

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

ACT I.

SCENE I....A drawing-room in SIR JOHN VESSEY'S house; folding-doors, at the back, which open on another drawing-room. To the right a table, with newspapers, books, &c.; to the left a sofa writing-table.

SIR JOHN, GEORGINA.

SIR JOHN [reading a letter edged with black]. Yes, he says at two precisely. "Dear Sir John, as since the death of my sainted Maria"—Hum—that 's his wife; she made him a martyr, and now he makes her a saint!

GEOR. Well, as since her death?

SIR JOHN [reading]. "I have been living in chambers, where I cannot so well invite ladies, you will allow me to bring Mr. Sharp, the lawyer, to read the will of the late Mr. Mordaunt (to which I am appointed executor) at your house—your daughter being the nearest relation. I shall be with you at two precisely. Henry Graves."

GEOR. And you really feel sure that poor Mr. Mordaunt has made me his heir?

SIR JOHN. Ay, the richest heiress in England! Can you doubt it? Are you not his nearest relation? Niece by your poor mother, his own sister! All the time he was making this enormous fortune in India did we ever miss sending him little reminiscences of our disinterested affection? When he was last in England, and you only so high, was not my house his home? Did n't I get a surfeit out of complaisance to his execrable curries and pillaws? Did n't he smoke his hookah—nasty old—that is, poor dear man—in my best drawing-room? And did you ever speak without calling him your "handsome uncle?"—for the excellent creature was as vain as a peacock—

GEOR. And so ugly—

SIR JOHN. The dear deceased! Alas, he was, indeed, like a kangaroo in a jaundice! And if, after all these marks of attachment, you are not his heiress, why then the finest feelings of our nature—the ties of blood—the principles of justice—are implanted in us in vain.

GEOR. Beautiful, sir. Was not that in your last speech at the Freemasons' Tavern upon the great Chimney-sweep Question?

SIR JOHN. Clever girl!—what a memory she has! Sit down, Georgy. Upon this most happy—I mean melancholy—occasion, I feel that I may trust you with a secret. You see this fine house—our fine servants—our fine plate—our fine dinners: every one thinks Sir John Vessey a rich man.

GEOR. And are you not, papa?

SIR JOHN. Not a bit of it—all humbug, child—all humbug, upon my soul! As you hazard a minnow to hook in a trout, so one guinea thrown out with address is often the best bait for a hundred. There are two rules in life—First, Men are valued not for what they are, but what they seem to be. SECONDLY, If you have no merit or money of your own, you must trade on the merits and money of other people. My father got the title by services in the army, and died penniless. On the strength of his services I got a pension of 400*l.* a-year—on the strength of 400*l.* a-year I took credit for 800*l.*: on the strength of 800*l.* a-year I married your mother with 10,000*l.*: on the strength of 10,000*l.* I took credit for 40,000*l.*, and paid Dicky Gossip three guineas a-week to go about everywhere calling me "Stingy Jack."

GEOR. Ha! ha! A disagreeable nickname.

SIR JOHN. But a valuable reputation. When a man is called stingy, it is as much as calling him rich; and when a man's called rich, why he 's a man universally respected. On the strength of my respectability I wheedled a constituency, changed my politics, resigned my seat to a minister, who, to a man of such stake in the country, could offer nothing less in return than a patent office of 2000*l.* a-year. That 's the way to succeed in life. Humbug, my dear!—all humbug, upon my soul!

GEOR. I must say that you—

SIR JOHN. Know the world, to be sure. Now, for your fortune. As I spend all that I have, I can have nothing to leave you; yet even without counting your uncle, you have always passed for an heiress on the credit of your expectations from the savings of "Stingy Jack." The same with your education. I never grudged anything to make a show—never stuffed your head with histories and homilies; but you draw, you sing, you dance, you walk well into a room; and that 's the way young ladies are educated now-a-days, in order to become a pride to their parents and a blessing to their husband—that is, when they have caught him. Apropos of a husband: you know we thought of Sir Frederick Blount.

GEOR. Ah, papa, he is so charming.

SIR JOHN. He was so, my dear, before we knew your poor uncle was dead; but an heiress such as you will be should look out for a duke. Where the deuce is Evelyn this morning?

GEOR. I 've not seen him, papa. What a strange character he is—so sarcastic; and yet he can be agreeable.

SIR JOHN. A humorist—a cynic! one never knows how to take him. My private secretary, a poor cousin, has not got a shilling, and yet, hang me if he does not keep us all at a sort of a distance.

GEOR. But why do you take him to live with us, papa, since there 's no good to be got by it?

SIR JOHN. There you are wrong; he has a great deal of talent: prepares my speeches, writes my pamphlets, looks up my calculations. My report on the last Commission has got me a great deal of fame, and has put me at the head of the new one. Besides, he is our cousin—he has no salary: kindness to a poor relation always tells well in the world; and benevolence is an useful virtue, particularly when you can have it for nothing. With our other cousin, Clara, it was different: her father thought fit to leave me her guardian, though she had not a penny—a mere useless incumbent; so, you see, I got my half-sister, Lady Franklin, to take her off my hands.

GEOR. How much longer is Lady Franklin's visit to be?

SIR JOHN. I do n't know, my dear; the longer the better, for her husband left her a good deal of money at her own disposal. Ah, here she comes.

SCENE II....LADY FRANKLIN, CLARA, SIR JOHN, GEORGINA.

SIR JOHN. My dear sister, we were just loud in your praises. But how 's this?—not in mourning?

LADY FRANK. Why should I go into mourning for a man I never saw?

SIR JOHN. Still there may be a legacy.

LADY FRANK. Then there 'll be less cause for affliction. Ha! ha! my dear Sir John, I 'm one of those who think feelings a kind of property, and never take credit for them upon false pretences.

SIR JOHN [aside]. Very silly woman! But, Clara, I see you are more attentive to the proper decorum; yet you are very, very, very distantly connected with the deceased—a third cousin, I think.

CLARA. Mr. Mordaunt once assisted my father, and these poor robes are all the gratitude I can show him.

SIR JOHN. Gratitude! humph! I am afraid the minx has got expectations.

LADY FRANK. So, Mr. Graves is the executor—the will is addressed to him! The same Mr. Graves who is always in black—always lamenting his ill fortune and his sainted Maria, who led him the life of a dog?

SIR JOHN. The very same. His liveries are black—his carriage is black—he always rides a black galloway—and, faith, if he ever marry again, I think he will show his respect to the sainted Maria by marrying a black woman.

LADY FRANK. Ha! ha! we shall see.—[Aside] Poor Graves, I always liked him: he made an excellent husband. Enter EVELYN [seats herself, and takes up a book, unserved.]

SIR JOHN. What a crowd of relations this Will brings to light: Mr. Stout, the Political Economist—Lord Glossmore—

LADY FRANK. Whose grandfather kept a pawnbroker's shop, and who, accordingly, entertains the profoundest contempt for every thing popular, parvenu, and plebeian.

SIR JOHN. Sir Frederick Blount—

LADY FRANK. Sir Fwedewick Blount, who objects to the letter R as being too rough, and therefore dwops its acquaintance: one of the new class of prudent young gentlemen, who, not having spirits and constitution for the hearty excesses of their predecessors, entrench themselves in the dignity of a lady-like languor. A man of fashion in the last century was riotous and thoughtless—in this he is tranquil and egotistical. He never does any thing that is silly, or says any thing that is wise. I beg your pardon, my dear; I believe Sir Frederick is an admirer of yours, provided, on reflection, he does not see "what hasom it could do him" to fall in love with your beauty and expectations. Then, too, our poor cousin the scholar,—Oh, Mr. Evelyn, there you are!

SIR JOHN. Evelyn—the very person I wanted: where have you been all day? Have you seen to those papers?—have you written my epitaph on poor Mordaunt?—Latin you know!—have you reported my speech at Exeter Hall?—have you looked out the debates on the Customs?—and, oh, have you mended up all the old pens in the study?

GEOR. And have you brought me the black floss silk?—have you been to Storr's for my ring?—and, as we cannot go out on this melancholy occasion, did you call at Hookham's for the last H. B. and the Comic Annual?

LADY FRANK. And did you see what was really the matter with my bay horse?—did you get me the Opera-box?—did you buy my little Charley his peg-top?

EVELYN [always, reading]. Certainly, Paley is right upon that point; for, put the syllogism thus—[looking up] Ma'am—Sir—Miss Vessey—you want something of me?—Paley observes, that to assist even the undeserving tends to the better regulation of our charitable feelings—no apologies—I am quite at your service.

SIR JOHN. Now he 's in one of his humours!

LADY FRANK. You allow him strange liberties, Sir John. Ev. You will be the less surprised at that, madam, when I inform you that Sir John allows me nothing else.—I am now about to draw on his benevolence.

LADY FRANK. I beg your pardon, sir, and like your spirit Sir John, I 'm in the way, I see; for I know your benevolence is so delicate that you never allow any one to detect it! [Walks aside.]

Ev. I could not do your commissions to-day—I have been to visit a poor woman, who was my nurse and my mother's last friend. She is very poor, very sick—dying—and she owes six months' rent!

SIR JOHN. You know I should be most happy to do anything for yourself. But the nurse—[aside] (some people's nurses are always ill!)—there are so many impostors about!—We 'll talk of it to-morrow. This most mournful occasion takes up all my attention. [Looking at his watch] Bless me! so late! I 've letters to write, and—none of the pens are mended? [Exit.]

GEOR. [taking out her purse]. I think I will give it to him—And yet, if I don't get the fortune after all!—Papa allows me so little!—then I must have those earrings [puts up the purse]. Mr. Evelyn, what is the address of your nurse?

Ev [writes and gives it]. She has a good heart with all her foibles!—Ah! Miss Vessey, if that poor woman had not closed the eyes of my lost mother, Alfred Evelyn would not have been this beggar to your father.

[CLARA looks over the address.]

GEOR. I will certainly attend to it [aside] if I get the fortune.

SIR JOHN [calling without]. Georgy, I say.

GEOR. Yes, papa.

EVELYN has seated himself again at the table [to the right], and leans his face on his hands.

CLARA. His noble spirit bowed to this!—Ah, at least here I may give him comfort—[sits down to write]. But he will recognise my hand.

LADY FRANK. What bill are you paying, Clara?—putting up a bank-note?

CLARA. Hush!—O Lady Franklin, you are the kindest of human beings. This is for a poor person—I would not have her know whence it came, or she would refuse it. Would you?—No,—he knows her handwriting also!

LADY FRANK. Will I—what?—give the money myself?—with pleasure! Poor Clara—Why, this covers all your savings—and I am so rich!

CLARA. Nay, I would wish to do all myself!—it is a pride—a duty—it is a joy; and I have so few joys! But, hush!—this way.

[They retire into the inner room and converse in dumb show.]

Ev. And thus must I grind out my life for ever!—I am ambitious, and Poverty drags me down!—I have learning, and Poverty makes me the drudge of fools!—I love, and Poverty stands like a spectre before the altar! But, no,—if, as I believe, I am but loved again, I will—will—what?—turn opium-eater, and dream of the Eden I may never enter!

LADY FRANK [to CLARA]. Yes, I will get my maid to copy and direct this—she writes well, and her hand will never be discovered. I will have it done and sent instantly. [Exit.]

CLARA advances to the front of the stage, and seats herself—EVELYN reading—Enter SIR FREDERICK BLOUNT.

SCENE III.... CLARA, EVELYN, SIR FREDERICK BLOUNT. BLOUNT. No one in the room! Oh, Miss Douglass! Pway do n't let me disturb you. Where is Miss Vesey—Georgina? [Taking CLARA's chair as she rises.]

EVELYN [Looking up, gives CLARA a chair, and re-seats himself].

[Aside]. Insolent puppy!

CLARA. Shall I tell her you are here, Sir Frederick?

BLOUNT. Not for the world—vewy pwetty girl this companion!

CLARA. What did you think of the Panorama the other day, cousin Evelyn?

EVELYN [reading].

"I cannot talk with civet in the room,

A fine puss gentleman that's all perfume!"

Rather good lines these.

BLOUNT. Sir!

EVELYN [offering the book]. Do n't you think so?—Cowper.

BLOUNT [declining the book]. Cowper!

Ev. Cowper.

BLOUNT. [shrugging his shoulders, to CLARA]. Stwange person, Mr. Evelyn! quite ajchawacter! Indeed the Panowama gives you no idea of Naples—a delightful place. I make it a wule to go there ewevy second year—I am vewy fond of twavelling. You'd like Wome (Rome)—bad inna, but vewy fine wuins; gives you quite a taste for that sort of thing!

Ev. [reading].

"How much a dunce that has been sent to roam Excels a dunce that has been kept at home."

BLOUNT. [aside]. That fellow Cowper says vewy odd things! Humph! it is beneath me to quawwell.—[Aloud]. It will not take long to wead the will, I suppose. Poor old Mordaunt—I am his nearest male relation. He was vewy eccentric. By the way, Miss Douglas, did you wemawk my ewicle? It is bwinging ewicles into fashion. I should be most happy if you would allow me to dwive you out.—Nay—nay—I should, upon my word.

Ev. [starting up]. A wasp! a wasp! just going to settle. Take care of the wasp, Miss Douglas!

BLOUNT. A wasp! where? do n't bwing it this way! some people don't mind them! I've a particular dislike to wasps; they sting damnably!

Ev. I beg pardon—it's only a gad-fly.

Enter SERVANT.

SERV. Sir John will be happy to see you in his study, Sir Frederick. [Exit Servant.]

BLOUNT. Vewy well. Upon my word, there is something vewy nice about this girl. To be sure, I love Georgina—but if this one would take a fancy to me [thoughtfully].—Well, I don't see what hawm it could do me! Au plaisir! [Exit.]

SCENE IV.... EVELYN, CLARA.

Ev. Clara!

CLARA. Cousin!

Ev. And you too are a dependant!

CLARA. But on Lady Franklin, who seeks to make me forget it.

Ev. Ay, but can the world forget it? This insolent condescension—this coxcombry of admiration—more galling than the arrogance of contempt! Look you now—Robe Beauty in silk and cachemire—hand Virtue into her chariot—lackey their caprices—wrap them from the winds—fence them around with a golden circle—and Virtue and Beauty are as goddesses, both to peasant and to prince.—Strip them of the adjuncts—see Beauty and Virtue poor—dependent—solitary—walking the world defenceless; oh, then, the devotion changes its character—the same crowd gather eagerly around—fools—fops—libertines—not to worship at the shrine, but to sacrifice the victim!

CLARA. My cousin, you are cruel!

Ev. Forgive me! There is a something, when a man's heart is better than his fortunes, that makes even affection bitter. Mortification for myself—it has ceased to chafe me. I can mock where I once resented. But you—you, so delicately framed and nurtured—one slight to you—one careless look—one disdainful tone—makes me feel the true curse of the poor man. His pride gives armour to his own breast, but it has no shield to protect another!

CLARA. But I too have pride of my own—I too can smile at the pointless insolence—

Ev. Smile—and he took your hand!—Oh, Clara, you know not the tortures that I suffer hourly! When others approach you—young—fair—rich—the sleek darlings of the world—I accuse you of your very beauty—I writhe beneath every smile that you bestow. No—speak not!—my heart has broke its silence, and you shall hear the rest. For you I have endured the weary bondage of this house—the fool's gibe—the hireling's sneer—the bread, purchased by toil, that should have led me to loftier ends: yes, to see you—hear you—breathe the same air—be ever at hand—that if others slighted, from one at least you might receive the luxury of respect! for this—for this I have lingered, suffered and forborne. Oh, Clara! we are orphans both—friendless both; you are all in the world to me: turn not away—my very soul speaks in these words—I love you.

CLARA. No—Evelyn—Alfred—No! say it not—think it not! it were madness.

Ev. Madness! Nay, hear me yet. I am poor—penniless—a beggar for bread to a dying servant. True!—But I have a heart of iron! I have knowledge—patience—health—and my love for you gives me at last ambition! I have trifled with my own energies till now, for I despised all things till I loved thee! With you to toil for—your step to support—your path to smoothe—and I—I, poor Alfred Evelyn—promise at last to win for you even fame and fortune! Do not withdraw your hand—this hand—shall it not be mine?

CLARA. Ah, Evelyn! Never—never!

Ev. Never!

CLARA. Forget this folly; our union is impossible, and to talk of love were to deceive both!

Ev. [bitterly]. Because I am poor!

CLARA. And I too! A marriage of privation—of penury—of days that dread the morrow! I have seen such a lot! Never return to this again.

Ev. Enough—you are obeyed. I deceived myself—ha! ha!—I fancied that I too was loved. I, whose youth is already half gone with care and toil!—whose mind is soured—whom nobody can love—who ought to have loved no one!

CLARA. [aside.] And if it were only I to suffer, or perhaps to starve!—Oh, what shall I say? Evelyn—Cousin?

Ev. Madam.

CLARA. Alfred—I—I—

Ev. Reject me!

CLARA. Yes! It is past! [Exit.]

Ev. Let me think. It was yesterday her hand trembled when mine touched it. And the rose I gave her—yes, she pressed her lips to it once when she seemed as if she saw me not. But it was a trap—a trick—for I was as poor then as now. This will be a jest for them all! Well, courage! it is but a poor heart that a coquet's contempt can break! And now that I care for no one, the world is but a great chess-board, and I will sit down in earnest and play with Fortune!

Enter LORD GLOSMORE preceded by SERVANT.

SERV. I will tell Sir John, my Lord!

[EVELYN takes up the newspaper.]

GLOSS. The secretary—hum!—Fine day, sir; any news from the East?

Ev. Yes!—all the wise men have gone back there!

GLOSS. Ha, ha!—not all, for here comes Mr. Stout, the great political economist.

SCENE V.

STOUT, GLOSMORE, EVELYN.

STOUT. Good morning, Glosmore.

GLOSS. Glosmore!—the Parvenu!

STOUT. Alford I might be late—Been detained at the Vestry—Astonishing how ignorant the English poor are! Took me an hour and a half to beat it into the head of a stupid old widow, with nine children, that to allow her three shillings a-week was against all the rules of public morality!

Ev. Excellent!—admirable!—your hand, sir!

GLOSS. What! you approve such doctrines, Mr. Evelyn? Are old women only fit to be starved?

Ev. Starved! popular delusion! Observe, my Lord—to squander money upon those who starve is only to afford encouragement to starvation!

STOUT. A very superior person that!

GLOSS. Atrocious principles! Give me the good old times when it was the duty of the rich to succour the distressed.

Ev. On second thoughts, you are right, my Lord. I, too, know a poor woman—ill—dying—in want. Shall she, too, perish?

GLOSS. Perish! horrible! in a Christian country. Perish! Heaven forbid!

Ev. [holding out his hand]. What, then, will you give her?

GLOSS. Ehem! Sir—the pariah ought to give.

STOUT. No!—No—No. Certainly not! [with great vehemence.]

GLOSS. No! no! But I say yes! yes! And if the pariah refuse to maintain the poor, the only way left to a man of firmness and resolution, holding the principles that I do, and adhering to the constitution of our fathers, is to force the poor on the pariah by never giving them a farthing oneself.

SCENE VI.... SIR JOHN, BLOUNT, LADY FRANKLIN, GEORGINA, GLOSMORE, STOUT, EVELYN.

SIR JOHN. How d'ye do! Ah! How d'ye do, gentlemen? This is a most melancholy meeting! The poor deceased! what a man he was!

BLOUNT. I was whistened Fwedewick after him! He was my first cousin.

SIR JOHN. And Georgina his own niece—next to kin! an excellent man, though odd—a kind heart, but no liver! I sent him twice a-year thirty dozen of the Cheltenham waters. It's a comfort to reflect on these little attentions at such a time.

STOUT. And I, too, sent him the Parliamentary Debates regularly, bound in calf. He was my second cousin—sensible man, and a follower of Malthus: never married to increase the surplus population, and fritter away his money on his own children. And now—

Ev. He reaps the benefit of celibacy in the prospective gratitude of every cousin he had in the world!

LADY FRANK. Ha! ha! ha!

SIR JOHN. Hush! hush! decency, Lady Franklin; decency!

Enter SERVANT.

SERV. Mr. Graves—Mr. Sharp.

SIR JOHN. Oh, here's Mr. Graves; that's Sharp, the lawyer, who brought the will from Calcutta.

SCENE VII.... GRAVES, SHARP, SIR JOHN, &c.

Chorus of SIR JOHN, GLOSMORE, BLOUNT, STOUT.

Ah, Sir—Ah, Mr. Graves!

[GEORGINA holds her handkerchief to her eyes.]

SIR JOHN. A sad occasion!

GRAVES. But every thing in life is sad. Be comforted Miss Vesey. True, you have lost an uncle: but I—I have lost a wife—such a wife!—the first of her sex—and the second cousin of the defunct! Excuse me, Sir John; at the sight of your mourning my wounds bleed afresh.

SIR JOHN. Take some refreshments—a glass of wine.

GRAVES. Thank you! (very fine sherry!) Ah, my poor sainted Maria! Sherry was her wine: everything reminds me of Maria! Ah, Lady Franklin! you knew her. Nothing in life can charm me now. [Aside]. A monstrous fine woman that!

SIR JOHN. And now to business. Evelyn, you may retire.

SHARP [looking at his notes]. Evelyn—any relation to Alfred Evelyn?

Ev. The same.

SHARP. Cousin to the deceased, seven times removed. Be seated, sir; there may be some legacy, though trifling; all the relations, however distant, should be present.

LADY FRANK. Then Clara is related—I will go for her. [Exit.]

GEOR. Ah, Mr. Evelyn; I hope you will come in for something—a few hundreds, or even more.

SIR JOHN. Silence! Hush! Whugh! ugh! Attention! [While the Lawyer opens the Will, re-enter LADY FRANKLIN and CLARA.]

SHARP. The will is very short—being all personal property. He was a man that always came to the point.

SIR JOHN. I wish there were more like him! [Groans and shakes his head.]

[Chorus groan and shake their heads.]

SHARP [reading]. "I, Frederick James Mordaunt, of Calcutta, being, at the present date, of sound mind, though infirm body, do hereby give, will, and bequeath—imprimis, to my second cousin, Benjamin Stout, Esq., of Pall-Mall, London—"

[Chorus exhibit lively emotion.]

Being the value of the Parliamentary Debates, with which he has been pleased to trouble me for some time past—deducting the carriage thereof, which he always forgot to pay—the sum of £14 2s. 4d.

[Chorus breathe more freely.]

STOUT. Eh, what!—£14! Oh, hang the old miser.

SIR JOHN. Decency—decency! Proceed, Sir.

SHARP. "Item.—To Sir Frederick Blount, Baronet, my nearest male relative—"

[Chorus exhibit lively emotion.]

BLOUNT. Poor old boy!

GEORGINA puts her arm over BLOUNT's chair.

SHARP. Being, as I am informed, the best dressed young man in London, and in testimony to the only merit I ever heard he possessed, the sum of £500, to buy a dressing-case.

[Chorus breathe more freely; GEORGINA catches her father's eye, and removes her arm.]

BLOUNT [laughing confusedly]. Ha! Ha! Ha! Vewy poor wit—low!—vewy—vewy low!

SIR JOHN. Silence, now, will you?

SHARP. "Item.—To Charles Lord Glosmore—who asserts that he is my relation—my collection of dried butterflies, and the pedigree of the Mordaunts from the reign of King John."

[Chorus as before.]

GLOSS. Butterflies! Pedigree! I disown the plebeian!

SIR JOHN [angrily]. Upon my word, this is too revolting! Decency—go on.

SHARP. "Item.—To Sir John Vesey, Baronet, Knight of the Guelph, F. R. S., F. S. A., &c."

[Chorus as before.]

SIR JOHN. Hush! Now it is really interesting!

SHARP. "Who married my sister, and who sends me every year the Cheltenham waters, which nearly gave me my death—I bequeath—the empty bottles."

SIR JOHN. Why, the ungrateful, rascally old—

CHORUS. Decency, Sir John—decency!

SHARP. "Item.—To Henry Graves, Esq., of the Albany—"

[Chorus as before.]

GRAVES. Pooh, gentlemen—my usual luck—not even a ring, I dare swear!

SHARP. "The sum of £5000 in the Three per Cents."

LADY FRANK. I wish you joy!

GRAVES. Joy—pooh! Three per Cents! Funds sure to go! Had it been land, now—though only an acre! just like my luck.

SHARP "Item.—To my niece, Georgina Vesey—"

[Chorus as before.]

SIR JOHN. Ah, now it comes!

SHARP. "The sum of £10,000 India stock, being, with her father's reputed savings, as much as a single woman ought to possess."

SIR JOHN. And what the devil, then, does the old fool do with all his money?

CHORUS. Really, Sir John, this is too revolting. Decency! Hush!

SHARP. "And, with the aforesaid legacies and exceptions, I do will and bequeath the whole of my fortune, in India stocks, Bonds, Exchequer bills, Three per Cents, Consols, and in the Bank of Calcutta (constituting him hereby sole residuary legatee and joint executor with the aforesaid Henry Graves, Esq.,) to Alfred Evelyn, now or formerly of Trinity College, Cambridge—"

SHARP. "Being, I am told, an oddity, like myself—the only one of my relations who never fawned on me, and who, having known privation, may the better employ wealth." And now, Sir, I have only to wish you joy, and give you this letter from the deceased—I believe it is important.

Ev. [crossing over to CLARA.] Ah, Clara, if you had but loved me!

CLARA [turning away]. And his wealth, even more than poverty, separates us for ever. [Owens crowd round to congratulate EVELYN.]

SIR JOHN [to GEORGINA]. Go, child—put a good face on it—he's an immense match! My dear fellow, I wish you joy: you are a great man now—a very great man!

Ev. [aside]. And her voice alone is silent!

LORD GLOSS. If I can be of any use to you—

STOUT. Or I, Sir—

BLOUNT. Or I? Shall I put you up at the clubs?

SHARP. You will want a man of business. I transacted all Mr. Mordaunt's affairs.

SIR JOHN. Tush, tush! Mr. Evelyn is at home here—always looked on him as a son! Nothing in the world we would not do for him! Nothing!

Ev. Lend me £10 for my old nurse!

END OF ACT I.

ACT II.

SCENE I.... An anteroom in Evelyn's new house; at one corner, behind a large screen, MR. SHARP writing at a desk, books and parchments before him—MR. CRIMBON, the portrait-painter; MR. GRAVE, the publisher; MR. MAC-STUCCO, the architect; MR. TABOURET, the upholsterer; MR. MACFINCH, the silversmith; MR. PATENT, the coach-maker; MR. KITE, the horse-dealer; and MR. FRANTZ, the tailor.—[SERVANTS in livery cross to and fro the stage.]

PAT. [to FRANTZ, showing a drawing.] Yes, sir; this is the Evelyn vis-a-vis! No one more the fashion than Mr. Evelyn. Money makes the man, sir.

FRANTZ. But de tailor, de schneider, make de gentleman! It is Mr. Frantz, of St. James's, who take his measure and his cloth, and who make de fine handsome noble-men and gentry, where de faders and de mutters make only de ugly little naked boys!

MACSTUCCO. He's a moan o' teesto. Mr. Evelyn. He taulks o' buying a vesela (villa), just to pool dune and build oop again. Ah, Mr. Macfinch, a design for a piece of plete, eh?

MACFINCH. [showing the drawing.] Yees, sir, the shield o' Alexander the Great, to hold ices and lemonade! It will coast two thousand pound!

MACSTUCCO. And it's dirt cheap—ye're Scotch, arn't ye?

MACFINCH. Aberdounshire!—scratch me, and I'll scratch you!

Ev. A levee, as usual. Good day. Ah, Tabouret, your designs for the draperies; very well. And what do you want, Mr. Crimson?

CRIM. Sir, if you'd let me take your portrait, it would make my fortune. Every one says you're the finest judge of paintings.

Ev. Of paintings! paintings! Are you sure I'm a judge of paintings?

CRIM. Oh, sir, did n't you buy the great Correggio for £4000?

Ev. True—I see. So £4000 makes me an excellent judge of paintings. I'll call on you, Mr. Crimson—good day. Mr. Grab—oh, you're the publisher who once refused me £5 for my poem?—you are right, it was sad doggrel.

GRAB. Doggrel! Mr. Evelyn it was sublime! But times were bad then.

Ev. Very bad times with me.

GRAB. But, now, sir, if you give me the preference, I'll push it, sir—I'll push it! I only publish for poets in high life, sir; and a gentleman of your station ought to be pushed! £500 for the poem, sir!

Ev. £500 when I don't want it, where £5 once would have seemed a fortune.

"Now I am rich, what value in the lines!
How the wit brightens—how the sense refines!"

KITE. Thirty young horses from Yorkshire, sir.

PATENT. [showing drawing]. The Evelyn vis-a-vis!

MACFINCH. [showing drawing]. The Evelyn salver.

FRANTZ. [opening his bundle, and with dignity]. Sare, I have brought de coat—de great Evelyn coat—

Ev. Oh, go to—that is, go home. Make me as celebrated for vis-a-vis, salvers, furniture, and coats, as I already am for painting, and shortly shall be for poetry. I resign myself to you—go!

[Exit MACFINCH, PATENT, &c.]

Enter STOUT.

Ev. Stout, you look heated.

STOUT. I hear you have just bought the great Grogin-hole property.

Ev. It is true. Sharp says it's a bargain.

STOUT. Well, my dear friend Hopkins, member for Grogin-hole, can't live another month—but the interest of mankind forbid regret for individuals. The patriot Popkins intends to start for the boro' the instant Hopkins is dead—your interest will secure his election! now is your time!—put yourself forward in the march of enlightenment. By all that is bigoted here comes Glossmore!

SCENE II....STOUT, GLOSSMORE, EVELYN; SHARP, still at his desk.

GLOSS. So lucky to find you at home. Hopkins, of Grogin-hole, is not long for this world. Popkins, the brewer, is already canvassing underhand (so very ungentleman-like). Keep your interest for Lord Cipher—a most valuable candidate. This is an awful moment—the CONSTITUTION depends on his return! Vote for Cipher!

STOUT. Popkins is your man.

Ev. [musingly]. Cipher and Popkins—Popkins and Cipher! Enlightenment and Popkins—Cipher and the Constitution! I AM puzzled. Stout, I am not known at Grogin-hole.

STOUT. Your property's known there.

Ev. But purity of election—independence of votes—

STOUT. To be sure: Cipher bribes abominably. Frustrate his schemes—preserve the liberties of the borough—turn every man out of his house who votes against enlightenment and Popkins.

Ev. Right! down with those who take the liberty to admire any liberty except our liberty! That is liberty!

GLOSS. Cipher has a stake in the country—will have £50,000 a-year—Cipher will never give a vote without considering beforehand how people of £50,000 a-year will be affected by the motion.

Ev. Right: for, as without law there would be no property, so to be the law for property is the only proper property of law! That is law!

STOUT. Popkins is all for economy—there's a sad waste of the public money—they give the Speaker £5000 a-year, when I've a brother-in-law who takes the chair at the vestry, and who assures me confidentially he'd consent to be Speaker for half the money.

GLOSS. Enough, Mr. Stout. Mr. Evelyn has too much at stake to be a leveller.

STOUT. And too much sense to be a bigot.

Ev. Mr. Evelyn has no politics at all! Did you ever play at battledore?

BOTH. Battledore!

Ev. Battledore!—that is, a contest between two parties: both parties knock about something with singular skill—something is kept up—high—low—here—there—everywhere—nowhere! How grave are the players! how anxious the bystanders! how noisy the battledores! But when this something falls to the ground, only fancy—it's nothing but cork and feather! Go, and play for yourselves—I'm no hand at it.

STOUT. [aside]. Sad ignorance! Aristocrat!

GLOSS. Heartless principles! Parvenu!

STOUT. Then you don't go against us? I'll bring Popkins to-morrow.

GLOSS. Keep yourself free till I present Cipher to you.

STOUT. I must go to inquire after Hopkins. The return of Popkins will be an era in history. [Exit.]

GLOSS. I must be off to the club—the eyes of the country are upon Grogin-hole. If Cipher fail, the Constitution is gone! [Exit.]

Ev. Sharp, come here—let me look at you! You are my agent, my lawyer, my man of business. I believe you honest; but what is honesty? where does it exist? in what part of us?

SHARP. In the heart, I suppose, sir.

Ev. Mr. Sharp, it exists in the breeches' pocket! Observe, I lay this piece of yellow earth on the table—I contemplate you both; the man there—the gold here! Now, there is many a man in those streets honest as you are, who moves, thinks, feels, and reasons as well as we do; excellent in form—impenetrable in soul; who, if his pockets were three days empty, would sell thought, reason, body, and soul too, for that little coin. Is that the fault of the man? no it is the fault of mankind! God made man; behold what mankind have made a god! When I was poor I hated the world; now I am rich I despise it! Fools—knaves—hypocrites!—By the by, Sharp, send £100 to the poor bricklayer whose house was burnt down yesterday.

Enter GRAVES.

Ah, Graves, my dear friend! what a world this is! a cur of a world, that fawns on its master, and bites the beggar. Ah! ha! it fawns on me now, for the beggar has bought the cur.

GRAVES. It is an atrocious world! but it will be burnt one day, and that's some comfort.

Ev. Every hour brings its gloomy lesson—the temper sours—the affections wither—the heart hardens into stone! Zounds, Sharp! what do you stand gaping there for? have you no bowels? why don't you go and see to the brick-layer?

[Exit SHARP.]

SCENE III....GRAVES, EVELYN.

Ev. Graves, of all my new friends—and their name is Legion—you are the only one I esteem; there is sympathy between us—we take the same views of life. I am cordially glad to see you!

GRAVES. [growing]. Ah! why should you be glad to see a man so miserable?

Ev. Because I am miserable myself!

GRAVES. You! Pahaw! you have not been condemned to lose a wife!

Ev. But, plague on it, man, I may be condemned to take one!—Sit down, and listen. I want a confidant!—Left fatherless, when a yet boy, my poor mother grudged herself food, to give me education. Some one had told her that learning was better than house and land—that's a lie, Graves.

GRAVES. A scandalous lie, Evelyn!

Ev. On the strength of that lie I was put to school—sent to college, a sizar. Do you know what a sizar is? In pride he is a gentleman—in knowledge he is a scholar—and he crawls about, amidst gentlemen and scholars, with the livery of a pauper on his back! I carried off the great prizes—I became distinguished—I looked to a high degree, leading to a fellowship; that is, an independence for myself—a home for my mother. One day a young lord insulted me—I retorted—he struck me—refused apology—refused redress. I was a sizar!—a Pariah!—a thing to be struck! Sir, I was at least a man, and I horsewhipped him in the hall before the eyes of the whole College! A few days, and the lord's chastisement was forgotten. The next day the sizar was expelled—the career of a life blasted. That is the difference between Rich and Poor: it takes a whirlwind to move the one—a breath may uproot the other! I came to London. As long as my mother lived I had one to toil for; and I did toil—did hope—did struggle to be something yet. She died, and then, somehow, my spirit broke—I resigned myself to my fate; the Alps above me seemed too high to ascend—I ceased to care what became of me. At last I submitted to be the poor relation—the hanger-on and gentleman-lackey of Sir John Vesey. But I had an object in that—there was one in that house whom I had loved at the first sight.

GRAVES. And were you loved again?

Ev. I fancied it, and was deceived. Not an hour before I inherited this mighty wealth, I confessed my love, and was rejected because I was poor. Now, mark: you remember the letter which Sharp gave me when the will was read?

GRAVES. Perfectly: what were the contents?

Ev. After hints, cautions, and admonitions—half in irony, half in earnest (Ah, poor Mordaunt had known the world!), it proceeded—but I'll read it to you:—"Having selected you as my heir, because I think money a trust to be placed where it seems likely to be best employed, I now—not impose a condition, but ask a favor. If you have formed no other and insuperable attachment, I could wish to suggest your choice: my two nearest female relations are my niece Georgina, and my third cousin, Clara Douglas, the daughter of a once dear friend. If you could see in either of these one whom you could make your wife, such would be a marriage that, if I live long enough to return to England, I would seek to bring about before I die." My friend, this is not a legal condition—the fortune does not rest on it; yet, need I say that my gratitude considers it a moral obligation? Several months have elapsed since thus called upon—I ought now to decide: you hear the names—Clara Douglas is the woman who rejected me!

GRAVES. But now she would accept you!

Ev. And do you think I am so base a slave to passion, that I would owe to my gold what was denied to my affection?

GRAVES. But you must choose one, in common gratitude; you ought to do so—yes, there you are right. Besides, you are constantly at the house—the world observes it: you must have raised hopes in one of the girls. Yes; it is time to decide between her whom you love, and her whom you do not!

Ev. Of the two, then, I would rather marry where I should exact the least. A marriage, to which each can bring sober esteem and calm regard, may not be happiness, but it may be content. But to marry one whom you could adore, and whose heart is closed to you—to yearn for the treasure, and only to claim the casket—to worship the statue that you never may warm to life. Oh! such a marriage would be a hell the more terrible because Paradise was in sight.

GRAVES. Georgina is pretty, but vain and frivolous. [Aside.] But he has no right to be fastidious: he has never known Maria! [Aloud.] Yes, my dear friend, now I think on it, you will be as wretched as myself! When you are married we will mingle our groans together!

Ev. You may misjudge Georgina; she may have a nobler nature than appears on the surface. On the day, but before the hour, in which this will was read, a letter, in a strange or disguised hand, signed, "From an unknown friend of Alfred Evelyn," and enclosing what to a girl would have been a considerable sum, was sent to a poor woman for whom I had implored charity, and whose address I had given only to Georgina.

GRAVES. Why not assure yourself?

Ev. Because I have not dared. For sometimes, against my reason, I have hoped that it might be Clara! [taking a letter from his bosom and looking at it.] No, I can't recognize the hand. Graves, I detest that girl!

GRAVES. Who? Georgina?

Ev. No; Clara! But I've already, thank Heaven! taken some revenge upon her. Come nearer. [Whispering.] I've bribed Sharp to say that Mordaunt's letter to me contained a codicil leaving Clara Douglas £20,000.

GRAVES. And did n't it? How odd, then, not to have mentioned her in his will.

Ev. One of his caprices: besides, Sir John wrote him word that Lady Franklin had adopted her. But I'm glad of it—I've paid the money—she's no more a dependant. No one can insult her now—she owes it all to me, and does not guess it, man—does not guess it!—owes it to me, me whom she rejected;—me, the poor scholar—Ha! ha!—there's some spite in that, eh?

GRAVES. You're a fine fellow, Evelyn, and we understand each other. Perhaps Clara may have seen the address, and dictated this letter, after all.

Ev. Do you think so?—I'll go to the house this instant!

GRAVES. Eh? Humph! Then I'll go with you. That Lady Franklin is a fine woman! If she were not so gay, I think—I could—

Ev. No; no; don't think any such thing: women are even worse than men.

GRAVES. True; to love is a boy's madness!

Ev. To feel is to suffer!

GRAVES. To hope is to be deceived.

Ev. I have done with romance!

GRAVES. Mine is buried with Maria!

Ev. If Clara did but write this!

GRAVES. Make haste, or Lady Franklin will be out!—A vale of tears!—a vale of tears!

Ev. A vale of tears, indeed!

[Exit.]

Re-enter GRAVES for his hat.

And I left my hat behind me! Just like my luck! If I had been bred a hatter, little boys would have come into the world without heads.

SCENE IV....Drawing-rooms at SIR JOHN VESSEY'S, as in Scene I., Act I.

LADY FRANKLIN, CLARA, SERVANT.

LADY FRANK. Past two, and I have so many places to go to. Tell Philipps I want the carriage directly—instantly.

SERVANT. I beg pardon, my Lady; Philipps told me to say the young horse had fallen lame, and could not be used to-day. [Exit.]

LADY FRANK. Well, on second thought, that is lucky; now I have an excuse for not making a great many tedious visits. I must borrow Sir John's horses for the ball to-night. Oh, Clara, you must see my new turban from Carson's—the prettiest thing in the world, and so becoming!

CLARA. Ah, Lady Franklin, you'll be so sorry—but—but—

LADY FRANK. But what?

CLARA. Such a misfortune! poor Smith is in tears—I promised to break it to you. Your little Charley had been writing his copy, and spilt the ink on the table; and Smith not seeing it—and taking out the turban to put in the pearls as you desired—she—she—

LADY FRANK. Ha! ha! laid it on the table, and the ink spoilt it. Ha! ha! how well I can fancy the face she made! Seriously, on the whole, it is fortunate; for I think I look best, after all in the black hat and feathers.

CLARA. Dear Lady Franklin, you really have the sweetest temper!

LADY FRANK. I hope so—for it's the most becoming turban a woman can wear! Think of that when you marry Oh, talking of marriage, I've certainly made a conquest of Mr. Graves.

CLARA. Mr. Graves! I thought he was inconsolable.

LADY FRANK. For his sainted Maria! Poor man! not contented with plaguing him while she lived, she must needs haunt him now she is dead.

CLARA. But why does he regret her?

LADY FRANK. Why? Because he has every thing to make him happy. Easy fortune, good health, respectable character. And since it is his delight to be miserable, he takes the only excuse the world will allow him. For the rest—it's the way with widowers; that is, whenever they mean to marry again. But, my dear Clara, you seem absent, pale, unhappy—tears too?

CLARA. No, no, not tears. No!

LADY FRANK. Ever since Mr. Mordaunt left you £20,000 every one admires you. Sir Frederick is desperately smitten.

CLARA. [with disdain]. Sir Frederick!

LADY FRANK. Ah! Clara, be comforted—I know your secret: I am certain that Evelyn loves you.

CLARA. He did; it is past now. He misconceived me when he was poor; and now he is rich, it is not for me to explain.

LADY FRANK. My dear child, happiness is too rare to be sacrificed to a scruple. Why does he come here so often?

CLARA. Perhaps for Georgina.

Enter SIR JOHN, and turns over the books &c., on the table, as if to look for the newspaper.

LADY FRANK. Pooh! Georgina is my niece;—she is handsome and accomplished—but her father's worldliness has spoilt her nature; she is not worthy of Evelyn. Behind the humor of his irony there is something noble—something that may yet be great. For his sake as well as yours, let me at least—

CLARA. Recommend me to his pity. Ah, Lady Franklin! if he addressed me from dictation, I should again refuse him. No; if he cannot read my heart—if he will not seek to read it, let it break unknown.

LADY FRANK. You mistake me, my dear child: let me only tell him that you dictated that letter—that you sent that money to his old nurse. Poor Clara! it was your little all. He will then know, at least, if avarice be your sin.

CLARA. He would have guessed it, had his love been like mine.

LADY FRANK. Guessed it—nonsense! The handwriting unknown to him—every reason to think it came from Georgina.

SIR JOHN [aside.] Hum! Came from Georgina!

LADY FRANK. Come, let me tell him this. I know the effect it would have upon his choice.

CLARA. Choice! oh, that humiliating word! No, Lady Franklin, no! Promise me!

LADY FRANK. But—

CLARA. No! Promise—faithfully—sacredly.

LADY FRANK. Well, I promise.

CLARA. You know how fearful is my character—no infant is more timid: if a poor spider cross the floor, you often laugh to see me grow pale and tremble; and yet I would lay this hand upon the block—I would walk barefoot over the ploughshare of the old ordeal—to save Alfred Evelyn one moment's pain. But I have refused to share his poverty, and I should die with shame if he thought I had now grown enamored of his wealth. My kind friend, you will keep your promise?

LADY FRANK. Yes, since it must be so.

CLARA. Thanks. I—I—forgive me—I am not well.

[Exit.]

LADY FRANK. What fools these girls are!—they take as much pains to lose a husband as a poor widow does to get one!

SIR JOHN. Have you seen the Times newspaper? Where the deuce is the newspaper? I can't find the Times newspaper.

LADY FRANK. I think it is in my room. Shall I fetch it?

SIR JOHN. My dear sister—you're the best creature. Do! [Exit LADY FRANKLIN.] Ugh! you unnatural conspirator against your own family! What can this letter be? Ah! I recollect something.

Enter GEORGINA.

GEOR. Papa, I want—

SIR JOHN. Yes, I know what you want well enough! Tell me—were you aware that Clara had sent money to that old nurse Evelyn bored us about the day of the will?

GEOR. No! He gave me the address, and I promised, if—

SIR JOHN. Gave you the address?—that's lucky! Hush!

Enter SERVANT.

SERV. Mr. Graves—Mr. Evelyn.

SCENE V....GRAVES, EVELYN, SIR JOHN, GEORGINA, LADY FRANKLIN.

LADY FRANK. [returning.] Here is the newspaper.

GRAVES. Ay, read the newspapers!—they'll tell you what this world is made of. Daily calendars of roguery and wof! Here, advertisements from quacks, money-lenders, cheap ware-houses, and spotted boys with two heads. So much for dupes and impostors! Turn to the other column—police reports, bankruptcies, swindling, forgery, and a biographical sketch of the snub-nosed man who murdered his own three little cherubs at Petonville. Do you fancy these but exceptions to the general virtue and health of the nation?—turn to the leading article! and your hair will stand on end at the horrible wickedness or melancholy idiom of that half the population who think differently from yourself. In my day I have seen already eighteen crises, six annihilations of Agriculture and Commerce, four overthrows of the Church, and three last, final, awful, and irremediable destructions of the entire Constitution! And that's a newspaper!

LADY FRANK. Ha! ha! your usual vein! always so amusing and good humored!

GRAVES [frowning and very angry]. Ma'am—good humored!

LADY FRANK. Ah! you should always wear that agreeable smile; you look so much younger, so much handsomer, when you smile!

GRAVES [softened]. Ma'am—A charming creature, upon my word!

LADY FRANK. You have not seen the last H. B.? it is excellent. I think it might make you laugh. But, by-the-by, I don't think you can laugh.

GRAVES. Ma'am, I have not laughed since the death of my sainted Ma—

LADY FRANK. Ah! and that spiteful Sir Frederick says you never laugh, because—but you'll be angry?

GRAVES. Angry!—pooh! I despise Sir Frederick too much to let any thing he says have the smallest influence over me! He says I don't laugh, because—

LADY FRANK. You have lost your front teeth!

GRAVES. Lost my front teeth! Upon my word! Ha! ha! ha! That's too good—capital! Ha! ha! ha! [laughing from ear to ear.]

LADY FRANK. Ha! ha! ha! [They retire in the table in the inner drawing-room.]

EVELYN [aside.] Of course Clara will not appear!—avoids me as usual! But what do I care?—what is she to me? Nothing! I'll swear this is her glove!—no one else has so small a hand. She'll miss it—so—so! Nobody's looking—I'll keep it, just to vex her.

SIR JOHN [to GEORGINA.] Yes, yes, leave me to manage: you took his portrait, as I told you.

GEOR. Yes—but I could not catch the expression. I got Clara to touch it up.

SIR JOHN. That girl's always in the way!

Enter CAPTAIN DUDLEY SMOOTH.

SMOOTH. Good morning, dear John. Ah, Miss Vesey, you have no idea of the conquests you made at Almack's last night.

Ev. [examining him curiously while SMOOTH is talking to GEORGINA.] And that's the celebrated Dudley Smooth!

SIR JOHN. More commonly called Deadly Smooth!—the finest player at whist, ecarte, billiards, chess, and piquet, between this and the Pyramids—the sweetest manners!—always calls you by your Christian name. But take care how you play at cards with him!

* For this melancholy jest Mr. Graves is indebted to a hypocondriacal abbe. The author read it some years ago in one of the French Ann.; he cannot remember which.

Ev. He does not cheat, I suppose?

SIR JOHN. Hist! No!—but he always wins! Eats up a brace of lords and a score or two of guardsmen every season, and runs through a man's fortune like a course of the Carlsbad waters. He's an uncommonly clever fellow!

Ev. Clever? yes. When a man steals a loaf, we cry down the knavery; when a man diverts his neighbor's mill-stream to grind his own corn, we cry up the cleverness. And every one courts Captain Dudley Smooth.

SIR JOHN. Why, who could offend him? the best-bred, civillest creature, and a dead shot. There is not a cleverer man in the three kingdoms.

Ev. A study—a study—let me examine him. Such men are living satires on the world.

SMOOTH [passing his arm caressingly over SIR JOHN'S shoulder]. My dear John, how well you are looking! A new lease of life. Introduce me to Mr. Evelyn.

Ev. Sir, it's an honor I've long ardently desired.

[They bow and shake hands.]

Enter SIR FREDERICK BLOUNT.

BLOUNT. How d'ye do, Sir John. Ah, Evelyn, I wished so much to see you.

Ev. 'T is my misfortune to be visible.

BLOUNT. A little this way. You know, perhaps, that I once paid my addresses to Miss Vesey; but since that wavy eccentric will Sir John has shuffled me off, and hints at a prior attachment—[aside] which I know to be false.

Ev [seeing CLARA]. A prior attachment!—(Ha! Clara!) Well, another time, my dear Blount.

Enter CLARA.

BLOUNT. Stay a moment; I want you to do me a favor with regard to Miss Douglas.

Ev. Miss Douglas!

BLOUNT. Yes; you see, though Georgina has great expectations, and Stingy Jack will leave her all that he has, yet she has only her legacy of £10,000 at the moment—no doubt closely settled on herself too: Clara has £20,000. And, I think, Clara always liked me a little.

Ev. You! I dare say she did.

BLOUNT. It is whispered about that you mean to propose to Georgina. Nay, Sir John more than hinted that was her prior attachment.

Ev. Indeed!

BLOUNT. Now, as you are all in all with the family, if you could say a word for me to Miss Douglas, I don't see what harm it could do me! [Aside.] I will punish Georgina for her puerility.

Ev. 'S death, man! speak for yourself! you are just the sort of man for young ladies to like; they understand you; you're of their own level. Pahaw! you're too modest—you want no mediator!

BLOUNT. My dear fellow, you flatter me. I'm well enough in my way. But you, you know, would cawwy everything before you! you're so confoundedly wick!

Ev. [turning to CLARA]. Miss Douglas, what do you think of Sir Frederick Blount? Observe him. He is well dressed—young—tolerably handsome [BLOUNT bowing.]—bows with an air—has plenty of small talk—every thing to captivate. Yet he thinks that if he and I were suitors to the same lady, I should be more successful because I am richer! What say you? Is love an auction? and do women's hearts go to the highest bidder?

CLARA. Their hearts? No!

Ev. But their hands—yes! You turn away. Ah, you dare not answer that question!

GEOR. [aside]. Sir Frederick flirting with Clara? I'll punish him for his perfidy. You are the last person to talk so, Mr. Evelyn!—you, whose wealth is your smallest attraction; you, whom every one admires, so witty, such taste, such talent! Ah, I'm very foolish!

SIR JOHN [clapping him on the shoulder]. You must not turn my little girl's head. Oh, you're a sad fellow! Apropos, I must show you Georgina's last drawings. She has wonderfully improved since you gave her lessons in perspective.

GEOR. No, papa; No! pray, no! Nay, don't!

SIR JOHN. Nonsense, child! it's very odd, but she's more afraid of you than of any one!

SMOOTH [to BLOUNT, taking snuff]. He's an excellent father, our dear John! and supplies the place of a mother to her. [Turns away to LADY FRANKLIN and GRAVES.]

[EVELYN and GEORGINA seat themselves, and look over the drawings; and SIR JOHN leans over them; SIR FREDERICK converses with CLARA; EVELYN watches them.]

Ev. Beautiful!—a view from Tivoli. [Death! she looks down while he speaks to her!] Is there a little fault in that coloring? (She positively blushes!) But this Jupiter is superb. (What a d—d coxcomb it is!) [Rising.] Oh, she certainly loves him—I too can be loved elsewhere—I too can see smiles and blushes on the face of another!

GEOR. Are you not well?

Ev. I beg pardon. Yes, you are indeed improved! Ah, who so accomplished as Miss Vesey? [Takes up the drawings; pays her marked attention in dumb show.]

CLARA. Yes, Sir Frederick, the concert was very crowded! Ah, I see that Georgina consoles him for the past! He has only praises for her, nothing but taunts for me!

BLOUNT. I wish you would take my opewa-box next Saturday—it is the best in the house. I'm not wick, but I spend what I have on myself! I make a point to have everything the best in a quiet way. Best opewa-box—best dogs—best horses—best house of its kind. I want nothing to complete my establishment but the best wife!

CLARA [abstractedly]. That will come in good time, Sir Frederick.

Ev. Oh, it will come—will it? Georgina refused the trifter—she courts him [taking up a portrait]. Why, what is this? my own—

GEOR. You must not look at that—you must not indeed. I did not know it was there!

SIR JOHN. Your own portrait, Evelyn. Why, child! I was not aware you took likenesses! That's something new! Upon my word it's a strong resemblance.

GEOR. Oh, no—it does not do him justice. Give it to me. I will tear it. [Aside] That odious Sir Frederick!

Ev. Nay, you shall not.

CLARA. So—so—he loves her then! Misery—misery! But he shall not perceive it! No—no—I can be proud too.

Ha! ha!—Sir Frederick—excellent—excellent—you are so entertaining—ha! ha! [laughs hysterically.]

Ev. Oh, the affectation of coquettes—they cannot even laugh naturally! [CLARA looks at him reproachfully, and walks aside with SIR FREDERICK.]

But where is the new guitar you meant to buy, Miss Vesey—the one inlaid with tortoise-shell? It is near a year since you set your heart on it, and I do n't see it yet!

SIR JOHN [taking him aside confidentially]. The guitar—oh, to tell you a secret—she applied the money I gave her for it to a case of charity several months ago—the very day the will was read. I saw the letter lying on the table, with the money in it. Mind, not a word to her—she'd never forgive me!

Ev. Letter! money! What was the name of the person she relieved? not Stanton?

SIR JOHN. I do n't remember indeed.

Ev. [taking out the letter.] This is not her hand!

SIR JOHN. No! I observed at the time it was not her hand, but I got out from her that she did not wish the thing to be known, and had employed some one else to copy it. May I see the letter? Yes, I think this is the wording. But I did not mean to tell you what case of charity it was. I promised Georgy I would not. Still, how did she know Mrs. Stanton's address? you never gave it to me!

Ev. I gave it to her, Sir John.

CLARA [at the distance]. Yes, I'll go to the opera, if Lady Franklin will. Do go, dear Lady Franklin! on Saturday, then, Sir Frederick.

Ev. Sir John, to a man like me, this simple act of unostentatious generosity is worth all the accomplishments in the world. A good heart—a tender disposition—a charity that shuns the day—a modesty that blushes at its own excellence—an impulse towards something more divine than Mammon; such are the true accomplishments which preserve beauty for ever young. Such I have sought in the partner I would take for life; such I have found—alas! not where I had dreamed! Miss Vesey, I will be honest—I say, then, frankly—[as CLARA approaches, raising his voice and looking fixedly at her]—I have loved another—deeply—truly—bitterly—vainly! I cannot offer to you, as I did to her, the fair first love of the human heart—rich with all its blossoms and its verdure. But if esteem—if gratitude—if an earnest resolve to conquer every recollection that would wander from your image; if these can tempt you to accept my hand and fortune, my life shall be a study to deserve your confidence. [CLARA stands motionless, clasping her hands, and then slowly seats herself.]

SIR JOHN. The happiest day of my life. [CLARA falls back in her chair.]

Ev. [darting forward.] [Aside.] She is pale; she faints! What have I done? Oh, heaven! Clara!

CLARA [rising with a smile.] Be happy, my cousin—be happy! Yes, with my whole heart I say it—be happy, Alfred Evelyn!

END OF ACT II.

ACT III.

SCENE I....The drawing-room in SIR JOHN VESSEY'S house.—SIR JOHN, GEORGINA.

SIR JOHN. And he has not pressed you to fix the wedding-day?

GEOR. No; and since he proposed he comes here so seldom, and seems so gloomy. Heigho! Poor Sir Frederick was twenty times more amusing.

SIR JOHN. But Evelyn is fifty times as rich!

GEOR. Sir Frederick dresses so well!

SIR JOHN. You'll have magnificent diamonds! But a word with you: I saw you yesterday in the square with Sir Frederick; that must not happen again. When a young lady is engaged to one man, nothing is so indecorous as to flirt with another. It might endanger your marriage itself. Oh, it's highly indecorous!

GEOR. Don't be afraid, papa; he takes up with Clara.

SIR JOHN. Who? Evelyn?

GEOR. Sir Frederick. Heigho! I hate artful girls.

SIR JOHN. The settlements will be splendid! if any thing happens, nothing can be handsomer than your jointure.

GEOR. My own kind papa, you always put things so pleasantly. But do you not fear lest he discover that Clara wrote the letter?

SIR JOHN. No; and I shall get Clara out of the house. But there is something else that makes me very uneasy.—You know that no sooner did Evelyn come into possession of his fortune than he launched out in the style of a prince. His house in London is a palace, and he has bought a great estate in the country. Look how he lives. Balls, banquets, fine arts, fiddlers, charities—and the devil to pay!

GEOR. But if he can afford it—

SIR JOHN. Oh! as long as he stopped there I had no apprehension; but since he proposed for you he is more extravagant than ever. They say he has taken to gambling! and he is always with Captain Smooth. No fortune can stand Deadly Smooth! If he gets into a scrape he may fall off from the settlements. We must press the marriage at once.

GEOR. Heigho! Poor Frederick! You don't think he is really attached to Clara?

SIR JOHN. Upon my word I can't say. Put on your bonnet, and come to Storr and Mortimer's to choose the jewels.

GEOR. The jewels! yes—the drive will do me good. So you'll send away Clara?—she's so very deceitful.

SIR JOHN. Never fear—yes—tell her to come to me.

[Exit GEORGINA.]

Yes; I must press on this marriage; Georgina has not wit enough to manage him—at least till he's her husband, and then all women find it smooth sailing. This match will make me a man of prodigious importance. I suspect he'll give me up her ten thousand pounds. I can't think of his taking to gamble, for I love him as a son—and I look on his money as my own.

SCENE II....CLARA, SIR JOHN.

SIR JOHN. Clara, my love!

CLARA. Sir.

SIR JOHN. My dear, what I am going to say may appear a little rude and unkind, but you know my character is frankness. To the point, then: my poor child, I'm aware of your attachment to Mr. Evelyn—

CLARA. Sir! my attachment?

SIR JOHN. It is generally remarked. Lady Kind says you are falling away. My poor girl, I pity you—I do, indeed! "Now, there's that letter you wrote to his old nurse—it has got about somehow; and the world is so ill-natured. I do not know if I did right; but, after he had proposed to Georgy, (of course not before!) I thought it so unpleasant for you, as a young lady, to be suspected of anything forward with respect to a man who was not attached to you, that I rather let it be supposed that Georgy herself wrote the letter.

"CLARA. Sir, I do not know what right you had to—"
SIR JOHN. That's very true, my dear; and I've been thinking since that I ought perhaps to tell Mr. Evelyn that the letter was yours—shall I?

"CLARA. No, sir; I beg you will not. I—I"—[weeps.]
SIR JOHN. My dear Clara, do not take on; I would not have said this for the world, if I was not a little anxious about my own girl. Georgina is so unhappy at what every one says of your attachment—

CLARA. Every one? Oh, torture!

SIR JOHN. That it preys on her spirits—it even irritates her temper! You see, though the marriage will take place almost immediately, Mr. Evelyn does not come so often as he ought. In a word, I fear these little jealousies and suspicions will tend to embitter their future union—I'm a father—forgive me.

CLARA. Embitter their union! Oh, never! What would you have me do, sir?

SIR JOHN. Why, you're now independent. Lady Franklin seems resolved to stay in town. Surely she can't mean to take her money out of the family by some foolish inclination for Mr. Graves! He's always purring and whining about the house, like a black cat in the megrims. What think you, eh?

CLARA. Sir, it was of myself—my unhappy self—you were speaking.

SIR JOHN. Sly! True; true! What I meant to say was this: Lady Franklin persists in staying here: you are your own mistress. Mrs. Carlton, aunt to my late wife, is going abroad for a short time, and would be delighted if you would accompany her.

CLARA. It is the very favor I would have asked of you. [Aside.] I shall escape at least the struggle and the shame. When does she go?

SIR JOHN. In five days—next Monday. You forgive me?

CLARA. Sir, I thank you.

SIR JOHN [drawing the table]. Suppose, then, you write a line to her yourself, and settle it at once?

Enter SERVANT.

SERV. The carriage, Sir John; Miss Vesey is quite ready.

SIR JOHN. "Wait a moment. SHALL I tell Evelyn 'you wrote the letter'?"

CLARA. "No, sir, I implore you."

SIR JOHN. "But it would be awkward for Georgy, if discovered."

CLARA. "It never shall be."

SIR JOHN. "Well, well, as you please. I know nothing could be so painful to a young lady of pride and delicacy." James, if Mr. Serious, the clergyman, calls, say I am gone to the great meeting at Exeter Hall: if Lord Spruce calls, say you believe I'm gone to the rehearsal of Cinderella. Oh! and if MacFinch should come—(MacFinch, who duns me three times a week)—say I've hurried off to Garraways to bid for the great Bulstrode estate. Just put the Duke of Lofty's card carelessly on the hall table. And, I say, James, I expect two gentlemen a little before dinner—Mr. Squab the Radical, and Mr. Qualm of the great Marylebone Conservative Association. Show Squab into the study, and be sure to give him the "Weekly True Sun."—Qualm into the back parlor with the "Times" and the "Morning Post." One must have a little management in this world. All humbug! all humbug, upon my soul! [Exit.]

CLARA [folding the letter]. There—it is decided! A few days, and we are parted for ever!—a few weeks, and another will bear his name—his wife! Oh, happy fate! She will have the right to say to him—though the whole world should hear her—"I am thine!" And I embitter their lot—I am the cloud upon their joyous sunshine! And yet, O Alfred! if she loves thee—if she knows thee—if she values thee—and, when thou wrong'st her, if she can forgive, as I do—I can bless her, when far away, and join her name in my prayers for thee!

Ev. [without.] Miss Vesey just gone? Well, I will write a line.

SCENE III....EVELYN, CLARA.

Ev. [Aside.] So, Clara! Do not let me disturb you, Miss Douglas.

CLARA [going]. Nay, I have done.

Ev. I see that my presence is always odious to you. It is a reason why I come so seldom. But be cheered, Madam: I am here but to fix the day of my marriage, and I shall then go into the country—till—till—in short, this is the last time my visit will banish you from the room I enter.

CLARA [aside]. The last time!—and we shall then meet no more! And to part thus for ever—in scorn—in anger—I cannot bear it!—[Approaching him.] Alfred, my cousin, it is true this may be the last time we shall meet—I have made my arrangements to quit England.

Ev. To quit England?

CLARA. But, before I go, let me thank you for many a past kindness, which it is not for an orphan easily to forget.

Ev. [mechanically.] To quit England!

CLARA. I have long wished it: but enough of me.—Evelyn, now that you are betrothed to another—now, without recurring to the past—now, without the fear of mutual error and mistake—something of our old friendship may at least return to us.—And if, too, I dared, I have that on my mind which only a friend—a sister—might presume to say to you.

Ev. [moved.] Miss Douglas—Clara—if there is aught that I could do—if, while hundreds—strangers—beggars—tell me that I have the power, by opening or shutting this worthless hand, to bid sorrow rejoice or poverty despair—if—my life—my heart's blood—could render to you one such service as my gold can give to others—why, speak!—and the past you allude to—yes, even that bitter past—I will cancel and forget!

CLARA [holding out her hand]. We are friends, then!—you are again my cousin!—my brother!

Ev. [dropping her hand.] Brother!—Ah! say on!

CLARA. I speak, then, as a sister—herself weak, inexperienced, ignorant, nothing—might speak to a brother, in whose career she felt the ambition of a man. Oh, Evelyn! when you inherited this vast wealth, I pleased myself with imagining how you would wield the power delegated to your hands. I knew your benevolence—your intellect—your genius!—the ardent mind couched beneath the cold sarcasm of a long-baffled spirit! I saw before me the noble and bright career open to you at last—and I often thought that, in after years, when far away—as I soon shall be—I should hear your name identified, not with what fortune can give the base, but with deeds and ends to which, for the great, fortune is but the instrument;—I often thought that I should say to my own heart—weeping proud and delicious tears—"And once this man loved me!"

Ev. No more, Clara!—oh, heavens!—no more!

CLARA. But has it been so?—have you been true to your own self?—Pomp—parade—luxuries—pleasure—folly!—all these might distinguish others, they do but belie the ambition and the soul of Alfred Evelyn!—Oh! pardon me—I am too bold—I pain—I offend you.—Ah, I should not have dared thus much had I not thought, at times, that—that—

Ev. That these follies—these vanities—this dalliance with a loftier fate—were your own work! You thought that, and you were right! Perhaps, indeed, after a youth steeped to the lips in the hyssop and gall of penury—perhaps I might have wished royally to know the full value of that dazzling and starry life which, from the last step in the ladder, I had seen indignantly and from afar. But a month—a week—would have sufficed for that experience. Experience!—Oh, how soon we learn that hearts are as cold and souls as vile—no matter whether the sun shine on the noble in his palace, or the rain drench the rags of the beggar cowering at the porch. The extremes of life differ but in this:—Above, Vice smiles and revels—below, Crime frowns and starves. But you—did not you reject me because I was poor? Despair me if you please!—my revenge might be unworthy—I wished to show you the luxuries, the gaud, the splendor I thought you prized,—to surround with the attributes your sex seems most to value the station that, had you loved me, it would have been yours to command. But vain—vain alike my poverty and my wealth! You loved me not in either, and my fate is sealed!

CLARA. A happy fate, Evelyn!—you love!

Ev. And at last I am beloved.—[After a pause, and turning to her abruptly.] Do you doubt it?

CLARA. No, I believe it firmly!—[Aside.] Were it possible for her not to love him?

Ev. Georgina, perhaps, is vain—and light—and—

CLARA. No; think it not! Once removed from the worldly atmosphere of her father's councils, and you will form and raise her to your own level. She is so young yet—she has beauty, cheerfulness and temper; the rest you will give, if you will but yet do justice to your own nature. And, now that there is nothing unkind between us—not even regret—and surely [with a smile] not revenge, my cousin; you will rise to your nobler self; and so, farewell!

Ev. No: stay—one moment; you still feel interest in my fate! Have I been deceived? Oh, why—why did you spurn the heart whose offerings were lavished at your feet? Could you still—still—? Distraction; I know not what I say!—my honor pledged to another; my vows accepted and returned! Go, Clara; it is best so! Yet you will miss some one, perhaps, more than me—some one to whose follies you have been more indulgent—some one to whom you would permit a yet tenderer name than that of brother!

CLARA [aside]. It will make him, perhaps, happier I think it! Think so if you will! but part friends.

Ev. Friends—and that is all! Look you, this is life!—The eyes that charmed away every sorrow—the hand whose lightest touch thrilled to the very core; the presence that, like moonlight, shed its own hallowing beauty over the meanest things; a little while—a year—a month—a day—and we smile that we could dream so idly. All—all—the sweet enchantment, known but once, never to return again, vanished from the world! And the one who forgets the soonest; the one who robs your earth for ever of its summer; comes to you with a careless lip, and says—"Let us part friends!"—Go, Clara, go, and be happy if you can!

CLARA [weeping]. Cruel—cruel to the last!—Heaven forgive you, Alfred!

Ev. Soft!—let me recall her words, her tones, her looks. Does she love me? She defends her rival—she did not deny it when I charged her with attachment to another: and yet—and yet—there is a voice at my heart which tells me I have been the rash slave of a jealous anger. But I have made my choice—I must abide the issue!

Enter GRAVES, preceded by SERVANT.

SERV. Lady Franklin is dressing, Sir.

SCENE IV.

GRAVES, EVELYN.

GRAVES. Well, I'll wait. [Exit Servant.] She was worthy to have known the lost Maria! So considerate to ask me hither—not to console me, that is impossible—but to indulge the luxury of woe. It will be a mournful scene. [Seeing EVELYN.] Is that you, Evelyn? I have just heard that the borough of Groginhole is vacant at last. Why not stand yourself?—with your property you might come in without even a personal canvass.

Ev. I, who despise these contests for the color of a straw—this everlasting litigation of Authority versus Man—I to be one of the wranglers? never!

GRAVES. You are quite right, and I beg your pardon.

Ev. [Aside.] And yet Clara spoke of ambition. She would regret me if I could be distinguished. [Aloud.] To be sure, after all, Graves, corrupt as mankind are, it is our duty to try at least to make them a little better. An Englishman owes something to his country.

GRAVES. He does, indeed! [Counting on his fingers.] East winds, Fogs, Rheumatism, Pulmonary complaints, and Taxes—[EVELYN walks about in disorder.] You seem agitated—a quarrel with your intended? Oh! when you've been married a month, you won't know what to do without one!

Ev. You are a pleasant comforter.

GRAVES. Do you deserve a comforter? One morning you tell me you love Clara, or at least detest her, which is the same thing—(poor Maria often said she detested me)—and that very afternoon you propose to Georgina!

Ev. Clara will easily console herself—thanks to Sir Frederick!

GRAVES. He is young!

Ev. Good looking!

GRAVES. A coxcomb!

Ev. And therefore irresistible!

GRAVES. Nevertheless, Clara has had the bad taste to refuse him. I have it from Lady Franklin, to whom he confided his despair in re-arranging his neckcloth.

Ev. My dear friend—is it possible?

GRAVES. But what! then? You must marry Georgina, who, so believed Lady Franklin, is sincerely attached to—your fortune. Go and hang yourself, Evelyn; you have been duped by them.

Ev. By them—bah! If deceived, I have been my own dupe. Is it not a strange thing that in matters of reason—of the arithmetic and logic of life—we are sensible, shrewd, prudent men? But touch our hearts, move our passions, take us for an instant from the hard safety of worldly calculation, and the philosopher is duller than the fool! Duped—if I thought it!

GRAVES. To be sure! You tried Clara in your poverty; it was a safe experiment to try Georgina in your wealth.

Ev. Ha! that is true, very true. Go on.

GRAVES. You'll have an excellent father-in-law. Sir John positively weeps when he talks of your income!

Ev. Sir John, possibly; but Georgina?

GRAVES. Plays affection to you in the afternoon, after practicing first with Sir Frederick in the morning.

Ev. On your life, sir, be serious; what do you mean?

GRAVES. That in passing this way I see her very often walking in the square with Sir Frederick.

Ev. Ha! say you so?

GRAVES. What then? Man is born to be deceived. You look nervous; your hand trembles; that comes of gaming. They say at the clubs that you play deeply.

Ev. Ha! ha! Do they say that? A few hundreds lost or won, a cheap opiate, any thing that can lay the memory to sleep. The poor man drinks and the rich man gambles—the same motive to both! But you are right; it is a base resource; I will play no more.

GRAVES. I am delighted to hear it, for your friend Captain Smooth has ruined half the young heirs in London. To play with him is to advertise yourself a bankrupt. Even Sir John is alarmed. I met him just now in Pall Mall; he made me stop, and implored me to speak to you. By the by, I forgot—do you bank with Flash, Brisk, Credit and Co.?

Ev. So, Sir John is alarmed? [Aside.] Galled by this coggling charlatan? Aha! I may beat him yet at his own weapons!—Humph! bank with Flash! Why do you ask me?

GRAVES. Because Sir John has just heard that they are in a very bad way, and begs you to withdraw anything you have in their hands.

Ev. I'll see to it. So Sir John is alarmed at my gambling?

GRAVES. Terribly! He even told me he should go himself to the club, this evening, to watch you.

Ev. To watch me!—good—I will be there.

GRAVES. But you will promise not to play.

Ev. Yes—to play. I feel it is impossible to give it up!

GRAVES. No—no! 'S death, man! be as wretched as you please: break your heart, that's nothing! but damme, take care of your pockets!

Ev. I will be there—I will play with Captain Smooth—I will lose as much as I please—thousands—millions—billions; and if he presume to spy on my losses, hang me if I don't lose Sir John himself into the bargain! [Going out and returning.] I am so absent! What was the bank you mention? Flash, Brisk, and Credit. Bless me, how unlucky! and it's too late to draw out to-day. Tell Sir John I'm very much obliged to him, and he'll find me at the club any time before daybreak hard at work with my friend Smooth! [Exit.]

GRAVES. He's certainly crazy! but I don't wonder at it. What the approach of the dog-days is to the canine species, the approach of the honeymoon is to the human race.

Enter SERVANT.

SERV. Lady Franklin's compliments—she will see you in the boudoir, Sir.

GRAVES. In the boudoir!—go, go—I'll come directly. [Exit SERVANT.] My heart beats!—It must be for grief. Poor Maria! [Searching his pockets for his handkerchief.] Not a white one—just like my luck: I call on a lady to talk of the dear departed, and I've nothing about me but a cursed gaudy, flaunting, red, yellow, and blue abomination from India, which it's even indecent for a disconsolate widower to exhibit. Ah! Fortune never ceases to torment the susceptible. The boudoir!—ha! ha! the boudoir! [Exit.]

SCENE V....A Boudoir in the same house.

LADY FRANK. Now, if my scheme does not succeed—I can't help laughing to think of it! Mum—here he comes.

Enter GRAVES.

GRAVES [sighing]. Ah, Lady Franklin.

LADY FRANK. [sighing]. Ah, Mr. Graves! [They seat themselves.] Pray excuse me for having kept you so long. Is it not a charming day?

GRAVES. An east wind, m'am; but nothing comes amiss to you—it's a happy disposition. Poor Maria! she too was naturally gay.

LADY FRANK. [aside]. Yes, she was gay. So much life, and a great deal of spirit.

GRAVES. Spirit? Yes! nothing could master it. She would have her own way. Ah, there was nobody like her!

LADY FRANK. And then, when her spirit was up, she looked so handsome! Her eyes grew so brilliant.

GRAVES. Did not they? Ah! ah! ha! ha! ha! And do you remember her pretty trick of stamping her foot?—the tiniest little foot—I think I see her now. Ah! this conversation is very soothing.

LADY FRANK. How well she acted in your private theatricals.

GRAVES. You remember her Mrs. Oakley in "The Jealous wife?"—Ha! ha! how good it was!—ha! ha!

LADY FRANK. Ha! ha! Yes, in the very first scene,

when she came out with [mimicking] "Your unkindness and barbarity will be the death of me!"

GRAVES. No—no! that's not it! more energy. [Mimicking.] "Your unkindness and barbarity will be the death of me." Ha! ha! I ought to know how she said it, for she used to practice it on me twice a day. Ah! poor dear lamb! [wipes his eyes].

LADY FRANK. And then she sang so well! was such a composer! What was that little French air she was so fond of?

GRAVES. Ha! ha! sprightly! was it not? Let me see—let me see.

LADY FRANK [humming]. Tum ti—ti tum—ti—ti—ti. No, that's not it.

GRAVES [humming]. Tum ti—ti—tum ti—ti—tum—tum tum.

BOTH. Tum ti—ti—tum ti—ti—tum—tum—tum. Ha! ha!

GRAVES [throwing himself back]. Ah! what recollections it revives! It is too affecting.

LADY FRANK [aside]. Now, if I could but get him to dance with me, we should end with being partners for life. It is affecting, but we are all mortal. [Sighs.] And at your Christmas party, at Cyprus Lodge, do you remember her dancing the Scotch reel with Captain Macnaughten.

GRAVES. Ha! ha! ha! To be sure—to be sure.

LADY FRANK. Can you think of the step! Some how this was it not? [dancing.]

GRAVES. No—no—quite wrong!—just stand there.—Now then [humming the tune]—La—la-la—la—La, la, &c. [They dance.] That's it—excellent—admirable!

LADY FRANK [aside]. Now it's coming.

[Enter SIR JOHN, BLOUNT, GEORGINA; they stand amazed. LADY FRANKLIN continues to dance.]

GRAVES. Bewitching—irresistible! It's Maria herself that I see before me! Thus—thus—let me clasp—Oh, the devil! Just like my luck! [Stopping opposite SIR JOHN.

LADY FRANKLIN runs off.]

SIR JOHN. Upon my word, Mr. Graves!

GEORG. BLOUNT. Encore—encore! Bravo—bravo!

GRAVES. It's all a mistake! I—I—Sir John. Lady Franklin, you see—that is to say—I.—Sainted Maria! you are spared, at least, this affliction!

GEORG. Pray go on!

BLOUNT. Don't let us interrupt you.

GRAVES. Interrupt me! I must say that this rudeness—this gross impropriety—to pry into the sorrows of a poor bereaved sufferer, seeking comfort from a sympathizing friend—But such is human nature!

GEOR. But, Mr. Graves!—[following him.]

GRAVES. Heartless!

BLOUNT. My dear Mr. Graves!—[following him.]

GRAVES. Frivolous!

SIR JOHN. Stay and dine!—[following him.]

GRAVES. Unfeeling!

OMNES. Ha!—ha!—ha!

GRAVES. Monsters! Good day to you.* [Exit, followed by SIR JOHN, &c.]

SCENE VI.... The interior of * * * * Club; night; lights, &c. Small sofa-tables, with books, papers, tea, coffee, &c. Several members grouped by the fireplace; one member with his legs over the back of his chair; another with his legs over his table; a third with his legs on the chimney-piece. To the left, and in front of the Stage, an old member reading the newspaper, seated by a small round table; to the right a card-table, before which CAPTAIN DUDLEY SMOOTH is seated, and sipping lemonade; at the bottom of the Stage another card-table.

GLOSSMORE, STOUT.

GLOSS. You do n't come often to the club, Stout?

STOUT. No; time is money. An hour spent at a club is unproductive capital.

OLD MEMBER [reading the paper.] Waiter!—the snuff-box. [Waiter brings it.]

GLOSS. So, Evelyn has taken to play? I see Deadly Smooth, "hushed in grim repose, awaits his evening prey."

Enter EVELYN; salutes and shakes hands with different members in passing up the Stage.

Ev. How d'ye do, Glossmore! How are you, Stout?—you do n't play, I think! Political Economy never plays at cards, eh?—never has time for anything more frivolous than Rents and Profits, Wages and Labor, High Prices and Low—Cott-laws, Poor-laws, Tithes, Currency—Dot-and-go-one Rates, Puzzles, Taxes, Riddles, and Botheration! Smooth is the man. Aha! Smooth. Piquet, eh? You owe me my revenge!

SMOOTH. My dear Alfred, anything to oblige.

[They seat themselves]

OLD MEM. Waiter!—the snuff-box.

[Waiter takes it from STOUT, and brings it back to Old Member.]

Enter BLOUNT.

BLOUNT. So, so! Evelyn at it again—eh, Glossmore?

GLOSS. Yes, Smooth sticks to him like a leech. Clever fellow, that Smooth!

BLOUNT. Will you make up a wubber?

GLOSS. Have you got two others?

BLOUNT. Yes; Flat and Green.

GLOSS. Bad players.

BLOUNT. I make it a wule to play with bad players; it is five per cent. in one's favor. I hate gambling. But a quiet wubber, if one is the best player out of four, can't do one any harm.

GLOSS. Clever fellow, that Blount!

[BLOUNT takes up the snuff-box, and walks off with it; Old Member looks at him savagely.]

[BLOUNT, GLOSSMORE, FLAT and GREEN, make up a table at the bottom of the Stage.]

SMOOTH. A thousand pardons, my dear Alfred—ninety repique—ten cards!—game!

Ev. [passing a note to him.] Game! Before we go on, one question. This is Thursday—how much do you calculate to win of me before Tuesday next?

* For the original idea of this scene the author is indebted to a Note pro verba, never, he believes, acted in public.

SMOOTH. Ce cher Alfred! He is so droll!

Ev. [writing in his pocket-book.] Forty games a night—four nights, minus Sunday—our usual stakes—that would be right, I think!

SMOOTH [glancing over the account.] Quite—if I win all—which is next to impossible.

Ev. It shall be possible to win twice as much, on one condition. Can you keep a secret?

SMOOTH. My dear Alfred, I have kept myself! I never inherited a farthing—I never spend less than £4,000 a year—and I never told a soul how I managed it.

Ev. Hark ye, then—a word with you—[they whisper].

OLD MEM. Waiter!—the snuff box. [WAITER takes it from BLOUNT, &c.]

Enter SIR JOHN.

Ev. You understand?

SMOOTH. Perfectly; any thing to oblige.

Ev. [cutting]. It is for you to deal. [They go on playing.]

SIR JOHN [grooming]. There's my precious son-in-law, that is to be, spending my consequence, and making a fool of himself. [Takes up the snuff box; OLD MEMBER looks at him savagely.]

BLOUNT. I'm out. Flat, a poney on the odd twick. That's wight. [Coming up, counting his money.] Well, Sir John, you do n't play?

SIR JOHN. Play? no! Confound him—lost again!

Ev. Hang the cards!—double the stakes!

SMOOTH. Just as you please—done!

SIR JOHN. Done, indeed!

OLD MEM. Waiter!—the snuff box. [WAITER takes it from SIR JOHN.]

BLOUNT. I've won eight points and the bets—I never lose—I never play in the Deadly Smooth set! [Takes up the snuff box; OLD MEMBER as before.]

SIR JOHN. [looking over SMOOTH's hand, and fidgeting backward and forward]. Lord have mercy on us! Smooth has seven for his point! What's the stakes?

Ev. Do n't disturb us—I only throw out four. Stakes, Sir John?—immense! Was ever such luck? not a card for my point. Do stand back, Sir John—I'm getting irritable.

OLD MEM. Waiter! the snuff-box.

BLOUNT. One hundred pounds on the next game, Evelyn?

SIR JOHN. Nonsense, nonsense—do n't disturb him! All the fishes come to the bait! Sharks and minnows all nibbling away at my son-in-law!

Ev. One hundred pounds, Blount! Ah! the finest gentlemen is never too fine a gentleman to pick up a guinea. Done! Treble the stakes, Smooth!

SIR JOHN. I'm on the rack! [seizing the snuff box.] Be cool, Evelyn! take care, my dear boy!—now don't ye, now don't!

Ev. What—what? You have four queens!—five to the king. Confound the cards!—a fresh pack. [Throws the cards behind him over SIR JOHN.]

FIRST MEM. I never before saw Evelyn out of temper. He must be losing immensely!

SECOND MEM. Yes, this is interesting!

SIR JOHN. Interesting! there's a wretch!

FIRST MEM. Poor fellow! he'll be ruined in a month!

SIR JOHN. I'm in a cold sweat.

SECOND MEM. Smooth is the very devil.

SIR JOHN. The devil's a joke to him!

GLOSS. [slapping SIR JOHN on the back]. A clever fellow, that Smooth, Sir John, eh? [Takes up the snuff-box; OLD MEMBER as before.] £100 on this game, Evelyn?

Ev. [half turning round]. You! well done, the Constitution! yes, £100!

OLD MEM. Waiter! the snuff-box.

STOUT. I think I'll venture!—£200 on this game, Evelyn?

Ev. [quite turning round]. Ha! ha! ha!—Enlightenment and the Constitution on the same side of the question at last!

O, Stout, Stout!—great happiness of the greatest number—greatest number, number one! Done, Stout!—£200—ha! ha! ha!—I deal, Stout. Well done, Political Economy—Ha! ha! ha!

SIR JOHN. Quite hysterical—drivelling! Arn't you ashamed of yourselves? His own cousins!—all in a conspiracy—a perfect gang of them. [Members indignant.]

STOUT [to Members]. Hush! he's to marry Sir John's daughter.

FIRST MEM. What, stingy Jack's? oh!

CHORUS OF MEM. Oh! oh!

OLD MEM. Waiter!—the snuff-box.

Ev. [rising in great agitation]. No more, no more—I've done!—quite enough. Glossmore, Stout, Blount, I'll pay you to-morrow. I—I—Death!—this is ruinous! [Seizes the snuff-box; OLD MEMBER as before.]

SIR JOHN. Ruinous? I dare say it is! What has he lost? what has he lost, Smooth? Not much? eh? eh? [Omnes gather round SMOOTH.]

SMOOTH. Oh, a trifle, dear John!—excuse! We never tell our winnings. [To BLOUNT] How d'ye do, Fred?

[To GLOSSMORE] By the by, Charles, don't you want to sell your house in Grosvenor-square?—£12,000, eh?

GLOSS. Yes, and the furniture at a valuation, About £3000 more.

SMOOTH [looking over his pocket-book]. Um!—Well, we'll talk of it.

SIR JOHN. 12 and 3—£15,000. What a cold-blooded rascal it is!—£15,000, Smooth?

SMOOTH. Oh, the house itself is a trifle, but the establishment—I'm considering whether I have enough to keep it up, my dear John.

OLD MEM. Waiter, the snuff box! [Scraping it round, and with a very face.] And it's all gone! [Gives it to the WAITER to fill.]

SIR JOHN [turning round]. And it's all gone!

Ev. [starting up and laughing hysterically.] Ha! ha! all gone? not a bit of it. Smooth, this club is so noisy. Sir John, you are always in the way. Come to my house!

come! Champagne and a broiled bone. Nothing venture, nothing have! The luck must turn, and by Jupiter we'll make a night of it!

SIR JOHN. A night of it!!! For Heaven's sake, Evelyn!

EVELYN!—think what you are about!—think of Georgina's feelings!—think of your poor lost mother!—think of the babes unborn!—think of—

Ev. I'll think of nothing! Zounds!—you do n't know what I have lost, man; it's all your fault, distracting my attention! Pahaw—pahaw! Out of the way, do! Come Smooth. Ha! ha! a night of it, my boy—a night of it!

[Exit SMOOTH and EVELYN.]

SIR JOHN [following]. You must not, you shall not! Evelyn, my dear Evelyn!—he's drunk—he's mad! Will no one send for the police?

MEMBERS. Ha! ha! ha! Poor old Stingy Jack!

OLD MEM. [rising for the first time, and in a great rage.] Waiter, the snuff box!

END OF ACT III.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.... The Anteroom in EVELYN's house, as in Scene I. Act II. TABOURET, MACFINCH, FRANTZ, and other tradesmen.

TAB. [half whispering]. So, I hear that Mr. Evelyn is turned gamester. There are strange reports about to-day; I don't know what to make of it. We must look sharp, Mr. Macfinch, we poor tradesmen, and make hay while the sun shines.

MACFINCH. I wish these geeming-houses were aw at the devil! it's a sheam and a sin for gentlemen to gang and ruin themselves, when we honest tradesmen would do it for them with our muckle advantage to the arts and commerce o' the country!

Enter SMOOTH from the inner room, with a pocket book and pencil in his hand.]

SMOOTH [Looking round]. Ham! ha! Fine pictures! [Feeling the curtains]. The new-fashioned velvet, hem! good-proportioned rooms. Yes, this house is better than Glossmore's. Oh, Mr. Tabouret, the upholsterer! you furnished these rooms. All of the best? oh!

TAB. Oh, the very best! Mr. Evelyn is not a man to grudge expense, sir.

SMOOTH. He is not indeed. You've been paid, I suppose, Tabouret?

TAB. No, sir, no—I never send in my bills when a customer is rich. [Aside] Bills are like trees, and grow by standing.

SMOOTH. Hump! Not PAID? hump!

MACFINCH. I dinna like that hoomph, there's something varra suspicious abun' it.

TAB. [to the tradesmen.] It's the great card-player, Captain Smooth—finest player in Europe—cleaned out the Duke of Silly Val. Uncommonly clever man.

SMOOTH [pacing about the room]. Thirty-six feet by twenty-eight—Um! I think a bow-window there would be an improvement: could it be done easily, Tabouret?

MACFINCH. If Mr. Evelyn wishes to pool about his house, there's no mon like my friend Mr. MacStucco.

SMOOTH. Evelyn? I was speaking of myself. Mr. MacStucco?—hump!

TAB. Yourself? Have you bought the house, sir?

SMOOTH. Bought it?—hum!—ha!—it depends—So you've not been paid yet?—um! Nor you—nor you—nor you? Hum! ah!

TAB. No, sir!—what then? No fear of Mr. EVELYN? Ha! ha!

OMNES [anxiously]. Ha! ha!—what then?

MACFINCH. Ah, sir, what then? I'm a puir mon wi' a family; this way, Captain! You've a leetle account in the buiks; an' we'll ee'n wipe it out altogether, an' you'll say what you mean by that Neom ha!

SMOOTH. Macfinch, my dear fellow, don't oblige me to cane you; I would not have Mr. Evelyn distressed for the world. Poor fellow! he holds very bad cards. So you've not been paid yet? Don't send in your bills on any account—Mind! Yes; I don't dislike the house with some alteration. Good day to you—Hum! ha!

[Exit, looking about him, examining the chairs, tables, &c.]

TAB. Plain as a pikestaff!—staked his very house on an odd trick!

SCENE II.... The foregoing.—Enter SHARP from the inner room, agitated and in hurry.

SHARP. O Lord! O Lord!—who'd have thought it? Cards are the devil's book! John—Thomas!—Harris!—[ringing the bell.]

Enter Two Servants.

Tom, take this letter to Sir John Vesey's. If not at home, find him—he will give you a cheque. Go to his banker's and get it cashed instantly. Quick—quick off with you!

TAB. [seizing Servant.] What's the matter?—what's the matter? How's Mr. Evelyn?

SER. Bad—very bad! Sate up all night with Captain Smooth. [Runs off.]

SHARP [to the other Servant.] Yes, Harris, your poor master! O dear! You will take this note to the Belgian minister, Portland-place. Passport for Ostend! Have the travelling carriage ready at a moment's notice!

MACFINCH [stopping Servant.] Passport! Harkye, my mon; is he gaun to pit the saut seas between us and the siller?

SER. Do n't stop me—something wrong in the chest—change of air—late hours—and Captain Smooth!

[Exit.]

SHARP [walking about.] And if the bank should break!—if the bank is broke, and he can't draw out!—bound to Smooth!

TAB. Bank!—what bank?

SHARP. Flash's bank! Flash, brother-in-law to Captain Smooth! What have you heard?—eh?—eh?

TAB. That there's an awful run on it!

SHARP. I must be off. Go—go—you can't see Mr. Evelyn to-day!

TAB. My account, Sir!

MACFINCH. I've a muckle bairns and a sma' bill!

FRANTZ. O Sarc, de great gentlemen always tink first of de tailor!

SHARP. Call again—call again at Christmas. The bank, the cards—the cards, the bank! O dear! O dear!

[Exit.]

TAB. The bank!

MACFINCH. The passport!

FRANTZ. And all dat vill be seen of de great Evelyn coat is de back of it. Donner and hagel!—I vil arrest him—I vil put de salt on de tail of it!

TAB. [aside.] I'll slip down to the city and see how the bank goes!

MACFINCH [aside.] I'll ean gang to my coosin de la'yer. Nothing but pestience for us, Mr. Tabouret.

TAB. Ay, ay—stick by each other—share and share alike—that's my way, Sir.

OMNES. Share and share alike. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Servant, GLOSSMORE and BLOUNT.

SER. My master is not very well, my lord; but I'll let him know. [Exit.]

GLOSS. I'm very curious to learn the result of his gambling tete-a-tete.

BLOUNT. Oh, he's so howwidly wick, he can afford even a tete-a-tete with Deadly Smooth!

GLOSS. Poor old Stingy Jack: why, Georgina was your intended.

BLOUNT. Yes; and I really liked the girl, though out of pique I proposed to her cousin. But what can a man do against money?

Enter EVELYN.

If we could start fair, you'd see whom Georgina would prefer: but she's sacrificed by her father! She as much as told me so!

EV. So, so, gentlemen, we've a little account to settle—one hundred each.

BOTH. De n't talk of it.

EV. Well, I won't!—[Taking BLOUNT aside.]—Ha! ha! you'd hardly believe it—but I'd rather not pay you just at present; my money is locked up, and I must wait, you know, for the Groginhole rents. So! instead of owing you one hundred pounds, suppose I owe you five? You can give me a cheque for the other four. And, harkye! not a word to Glossmore.

BLOUNT. Glossmore! the gweatest gossip in London! I shall be delighted! [Aside.] It never does harm to lend to a wick man; one gets it back somehow. By the way, Evelyn, if you want my gwey cab-horse, you may have him for two hundred pounds, and that will make seven!

EV. [aside.] That's the fashionable usury: your friend does not take interest—he sells you a horse. [Aloud.] Blount, it's a bargain.

BLOUNT [writing the cheque, and musingly.] No; I don't see what harm it can do me; that off leg must end in a spavin.

EV. [to GLOSSMORE.] That hundred pounds I owe you is rather inconvenient at present; I've a large sum to make up for the Groginhole property—perhaps you would lend me four or five hundred more, just to go on with!

GLOSS. Certainly! Hopkins is dead: your interest for Cipher would—

EV. Why, I can't promise that at this moment. But as a slight mark of friendship and gratitude, I shall be very much flattered if you'll accept a splendid grey cab-horse I bought to-day—cost two hundred pounds!

GLOSS. Bought to-day!—then I'm safe. My dear fellow! you're always so princely!

EV. Nonsense! just write the cheque; and, harkye!—not a syllable to Blount!

GLOSS. Blount? [He's the town-crier!] [Goes to write.] BLOUNT. [giving EVELYN the cheque.] Wansom's, Pall-mall.

EV. Thank you. So you proposed to Miss Douglas?

BLOUNT. Hang it! yes; I could have sworn that she fancied me; her manner, for instance, that very day you proposed for Miss Vesey—otherwise Georgina—

EV. Has only half what Miss Douglas has.

BLOUNT. You forget how much Stingy Jack must have saved! But I beg your pardon.

EV. Never mind; but not a word to Sir John, or he'll fancy I'm ruined.

GLOSS. [giving the cheque.] Ransom's, Pall-mall. Tell me, did you win or lose last night?

EV. Win! lose! oh! No more of that, if you love me. I must send off at once to the bankers. [Looking at the two cheques.]

GLOSS. [aside.] Why! he's borrowed from Blount too!

BLOUNT [aside.] That's a draft from Lord Glossmore!

EV. Excuse me; I must dress; I have not a moment to lose. You remember you dine with me to-day—seven o'clock. You'll meet Smooth. [With tears in his voice.] It may be the last time I shall ever welcome you here! My—what am I saying? Oh, merely a joke!—good by—good by. [Shaking them heartily by the hand. Exit by the inner room.]

BLOUNT. Glossmore!

GLOSS. Blount!

BLOUNT. I am afraid all's not wight!

GLOSS. I incline to your opinion!

BLOUNT. But I've sold my gwey cab-horse.

GLOSS. Grey cab-horse! you! What is he really worth now?

BLOUNT. Since he is sold, I will tell you—not a sixpence!

GLOSS. Not a sixpence! he gave it to me! [EVELYN at the door, giving directions to a SERVANT in dumb show.]

BLOUNT. That was devilish unhandsome! Do you know, I feel nervous!

GLOSS. Nervous? Let us run and stop payment of our drafts. [EVELYN shuts the door, and SERVANT runs across the stage.]

BLOUNT. Hollo, John! where so fast?

SER. [in great haste.] Beg pardon, Sir Frederick, to Pall-mall—Messrs. Ransom. [Exit.]

BLOUNT [solemnly.] Glossmore we are floored!

GLOSS. Sir, the whole town shall know of it! [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV....Enter TOKE and other SERVANTS.

TOKE. Come, come, stir yourselves! we've no time to lose. This room is to be got ready for the shawls. Mrs. Crump and the other ladies of the household are to wait here on the women before they go up to the drawing-room. Take away that desk: don't be lazy! and give me the newspaper. [TOKE reads himself; the SERVANTS bustle about.] Strange reports about my patron! and the wally is gone for the passport!

[Enter FRANTZ with a bundle.]

FRANTZ. Mr. Toke, my goot Mr. Toke, I've brought you von beetle present.

TOKE. John and Charles, vanish! [Exeunt SERVANTS.] I scorns to corrupt them 'ere working clammes!

FRANTZ [producing a pair of small-clothes, which TOKE examines.] Your master is von beggar! He wants to run away; we are all in the same vat—you-call-it—de same leetel nasty boat, Mr. Toke! Just let my friend Mr. Clutch up through the area, and I will arrest him dis very day.

TOKE. I accept the abridgments; but you've forgotten to line the pockets!

FRANTZ. Bleesh my soul, so I have! [giving a note.]

TOKE. The area gate shall be left undefended. De it quietly; no close, as the French say.

FRANTZ. Goot Mr. Toke—to-morrow I will line de oter pocket. [Exit.]

TOKE. My patron does not give me satisfaction!

Enter FOOTMAN.

FOOTMAN. What chandeliers are to be lighted, Mr. Toke? it's getting late.

TOKE. Don't disturb me—I'm rum-mynating!—yes, yes, there's no doubt of it! Charles, the area gate is open?

FOOT. And all the plate in the pantry! I'll run and—

TOKE. Not a step! leave it open.

FOOT. But—

TOKE [with dignity.] It's for the sake of ventilation! [Exeunt.]

SCENE V....A splendid saloon in EVELYN's house.

EVELYN, GRAVES.

GRAVES. You've withdrawn your money from Flash and Briak.

EV. No.

GRAVES. No! then—

Enter SIR JOHN, LADY FRANKLIN, and GEORGINA.

SIR JOHN. Yen got the cheque for £500, safely? Teo happy to—

EV. [interrupting him.] My best thanks! my warmest gratitude! So kind in you! so reasonable!—that £500—you do n't know the value of that £500. I shall never forget your nobleness of conduct.

SIR JOHN. Gratitude! nobleness! [Aside:] I can't have been taken in?

EV. And in a moment of such distress!

SIR JOHN [aside.] Such distress! He picks out the ugliest words in the whole dictionary!

EV. I've done with Smooth. But I'm still a little crippled, and you must do me another favor. I've only as yet paid the deposit of ten per cent. for the great Groginhole property. I am to pay the rest this week; nay, I fear, tomorrow. I've already sold out the funds; the money lies at the bankers', and of course I can't touch it; for if I do n't pay by a certain day, I forfeit the estate and the deposit.

SIR JOHN. What's coming now, I wonder?

EV. Georgina's fortune is £10,000. I always meant, my dear Sir John, to present you with that little sum.

SIR JOHN. Oh, Evelyn! your generosity is positively touching! [wipes his eyes.]

EV. But the news of my losses has frightened my tradesmen! I have so many heavy debts at this moment—that—that— But I see Georgina is listening, and I'll say what I have to say to her.

SIR JOHN. No, no—no no. Girl's do n't understand business!

EV. The very reason I speak to her. This is an affair, not of business, but of feeling. Stout, show Sir John my Correggio.

SIR JOHN [aside.] Devil take his Correggio! The man is born to torment me!

EV. My dear Georgina, whatever you may hear said of me, I flatter myself that you feel confidence in my honor.

GEOR. Can you doubt it?

EV. I confess that I am embarrassed at this moment; I have been weak enough to lose money at play, and there are other demands on me. I promise you never to gamble again as long as I live. My affairs can be retrieved, but for the first few years of our marriage it may be necessary to retrench.

GEOR. Retrench!

EV. To live perhaps altogether in the country.

GEOR. Altogether in the country!

EV. To confine ourselves to a modest competence.

GEOR. Modest competence! I knew something horrid was coming!

EV. And now, Georgina, you may have it in your power at this moment to save me from much anxiety and humiliation. My money is locked up—my debts of honor must be settled—you are of age—your 10,000 in your own hands—

SIR JOHN. [Stout listening as well as SIR JOHN.] I'm standing on hot iron!

EV. If you could lend it to me for a few weeks—You hesitate! oh! believe the honor of the man you will call your husband before all the calumnies of the fools whom we call the world! Can you give me this proof of your confidence? Remember, without confidence, what is wedlock?

SIR JOHN [aside to her.] No!—[Aloud, pointing his glass at the Correggio.] Yes, the picture may be fine.

STOUT. But you don't like the subject?

GEOR. [aside.] He may be only trying me. Best leave it to papa.

EV. Well—

GEOR. You—you shall hear from me to-morrow. [Aside.] Ah, there's that dear Sir Frederick!

[Goes to BLOUNT.]

Enter GLOSSMORE and SMOOTH; EVELYN salutes them, paying SMOOTH servile respect.

LADY FRANK. [to GRAVES.] Ha! ha! To be so disturbed yesterday; was it not droll?

GRAVES. Never recur to that humiliating topic!

GLOSS [to STOUT.] See how Evelyn fawns upon Smooth.

STOUT. How mean in him. Smooth—a professional gambler—a fellow who lives by his wits. I would not know such a man on any account.

SMOOTH [to GLOSSMORE.] So Hopkins is dead; you want Cipher to come in for Groginhole, eh?

GLOSS. What! could you manage it?

SMOOTH. Ce Cher Charles! any thing to oblige.

STOUT. Groginhole! What can he have to do with Groginhole! Glossmore, present me to Smooth.

GLOSS. What! the gambler; the fellow who lives by his wits?

STOUT. Why, his wits seem to be an uncommonly productive capital! I'll introduce myself. How d'ye do, Captain Smooth? We have met at the club, I think; I am charmed to make your acquaintance in private. I say, sir, what do you think of the affairs of the nation? Bad! very bad! no enlightenment! great fall off in the revenue! no knowledge of finance! there's only one man who can save the country!—and that's POPKINS.

SMOOTH. Is he in parliament, Mr. Stout? What's your Christian name, by the by?

STOUT. Benjamin. No; constituencies are so ignorant, they don't understand his value. He's no orator: in fact, he stammers so much—but devilish profound. Could not we insure him for Groginhole?

SMOOTH. My dear Benjamin, it's a thing to be thought on.

EV. [advancing.] My friends, pray be seated; I wish to consult you. This day twelve months I succeeded to an immense income, and as, by a happy coincidence, on the same day I secured your esteem, so now I wish to ask you if you think I could have spent that income in a way more worthy your good opinion?

GLOSS. Impossible! excellent taste—beautiful house!

BLOUNT. Vewy good horses—[aside to GLOSSMORE:] especially the gwey cab!

LADY FRANK. Splendid pictures!

GRAVES. And a magnificent cook, ma'am!

SMOOTH [thrusting his hands in his pockets.] It's my opinion, Alfred—and I'm a judge—that you could not have spent your money better!

OMNES [except SIR JOHN.] Very true!

EV. What say you, Sir John? You may think me a little extravagant; but you know that in this world the only way to show one's self thoroughly respectable is to make a thoroughly respectable show.

SIR JOHN. Certainly—certainly! No, you could not have done better. [Aside.] I do n't know what to make of it.

GEOR. Certainly. [Coaxingly.] Don't retrench, my dear Alfred!

GLOSS. Retrench! nothing so plebeian!

STOUT. Plebeian, sir!—worse than plebeian!—it is against all the rules of public morality. Every one knows, now-a-days, that extravagance is a benefit to the population—encourages art, employs labor, and multiplies spinning-jennies.

EV. You re-assure me!—I own I did think that a man worthy of friends so sincere might have done something better than feast—dress—drink—play—

GLOSS. Nonsense!—we like you the better for it. [Aside.] I wish I had my £800 back, though.

EV. And you are as much my friends as when you offered me £10 for my old nurse.

SIR JOHN. A thousand times more so, my dear boy! [Omnes approve.]

Enter SHARP.

SMOOTH. But who's our new friend?

EV. Who! the very man who first announced to me the wealth which you allow I have spent so well. But what's the matter, Sharp? [SHARP whispers EVELYN.]

EV. [aloud.] The bank's broke!

SIR JOHN. Broke!—what bank!

EV. Flash, Briak, and Co.

GLOSS. [to SMOOTH.] And Flash was your brother-in-law. I'm very sorry.

SMOOTH [taking snuff.] Not all, Charles—I did not bank there.

SIR JOHN. Oh!—Not much in their hands?

EV. Why, I told you the purchase-money for Groginhole was at my bankers'.... But no, no: do n't look so frightened: it was not placed with Flash. It is at Hoare's; it is, indeed. Nay, I assure you, it is. A mere trifle at Flash's—upon my word, now! To-morrow, Sharp, we'll talk of this! One day more—one day, at least, for enjoyment!

SIR JOHN. Oh pretty enjoyment!

BLOUNT. And he borrowed £700 of me!

GLOSS. And £600 of me!

SIR JOHN. And £500 of me!

STOUT. Oh! a regular Jeremy Diddler!

SMOOTH [to SIR JOHN.] John, do you know, I think I would take a handsome offer for this house just as it stands—furniture, plate, pictures, books, bronzes, and statues!

SIR JOHN. Powers above!

STOUT [to SIR JOHN.] I say, you have placed your daughter in a very unsafe investment. What then?—a daughter's like any other capital—transfer the stock in hand to 'other speculation.

SIR JOHN [going to GEORGINA.] Ha! I'm afraid we've been very rude to Sir Frederick. A monstrous fine young man!

Enter TOKE.

TOKE [to EVELYN.] Sir, I beg your pardon, but Mr. Macfinch insists on my giving you this letter instantly.

EV. [reading.] How! Sir John, this fellow, Macfinch, has heard of my misfortunes, and insists on being paid;—a lawyer's letter—quite insolent!

TOKE. And, Sir, Mr. Tabouret is below, and declares he won't stir till he's paid.

EV. Won't stir till he's paid! What's to be done, Sir John?—Smooth, what is to be done?

SMOOTH. If he won't stir till he's paid, make him up a bed, and I'll take him in the inventory as one of the fixtures, Alfred!

EV. It is very well for you to joke, Mr. Smooth. But—Enter Sheriff's Officer, giving a paper to EVELYN, and whispering.

EV. What's this? Frantz, the tailor. Why, you impudent scoundrel! Faith! this is more than I bargained for—Sir John, I'm arrested.

STOUT [slapping SIR JOHN on the back with glee.] He's arrested, old gentleman! But I did n't lend him a farthing.

EV. And for a mere song—£150! Sir John, pay this fellow, will you? or bail me, or something,—while we go to dinner!

SIR JOHN. Pay—bail—I'll de d—d if I do! Oh, my £500! my £500! Mr. Alfred Evelyn, I want my £500!

GRAVES. I'm going to do a very ailly thing—I shall lose both my friend and my money: just like my luck! Evelyn, go to dinner—I'll settle this for you.

LADY FRANK. I love you for that!

GRAVES. Do you? then I am the happiest. Ah! ma'am, I do not know what I am saying!

[Exeunt GRAVES and OFFICER.]

EV. [to GEORGINA.] Do not go by these appearances! I repeat, £10,000 will more than cover all my embarrassments. I shall hear from you to-morrow?

GEORGINA. Yes—yes!

EV. But you're not going? You, too, Glossmore? you, Blount? you, Stout? you, Smooth?

SMOOTH. No; I'll stick by you—as long as you've a guinea to stake!

GLOSS. Oh, this might have been expected from a man of such ambiguous political opinions!

STOUT. Do not stop me, Sir. No man of common enlightenment would have squandered his substance in this way. Pictures and statues! laugh!

EV. Why, you all said I could not spend my money better! Ha! ha! ha!—the absurd mistake!—you do not fancy I'm going to prison? Ha! ha! Why do not you laugh, Sir John? Ha! ha! ha!

SIR JOHN. Sir, this horrible levity! Take Sir Frederick's arm, my poor, injured, innocent child! Mr. Evelyn, after this extraordinary scene, you can't be surprised that I—I—Zounds! I'm suffocating!

SMOOTH. But, my dear John, they've no right to arrest the dinner!

STOUT [aside]. But the election at Groginhole is to-morrow. This news may not arrive before the poll closes! [Running to EVELYN.] Sir, Popkins never bribes: but Popkins will bet you £1000 that he do not come in for Groginhole.

GLOSS. This is infamous, Mr. Stout! Cipher is a man who scorns every subterfuge! [Aside to EVELYN.] But, for the sake of the Constitution, name your price.

EV. I know the services of Cipher—I know the profundity of Popkins; but it's too late—the borough's engaged!

TOKE. Dinner is served.

GLOSS [passing]. Dinner!

STOUT. Dinner!—it's a very good smell!

EV [to SIR JOHN]. Turtle and venison too!

[They stop irresolute.]

EV. That's right—come along. But, I say, Blount—Stout—Glossmore—Sir John—one word first; will you lend me 10l. for my old nurse?

[Exeunt omnes, indignantly.]

SMOOTH and EVELYN. Ha! ha! ha!

END OF ACT IV.

ACT V.

SCENE I..... * * * * * Club; SMOOTH, GLOSSMORE—other Members.

GLOSS. Will his horses be sold, think you?

SMOOTH. Very possibly, Charles!—a fine stud—hum! ha! Waiter, a glass of sherry.

GLOSS. They say he must go abroad!

SMOOTH. Well! it's the best time of year for travelling, Charles.

GLOSS. We are all to be paid to-day; and that looks suspicious!

SMOOTH. Very suspicious, Charles! Hum!—ah!

GLOSS. My dear fellow, you must know the rights of the matter: I wish you'd speak out. What have you really won? Is the house itself gone?

SMOOTH. The house is certainly not gone, Charles, for I saw it exactly in the same place this morning at half past ten—it has not moved an inch!

[Waiter gives a letter to GLOSSMORE.]

GLOSS. [reading]. From Groginhole—an express! What's this? I'm amazed!!! [Reading]. "They've actually at the eleventh hour started Mr. Evelyn; and nobody knows what his politics are! We shall be beat! the constitution is gone!—Cipher!" Oh! this is infamous in Evelyn! Gets into parliament just to keep himself out of the Bench.

SMOOTH. He's capable of it!

GLOSS. Not a doubt of it, Sir! not a doubt of it!

[Enter SIR JOHN and BLOUNT, talking.]

SIR JOHN. My dear boy, I'm not flint! I am but a man! if Georgina really loves you—and I am sure that she does—I will never think of sacrificing her happiness to ambition—she is yours; I told her so this very morning.

BLOUNT. The old humbug!

SIR JOHN. She's the best of daughters! the most obedient artless creature! Oh! she's been properly brought up: a good daughter makes a good wife. Dine with me at seven, and we'll talk of the settlements.

BLOUNT. Yes! I do not care for fortune; but—

SIR JOHN. Her 10,000l. will be settled on herself—that of course.

BLOUNT. All of it, Sir? Weally I—

SIR JOHN. What then, my dear boy? I shall leave you both all I've laid by. Ah! you know I'm a close fellow! "Stingy Jack"—eh? After all, worth makes the man!

SMOOTH. And the more a man's worth, John, the worthier man he must be! [Exit.]

BLOUNT. [aside]. Yes; he has no other child! She must have all his savings; I do not see what harm it could do me. Still that 10,000l.—I want that 10,000l.: if she would but run off now, one could get rid of the settlements.

[Enter STOUT (wiping his forehead), and takes SIR JOHN aside.]

STOUT. Sir John we've been played upon! My secretary is brother to Flash's head clerk; Evelyn had not £300 in the bank!

SIR JOHN. Bless us and save us! you take away my breath! But then—Deadly Smooth—the arrest—the—oh, he must be done up!

STOUT. As to Smooth, he'd "do any thing to oblige." All a trick, depend on it! Smooth has already deceived me, for before the day's over Evelyn will be member for Groginhole. I've had an express from Popkins; he's in despair! not for himself, but for the country, Sir John; what's to become of the country?

SIR JOHN. But what could be Evelyn's object?

STOUT. Object? Do you look for an object in a whimsical creature like that? A man who has not even any political opinions; Object! Perhaps to break off his match with your daughter! Take care, Sir John, or the borough will be lost to your family!

SIR JOHN. Aha! I begin to smell a rat! But it's not too late yet.

STOUT. My interest in Popkins made me run to Lord Spendquick, the late proprietor of Groginhole. I told him that Evelyn could not pay the rest of the money; and he told me that—

SIR JOHN. What?

STOUT. Mr. Sharp had just paid it him; there's no hope for Popkins! England will rue this day!

SIR JOHN. Georgina shall lend him the money! I'll lend him—every man in my house shall lend him—I feel again what it is to be a father-in-law! But stop; I'll be cautious. Stout may be on his side—a trap—not likely; but I'll go first to Spendquick myself. Sir Frederick, excuse me: you can't dine with me to-day. And, on second thoughts, I see that it would be very unhandsome to desert poor Evelyn now he's down in the world. Can't think of it. Very much honored, and happy to see you as a friend.

Waiter! my carriage! Um! What, humbug Stingy Jack, will they? Ah! a good joke, indeed! [Exit.]

BLOUNT. Mr. Stout, what have you been saying to Sir John? Something against my character; I know you have; don't deny it. Sir, I shall expect satisfaction!

STOUT. Satisfaction, Sir Frederick? as if a man of enlightenment had any satisfaction in fighting! Did not mention your name; we were talking of Evelyn. Only think!—he's no more ruined than you are.

BLOUNT. Not ruined? Aha, now I understand! So, so! Stay, let me see: she's to meet me in the square! [picks out his watch; a very small one.]

STOUT [picking out his own; a very large one]. I must be off to the vestry.

BLOUNT. Just in time! Ten thousand pounds! Gad, my blood's up, and I won't be treated in this way, if he were fifty times Stingy Jack! [Exit.]

SCENE II..... The drawing-rooms in SIR JOHN VESSEY'S house.

LADY FRANKLIN, GRAVES.

GRAVES. Well, well, I am certain that poor Evelyn loves Clara still; but you can't persuade me that she cares for him.

LADY FRANK. She has been breaking her heart ever since she heard of his distress. Nay, I am sure she would give all she has, could it save him from the consequences of his own folly.

GRAVES [half aside]. She would only give him his own money if she did. I should like just to sound her.

LADY FRANK. [ringing the bell]. And you shall. I take so much interest in her that I forgive your friend every thing but his offer to Georgina. [Enter SERVANT.] Where are the young ladies?

SERV. Miss Vessey is, I believe, still in the square; Miss Douglas is just come in, my lady.

LADY FRANK. What, did she not go out with Miss Vessey?

SERV. No, my lady; I attended her to Drummond's the banker. [Exit.]

LADY FRANK. Drummond's! [Enter CLARA.] Why, child, what on earth could take you to Drummond's at this hour of the day?

CLARA [confused]. Oh, I—that is—I—Ah, Mr. Graves! How is Mr. Evelyn? How does he bear up against so sudden a reverse?

GRAVES. With an awful calm. I fear all is not right here! [touching his head]. The report in the town is, that he must go abroad instantly—perhaps to-day.

CLARA. Abroad!—to-day!

GRAVES. But all his creditors will be paid; and he only seems anxious to know if Miss Vessey remains true to his misfortunes.

CLARA. Ah! he loves her so much, then!

GRAVES. Um! That's more than I can say.

CLARA. She told me, last night, that he said to the last that £10,000 would free him from all his liabilities—that was the sum, was it not?

GRAVES. Yes; he persisted in the same assertion. Will Miss Vessey lend it?

LADY FRANK. [aside]. If she does I shall not think so well of her poor dear mother; for I am sure she'd be no child of Sir John's.

GRAVES. I should like to convince myself that my poor friend has nothing to hope for from a woman's generosity.

LADY FRANK. Civil! And are men, then, less covetous?

GRAVES. I know one man, at least, who, rejected in his poverty by one as poor as himself, no sooner came into a sudden fortune than he made his lawyer invent a codicil which the testator never dreamt of, bequeathing independence to a woman who had scorned him.

LADY FRANK. And never told her?

GRAVES. Never! There's no such document at Doctors' Commons, depend on it. You seem incredulous, Miss Clara! Good day.

CLARA [following him]. One word, for mercy's sake!—Do I understand you right? Ah, how could I be so blind? Generous Evelyn!

GRAVES. You appreciate and Georgina will desert him. Miss Douglas, he loves you still. If that's not just like me! Meddling with other people's affairs, as if they were worth it—hang them!

[Exit.]

CLARA. Georgina will desert him. Do you think so? [Aside.] Ah, he will soon discover that she never wrote that letter!

LADY FRANK. She told me, last night, that she would never see him again. To do her justice, she's less interested than her father; and as much attached as she can be to another. Even while engaged to Evelyn, she has met Sir Frederick every day in the square.

CLARA. And he is alone—sad—forsaken—ruined. And I, whom he enriched—I, the creature of his bounty—I, once the woman of his love, I stand idly here to content myself with tears and prayers! Oh, Lady Franklin, have pity on me—on him! We are both of kin to him; as relations we have both a right to comfort! Let us go to him—come!

LADY FRANK. No! it would scarcely be right—remember the world—I cannot.

CLARA. All abandon him—then I will go alone!

LADY FRANK. You!—so proud, so sensitive!

CLARA. Pride—when he wants a friend?

LADY FRANK. His misfortunes are his own fault—a gambler!

CLARA. Can you think of his faults now? I have no right to do so. All I have—all—his gift! and I never to have dreamt of it!

LADY FRANK. But if Georgina do indeed release him, if she has already done so—what will he think? What but—

CLARA. What but—that, if he love me still, I may have enough for both, and I am by his side! But that is too bright a dream. He told me I might call him brother.—Where, now, should a sister be?—But—but—I—I—I tremble! If, after all—if—if—in one word—Am I too bold? The world—my conscience can answer that—but do you think that he could despise me?

LADY FRANK. No, Clara, no! Your fair soul is too transparent for even libertines to misconstrue. Something tells me that this meeting may make the happiness of both! You cannot go alone. My presence justifies all. Give me your hand—we will go together! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III..... A room in EVELYN'S house.

EV. Yes; as yet, all surpasses my expectations. I am sure of Smooth—I have managed even Sharp; my election will seem but an escape from a prison. Ha! ha! True, it cannot last long; but a few hours more are all I require, and for that time at least I shall hope to be thoroughly ruined. [Enter GRAVES.] Well, Graves, and what do people say of me?

GRAVES. Every thing that's bad!

EV. Three days ago I was universally respected. I awoke this morning to find myself singularly infamous. Yet I'm the same man.

GRAVES. Humph! why gambling—

EV. Can't it be not criminal to gamble—it was criminal to lose. Tat!—will you deny that, if I had ruined Smooth instead of myself, every hand would have grasped mine yet more cordially, and every lip would have smiled congratulation on my success? Man—Man. I've not been rich and poor for nothing! The Vices and the Virtues are written in a language the World cannot construe; it reads them in a vile translation, and the translators are—FAILURE and SUCCESS! You alone are unchanged.

GRAVES. There's no merit in that. I am always ready to mingle my tears with any man. [Aside.] I know I'm a fool, but I can't help it. Hark ye, Evelyn! I like you—I'm rich; and any thing I can do to get you out of your hobble will give me an excuse to grumble for the rest of my life. There, now it's out.

EV. [touching]. There's something good in human nature after all! My dear friend, did I want your aid I would accept it, but I can extricate myself yet. Do you think Georgina will give me the same proof of confidence and affection?

GRAVES. Would you break your heart if she did not?

EV. It is in vain to deny that I still love Clara; our last conversation renewed feelings which would task all the energies of my soul to conquer. What then? I am not one of those, the Sybarites of sentiment, who deem it impossible for humanity to conquer love—who call their own weakness the voice of a resistless destiny. Such is the poor excuse of every woman who yields her honor, of every adulterer who betrays his friend. No! the heart was given to the soul as its ally, not as its traitor.

GRAVES. What do you tend to?

EV. This.—If Georgina still adheres to my fortunes (and I will not put her to too harsh trial), if she can face the prospect, not of ruin and poverty, for reports wrong me there, but of a moderate independence; if, in one word, she love me for myself, I will shut Clara for ever from my thought. I am pledged to Georgina, and I will carry to the altar a soul resolute to deserve her affection and fulfil its vows.

GRAVES. And if she rejects you?

EV. [joyfully]. If she do I am free once more! And then—then I will dare to ask, for I can ask without dishonor, if Clara can explain the past and bless the future!

[Enter Servant with a letter.]

EV. [after reading it]. The die is cast—the dream is over! Generous girl. Oh, Georgina! I will deserve you yet.

GRAVES. Georgina, is it possible?

EV. And delicacy, the womanhood, the exquisite grace of this! How we misjudge the depth of the human heart! How, seeing the straws on the surface, we forget that the pearls may lie hid below! I imagined her incapable of this devotion.

GRAVES. And I too!

EV. It were base in me to continue this trial a moment longer: I will write at once and to undeceive that generous heart [writing].

GRAVES. I would have given 1000l. if that little jade Clara had been beforehand: but just like my luck! if I want a man to marry one woman, he's sure to marry another on purpose to vex me! [EVELYN rings the bell.]

[Enter Servant.]

EV. Take this instantly to Miss Vessey; say I will call in an hour. [Exit Servant.] And now Clara is resigned for ever! Why does my heart sink within me? Why, why, looking to the fate to come, do I see only the memory of what has been?

GRAVES. You are re-engaged then to Georgina!

EV. Irrevocably.

SCENE IV..... Enter SERVANT, announcing KADY FRANKLIN and MISS DOUGLASS.—EVELYN, GRAVES.

LADY FRANK. My dear Evelyn, you may think it strange to receive such visitors at this moment; but, indeed, it is no time for ceremony. We are your relations—it is reported you are about to leave the country—we come to ask frankly what we can do to serve you?

EV. Madam—I—

LADY FRANK. Come, come—do not hesitate to confide in us; Clara is less a stranger to you than I am: your friend here will perhaps let me consult with him.—[Aside to GRAVES.] Let us leave them to themselves.

GRAVES. You're an angel of a widow; but you come too late, as whatever is good for anything generally does. [They retire into the inner room, which should be partially open.]

EV. Miss Douglas, I may want words to thank you; this goodness—this sympathy—

* * * * * "Errors, like straws," &c.

CLARA (absorbing herself to her emotion). Evelyn! Evelyn! Do not talk thus!—Goodness! sympathy!—I have learned all—all! It is for me to speak of gratitude! What! even when I had so wounded you—when you believed me the mercenary and cold—when you thought that I was blind and base enough not to know your what you are;—even at that time you thought but of my happiness—my fortunes—my fate!—And to you—you—I owe all that has raised the poor orphan from servitude and dependence! While your words were so bitter, your deeds so gentle! Oh, noble Evelyn, this, then, was your revenge!

Ev. You owe me no thanks; that revenge was sweet! Think you it was nothing to feel that my presence haunted you, though you knew it not?—that in things, the pettiest as the greatest, which that gold could buy—the very jewels you wore—the very robe in which to other eyes, you might seem more fair—in all in which you took the woman's young and innocent delight—I had a part—a share? that even if separated for ever—even if another's—even in distant years—perhaps in a happy home, listening to sweet voices, that might call you "mother!"—even then should the uses of that dress bring to your lips one smile—that smile was mine—due to me—due, as a sacred debt, to the hand that you rejected—to the love that you despised!

CLARA. Despised! See the proof that I despised you!—see: in this hour, when they say you are again as poor as before, I forgot the world—my pride—perhaps too much my sex: I remember but your sorrow—I am here!

Ev. (aside). O, Heaven! give me strength to bear it! [Aloud] And is this the same voice that, when I knelt at your feet—when I asked but one day the hope to call you mine—spoke only of poverty, and answered, "Never?"

CLARA. Because I had been unworthy of your love if I had ensured your misery. Evelyn, hear me! My father, like you, was poor—generous; gifted, like you, with genius—ambition; sensitive, like you, to the least breath of insult. He married, as you would have done—married one whose only dower was penury and care! Alfred, I saw that genius the curse to itself!—I saw that ambition wither to despair!—I saw the struggle—the humiliation—the proud man's agony—the bitter life—the early death!—and heard ever his breathless cry my mother's groan of self-reproach! Alfred Evelyn, now speak! Was the woman you loved so nobly to repay you with such a doom?

Ev. Clara, we should have shared it!

CLARA. Shared? Never let the woman who really loves comfort her selfishness with such delusion! In marriages like this the wife cannot share the burden; it is he—the husband—to provide, to scheme, to work, to endure—to grind out his strong heart at the miserable wheel! The wife, alas, cannot share the struggle—she can but witness the despair! And, therefore, Alfred, I rejected you.

Ev. Yet you believe me as poor now as I was then.

CLARA. But I am not poor; we are not so poor. Of this fortune, which is all your own—if, as I hear, one-half would free you from your debts, why, we have the other half still left, Evelyn! It is humble—but it is not penury.

Ev. Cease, cease—you know not how you torture me. Oh, that when hope was possible!—oh, that you had bid me take it to my breast and wait for a brighter day!

CLARA. And so have consumed your life of life upon a hope perhaps delayed till age—shut you from a happier choice, from fairer fortunes—shackled you with vows that, as my youth and its poor attributes decayed, would only have irritated and galled—made your whole existence one long suspense! No, Alfred, even yet you do not know me!

Ev. Know you! Fair angel, too excellent for man's harder nature to understand!—at least it is permitted me to reverse. Why were such blessed words not vouchsafed to me before?—why, why came they now—too late! Oh Heaven—too late!

CLARA. Too late! What, then, have I said?

Ev. Wealth! what is it without you? With you, I recognise its power; to forestall your every wish—to smooth your every path—to make all that life borrows from Grace and Beauty your ministrant and handmaid; and then looking to those eyes, to read there the treasures of a heart that excelled all that things could lavish; why that were to make gold indeed a god! But vain—vain—vain! Bound by every tie of faith, gratitude, loyalty and honor, to another!

CLARA. Another! Is she, then, true to your reverses? I did not know this—indeed, I did not! And I have thus betrayed myself! O, shame! he must despise me now!

SCENE V.

The foregoing.—Enter SIR JOHN; at the same time GRAVES and LADY FRANKLIN advance from the inner room.

SIR JOHN (with dignity and frankness). Evelyn, I was hasty yesterday. You must own it natural that I should be so. But Georgina has been so urgent in your defence, that—[as LADY FRANKLIN comes up to listen] Sister, just shut the door, will you?—that I cannot resist her. What's money without happiness? So give me your security; for she insists on lending you the 10,000.

Ev. I know; and have already received it.

SIR JOHN. Already received it! Is he joking? Faith, for the last two days I believe I have been living among the Mysteries of Udolpho! Sister, have you seen Georgina?

LADY FRANK. Not since she went out to walk in the square.

SIR JOHN. (aside). She's not in the square nor the house—where the deuce can the girl be?

Ev. I have written to Miss Vesey—I have asked her to fix the day for our wedding.

SIR JOHN (joggingly). Have you? Go, Lady Franklin, find her instantly—she must be back by this time: take my carriage, it is but a step—you won't be two minutes gone. [Aside.] I'd go myself, but I'm afraid of leaving him a moment while he's in such excellent dispositions.

LADY FRANK. (repulsing CLARA). No no: stay till I return. [Exit.]

SIR JOHN. And don't be downhearted, my dear fellow: if the worst come to the worst, you will have every thing I can leave you. Meantime, if I can in any way help you—

Ev. Ha! you!—you, too? Sir John, you have seen my letter to Miss Vesey? [aside] or could she have learned the truth before she ventured to be generous?

SIR JOHN. No; on my honor. I only just called at the door on my way from Lord Spend—that is, from the City. Georgina was out;—was ever anything so unlucky?

[Blow] (Hush!—Blow for ever!) What's that?

Enter SHARP.

SHARP. Sir, a deputation from Grogginhole—poll closed in the first hour—you are returned! Hollow, air; hollow!

Ev. And it was to please Clara!

SIR JOHN. Mr. Sharp! Mr. Sharp! I say, how much has Mr. Evelyn lost by Messrs. Flash and Co.

SHARP. Oh, a great deal Sir; a great deal.

SIR JOHN (alarmed). How! a great deal!

Ev. Speak the truth, Sharp; concealment is all over.

SHARP. £223 6s. 3d.; a great sum to throw away.

GRAVES. Ah, I comprehend now! Poor Evelyn, caught in his own trap!

SIR JOHN. Eh! what, my dear boy? what? Ha! ha! all humbug, was it? All humbug, upon my soul! So, Mr. Sharp, is n't he ruined after all? not the least, wee, rascally, little bit in the world, ruined?

SHARP. Sir, he has never even lived up to his income.

SIR JOHN. Worthy man! I could jump up to the ceiling! I am the happiest father-in-law in the three kingdoms. And that's my sister's knock too.

CLARA. Since I was mistaken, cousin; since, now, you do not need me, forget what has passed; my business here is over. Farewell!

Ev. Could you but see my heart at this moment, with what love, what veneration, what anguish it is filled, you would know how little, in the great calamities of life, fortune is really worth. And must we part now—now—when—when—I never wept before, since my mother died!

Enter LADY FRANKLIN and GEORGINA, followed by BLOUNT who looks shy and embarrassed.

GRAVES. Georgina herself—then there's no hope.

SIR JOHN. What the deuce brings that fellow Blount here? Georgy, my dear Georgy, I want you—

Ev. Stand back, Sir John.

SIR JOHN. But I must speak a word to her—I want to—

Ev. Stand back, I say—not a whisper—not a sign. If your daughter is to be my wife, to her heart only will I look for a reply to mine.

LADY FRANK. (to GEOR). Speak the truth, niece.

Ev. Georgina, is it true, then, that you trust me with your confidence—your fortune. Is it also true that, when you did so, you believed me ruined? O, pardon the doubt! Answer as if your father stood not there—answer me from that truth the world cannot yet have plucked from your soul—answer as if the we or weal of a life trembling in the balance—answer as the woman's heart, yet virgin and unpolluted, should answer to one who has trusted to it his all!

GEOR. What can he mean?

SIR JOHN (making signs). She won't look this way, she won't!—hang her! Hem!

Ev. You falter. I implore—I adjure you—answer!

LADY FRANK. The truth!

GEOR. Mr. Evelyn; your fortune might well dazzle me, as it dazzled others. Believe me, I sincerely pity your reverses.

SIR JOHN. Good girl: you hear her, Evelyn?

GEOR. What's money without happiness?

SIR JOHN. Clever creature!—no noble sentiment!

GEOR. And so, as our engagement is now annulled—papa told me so this very morning—I have promised my hand where I have given my heart, to Sir Frederick Blount.

SIR JOHN. I told you, I! No such thing, no such thing; you frighten her out of her wits; she don't know what she's saying.

Ev. Am I awake? But this letter—this letter, received to-day—

LADY FRANK. (looking over the letter). Drummond's! from a banker!

Ev. Read, read.

LADY FRANK. "Ten thousand pounds just placed to your account: from the same unknown friend to Alfred Evelyn." Oh, Clara, I know now why you went to Drummond's this morning!

Ev. Clara! What! and the former one with the same signature, on the faith of which I placed my hand and sacrificed my heart—

LADY FRANK. Was written under my eyes, and the secret kept that—

Ev. Look up, look up, Clara; I am free! I am released! you forgive me? you love me? you are mine! We are rich—rich! I can give you fortune, power; I can devote to you my whole life, thought, heart, soul; I am all yours, Clara, my own, my wife!

SIR JOHN. A pretty mess you've made of it, to humbug your own father! And you, too, Lady Franklin—I am to thank you for this!

LADY FRANK. You've to thank me that she's not now on the road to Scotland with Sir Frederick; I chanced on them by the Park just in time to dissuade and save her. But, to do her justice, a hint of your displeasure was sufficient.

GEOR. (half sobbing). And you know, papa, you said this very morning that poor Frederick had been very ill used, and you would settle it all at the club.

BLOUNT. Come, Sir John, you can only blame yourself and Evelyn's cunning device! After all, I'm no such vewy bad match; and as for the £10,000—

Ev. I'll double it. Ah, Sir John, what's money without happiness?

SIR JOHN. Pahaw—nonsense—stuff! Do n't humbug me.

LADY FRANK. But if you do n't consent, she'll have no husband at all.

SIR JOHN. Hum! there's something in that. [Aside to EVELYN] Double it, will you? Then settle it all tightly on her. Well—well—my foible is not avarice. Blount, make her happy. Child, I forgive you. [Pinching her arm.] Ugh, you fool!

GRAVES (to LADY FRANKLIN). I'm afraid it's catching. What say you? I feel the symptoms of matrimony creeping all over me. Shall we? eh? Shall we? Frankly, now, frankly—

LADY FRANK. Frankly, now, there's my hand, on one condition—that we finish our reel on the wedding-day.

GRAVES. Accepted. Is it possible? Sainted Maria! thank Heaven you are spared this affliction.

Enter SMOOTH.

SMOOTH. How d'ye do, Alfred?—I intrude, I fear! Quite a family party.

BLOUNT. With Sir John, SMOOTH—Georgina's mine, and—

SMOOTH. And our four friends there, apparently have made up another rubber. John, my dear boy, you look as if you had something at stake on the odd trick.

SIR JOHN. Sir, you're very—Confound the fellow!—and he's a dead shot too!

Enter STOUT and GLOSSMORE hastily, talking with each other.

STOUT. I'm sure he's of our side; we've all the intelligence.

GLOSS. I'm sure he's of ours if his fortune is safe, for we've all the property.

STOUT. Just heard of your return, Evelyn! Congratulate you. The great motion of the season is fixed for Friday. We count on your vote. Progress with the times!

GLOSS. Preserve the Constitution!

STOUT. Your money will do wonders for the party!—Advance!

GLOSS. The party respects men of your property! Stick fast!

Ev. I have the greatest respect, I assure you, for the worthy and intelligent flies upon both sides of the wheel; but whether we go too fast or too slow does not, I fancy, depend so much on the flies as on the Stout Gentleman who sits inside and pays the post-boys. Now all my politics as yet is to consider what's best for the Stout Gentleman!

SMOOTH. Meaning John Bull. See dear old John!

STOUT. I'm as wise as I was before.

GLOSS. Sir, he's a trimmer!

Ev. [to CLARA.] Ah, Clara, you—you have succeeded where wealth had failed! You have reconciled me to the world and to mankind. My friends—we must confess it—amidst the humors and the follies, the vanities, deceits, and vices that play their part in the Great Comedy of Life—it is our own fault if we do not find such natures, though rare and few, as redeem the rest, brightening the shadows that are flung from the form and body of the trame, with glimpses of the everlasting holiness of truth and love.

GRAVES. But for the truth and the love, when found, to make us tolerably happy, we should not be without—

LADY FRANK. Good health;

GRAVES. Good spirits;

CLARA. A good heart;

SMOOTH. An innocent rubber;

BLOUNT. A proper deguee of pudence;

STOUT. Enlightened opinions;

GLOSS. Constitutional principles;

SIR JOHN. Knowledge of the world;

Ev. And—plenty of Money!

THE END.

MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP.

CHAPTER LI.

The bland and open-hearted proprietor of Bachelor's Hall, slept on amidst the congenial accompaniments of rain, mud, dirt, damp, fog, and rats, until late in the day; when, summoning his valet Tom Scott to assist him to rise, and to prepare breakfast, he quitted his couch, and made his toilet. This duty performed, and his repast ended, he again betook himself to Bevis Marks.

This visit was not intended for Mr. Swiveller, but for his friend and employer Mr. Sampson Brass. Both gentlemen however were from home, nor was the life and light of law, Miss Sally, at her post either. The fact of their joint desertion of the office was made known to all comers by a scrap of paper in the hand-writing of Mr. Swiveller, which was attached to the bell-handle, and which, giving the reader no clue to the time of the day when it was first posted, furnished him with the rather vague and unsatisfactory information that that gentleman would "return in an hour."

"There's a servant, I suppose," said the dwarf, knocking at the house-door. "She'll do."

After a sufficiently long interval, the door was opened, and a small voice immediately accosted him with, "Oh! Please will you leave a card or message?"

"Eh?" said the dwarf, looking down (it was something quite new to him) upon the small servant.

To this, the child, conducting her conversation as upon the occasion of her first interview with Mr. Swiveller, again replied, "Oh, please will you leave a card or message?"

"I'll write a note," said the dwarf, pushing past her into the office; "and mind your master has it directly he comes home." So Mr. Quilp climbed up to the top of a tall stool to write the note, and the small servant carefully tutored for such emergencies, looked on, with her eyes wide open, ready, if he so much as abstracted a wafer, to rush into the street and give the alarm to the police.

As Mr. Quilp folded his note (which was soon written: being a very short one) he encountered the gaze of the small servant. He looked at her long and earnestly.

"How are you?" said the dwarf, moistening a wafer with horrible grimaces.

The small servant, perhaps frightened by his looks, returned no audible reply; but it appeared from the motion of her lips that she was inwardly repeating the same form of expression concerning the note or message.

"Do they use you ill here? is your mistress a Tartar?" said Quilp with a chuckle.

In reply to the last interrogation, the small servant, with a look of infinite cunning, mingled with fear, screwed up her mouth very tight and round, and nodded violently.

Whether there was any thing in the peculiar slyness of her action which fascinated Mr. Quilp, or any thing in the expression of her features at the moment which attracted his attention for some other reason; or whether it merely occurred to him as a pleasant whim to stare the small servant out of countenance; certain it is, that he planted his elbows square and firmly on the desk, and squeezing up his cheeks with his hands, looked at her fixedly.

"Where do you come from?" he said, after a long pause, stroking his chin.

"I do n't know."

"What's your name?"

"Nothing."

"Nonsense!" retorted Quilp. "What does your mistress call you when she wants you?"

"A little devil," said the child.

She added in the same breath, as if fearful of any further questioning, "But please will you leave a card or message?"

These unusual answers might naturally have provoked some further inquiries. Quilp, however, without uttering another word, withdrew his eyes from the small servant, stroked his chin more thoughtfully than before, and then, bending over the note as if to direct it with scrupulous and hair-breadth nicety, looked at her, covertly but very narrowly, from under his bushy eyebrows. The result of this secret survey was, that he shaded his face with his hands, and laughed slyly and noiselessly, until every vein in it was swollen almost to bursting. Pulling his hat over his brow to conceal his mirth and its effects, he tossed the letter to the child, and hastily withdrew.

Once in the street, moved by some secret impulse, he laughed, and held his sides, and laughed again, and tried to peer through the dusty area railings as if to catch another glimpse of the child, until he was quite tired out. At last, he travelled back to the Wilderness, which was within rifle-shot of his bachelor retreat, and ordered tea in the wooden summer-house that afternoon for three persons; an invitation to Miss Sally Brass and her brother to partake of that entertainment at that place, having been the object both of his journey and his note.

It was not precisely the kind of weather in which people usually take tea in summer-houses, far less in summer-houses in an advanced state of decay, and overlooking the slimy banks of a great river at low water. Nevertheless, it was in this choice retreat that Mr. Quilp ordered a cold collation to be prepared, and it was beneath its cracked and leaky roof that he in due course of time received Mr. Sampson and his sister Sally.

"You're fond of the beauties of nature," said Quilp with a grin. "Is this charming, Brass? Is it unusual, unsophisticated, primitive?"

"It's delightful indeed, sir," replied the lawyer.

"Cool?" said Quilp.

"N-not particularly so, I think, sir," rejoined Brass, with his teeth chattering in his head.

"Perhaps a little damp and agree-ish?" said Quilp.

"Just damp enough to be cheerful, sir," rejoined Brass.

"Nothing more, sir, nothing more."

"And Sally?" said the delighted dwarf. "Does she like it?"

"She'll like it better," returned that strong-minded lady, "when she has tea; so let us have it, and do n't bother."

"Sweet Sally!" cried Quilp, extending his arms as if about to embrace her. "Gentle, charming, overwhelming Sally."

"He's a very remarkable man indeed!" soliloquised Mr. Brass. "He's quite a Troubadour, you know; quite a Troubadour!"

These complimentary expressions were uttered in a somewhat absent and distracted manner; for the unfortunate lawyer, besides having a bad cold in his head, had got wet in coming, and would have willingly borne some pecuniary sacrifice if he could have shifted his present raw quarters to a warm room, and have dried himself at a fire. Quilp, however—who, beyond the gratification of his demon whims, owed Sampson some acknowledgment of the part he had played in the morning scene of which he had been a hidden witness—marked the symptoms of uneasiness with a delight past all expression, and derived from them a secret joy which the costliest banquet could never have afforded him.

It is worthy of remark, too, as illustrating a little feature in the character of Miss Sally Brass, that, although on her own account she would have borne the discomforts of the Wilderness with a very ill grace, and would probably, indeed, have walked off before the tea appeared, she no sooner beheld the latent uneasiness and misery of her brother than she developed a grim satisfaction, and began to enjoy herself after her own manner. Though the wet came stealing through the roof and trickling down upon their heads, Miss Brass uttered no complaint, but presided over the tea equipage with imperturbable composure. While Mr. Quilp, in his uproarious hospitality, seated himself upon an empty beer barrel, vaunted the place as the most beautiful and comfortable in the three kingdoms, and elevating his glass, drank to their next merry-meeting in that jovial spot; and Mr. Brass, with the rain plashing down into his tea-cup, made a dismal attempt to pluck up his spirits and appear at his ease; and Tom Scott, who was in waiting at the door under an old umbrella, exulted in his agonies and bade fair to split his sides with laughing; while all this was passing, Miss Sally Brass, unmindful of the wet which dripped down upon her own feminine person and fair apparel, sat placidly behind the tea-board, erect and grizzled, contemplating the unhappiness of her brother with a mind at ease, and content, in her amiable disregard of self, to sit there all night, witnessing the torments which his avaricious and grovelling nature compelled him to endure and forbade him to resent. And this, it must be observed, or the illustration would be incomplete, although in a business point of view, she had the strongest sympathy with Mr. Sampson, and would have been beyond measure indignant, if he had thwarted their client in any one respect.

In the height of his boisterous merriment, Mr. Quilp having on some pretences dismissed his attendant sprite for the moment, resumed his usual manner all at once, dismounted from his cask, and laid his hand upon the lawyer's sleeve.

"A word," said the dwarf, "before we go further. Sally, hark'ee for a minute."

Miss Sally drew closer, as if accustomed to business conferences with their host which were the better for not having air.

"Business," said the dwarf, glancing from brother to sister. "Very private business. Lay your heads together when you're by yourselves."

"Certainly, sir," returned Brass, taking out his pocket-book and pencil. "I'll take down the heads, if you please, sir. Remarkable documents," added the lawyer, raising his eyes to the ceiling, "most remarkable documents. He states his points so clearly that it's a treat to have 'em! I do n't know any act of parliament that's equal to him in clearness."

"I shall deprive you of a treat," said Quilp, dryly. "Put up your book: We do n't want any documents. So. There's a lad named Kit—"

Miss Sally nodded, implying that she knew of him.

"Kit!" said Mr. Sampson. "Kit! ha! I've heard the name before, but I do n't exactly call to mind—I do n't exactly—"

"You're as slow as a tortoise, and more thick-headed than a rhinoceros," returned his obliging client, with an impatient gesture.

"He's extremely pleasant!" cried the obsequious Sampson. "His acquaintance with Natural History, too, is surprising. Quite a Buffon, quite!"

There is doubt that Mr. Brass intended some compliment or other; and it has been argued with show of reason that he would have said Buffon, but made use of a superfluous vowel. Be this as it may, Quilp gave him no time for correction, as he performed that office himself by more than tapping him on the head with the handle of his umbrella.

"Do n't let's have any wrangling," said Miss Sally, staying his hand. "I've showed you that I know him, and that's enough."

"She's always foremost!" said the dwarf, patting her on the back and looking contemptuously at Sampson. "I do n't like Kit, Sally."

"Nor I," rejoined Miss Brass.

"Nor I," said Sampson.

"Why, that's right!" cried Quilp. "Half our work is done already. This Kit is one of your honest people, one of your fair characters; a prowling, prying hound; a hypocrite; a double-faced, white-livered, sneaking spy; a crouching cur to those that feed and coax him, and a barking, yelping dog to all besides."

"Fearfully eloquent!" said Brass, with a sneeze. "Quite appalling!"

"Come to the point," said Miss Sally, "and do n't talk so much."

"Right again!" exclaimed Quilp, with another contemptuous look at Sampson, "always foremost! I say, Sally, he is a yelping, insolent dog to all besides, and, most of all, to me. In short, I owe him a grudge."

"That's enough sir," said Sampson.

"No, it's not enough, sir," sneered Quilp; "will you hear me out? Besides that I owe him a grudge on that account, he thwarts me at this minute, and stands between me and an end which might otherwise prove a golden one to us all. Apart from that, I repeat that he crosses my humor, and I hate him. Now, you know the lad, and can guess the rest. Devise your own means of putting him out of the way, and execute them. Shall it be done?"

"It shall, sir," said Sampson.

"Then give me your hand," retorted Quilp. "Sally, girl, yours. I rely as much, or more, on you than him. Tom Scott comes back. Lantern, pipes, more grog, and a jolly night of it!"

No other word was spoken, no other look exchanged, which had the slightest reference to this, the real occasion of their meeting. The trio were well accustomed to act together, and were linked to each other by ties of mutual interest and advantage, and nothing more was needed. Resuming his boisterous manner with the same ease with which he had thrown it off, Quilp was in an instant the same uproarious, reckless little savage, he had been a few seconds before. It was ten o'clock at night before the amiable Sally supported her beloved and loving brother from the Wilderness, by which time he needed the utmost support her tender frame could render; his walk being for some unknown reason anything but steady, and his legs constantly doubling up in unexpected places.

Overpowered, notwithstanding his late prolonged stumbers, by the fatigues of the last few days, the dwarf lost no time in creeping to his dainty house, and was soon dreaming in his hammock. Leaving him to visions, in which perhaps the quiet figures we quitted in the old church porch were not without their share, be it our task to rejoin them as they sat and watched.

CHAPTER LII.

After a long time, the schoolmaster appeared at the wicket-gate of the churchyard, and hurried toward them; jingling in his hand, as he came along, a bunch of rusty keys. He was quite breathless with pleasure and haste when he reached the porch, and at first could only point toward the old building which the child had been contemplating so earnestly.

"You see those two old houses?" he said at last.

"Yes, surely," replied Nell. "I have been looking at them nearly all the time you have been away."

"And you would have looked at them more curiously yet if you could have guessed what I have to tell you," said her friend. "One of these houses is mine."

Without saying any more, or giving the child time to reply, the schoolmaster took her hand, and, his honest face quite radiant with exultation, led her to the place of which he spoke.

They stopped before its low arched door. After trying several of the keys in vain, the schoolmaster found one to fit the huge lock, which turned back, creaking, and admitted them into the house.

The room into which they entered was a vaulted chamber once nobly ornamented by cunning architects, and still retaining, in its beautiful groined roof and rich stone tracery, choice remnants of its ancient splendor. Foliage carved in the stone, and emulating the mystery of Nature's hand, yet remained to tell how many times the leaves outside had come and gone, while it lived on unchanged. The broken figures supporting the burden of the chimney-piece, though mutilated, were still distinguishable for what they had been—far different from the dust without—and showed sadly by the empty hearth, like creatures who had outlived their kind, and mourned their own too slow decay.

In some old time—for even change was old in that place—a wooden partition had been constructed in one part of the chamber to form a sleeping-closet, into which the light was admitted at the same period by a rude window, or rather niche, cut in the solid wall. This screen, together with two seats in the broad chimney, had at some forgotten date been part of the church or convent; for the oak, hastily appropriated to its present purpose, had been little altered from its former shape, and presented to the eye a pile of fragments of rich carving from its old monkish stalls.

An open door leading to a small room or cell, dim with the light that came through leaves of ivy, completed the interior of this portion of the ruin. It was not quite destitute of furniture. A few strange chairs, whose arms and legs looked as though they had dwindled away with age; a table, the very spectre of its race; a great old chest that had once held records in the church, with other quaintly-fashioned domestic necessaries, and store of fire-wood for the winter, were scattered around, and gave evident tokens of its occupation as a dwelling-place at no very distant time.

The child looked around her with that solemn feeling with which we contemplate the work of ages that have become but drops of water in the great ocean of eternity. The old man had followed them, but they were all three hushed for a space, and drew their breath softly, as if they feared to break the silence even by so slight a sound.

"It is a very beautiful place!" said the child in a low voice.

"I almost feared you thought otherwise," returned the schoolmaster. "You shivered when we first came in, as if you felt it cold and gloomy."

"It was not that," said Nell, glancing round with a slight shudder. "Indeed I cannot tell you what it was, but when I saw the outside, from the church porch, the same feeling came over me. It is its being so old and gray, perhaps."

"A peaceful place to live in, do n't you think so?" said her friend.

"Oh yes," rejoined the child, clasping her hands earnestly. "A quiet, happy place—a place to live and learn to die in!" She would have said more, but that the energy of her thoughts caused her voice to falter and come in trembling whispers from her lips.

"A place to live and learn to live, and gather health of mind and body in," said the schoolmaster; "for this old house is yours."

"Ours!" cried the child.

"Ay," returned the schoolmaster, gayly, "for many a merry year to come, I hope. I shall be a close neighbor—only next door—but this house is yours."

Having now disburdened himself of his great surprise, the schoolmaster sat down, and drawing Nell to his side, told her how he had learnt that that ancient tenement had been occupied for a very long time by an old person, nearly a hundred years of age, who kept the keys of the church, opened and closed it for the services, and showed it to strangers; how she had died not many weeks ago, and nobody had yet been found to fill the office; how, learning all this in an interview with the sexton, who was confined to his bed by rheumatism, he had been bold to make mention of his fellow-traveller, which had been so favorably received by that high authority, that he had taken courage, acting on his advice, to propound the matter to the clergyman. In a word, the result of his exertions was, that Nell and her grandfather were to be carried before the last-named gentleman next day; and his approval of their conduct and appearance reserved as a matter of form, that they were already appointed to the vacant post.

"There's a small allowance of money," said the schoolmaster. "It is not much, but still enough to live upon in this retired spot. By clubbing out funds together, we shall do bravely; no fear of that."

"Heaven bless and prosper you!" sobbed the child.

"Amen, my dear," returned her friend, cheerfully; "and all of us, as it will, and has, in leading through sorrow and trouble to this tranquil life. But we must look at my house now. Come!"

They repaired to the other tenement; tried the rusty keys as before; at length found the right one; and opened the worm-eaten door. It led into a chamber, vaulted and old, like that from which they had come, but not so spacious, and having only one other little room attached. It was not difficult to divine that the other house was of right the schoolmaster's, and that he had chosen for himself the least commodious, in his care and regard for them. Like the adjoining habitation, it held such old articles of furniture as were absolutely necessary, and had its stack of fire-wood.

To make these dwellings as habitable and full of comfort as they could, was now their pleasant care. In a short time, each had its cheerful fire glowing and crackling on the hearth, and reddening the pale old walls with a hale and healthy blush. Nell, busily plying her needle, repaired the tattered window-hangings, drew together the rents that time had worn in the threadbare scraps of carpet, and made them whole and decent. The schoolmaster swept and smoothed the ground before the door, trimmed the long grass, trained the ivy and creeping plants, which hung their drooping heads in melancholy neglect; and gave to the outer walls a cheery air of home. The old man, sometimes by his side and sometimes with the child, lent his aid to both, went here and there on little patient services, and was happy. Neighbors, too, as they came from work, proffered their help; or sent their children with such small presents or loans as the strangers needed most. It was a busy day; and night came on, and found them wondering that there was yet so much to do, and that it should be dark so soon.

They took their supper together in the house which may be henceforth called the child's; and when they had finished their meal drew round the fire, and almost in whispers—their hearts were too quiet and glad for loud expression—discussed their future plans. Before they separated, the schoolmaster read some prayers aloud; and then, full of gratitude and happiness, they parted for the night.

At that silent hour, when her grandfather was sleeping peacefully in his bed, and every sound was hushed, the child lingered before the dying embers, and thought of her past fortunes as if they had been a dream and she only now awake. The glare of the sinking flame, reflected in the oaken panels whose carved tops were dimly seen in the gloom of the dusky roof—the aged walls, where strange shadows came and went with every flickering of the fire—the solemn presence, within, of that decay which falls on every side, of Death—filled her with deep and thoughtful feelings, but which none of terror or alarm. A change had been gradually stealing over her, in the time of her loneliness and sorrow. With failing strength and heightening resolution, there had sprung up a purified and altered mind; there had grown in her bosom blessed thoughts and hopes, which are the portion of few but the weak and drooping. There were none to see the frail, perishable figure, as it glided from the fire and leaned pensively at the open casement; none but the stars, to look into the upturned face and read its history. The old church bell rang out the hour with a mournful sound, as if it had grown sad from so much communing with the dead and unheeded warning to the living; the fallen leaves rustled; the grass stirred upon the graves; all else was still and sleeping.

Some of the dreamless sleepers lay close within the shadow of the church—touching the wall, as if they clung to it for comfort and protection. Others had chosen to lie beneath the changing shade of trees; others by the path, that footsteps might come near them; others among the graves of little children. Some had desired to rest beneath the very ground they had trodden in their daily walks; some where the setting sun might shine upon their beds; some where its light would fall upon them when it rose—Perhaps not one of the unprisoned souls had been able quite to separate itself in living thought from its old companion. If any had, it had still felt for it a love like that which captives have been known to bear toward the cell in which they have been long confined, and even at parting hung upon its narrow bounds affectionately.

It was long before the child closed the window and approached her bed. Again something of the same sensation as before—an involuntary chill—a momentary feeling akin to fear—but vanishing directly, and leaving no alarm behind. Again, too, dreams of the little scholar; of the roof opening, and a column of bright faces, rising far away into the sky, as she had seen in some old scriptural picture once, and looking down on her, asleep. It was a sweet and happy dream. The quiet spot, outside, seemed to remain the same, save that there was music in the air, and a sound of angel's wings. After a time the sisters came there hand in hand, and stood among the graves. And then the dream grew dim, and faded.

With the brightness and joy of morning came the renewal of yesterday's labors, the revival of its pleasant thoughts, the restoration of its energies, cheerfulness, and hope. They worked gayly in ordering and arranging their houses until noon, and then went to visit the clergyman.

He was a simple-hearted old gentleman, of a shrinking, subdued spirit, accustomed to retirement, and very little acquainted with the world, which he had left many years before to come and settle in that place. His wife had died in the house in which he still lived, and he had long since lost sight of any earthly cares or hopes beyond it.

He received them very kindly, and at once showed an interest in Nell; asking her name, and age, her birth-place, the circumstances which had led her there, and so forth. The schoolmaster had already told her story. They had no other friends or home to leave, he said, and had come to share his fortunes. He loved the child as though she were his own.

"Well, well," said the clergyman. "Let it be as you desire. She is very young."

"Old in adversity and trial, sir," replied the schoolmaster.

"God help her! Let her rest and forget them," said the old gentleman. "But an old church is a dull and gloomy place for one so young as you, my child."

"Oh no, sir," returned Nell. "I have no such thoughts, indeed."

"I would rather see her dancing on the green at night," said the old gentleman, laying his hand upon her head and smiling sadly, "than have her sitting in the shadow of our mouldering arches. You must look to this, and see that her heart does not grow heavy among these solemn ruins. Your request is granted, friend."

After more kind words, they withdrew, and repaired to the child's house, where they were yet in conversation on their happy fortune, when another friend appeared.

This was a little old gentleman, who lived in the parsonage-house, and had resided there (so they learnt soon afterward) ever since the death of the clergyman's wife, which had happened fifteen years before. He had been his college friend, and always his close companion; in the first shock of his grief had come to console and comfort him; and from that time they had never parted company. The little old gentleman was the active spirit of the place; the adjuster of all differences, the promoter of all merry-makings, the dispenser of his friend's bounty and of no small charity of his own beside; the universal mediator, comforter and friend. None of the simple villagers had cared to ask his name, or, when they knew it, to store it in their memory. Perhaps from some vague rumor of his college honors which had been whispered abroad upon his first arrival, perhaps because he was an unmarried, unincumbered gentleman, he had been called the bachelor. The name pleased him, or suited him as well as any other; and the Bachelor he had ever since remained. And the bachelor it was, it may be added, who with his own hands had laid in the stock of fuel which the wanderers had found in their new habitations.

The bachelor, then—to call him by his usual appellation—lifted the latch, showed his little round mild face for a moment at the door, and stepped into the room like one who was no stranger to it.

"You are Mr. Marton, the new schoolmaster?" he said, greeting Nell's kind friend.

"I am, sir."

"You come well recommended, and I am glad to see you. I should have been in the way yesterday, expecting you, but I rode across the country to carry a message from a sick mother to her daughter in service some miles off, and have but just now returned. This is our young church-keeper? You are not the less welcome, friend, for her sake, or for this old man's; nor the worse teacher for having learnt humanity."

"She has been ill, sir, very lately," said the schoolmaster, in answer, in answer to the look with which their visitor regarded Nell when he had kissed her cheek.

"Yes, yes. I know she has," he rejoined. "There have been suffering and heartache here."

"Indeed there have, sir."

The little old gentleman glanced at the grandfather, and back again at the child, whose hand he took tenderly in his, and held.

"You will be happier here," he said; "we will try, at least, to make you so. You have made great improvements here already. Are they the work of your hands?"

"Yes, sir."

"We may make some others—not better in themselves, but, with better means, perhaps," said the bachelor. "Let us see now, let us see."

Nell accompanied him into the other little rooms, and over both the houses, in which he found various small comforts wanting, which he engaged to supply from a certain collection of odds and ends he had at home, and which must have been a very miscellaneous and extensive one, as it comprehended the most opposite articles imaginable. They all came, however, and came without loss of time; for the little old gentleman, disappearing for some five or ten minutes, presently returned, laden with old shelves, rugs, blankets, and other household gear, and followed by a boy bearing a similar load. These being cast on the floor in a promiscuous heap, yielded a quantity of occupation in arranging, erecting, and putting away; the superintendence of which task evidently afforded the old gentleman extreme delight, and engaged him for some time with great briskness and activity. When nothing more was left to be done, he charged the boy to run off and bring his schoolmates to be marshalled before their new master, and solemnly reviewed.

"As good a set of fellows, Marton, as you'd wish to see," he said, turning to the schoolmaster when the boy was gone; "but I do n't let 'em know I think so. That would n't do, at all."

The messenger soon returned at the head of a long row of urchins, great and small, who, being confronted by the bachelor at the house door, fell into various convulsions of politeness; clutching their hats and caps, squeezing them into the smallest possible dimensions, and making all manner of bows and scrapes; which the little old gentleman contemplated with excessive satisfaction, and expressed his approval of by a great many nods and smiles. Indeed, his approbation of the boys was by no means so scrupulously disguised as he had led the schoolmaster to suppose, inasmuch as it broke out in sundry loud whispers and confidential remarks which were perfectly audible to them every one.

"This first boy, schoolmaster," said the bachelor, "is John Owen; a lad of good parts, sir, and frank, honest temper; but too thoughtless, too playful, too light-headed by far. That boy, my good sir, would break his neck with pleasure, and deprive his parents of their chief comfort—and between ourselves when you come to see him at hare and hounds, taking the fence and ditch by the finger-post, and sliding down the face of the little quarry, you'll never forget it. It's beautiful!"

John Owen having been thus rebuked, and being in perfect possession of the speech aside, the bachelor singled out another boy.

"Now, look at that lad, sir," said the bachelor. "You see that fellow? Richard Evans his name is, sir. An amazing boy to learn, blessed with a good memory, and a ready understanding, and moreover with a good voice and ear for psalm-singing, in which he is the best among us. Yet, sir, that boy will come to a bad end; he'll never die in his bed; he's always falling asleep in church in sermon-time—and to tell you the truth, Mr. Marton, I always did the same at his age, and feel quite certain that it was natural to my constitution and I could n't help it."

This hopeful pupil, edified by the above terrible reproof, the bachelor turned to another.

"But if we talk of examples to be shunned," said he, "if we come to boys that should be a warning and a beacon to all their fellows, here's the one, and I hope you won't spare him. This is the lad, sir; this one with the blue eyes and light hair. This is a swimmer, sir, this fellow—a diver, Lord save us! This is a boy, sir, who had a fancy for plunging into eighteen feet of water with his clothes on and bringing up a blind man's dog, who was being drowned by the weight of his chain and collar, while his master stood wringing his hands upon the bank, bewailing the loss of his guide and friend. I sent the boy two guineas anonymously, sir," added the bachelor, in his peculiar whisper, "directly I heard of it; but never mention it on any account, for he has n't the least idea that it came from me."

Having disposed of this culprit, the bachelor turned to another, and from him to another, and so on through the whole array, laying, for their wholesome restriction within due bounds, the same cutting emphasis on such of their propensities as were dearest to his heart and were unquestionably referable to his own precept and example. Thoroughly persuaded in the end that he had made them miserable by his severity, he dismissed them with a small present, and an admonition to walk quietly home, without any leavings, scufflings, or turnings out of the way: which injunction (he informed the schoolmaster in the same audible confidence) he did not think he could have obeyed when he was a boy, had his life depended on it.

Hailing these little tokens of the bachelor's disposition as so many assurances of his own welcome course from that time, the schoolmaster parted from him with a light heart and joyous spirits, and deemed himself one of the happiest men on earth. The windows of the two old houses were ruddy again that night with the reflection of the cheerful fires that burnt within; and the bachelor and his friend, pausing to look upon them as they returned from their evening walk, spoke softly together of the beautiful child, and looked round upon the churchyard with a sigh.

CHAPTER XLII.

Nell was stirring early in the morning; and having discharged her household tasks, and put every thing in order for the good schoolmaster (though sorely against his will, for he would have spared her the pains), took down, from its nail by the fireside, a little bundle of keys with which the bachelor had formally invested her on the previous day, and went out alone to visit the old church.

The sky was serene and bright, the air clear, perfumed with the fresh scent of newly-fallen leaves, and grateful to every sense. The neighboring stream sparkled, and rolled onward with a tuneful sound; the dew glistened on the green mounds, like tears shed by Good Spirits over the dead.

Some young children sported among the tombs, and hid from each other, with laughing faces. They had an infant with them, and had laid it down asleep upon a child's grave, in a little bed of leaves. It was a new grave—the resting-place, perhaps, of some little creature, who, meek and patient in its illness, had often sat and watched them, and now seemed to their minds scarcely changed.

She drew near and asked one of them whose grave it was. The child answered that that was not its name; it was a garden—his brother's. It was greener, he said, than all the other gardens, and the birds loved it better because he had been used to feed them. When he had done speaking, he looked at her with a smile, and kneeling down and nestling for a moment with his cheek against the turf, bounded merrily away.

She passed the church, gazing upward at its old tower, went through the wicket gate, and so into the village. The old sexton, leaning on a crutch, was taking the air at his cottage door, and gave her good morrow.

"You are better?" said the child, stopping to speak with him.

"Ay, surely," returned the old man. "I'm thankful to say, much better."

"You will be quite well soon."

"With Heaven's leave, and a little patience. But come in, come in."

The old man leaped on before, and warning her of the downward step, which he achieved himself with no small difficulty, led the way into his little cottage.

"It is but one room, you see. There is another up above, but the stair has got harder to climb o' late years, and I never use it. I'm thinking of taking to it again next summer, though."

The child wondered how a grey-headed man like him—one of his trade too—could talk of time so easily. He saw her eyes wandering to the tools that hung upon the wall, and smiled.

"I warrant now," he said, "that you think all those are used in making graves."

"Indeed, I wondered that you wanted so many."

"And well you might. I am a gardener. I dig the ground, and plant things that are to live and grow. My works do n't all moulder away and rot in the earth. You see that spade in the centre?"

"The very old one—so notched and worn? Yes."

"That's the sexton's spade, and it's a well-used one, as you see. We're healthy people here, but it has done a power of work. If it could speak now, that spade, it would tell you of many an unexpected job that it and I have done together; but I forget 'em, for my memory's a poor one. That's nothing new," he added hastily. "It always was."

"There are flowers and shrubs to speak to your other work," said the child.

"Oh yes. And tall trees. But they are not so separated from the sexton's labors as you think."

"No!"

"Not in my mind, and recollection—such as it is," said the old man. "Indeed they often help it. For say that I planted such a tree for such a man. There it stands to remind me that he died. When I look at its broad shadow, and remember what it was in his time, it helps me to the age of my other work, and I can tell you pretty nearly when I made his grave."

"But it may remind you of one who is still alive," said the child.

"Of twenty that are dead, in connection with that one who lives, then," rejoined the old man; "wife, husband, parents, brothers, sisters, children, friends—a score at least. So it happens that the sexton's spade gets worn and battered. I shall need a new one—next summer."

The child looked quickly towards him, thinking that he jested with his age and infirmity: but the unconscious sexton was quite in earnest.

"Ah!" he said, after a brief silence. "People never learn. They never learn. It's only we who turn up the ground, where nothing grows and every thing decays, who think of such things as these—who think of them properly, I mean. You have been into the church?"

"I am going there now," the child replied.

"There's an old well there," said the sexton, "right underneath the belfry; a deep, dark, echoing well. Forty years ago, you had only to let down the bucket till the first knot in the rope was free of the windlass, and you heard it splashing in the cold dull water. By little and little the water fell away, so that in ten years after that, a second knot was made, and you must unwind so much rope, or the bucket swung tight and empty at the end. In ten years' time, the water fell again, and a third knot was made. In ten years more the well dried up; and now, if you lower the bucket till your arms are tired and let out nearly all the cord, you'll hear it of a sudden clanking and rattling on the ground below, with a sound of being so deep and so far down, that your heart leaps into your mouth, and you start away as if you were falling in."

"A dreadful place to come on in the dark!" exclaimed the child, who had followed the old man's looks and words until she seemed to stand upon its brink.

"What is it but a grave!" said the sexton. "What else! And which of our old folks, knowing all this, thought, as the spring subside, of their own failing strength, and lessening life? Not one!"

"Are you very old yourself?" asked the child, involuntarily.

"I shall be seventy-nine—next summer."

"You still work when you are well?"

"Work! To be sure. You shall see my gardens hereabout. Look at the window there. I made, and have kept, that plot of ground entirely with my own hands. By this time next year I shall hardly see the sky; the boughs will have grown so thick. I have my winter at night besides."

He opened, as he spoke, a cupboard close to where he sat, and produced some miniature boxes, carved in a homely manner and made of old wood.

"Some gentlefolks who are fond of ancient days, and what belongs to them," he said, "like to buy these keepsakes from our church and ruins. Sometimes I make them of scraps of oak, that turn up here and there; sometimes of bits of coffins which the vaults have long preserved. See here—this is a little chest of the last kind, clasped at the edges with fragments of brass plates that had writings on 'em once, though it would be hard to read it now. I have n't many by me at this time of year, but these shelves will be full—next summer."

The child admired and praised his work, and shortly afterwards departed; thinking as she went how strange it was, that this old man, drawing from his pursuits, and every thing around him, one stern moral, never contemplated its application to himself; and, while he dwelt upon the uncertainty of human life, seemed both in word and deed to deem himself immortal. But her musings did not stop here, for she was wise enough to think that by a good and merciful adjustment this must be human nature, and that the old sexton, with his plans for next summer, was but a type of all mankind.

Full of these meditations she reached the church. It was easy to find the key belonging to the outer door, for each was labelled on a scrap of yellow parchment. Its very turning in the lock awoke a hollow sound, and when she entered with a faltering step, the echoes that it raised in closing, made her start.

Every thing in our lives, whether of good or evil, affects us most by contrast. If the peace of the simple village had moved the child more strongly, because of the dark and troubled ways that lay beyond and through which she had journeyed with such failing feet, what was the deep impression of finding herself alone in that solemn building; where the very light, coming through sunken windows, seemed old and grey; and the air, redolent of earth and mould, seemed laden with decay purified by time of all its grosser particles, and sighed through arch and aisle, and clustered pillars, like the breath of ages gone! Here was the broken pavement, worn so long ago by pious feet, that Time, stealing on the pilgrims' steps, had trodden out their track, and left but crumbling stones. Here were the rotten beam, the sinking arch, the sapped and mouldering wall, the lowly trench of earth, the stately tomb on which no epitaph remained—all—marble, stone, iron, wood, and dust, one common monument of ruin. The best work and the worst, the plainest and the richest, the stateliest and the least imposing—both of Heaven's work and man's—all found one common level here, and told one common tale.

Some part of the edifice had been a baronial chapel, and here were effigies of warriors stretched upon their beds of stone with folded hands, cross-legged—those who had fought in the Holy Wars—girded with their swords, and cased in armor as they had lived. Some of these knights had their own weapons, helmets, coats of mail, hanging upon the walls hard by, and dangling from rusty hooks. Broken and dilapidated as they were, they yet retained their ancient form, and something of their ancient aspect. Thus violent deeds live after men upon the earth, and traces of war and bloodshed will survive in mournful shapes, long after those whose worked the desolation are but atoms of earth themselves.

The child sat down in this old, silent place, among the stark figures on the tombs—they made it more quiet there, than elsewhere, to her fancy—and gazing round with a feeling of awe, tempered with a calm delight, felt that now she was happy, and at rest. She took a Bible from the shelf, and read; then laying it down, though of the summer days and the bright spring-time that would come—of the rays of sun that would fall in slant upon the sleeping forms—of the leaves that would flutter at the window, and play in glistening shadows on the pavement—of the songs of birds, and growth of buds and blossoms out of doors—of the sweet air, that would steal in and gently wave the tattered banners overhead. What if the spot awakened thoughts of death! Die who would, it would still remain the same; these sights and sounds would still go on as happily as ever. It would be no pain to sleep amidst them.

She left the chapel—very slowly and often turning back to gaze again—and coming to a low door, which plainly led into the tower, opened it, and climbed the winding stair in darkness; save where she looked down through narrow loopholes on the place she had left, or caught a glimmering vision of the dusty bells. At length she gained the end of the ascent and stood upon the turret top.

Oh! the glory of the sudden burst of light; the freshness of the fields and woods, stretching away on every side and meeting the bright blue sky; the cattle grazing in the pastures; the smoke, that, coming from among the trees, seemed to rise upward from the green earth: the children yet at their gambols down below—all, every thing, so beautiful and happy. It was like passing from death to life; it was drawing nearer Heaven.

The children were gone by the time she emerged into the porch, and locked the door. As she passed the school-house she could hear the busy hum of voices. Her friend had begun his labors only that day. The noise grew louder, and looking back, she saw the boys come trooping out, and disperse themselves with merry shouts and play. "It's a good thing," thought the child. "I am very glad they pass the church." And then she stopped, to fancy how the noise would sound inside, and how gently it would seem to die away upon the ear.

Again that day, yes, twice again, she stole back to the old chapel, and in her former seat read from the same book, or indulged the same quiet train of thought. Even when it had grown dusk, and the shadows of coming night made it more solemn still, the child remained like one rooted to the spot, and had no fear, or thought of stirring.

They found her there at last, and took her home. She looked pale but very happy, until they separated for the night; and then, as the poor schoolmaster stooped down to kiss her cheek, he thought he felt a tear upon his face.

CHAPTER LIV.

The bachelor, in his various occupations, found in the old church a constant source of interest and amusement. Taking that pride in it which men conceive for the wonders of their own little world, he had made its history his study; and many a summer day within its walls, and many a winter's night beside the parsonage fire, had found the bachelor still poring over and adding to his goodly store of tale and legend.

As he was not one of those rough spirits who would strip fair Truth of every little shadowy vestment in which time and teeming fancies love to array her—and some of which become her pleasantly enough, serving, like the waters of her well, to add new graces to the charms they half suggest, and to awaken interest and pursuit rather than languor and indifference—as, unlike this stern and obdurate class, he loved to see the goddess crowned with those garlands of wild flowers which tradition wreathes for her gentle wearing, and which are often freshest in their homeliest shapes,—he trod with a light step and bore with a light hand upon the dust of centuries, unwilling to demolish any of the airy shrines that had been raised above it, if one good feeling or affection of the human heart were hiding thereabouts. Thus, in the case of an ancient coffin of rough stone, supposed for many generations to contain the bones of a certain baron, who, after ravaging, with cut and thrust, and plunder, in foreign lands, came back with a penitent and sorrowing heart to die at home, but which had been lately shown by learned antiquaries to be no such thing, as the baron in question (so they contended) had died hard in battle, gnashing his teeth and cursing with his latest breath,—the bachelor stoutly maintained that the old tale was the true one; that the baron, repenting him of the evil, had done great charities and meekly given up the ghost; and that if ever baron went to heaven, that baron was then at peace. In like manner, when the aforesaid antiquaries did argue and contend that a certain secret vault was not the tomb of a certain grey-haired lady who had been hanged and drawn and quartered by glorious Queen Bess for succouring a wretched priest who fainted of thirst and hunger at her door, the bachelor did solemnly maintain against all comers that the church was hallowed by the said poor lady's ashes; that her remains had been collected in the night from four of the city's gates, and thither in secret brought, and there deposited: and the bachelor did further (being highly excited at such times) deny the glory of Queen Bess, and assert the immeasurably greater glory of the meanest woman in the realm who had a merciful and tender heart. As to the assertion that the flat stone near the door was not the grave of the miser who had disowned his only child and left a sum of money to the church to buy a peal of bells, the bachelor did readily admit the same, and that the place had given birth to no such man. In a word, he would have had every stone and plate of brass, the monument only of deeds whose memory should survive. All others he was willing to forget. They might be buried in consecrated ground, but he would have had them buried deep and never brought to light again.

It was from the lips of such a tutor, that the child learnt her easy task. Already impressed, beyond all telling, by the silent building and the peaceful beauty of the spot in which it stood—majestic age surrounded by perpetual youth—it seemed to her, when she heard these things, sacred to all goodness and virtue. It was another world, where sin and sorrow never came; a tranquil place of rest, where nothing evil entered.

When the bachelor had given her in connection with almost every tomb and flat grave-stone some history of its own, he took her down into the old crypt, now a mere dull vault, and showed her how it had been lighted up in the time of the monks, and how, amid lamps depending from the roof, and swinging censers exhaling scented odors, and habits glittering with gold and silver, and pictures, and precious stuffs, and jewels, all flashing and glistening through the low arches, the chaunt of aged voices had been many a time heard there at midnight in old days, while hooded figures knelt and prayed around, and told their rosaries of beads. Thence, he took her above ground again, and showed her, high up in the old walls, small galleries; where the nuns had been wont to glide along—dimly seen in their dark dresses so far off—or to pause like gloomy shadows, listening to the prayers. He showed her, too, how the warriors, whose figures rested on the tombs, had worn those rotting scraps of armor up above—how this had been a helmet, and that a shield, and that a gauntlet—and how they had wielded the great two-handed swords, and beaten men down with yonder iron mace. All that he told the child she treasured in her mind; and sometimes, when she woke at nights from dreams of those old times, and rising from her bed looked out at the dark church, she almost hoped to see the windows lighted up, and hear the organ's swell, and sound of voices, on the rushing wind.

The old sexton soon got better, and was about again. From him the child learnt many other things, though of a different kind. He was not able to work, but one day there was a grave to be made, and he came to overlook the man who dug it. He was in a talkative mood; and the child, at first standing by his side, and afterwards sitting on the grass at his feet, with her thoughtful face raised toward his, began to converse with him.

Now the man who did the sexton's duty was a little older than he, thought much more active. But he was deaf; and when the sexton (who peradventure, on a pinch, might have walked a mile with great difficulty in half-a-dozen hours) exchanged a remark with him about his work, the child could not help noticing that he did so with an impatient kind of pity for his infirmity, as if he were himself the strongest and heartiest man alive.

"I'm sorry to see there is this to do," said the child, when she approached. "I heard of no one having died."

"She lived in another hamlet, my dear," returned the sexton. "Three mile away."

"Was she young?"

"Ye—yes," said the sexton; "not more than sixty-four, I think. David, was she more than sixty-four?"

David, who was digging hard, heard nothing of the question. The sexton, as he could not reach to touch him with his crutch, and was too infirm to rise without assistance, called his attention by throwing a little mould upon his red nightcap.

"What's the matter now?" said David, looking up.

"How old was Becky Morgan?" asked the sexton.

"Becky Morgan?" repeated David.

"Yes," replied the sexton; adding in a half compassionate, half irritable tone, which the old man could not hear, "you're getting very deaf, Davy, very deaf, to be sure."

The old man stopped in his work, and cleansing his spade with a piece of slate he had by him for the purpose—and scraping off, in the process, the essence of Heaven knows how many Becky Morgans—set himself to consider the subject.

"Let me think," quoth he. "I saw last night what they had put upon the coffin—was it seventy-nine?"

"No, no," said the sexton.

"Ah, yes, it was though," returned the old man with a sigh. "For I remember thinking she was very near our age. Yes, it was seventy-nine."

"Are you sure you didn't mistake a figure, Davy?" asked the sexton, with signs of some emotion.

"What?" said the old man. "Say that again."

"He's very deaf. He's very deaf indeed," cried the sexton, petulantly; "are you sure you're right about the figures?"

"Oh, quite," replied the old man. "Why not?"

"He's exceedingly deaf," muttered the sexton to himself. "I think he's getting foolish."

The child rather wondered what had led him to this belief, as to say the truth the old man seemed quite as sharp as he, and was infinitely more robust. As the sexton said nothing more just then, however, she forgot it for the time, and spoke again.

"You were telling me," she said, "about your garden. Do you ever plant things here?"

"In the churchyard?" returned the sexton. "Not I."

"I have seen some flowers and little shrubs about," the child rejoined; "there are some over there, you see. I thought they were of your rearing, though indeed they grow but poorly."

"They grow as Heaven wills," said the old man; "and it kindly ordains that they shall never flourish here."

"I do not understand you."

"Why, this it is," said the sexton. "They mark the graves of those who had very tender, loving friends."

"I was sure they did!" the child exclaimed. "I am very glad to know they do!"

"Ay," returned the old man, "but stay. Look at them. See how they hang their heads, and droop, and wither. Do you guess the reason?"

"No," the child replied.

"Because the memory of those who lie below, passes away so soon. At first they tend them, morning, noon, and night; they soon begin to come less frequently; from once a day, to once a week; from once a week to once a month; then at long and uncertain intervals; then, not at all. Such tokens seldom flourish long. I have known the briefest summer flowers outlive them."

"I grieve to hear it," said the child.

"Ah! so say the gentlefolks who come down here to look about them," returned the old man, shaking his head, "but I say otherwise. 'Tis a pretty custom you have in this part of the country, they say to me sometimes, 'to plant the graves, but it's melancholy to see these things all withering or dead.' I crave their pardon and tell them that, as I take it, 'tis a good sign for the happiness of the living. And so it is. It's nature."

"Perhaps the mourners learn to look to the blue sky by day, and to the stars by night; and to think that the dead are there, and not in graves," said the child in an earnest voice.

"Perhaps so," replied the old man, doubtfully. "It may be."

"Whether it be as I believe it is, or no," thought the child to herself, "I'll make this place my garden. It will be no harm at least to work here day by day; and pleasant thoughts will come of it, I am sure."

Her glowing cheek and moistened eye passed unnoticed by the sexton, who turned toward old David, and called him by his name. It was plain that Becky Morgan's age still troubled him, though why, the child could scarcely understand.

The second or third repetition of his name attracted the old man's attention. Pausing from his work, he leant upon his spade, and put his hand to his dull ear.

"Did you call?" he said.

"I have been thinking, Davy," replied the sexton, "that she," he pointed to the grave, "must have been a deal older than you or me."

"Seventy-nine," answered the old man with a sorrowful shake of the head, "I tell you that I saw it."

"Saw it?" replied the sexton; "ay, but, Davy, women don't always tell the truth about their age."

"That's true, indeed," said the other old man, with a sudden sparkle in his eye. "She might have been older."

"I'm sure she must have been. Why, only think how old she looked. You and I seemed but boys to her."

"She did look old," rejoined David. "You're right. She did look old."

"Call to mind how old she looked for many a long, long year, and say if she could be but seventy nine at last—only our age," said the sexton.

"Five year older at the very least!" cried the other.

"Five!" retorted the sexton. "Ten. Good eighty-nine. I call to mind the time her daughter died. She was eighty-nine if she was a day, and tries to pass upon us now, for ten year younger. Oh! human vanity!"

The other old man was not behind-hand with some moral reflections on this fruitful theme, and both adduced a mass of evidence; of such weight as to render it doubtful—not whether the deceased was of the age suggested, but whether she had not almost reached the patriarchal term of a hundred. When they had settled this question to their mutual satisfaction, the sexton, with his friend's assistance, rose to go.

"It's chilly, sitting here, and I must be careful—till the summer," he said, as he prepared to limp away.

"What?" asked old David.

"He's very deaf, poor fellow!" cried the sexton. "Good bye."

"Ah!" said old David, looking after him. "He's failing very fast. He ages every day."

And so they parted: each persuaded that the other had less life in him than himself; and both greatly consoled and comforted by the little fiction they had agreed upon, respecting Becky Morgan; whose decease was no longer a precedent of uncomfortable application, and would be no business of theirs for half-a-score of years to come.

The child remained for some minutes, watching the deaf old man as he threw out the earth with his shovel, and, often stopping to cough and fetch his breath, still muttered to himself, with a kind of sober chuckle, that the sexton was wearing fast. At length she turned away, and walking thoughtfully through the churchyard, came unexpectedly upon the schoolmaster, who was sitting on a green grave in the sun, reading.

"Nell here?" he said cheerfully, as he closed his book. "It does me good to see you in the air and light. I feared you were again in the church, where you so often are."

"Feared?" replied the child, sitting down beside him. "Is it not a good place?"

"Yes, yes," said the schoolmaster. "But you must be gay sometimes—nay, don't shake your head and smile so very sadly."

"Not sadly, if you knew my heart. Do not look at me as if you thought me sorrowful. There is not a happier creature on earth than I am now."

Full of grateful tenderness, the child took his hand, and folded it between her own. "It's God's will!" she said, when they had been silent for some time.

"What?"

"All this," she rejoined; all this about us. But which of us is sad now? You see that I am smiling."

"And so am I," said the schoolmaster; "smiling to think how often we shall laugh in this same place. Were you not talking yonder?"

"Yes," the child rejoined.

"Of something that has made you sorrowful?"

There was a long pause. "What was it," said the schoolmaster, tenderly. "Come. Tell me what it was."

"I rather grieve—I do rather grieve to think," said the child, bursting into tears, "that those who die about us, are so soon forgotten."

"And do you think," said the schoolmaster, marking the glance she had thrown around, "that an unvisited grave, a withered tree, a faded flower or two, are tokens of forgetfulness or cold neglect? Do you think there are no deeds far away from here, in which these dead may be best remembered? Nell, Nell, there may be people busy in the world at this instant, in whose good actions and good thoughts these very graves—neglected as they look to us—are the chief instruments."

"Tell me no more," said the child, quickly. "Tell me no more. I feel, I know it. How could I be unkindful of it, when I thought of you?"

"There is nothing," cried her friend, "no, nothing innocent or good, that dies, and is forgotten. Let us hold to that faith, or none. An infant, a prattling child, dying in its cradle, will live again in the better thoughts of those who loved it; and play its part, through them, in the redeeming actions of the world, though its body be burnt to ashes or drowned in the deepest sea. There is not an angel added to the Host of Heaven but does its blessed work on earth in those that loved it here. Forgotten! oh, if the good deeds of human creatures could be traced to their source, how beautifully would even death appear; for how much charity, mercy, and purified affection, would be seen to have their growth in dusty graves!"

"Yes," said the child, "it is the truth; I know it is. Who should feel its force so much as I, in whom your little scholar lives again! Dear, dear, good friend, if you knew the comfort you have given me."

The poor schoolmaster made her no answer, but bent over her in silence; for his heart was full.

They were yet seated in the same place, when the grandfather approached. Before they had spoken many words together, the church clock struck the hour of school, and their friend withdrew.

"A good man," said the grandfather, looking after him; "a kind man. Surely he will never harm us, Nell. We are safe here, at last—oh! We will never go away from here!"

The child shook her head, and smiled.

"She needs rest," said the old man, patting her cheek; "too pale—too pale. She is not like what she was!"

"When?" asked the child.

"Ha!" said the old man, "to be sure—when? How many weeks ago? Could I count them on my fingers? Let them rest though; they're better gone."

"Much better, dear," replied the child. "We will forget them; or, if we ever call them to mind, it shall be only as some uneasy dream that has passed away."

"Hush!" said the old man, motioning hastily to her with his hand and looking over his shoulder; "no more talk of the dream, and all the miseries it brought. There are no dreams here. 'Tis a quiet place, and they keep away. Let us never think about them, lest they should pursue us again. Sunken eyes and hollow cheeks—wet, cold, and famine—and horrors before them all, that were even worse—we must forget such things if we would be tranquil here."

"Thank Heaven!" inwardly exclaimed the child, "for this most happy change!"

"I will be patient," said the old man, "humble, very thankful and obedient, if you will let me stay. But do not hide from me; do not steal away alone; let me keep beside you. Indeed, I will be very true, and faithful, Nell."

"I steal away alone! why that," replied the child, with assumed gayety, "would be a pleasant jest indeed. See here, dear grandfather, we'll make this place our garden—why not? It is a very good one—and to-morrow we'll begin, and work together, side by side."

"It is a brave thought!" cried her grandfather. "Mind, darling—we begin to-morrow!"

Who so delighted as the old man, when they next day began their labor? [Who so unconscious of all associations connected with the spot, as he? They plucked the long grass and nettles from the tombs, thinned the poor shrubs and roots, made the turf smooth, and cleared it of the leaves and weeds. They were yet in the ardor of their work, when the child, raising her head from the ground over which she bent, observed that the bachelor was sitting on the stile close by, watching them in silence.

"A kind office," said the little gentleman, nodding to Nell as she courtesied to him. "Have you done all that this morning?"

"It is very little, sir," returned the child, with downcast eyes, "to what we mean to do."

"Good work, good work," said the bachelor. "But do you only labor at the graves of children and young people?"

"We shall come to the others in good time, sir," replied Nell, turning her head aside, and speaking softly.

It was a slight incident, and might have been design, or accident, or the child's unconscious sympathy with youth. But it seemed to strike upon her grandfather, though he had not noticed it before. He looked in a hurried manner at the graves, then anxiously at the child, then pressed her to his side, and bade her stop to rest. Something he had long forgotten appeared to struggle faintly in his mind. It did not pass away as weightier things had done; but came upmost again, and yet again, and many times that day, and often afterward. Once, while they were yet at work, the child, seeing that he often turned and looked uneasily at her, as though he were trying to resolve some painful doubts or collect some scattered thoughts, urged him to tell the reason. But he said it was nothing—nothing—and, laying her head upon his arm, patted her fair cheek with his hand, and muttered that she grew stronger every day, and would be a woman soon.

CHAPTER LV.

From that time there sprung up in the old man's mind, a solicitude about the child which never slept or left him. There are chords in the human heart—strange, varying strings—which are only struck by accident; which will remain mute and senseless to appeals the most passionate and earnest, and respond at last to the slightest casual touch. In the most insensible or childish minds, there is some train of reflection which art can seldom lead, or skill assist, but which will reveal itself, as great truths have done, by chance, and when the discoverer has the plainest and simplest end in view. From that time, the old man never for a moment forgot the weakness and devotion of the child: from the time of that slight incident, he, who had seen her toiling by his side through so much difficulty and suffering, and had scarcely thought of her otherwise than as the partner of miseries which he felt severely in his own person, and deplored for his own sake at least as much as hers, awoke to a sense of what he owed her, and what those miseries had made her. Never, no, never once, in one unguarded moment from that time to the end, did any care for himself, any thought of his own comfort, any selfish consideration or regard, distract his thoughts from the gentle object of his love.

He would follow her up and down, waiting till she should tire and lean upon his arm—he would sit opposite to her in the chimney-corner, content to watch, and look, until she raised her head and smiled upon him as of old—he would discharge, by stealth, those household duties which tasked her powers too heavily—he would rise, in the cold dark nights, to listen to her breathing in her sleep, and sometimes crouch for hours by her bedside only to touch her hand. He who knows all, can only know what hopes, and fears, and thoughts of deep affection, were in that one disordered brain, and what a change had fallen on the poor old man.

Sometimes—weeks had crept on, then—the child, exhausted, though with little fatigue, would pass whole evenings on a couch beside the fire. At such times, the schoolmaster would bring in books, and read to her aloud; and seldom an evening passed, but the bachelor came in, and took his turn of reading. The old man sat and listened—with little understanding for the words, but with his eyes fixed upon the child—and if she smiled or brightened with the story, he would say it was a good one, and conceive a fondness for the very book. When in their evening talk, the bachelor told some tale that pleased her (as his tales were sure to do,) the old man would painfully try to store it in his mind; nay, when the bachelor left them, he would sometimes slip out after him, and humbly beg that he would tell him such a part again, that he might learn to win a smile from Nell.

But these were rare occasions, happily; for the child yearned to be out of doors, and walking in her solemn garden. Parties, too, would come to see the church; and those who came, speaking to others of the child, sent more; so that even at that season of the year they had visitors almost daily. The old man would follow them at a little distance through the building, listening to the voice he loved so well; and when the strangers left, and parted from Nell, he would mingle with them to catch up fragments of their conversation; or he would stand for the same purpose, with his grey head uncovered, at the gate, as they passed through. They always praised the child, her sense and beauty, and he was proud to hear them! But what was that, so often added, which wrung his heart, and made him sob and weep alone, in some dull corner! Alas! even careless strangers—they who had no feeling for her, but the interest of the moment—they who would go away and forget next week that such a being lived—even they saw it—even they pitied her—even they bade him good day compassionately, and whispered as they passed.

The people of the village, too, of whom there was not one but grew to have a fondness for poor Nell; even among them, there was the same feeling; a tenderness toward her—a compassionate regard for her, increasing every day. The very schoolboys, light-hearted and thoughtless as they were, even they cared for her. The roughest among them was sorry if he missed her in the usual place upon his way to school, and would turn out of the path to ask for her at the latticed window. If she were sitting in the church, they perhaps might peep in softly at the open door; but they never spoke to her, unless she rose and went to speak to them. Some feeling was abroad which raised the child above them all.

So, when Sunday came. They were all poor country people in the church, for the castle in which the old family had lived, was an empty ruin, and there were none but humble folks for seven miles around. There, as elsewhere, they had an interest in Nell. They would gather round her in the porch, before and after service; young children would cluster at her skirts; and aged men and women forsake their gossips, to give her kindly greeting. None of them, young or old, thought of passing the child without a friendly word. Many who came from three or four miles distant, brought her little presents; the humblest and rudest had good wishes to bestow.

She had sought out the young children whom she first saw playing in the churchyard. One of these—he who had spoken of his brother—was her little favorite and friend, and often sat by her side in the church, or climbed with her to the tower-top. It was his delight to help her, or to fancy that he did so, and they soon became close companions.

It happened, that, as she was reading in the old spot by herself one day, this child came running in with his eyes full of tears, and after holding her from him and looking at her eagerly for a moment, clasped his little arms passionately around her neck.

"What now?" said Nell, soothing him. "What is the matter?"

"She is not one yet!" cried the boy, embracing her still more closely. "No, no. Not yet."

She looked at him wonderingly, and putting his hair back from his face, and kissing him, asked what he meant.

"You must not be one, dear Nell," cried the boy. "We can't see them. They never come to play with us, or talk to us. Be what you are. You are better so."

"I do not understand you," said the child. "Tell me what you mean."

"Why, they say," replied the boy, looking up into her face, "that you will be an angel, before the birds sing again. But you won't be, will you? Don't leave us Nell, though the sky is bright. Do not leave us!"

The child drooped her head, and put her hands before her face.

"She cannot bear the thought!" cried the boy, exulting through his tears. "You will not go. You know how sorry we should be. Dear Nell, tell me that you'll stay among us. Oh! pray, pray, tell me that you will."

The little creature folded his hands, and knelt down at her feet.

"Only look at me, Nell," said the boy, "and tell me that you'll stop, and then I shall know that they are wrong, and will cry no more. Won't you say yes, Nell?"

Still the drooping head and hidden face, and the child quite silent—save for her sobs.

"After a time," pursued the boy, trying to draw away her hand, "the kind angels will be glad to think that you are not among them, and that you stayed here to be with us. Willy went away, to join them; but if he had known how I should miss him in our little bed at night, he never would have left me, I am sure."

Yet the child could make him no answer, and sobbed as though her heart were bursting.

"Why would you go, dear Nell? I know you would not be happy when you heard that we were crying for your loss. They say that Willy is in Heaven now, and that it's always summer there, and yet I'm sure he grieves when I lie down upon his garden bed, and he cannot turn to kiss me. But if you do go, Nell," said the boy, caressing her, and pressing his face to hers, "be fond of him, for my sake. Tell him how I love him still, and how much I loved you; and when I think that you two are together, and are happy, I'll try to bear it, and never give you a pain by doing wrong—indeed I never will!"

The child suffered him to move her hands, and put them round his neck. There was a tearful silence, but it was not long before she looked upon him with a smile, and promised him, in a very gentle quiet voice, that she would stay, and be his friend, as long as Heaven would let her. He clasped his hands for joy, and thanked her many times; and being charged to tell no person what had passed between them, gave her an earnest promise that he never would.

Nor did he, so far as the child could learn; but was her quiet companion in all her walks and mummings, and never again adverted to the theme, which he felt had given her pain, although he was unconscious of its cause. Something of distrust lingered about him still; for he would often come, even in the dark evenings, and call in a timid voice outside the door to know if she were safe within; and being answered yes, and bade to enter, would take his station on a low stool at her feet, and sit there patiently until they came to seek, and take him home. Sure as the morning came, it found him lingering near the house to ask if she were well; and, morning, noon, or night, go where she would, he would forsake his playmates and his sports to bear her company.

"And a good little friend he is, too," said the old sexton to her once. "When his elder brother died—elder seems a strange word, for he was only seven years old—I remember this one took it sorely to heart."

The child thought of what the schoolmaster had told her, and felt how its truth was shadowed out even in this infant.

"It has given him something of a quiet way, I think," said the old man, "though for that he is merry enough at times. I'd wager now, that you and he have been listening by the old well."

"Indeed we have not," the child replied. "I have been afraid to go near it; for I am not often down in that part of the church, and do not know the ground."

"Come down with me," said the old man. "I have known it from a boy. Come!"

They descended the narrow steps which led into the crypt, and paused among the gloomy arches, in a dim and murky spot.

"This is the place," said the old man. "Give me your hand while you throw back the cover, lest you should stumble and fall in. I am too old—I mean rheumatic—to stoop, myself."

"A black and dreadful place!" exclaimed the child.

"Look in," said the old man, pointing downward with his finger. The child complied, and gazed down into the pit.

"It looks like a grave, itself," said the old man.

"It does," replied the child.

"I have often had the fancy," said the sexton, "that it might have been dug at first to make the old place look more gloomy, and the old monks more religious. It's to be closed up, and built over."

The child still stood, looking thoughtfully into the vault.

"We shall see," said the sexton, "on what gay heads other earth will have closed, when the light is shut out from here. God knows! They'll close it up, next spring."

"The birds sing again in spring," thought the child, as she leant at her casement window, and gazed at the declining sun. "Spring! a beautiful and happy time!"

RATHER PREMATURE.—On Monday morning, at an early hour, the bells at Hackney set up a loud and joyful peal in honor of the birth of a young Prince of Wales. Every body was delighted at the happy news, more especially the school children, who readily obtained the privilege of a holiday. The same bells commenced tolling for the late King two or three days before his Majesty died. It is to be hoped, the church at Hackney is under more discreet management than the steeple.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Miss Quirk turned pale with astonishment and vexation on seeing this elegant and interesting addition to her album. Titmouse, on the contrary, looked at it with no little pride; for having had a capital pen, and his heart being in his task, he had produced what he conceived to be a very superior specimen of penmanship: in fact, the signature was by far the best he had ever written. When he had gone, Miss Quirk was twenty times on the point of tearing out the leaf which had been so dimly disfigured; but on her father coming home in the evening, he laughed heartily—"and as to tearing it out," said he, "let us first see which way the verdict is."

Titmouse became, after this, a pretty frequent visitor at Alibi House, growing more and more attached to Miss Quirk, who, however, conducted herself toward him with much judgement. His inscription in her album had done a vast deal toward cooling down the ardor with which she had been disposed to regard even the future owner of ten thousand a-year. Poor Snap seemed to have lost all chance, being treated with greater coldness by Miss Quirk on every succeeding visit to Alibi House. At this he was sorely discomfited; for she would have whatever money her father might die possessed of, besides a commanding interest in the partnership business. "T was a difficult thing for him to preserve his temper in his close intimacy with Titmouse, who had so grievously interfered with his prospects.

The indisposition I have been mentioning prevented Titmouse from paying his promised visit to Satin Lodge. On returning to his lodgings, from Alibi House, he found that Tag-rag had either called or sent every day to inquire after him with the most affectionate anxiety; and one or two notes lying on his table apprised him of the lively distress which the ladies of Satin Lodge were enduring on his account, and implored him to lose not a moment in communicating the state of his health and personally assuring them of his safety. Though the image of Miss Quirk was continually before his eyes, Titmouse, nevertheless, had cunning enough not to drop the slightest hint to the Tag-rags of the true state of his feeling. Whenever any inquiry, with ill-disguised anxiety, was made by Mrs. Tag-rag concerning Alibi House and its inmates, Titmouse would, to be sure, mention Miss Quirk, but in such a careless and slighting way as gave great consolation and encouragement to Tag-rag, his wife and daughter. When at Mr. Quirk's, he spoke somewhat unreservedly of the amiable inmates of Satin Lodge. These two mansions were almost the only private residences visited by Titmouse, who spent his time much in the way which I have already described. How he got through his days I can hardly tell. At his lodgings he got up very late and went to bed very late. He never read any thing excepting occasionally a song book lent him by Snap, or a novel, or some such book as "Boxiana," from the circulating library. Dawdling over his dress and his breakfast, then whistling and humming, took up so much of every day as he passed at his lodgings. The rest was spent in idling about the town, looking in at shop windows, and now and then going to some petty exhibition. When evening came, he was generally joined by Snap, when they would spend the night together in the manner I have already described. As often as he dared, he called at Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap's office at Saffron Hill, and worried them not a little by inquiries concerning the state of his affairs and the cause of the delay in commencing proceedings. As for Huckaback, by the way, Titmouse cut him entirely, saying that he was a devilish low fellow, and it was no use knowing him. He made many desperate efforts, both personally and by letter, to renew his acquaintance with Titmouse, but in vain. I may as well mention, by the way, that as soon as Snap got scent of the little money transaction between his friend and Huckaback, he called upon the latter and tendering him twelve shillings, demanded up the document which he had extorted from Titmouse. Huckaback held out obstinately for some time; but Snap was too much for him, and such a formidable strain about an indictment for a conspiracy (!) and fraud, that Huckaback at length consented, on receiving twelve shillings, to deliver up the document to Snap, on condition of Snap's destroying it on the spot. This was done, and so ended all intercourse—at least on this side of the grave—between Titmouse and Huckaback.

The sum allowed by Messrs. Quirk and Gammon to Titmouse was amply sufficient to have kept him in comfort; but it never would have enabled him to lead the kind of life which I have described; and he would certainly have got very awkwardly involved had it not been for the kindness of Snap in advancing him, from time to time, such sums as his exigencies required. In fact, matters went on as quietly and smoothly as possible for several months, till about the middle of November, when an event occurred that seemed to threaten the total demolition of all his hopes and expectations.

He had not seen or heard from Messrs. Quirk or Gammon for nearly a fortnight; Snap he had not seen for nearly a week. At length he ventured to make his appearance at Saffron-Hill, and was received with a startling coldness—a stern abruptness of manner, that frightened him out of his wits. All the three partners were alike—as for Snap, the contrast between his present and his former manner was perfectly shocking; he seemed quite another person. The fact was, that the full statement of Titmouse's claims had been laid before Mr. Subtle, the leading counsel retained in his behalf, for his opinion, before actually commencing proceedings, and the partners were indeed thunderstruck on receiving that opinion; for Mr. Subtle pointed out a radical deficiency of proof in a matter which, as soon as their attention was thus pointedly called to it, Messrs. Quirk and Gammon were amazed at their having overlooked, and still more at its having escaped the notice of Mr. Tresayle, Mr. Mortmain, and Mr. Frankpledge.

Mr. Quirk hurried with the opinion to the first two gentlemen; and, after a long interview with each, they owned their fears that Mr. Subtle was right, and that the defect seemed incurable; but they showed their agitated clients, that they had been guilty of neither oversight nor ignorance, inasmuch as the matter in question was one of evidence only—one which a visi prius lawyer, with a full detail of "proofs" before him, could hardly fail to light upon; but which, it would be found, had been assumed and taken for granted in the cases laid before conveyancers. They promised to turn it over in their minds, and to let Messrs. Quirk and Gammon know if any thing occurred to vary their impression.

Mr. Tresayle and Mortmain, however, preserved an ominous silence. As for Frankpledge, he had a knack, somehow or another, of always coming to the conclusion wishes and hoped for by his clients; and after prodigious pains, wrote a very long opinion to show that there was nothing in the objection. Neither Mr. Quirk nor Mr. Gammon could understand the process by which Mr. Frankpledge arrived at such a result; but, in despair, they laid his opinion before Mr. Subtle, in the shape of a second case for his opinion. It was, in a few days' time, returned to them, with only a line or two—thus:

"With every respect for the gentleman who wrote this opinion, I cannot perceive what it has to do with the question. I see no reason whatever to depart from the view I have already taken of this case—J. S."

Here was something like a dead lock.

"We're done, Gammon!" said Quirk, with a dismayed air. Gammon seemed lost, and made no answer.

"Does any thing—eh?—Any thing occur to you? Gammon, I will say this for you—you're a long-headed fellow." Still Gammon spoke not.

"Gammon! Gammon!—I really believe—you begin to see something."

"It's to be done, Mr. Quirk," said Gammon at length, with a grave and apprehensive look, and a cheek paler than before.

"Eh? how? Oh, I see!—Know what you mean, Gammon," replied Quirk, with a hurried whisper, glancing at both doors to see that they were safe.

"We must resume our intercourse with Titmouse, and let matters go on as before," said Gammon, with a very anxious, but, at the same time, a determined air.

"I—I wonder if what has occurred to you is what has occurred to me?" inquired Quirk, in an eager whisper.

"Pooh! pooh! Mr. Quirk."

"Gammon, dear Gammon, no mystery! You know I have a deep stake in this matter!"

"So have I, Mr. Quirk," replied Gammon, with a sigh. "However,"—Here the partners put their heads close together, and whispered to each other in a low, earnest tone, for some minutes. Quirk rose from his seat and took two or three turns about the room in silence, Gammon watching him calmly.

To his inexpressible relief and joy, within a few hours of the happening of the above colloquy, Titmouse found himself placed on precisely his former footing with Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap.

In order to bring on the cause for trial at the next spring assizes, it was necessary that the declaration in ejectment should be served on the tenant in possession before Hilary term; and, in a matter of such magnitude, it was deemed expedient for Snap to go down and personally effect the service in question. In consequence, also, of some very important suggestions as to the evidence, given by the junior in the cause, it was arranged that Snap should go down about a week before the time fixed upon for effecting the service, and make minute inquiries as to one or two facts which it was understood could be established in evidence. As soon as Titmouse heard of this movement, that Snap was going direct to Yatton, the scene of his, Titmouse's, future greatness, he made the most pertinacious and vehement entreaties to Messrs. Quirk and Gammon to be allowed to accompany him, even going down on his knees. There was no resisting this; but they exacted a solemn pledge from him that he would place himself entirely at the disposal of Snap; go under some feigned name, and, in short, neither say nor do any thing tending to disclose their real character or errand.

Snap and Titmouse established themselves at the Hare and Hounds Inn at Grilston; and the former immediately began, cautiously and quietly, to collect such evidence as he could discover. One of the first persons to whom he went was old, blind Bess. His many pressing questions at length stirred up in the old woman's mind recollections of long-forgotten names, persons, places, scenes, and associations, thereby producing an agitation not easily to be got rid of, and which had by no means subsided when Dr. Tatham and Mr. Aubrey paid her the Christmas-day visit, which has been already described.

The reader has had already pretty distinct indications of the manner in which Titmouse and Snap conducted themselves during their stay in Yorkshire, and which, I fear, have not tended to raise either of these gentlemen in the reader's estimation. Titmouse manifested a very natural anxiety to see the present occupants of Yatton; and it was with infinite difficulty that Snap could prevent him from sneaking about in the immediate neighborhood of the hall, with the hope of seeing them. His first encounter with Mr. and Miss Aubrey was entirely accidental, as the reader may remember: and when he found that the lady on horseback near Yatton, and the lady whom he had striven to attract the notice of in Hyde Park, were one and the same beautiful woman, and that that beautiful woman was neither more nor less than the sister of the present owner of Yatton—the marvellous discovery created a mighty poth in his little feelings. The blaze of Kate Aubrey's beauty in an instant summoned the images both of Tabitha Tag-rag and Dora Quirk. It even for a while outshone the splendors of ten thousand a year; such is the inexpressible and incalculable power of woman's beauty over every thing in the shape of man—over even so despicable a sample of him as Tittlebat Titmouse.

While putting in practise some of those abominable tricks, to which, under Snap's tutelage, Titmouse had become accustomed in walking the streets of London, and from which even the rough handling they had got from Farmer Hazel could not turn him, Titmouse at length, as has been seen, most unwittingly fell foul of that fair creature, Catharine Aubrey herself; who seemed truly like an angelic messenger, returning from her errand of sympathy and mercy, and suddenly beset by a little imp of darkness. When Titmouse discovered who was the object of his audacious and revolting advances, his soul was petrified within him; and it was fortunate that the shriek of Miss Aubrey's attendant at length startled him into a recollection of a pair of heels, to which he was that evening indebted for an escape from a most murderous cudgeling, which might have been attended with one effect not contemplated by him who inflicted it, viz: the retention of the Aubreys in the possession of Yatton! Titmouse ran for nearly half-a-mile on the high road toward Grilston, without stopping. He dared not venture back to Yatton, with the sound of the lusty farmer's voice in his ears, to get back from the Aubrey arms the horse which had brought him that afternoon from Grilston, to which place he walked on, through the snow and darkness; reaching his inn in a perfect panic, from which, at length, a tumbler of stiff brandy and water, with two or three cigars, somewhat relieved him. Forgetful of the solemn pledge which he had given to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, not to disclose his name or errand, and it never once occurring to him that, if he would but keep his own counsel, Miss Aubrey could never identify him with the ruffian who had assailed her, he spent the interval between eight and twelve o'clock, at which latter hour the coach by which he had resolved to return to London would pass through Grilston, in inditing the following letter to Miss Aubrey:

"GRILSTON, January 6th, 18—.

"TITTLEBAT TITMOUSE.

"(Private.)"

This equally characteristic and disgusting production, its infatuated writer sealed twice, and then left it with sixpence in the hands of the landlady of the Hare and Hounds, to be delivered at Yatton Hall the first thing in the morning. The good woman, however—having no particular wish to oblige such a strange puppy, whom she was only too glad to get rid of, and having a good deal to attend to—laid the letter aside on the chimney-piece, and entirely lost sight of it for nearly a fortnight. Shortly after the lamentable tidings concerning the impending misfortunes of the Aubrey family had been communicated to the inhabitants of Grilston, she forwarded the letter, little dreaming of the character in which its writer was likely, ere long, to reappear at Grilston, with one or two others, a day or two after Miss Aubrey had had the interview with her brother which I have described to the reader; but it lay unnoticed by any one—above all, by the sweet sufferer whose name was indicated on it—among a great number of miscellaneous letters and papers which had been suffered to accumulate on the library table.

Mr. Aubrey entered the library one morning alone, for the purpose of attending to many matters which had been long neglected. He was evidently thinner: his face was pale, and his manner dejected; still there was about him a noble air of calmness and resolution. Through the richly-pictured, old stained-glass window, the mottled sunbeams were streaming in a kind of tender radiance upon the dear old familiar objects around him. All was silent. Having drawn his chair to the table, on which were lying a confused heap of letters and papers, he felt a momentary repugnance to enter upon the task which he had assigned to himself, of opening and attending to them; and walked slowly for some time up and down the room, with folded arms, uttering occasionally profound sighs. At length he sat down, and commenced the disheartening task of opening the many letters before him. One of the first he opened was from Peter Johnson—the old tenant to whom he had lent the sum of two hundred pounds; and it was full of expressions of gratitude and respect. Then came a letter, a fortnight old, bearing the frank of Lord —, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He opened it and read:

"WHITEHALL, 16th January, 18—.

"MY DEAR AUBREY: You will remember that Lord —'s motion stands for the 28th. We all venture to calculate upon receiving your powerful support in the debate. We expect to be much pressed with the Duke of —'s affair, which you handled shortly before the recess with such signal ability and success. When you return to town, you must expect a renewal of certain offers, which I most sincerely trust, for the benefit of the public service, will not be again declined. Ever yours faithfully,

C.—
 ("Private and confidential.")

"Charles Aubrey, Esq., M. P."
 Mr. Aubrey laid down the letter calmly, as soon as he had read it; and, leaning back in his chair, seemed lost in thought for several minutes. Presently he re-applied himself to his task, and opened and glanced over a great many letters: the contents of several of which occasioned him deep emotion. Some were from persons in distress whom he had assisted, and who implored a continuance of his aid; others were from ardent political friends—some sanguine, others desponding—concerning the prospects of the season. Two or three hinted that it was every where reported that he had been offered one of the under secretariats, and had declined; but that it was, at the King's desire, to be pressed upon him. Many letters were on private, and still more on country business; and with one of them he was engaged, when a servant entered with one of that morning's country papers. Tired with his task, Mr. Aubrey rose from his chair as the servant gave him the paper; and, standing before the fire, he unfolded the Yorkshire Stingo, and glanced listlessly over its miscellaneous contents. At length his eye hit upon the following paragraph:

"The rumors so deeply affecting a member for a certain borough in this county, and to which we alluded in our last paper but one, turn out to be well founded. A claimant has started up to very large estates at present held by the gentleman in question; and we are very much misinformed if the ensuing spring assizes will not effect a considerable change in the representation of the borough alluded to, by relieving it from the Tory thralldom under which it has been so long oppressed. We have no wish to bear hard upon a falling man; and, therefore, shall make no comment upon the state of mind in which the person may be presumed to be, who must be conscious that he has so long been enjoying the just rights of others. Some extraordinary disclosures may be looked for when the trial comes on. We have heard from a quarter on which we are disposed to place reliance, that the claimant is a gentleman of decided Whig principles, and who will prove a valuable accession to the Liberal cause."

The tears very nearly forced their way out of Mr. Aubrey's eyes on reading this most unfeeling paragraph; but they had, with a strong effort, been dispersed just as Miss Aubrey entered the room. Her brother quietly folded up the paper and laid it aside, fearful lest his sister's feelings should be pierced by so coarse and brutal a paragraph, which, in fact, had been concocted in London in the office of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, who were, as before stated, interested in the Sunday Flash, which was in some sort connected, through the relationship of the editors, with the Yorkshire Stingo. The idea had been suggested by Gammon, of attempting to enlist the political feeling of a portion of the county in favor of their client.

"Here are several letters for you, Kate," said her brother, picking several of them out. The very first she took up, it having attracted her attention by the double seal, and the vulgar style of the handwriting, was that from Titmouse, which has just been laid before the reader. With much surprise she opened the letter, her brother being similarly engaged with his own; and her face getting gradually paler and paler as she went on, at length she flung it on the floor with a passionate air, and burst into tears. Her brother, with astonishment, exclaimed: "Dear Kate, what is it?" and he rose and stooped to pick up the letter.

"Do n't—do n't, Charles!" she cried, putting her foot upon it, and flinging her arms round his neck. "It is an audacious letter—a vulgar, a cruel letter, dear Charles!" Her emotion increased as her thoughts recurred to the heartless paragraph concerning her brother with which the letter concluded. "I could have overlooked every thing but that," said she, unwittingly. With gentle force he succeeded in getting hold of the painfully ridiculous and contemptible effusion. He attempted faintly to smile several times as he went on.

"Do n't—do n't, dearest Charles! I can't bear it.—Do n't smile—it's very far from your heart; you do it only to assure me."

Here Mr. Aubrey read the paragraph concerning himself. His face turned a little paler than before, and his lips quivered with suppressed emotion. "He is evidently a very foolish fellow!" he exclaimed, walking toward the window, with his back to his sister, whom he did not wish to see how much he was affected by so petty an incident.

"What does he allude to, Kate, when he talks of your having spoken angrily to him, and that he did not know you?" he inquired, after a few moments' pause, returning to her.

"Oh dear! I am so grieved that you should have noticed it—but since you ask me"—and she told him the occurrence alluded to in the letter. Mr. Aubrey drew himself up unconsciously as Kate went on, and she perceived him becoming still paler than before, and felt the kindling anger of his eye.

"Forget it—forget it, dearest Charles! So despicable a being is really not worth a thought," said Kate, with increasing anxiety: for she had never in her life before witnessed her brother the subject of such powerful emotions as then made rigid his slender frame. At length, drawing a long breath—

"It is fortunate, Kate," said he calmly, "that he is not a gentleman, and that I endeavor to be—a Christian." She flung her arms round him, exclaiming, "There spoke my own noble brother!"

"I shall preserve this letter as a curiosity, Kate," said he presently; and with a pointed significance of manner, that arrested his sister's attention, he added, "It is rather singular, but some time before you came in, I opened a letter in which your name is mentioned—I cannot say in a similar manner, and yet—in short, it is from Lord de la Zouch, enclosing one."

Miss Aubrey suddenly blushed scarlet, and trembled violently.

"Do n't be agitated, my dear Kate, the enclosure is from Lady de la Zouch; and if it be in the same strain of kindness that pervades Lord de la Zouch's letter to me"—

"I would rather that you opened and read it, Charles"—she faltered, sinking into a chair.

"Come, come, dear Kate—play the woman!" said her brother, with an affectionate air—"To say that there is nothing in these letters that I believe will interest you—very deeply gratify and interest your feelings—would be"—

"I know—I—I suspect—I"—faltered Miss Aubrey, with much agitation—"I shall return."

"Then you shall take these letters with you, and read, or not read them as you like," said her brother, putting the letters into her hand with a fond and sorrowful smile, that soon, however, flitted away—and, leading her to the door, he was once more alone; and, after a brief interval of reverie, he wrote answers to such of the many letters before him as he considered earliest to require them.

Notwithstanding the judgement and tenderness with which Dr. Tatham discharged the very serious duty which, at the entreaty of his afflicted friends, he had undertaken, of breaking to Mrs. Aubrey the calamity with which she and her family were menaced, the effects of the disclosure had been most disastrous. They had paralyzed her; and Mr. Aubrey, who had long been awaiting the issue, in sickening suspense, in an adjoining room, was hastily summoned in to behold a mournful and heart-rending spectacle. His venerable mother—she who had given life at the mortal peril of her own; she whom he cherished with unutterable tenderness and reverence; she who doted upon him as upon the light of her eyes; from whose dear lips he had never heard a word of unkindness or severity; whose heart had never known an impulse but of gentle, noble, unbounded generosity towards all around her—this idolized being now lay suddenly prostrated and blighted before him—

Poor Aubrey yielded to his long and violent agony, in the presence of her who could no longer hear, or see, or be sensible of what was passing in the chamber.

"My son," said Dr. Tatham, after the first burst of his friend's grief was over, and he knelt down beside his mother with her hand grasped in his, "despise not the chastening of the Lord; neither be weary of his correction;

"For whom the Lord loveth, he correcteth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth.

"The Lord will not cast off for ever;

"But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies.

"For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

It was with great difficulty that Dr. Tatham could render himself audible while murmuring these soothing and solemn passages of scripture in the ear of his distracted friend, beside whom he knelt.

Mrs. Aubrey had suffered a paralytic seizure, and lay motionless and insensible; her features slightly disfigured, but partially concealed beneath her long silvery gray hair, which had, in the suddenness of the fit, strayed from beneath her cap.

"But what am I about?" at length exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, with a languid and alarmed air—"has medical assistance—"

"Dr. Goddard and Mr. Whateley are both sent for by several servants, and will doubtless be very quickly here," replied Dr. Tatham; and while he yet spoke, Mr. Whateley—who, when hastened on by the servant who had been sent for him, was entering the park on a visit to young Mrs. Aubrey, who was also seriously ill and in peculiarly critical circumstances—entered the room, and immediately resorted to the necessary measures. Soon afterwards, also, Dr. Goddard arrived; but, alas, how little could they do for the venerable sufferer!

During the next, and for many ensuing days, the lodge was assailed by very many anxious and sympathizing inquirers, who were answered by Waters, whom Mr. Aubrey—oppressed by the number of friends who hurried up to the hall, and insisted upon seeing him to ascertain the extent to which the dreadful rumors were correct—had stationed there during the day to afford the requisite information. The hall was pervaded by a gloom that could be felt. Every servant had a wo-begone look, and moved about as if a funeral were stirring. Little Charles and Agnes, almost imprisoned in their nursery, seemed quite puzzled and confused at the strange, unusual seriousness, and quietness, and melancholy faces every where about them. Kate romped not with them as had been her wont; but would constantly burst into tears as she held them on her knee or in her arms, trying to evade the continual questioning of Charles. "I think it will be time for me to cry too by-and-by!" said he to her one day, with an air half in earnest, that made poor Kate's tears flow afresh. Sleepless nights and days of sorrow soon told upon her appearance. Her glorious buoyancy of spirits, that erewhile, as it were, had filled the whole hall with gladness—where were they now? Ah, me! the rich bloom had disappeared from her beautiful cheek; but her high spirit, though oppressed, was not broken, and she stood firmly and calmly amid the scowling skies and lowering tempests. You fancied you saw her auburn tresses stirred upon her pale but calm brow by the breath of the approaching storm; and that she also felt it, but trembled not. Her heart might be, indeed, bruised and shaken; but her spirit was, ay, unconquerable. My glorious Kate, how my heart goes forth toward you.

And thou, her brother, who art of kindred spirit; who art supported by philosophy, and exalted by religion, so that thy constancy cannot be shaken or overthrown by the black and ominous swell of trouble which is increasing and closing around thee, I know that thou wilt outlive the storm—and yet it rocks thee!

A month or two may see thee and thine expelled from Old Yatton, and not merely having lost every thing, but with a liability to thy successor that will hang around thy neck like a millstone. What, indeed, is to become of you all? Whither will you go? And your suffering mother, should she survive so long, is her precious form to be borne away from Yatton?

Around thee stand those who, if thou faltest, will perish—and that thou knowest; around thy calm, sorrowful, but erect figure, are a melancholy group—thy afflicted mother—the wife of thy bosom—thy two little children—thy brave and beautiful sister—Yet think not, Misfortune! that over this man thou art about to achieve thy accustomed triumphs. Here, behold thou hast a MAN to contend with; nay, more, a CHRISTIAN MAN, who hath calmly girded up his loins against the coming fight!

"T was Sabbath evening, some five weeks or so after the happening of the mournful events above commemorated, and Kate, having spent as usual several hours keeping watch beside the silent and motionless figure of her mother, had quitted the chamber for a brief interval, thinking to relieve her oppressed spirits by walking, for a little while, up and down the long gallery. Having slowly paced backwards and forwards once or twice, she rested against the little oriel window at the furthest extremity of the gallery, and gazed, with saddened eye, upon the setting sun, till at length, in calm grandeur, it disappeared beneath the horizon. "T was to Kate a solemn and mournful sign; especially followed as it was by the deepening shadows and gloom of evening. She sighed; and, with her hands crossed on her bosom, gazed, with a tearful eye, into the darkening sky, where glittered the brilliant evening star. Thus she remained, a thousand pensive and tender thoughts passing through her mind, till the increasing chills of evening warned her to retire. "I will go," said she to herself, as she walked slowly along, "and try to play the evening hymn—I may not have many more opportunities!"

NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES.

NO. II.

"Pristine vigor and ancient discipline."—PAULDING.

James Fennimore Cooper wrote the Naval History of the United States, bringing it down in some points to the present day: but, owing to a bad judgement at best, he fancied himself bound to treat the subject upon the principle of "Nil mortuis nisi bonum," forgetting the important fact that the living possess the power for good or evil, as their feelings prompt.

His book was a good one for the people: it lulled them into a quiet repose, (the unfailing result of a well-stuffed vanity) by covering over the corruptions of the Navy, and leaving the sores to fester beneath the surface, though occasionally breaking out into, what some have been pleased to term, "the miserable gossip of the officers." He has also shown that there is enough of the ancient material left around which the raw might rally in time of danger; and triumphantly mentions such a one, as holding such a number on the list of Post-Captains. There are, fortunately, however, enough who possess sufficient integrity and discernment, to see through the manifold discrepancies of his book, and to regard it as the ointment of an empyric, that will be attended by the same ephemeral notoriety that has fallen to the share of the other nostrums put forth by him.

It is our province to take up the subject where Mr. Cooper left off, and shew the public that the small and very equivocal services of some of these captains have been presumed upon to a most unlimited extent, and in many instances have served them as a cover under which they have committed acts that would have sent ordinary men to the State Prison.

The continual boring of members of Congress for a Bill to create the grade of Admirals, is based upon the same services; but members of Congress have wisely concluded that those services have long since been cancelled by subsequent acts of outrage upon honor and decency, that have left the aspirants to the dignity, destitute of the necessary qualifications.

We desire that it may be borne in mind that a man who is destitute of honesty and virtue, cannot obtain from those around him, a very great degree of respect and confidence. An old courtesan is always ready to construe each word and gesture into an insinuation against her purity: it is the very consciousness of a want of virtue that creates the unfounded suspicion, and brings on at length an open rupture, which tears the veil from her real character. It is thus with many Captains in the Navy. Unchecked by any law, they have steeped themselves in dishonor and iniquity; and, feeling their own unworthiness of character, they fancy disrespect where none is intended, and from those, perhaps, who are ignorant of their real character. Thus they harrow up their feelings with the phantoms of suspicion, inflict petty, harassing, and unmerited punishments on the supposed offenders; until human nature, oppressed with injustice, turns upon the persecutor. Courts martial follow, and the public wonder at the insubordination of the Navy, and chime in with the cry that the grade of Admirals is necessary for the discipline of the service, and its proper organization, without reflecting upon the immeasurable distance that already lies between the present highest grade, and the real merits of its possessors—the heirs apparent to the dignity, should it ever unfortunately be created.

We address one of this character in direct terms and seek reply!

Are you not aware that, in more than one city of the United States, all gross falsehoods are called by the name you bear, and that your own practice has so stamped them? That the fish, commonly known as the toad fish, which becomes inflated with air when taken from the water, is known on every shore washed by the Atlantic, by the same appellation? That your own ridiculous and pompous inflation, and mean and contemptible collapses have produced the similarity of nature, and the application of the name? Are you not aware that using the contents of a letter, of which you feloniously broke the seal, deprived you of the only plea which an honorable man might have offered in a similar case? Does not this one act dishonor you in the estimation of every honest man? And can you, if even another command should unfortunately devolve upon you, play any other part than that of the old haridan, always suspicious of those around you?—that suspicion prompting you to inflict petty annoyances, and unmerited punishments upon the unfortunate beings under your command, until they turn at last, as a stag at bay, bringing on fresh courts martial, and renewed discontent throughout the service. Will you not then join in the worn out cry of insubordination? And then by false reports try to increase the power to suppress it, when you well know that your own want of honorable principle, integrity and virtue, backed by irresponsible power, produced the result? We warn you, sir, that that act has laid the foundation of more heart-burnings, jealousies, germs of discord, and injuries to the service in your next command, than your pompous, but subsequently counterfeited reply to the English officer, who took from you a prize ship, that you neither attempted to destroy nor defend, can ever smother or redeem.

We turn again to him, who under the cover of friendship—and whose commission as captain in the Navy, should have been a guarantee against a dishonorable act; who pledged the honor of that commission, and his sacred word as a man, to return a sum of borrowed money within the same week, and which after a lapse of fourteen years still remains in his pocket, a brand of living fire, that would long since have consumed honesty to its very spine: he too, has harped upon the insubordination of the junior officers, and complained of the difficulty of exacting from them the respect due to his rank. Do you not know, sir, that the infamous bargain you lately made upon a foreign station with an unnatural mother for the sale of her daughter to yourself has been blazoned throughout every ship that carries the stars and stripes of the American Navy? Is it not notorious that to that act of hellish outrage to God and man, you added the pitiful trick of a mean rogue by swindling the monster out of her unholy and iniquitous wages? And do you expect from all below you in rank the deference that can be yielded only to honor and honesty? Shall they too wallow in the mire of infamy until they accustom them selves to look upon you and your fellow captains with indifference, at least, if not with respect? Think you that the present miserable laws, and usages of the Navy, shall continue to afford your grade opportunities to revel in debauchery and vice, while they furnish you with a powerful engine to grind and oppress your inferiors in rank? Will not Congress listen to this appeal from the younger branches of the Navy? They seek not alms now at the Hall door, neither pay nor promotion; they ask for an outstretched arm to save them from sinking deeper into the slough of despair.

Let the false issue of "Pristine Vigor and Ancient Discipline," set up by Mr. Secretary Paulding, and that miserable thing, called the Navy Board continue for a few years longer, and relief will come too late. Are not the sores and diseases upon the body of the Navy sufficiently manifest to awaken sympathy? Or will Congress wait until it falls into a common leprosy, a loathsome disease from which our countrymen, and the world, will turn in abhorrence and disgust?

CONTENTS OF THIS WEEK'S NEW WORLD.

A letter has been received in this city, dated Belfast, Ireland, from the son-in-law of Sheridan Knowles, the dramatist, in which he remarks that he obtained the new tragedy of JOHN OF PROCTOR, published in the New World, at his residence in Belfast, three weeks before he could procure a copy of the original edition published in London. A fact like this hardly needs a word of comment; we relate it with pride as a most satisfactory demonstration of the truth that the New World has won the race and borne the prize away from all competitors. This assertion will elicit splanetic and ill-natured observations—but we appeal to the public to sustain the verity of our statement; and we appeal also to the evidence of this week's paper, in which appears, in advance not only of all the journals here but of the publication in London, BULWER'S NEW COMEDY OF 'MONEY.'

Our arrangements are such that we challenge any one to outdo us in the promptness of our republications, or in the character of the original literature, which we shall liberally obtain from the first American writers—LET THE EXPENDITURE BE WHAT IT WILL.

SCHOOL DISTRICT LIBRARIES.—The admirable plan of providing for the whole people the means of reading, by establishing in every school district a library of choice books, is, we are happy to perceive, attracting general attention throughout the country. Its very gratifying success in this State, and the invaluable results to be anticipated from its adoption, cannot fail of recommending it to the warmest support of the friends of popular education every where. The Messrs. Harpers are entitled to great praise for the prompt and efficient manner in which they have come forward in aid of this cause. Their enterprise, indeed, may be considered as indispensable in accomplishing the important objects contemplated by the introduction of these libraries; as, without it, or some similar undertaking, conducted on like principles, and with the same spirit and discretion, the supply of books of a suitable character would be entirely inadequate to so extensive a demand. These enterprising publishers have already issued three series, in all 150 volumes, specially selected and prepared for this object, embracing almost every subject of human knowledge, and admirably adapted in all respects to the purpose for which they are designed. The unexampled cheapness of these books is worthy of notice. A fourth series is announced as being in preparation. The example of our own noble State in thus effectively providing for the instruction of her entire population, will, we doubt not, have its effect elsewhere; and we confidently anticipate, that at no distant day every State in our glorious Union will adopt similar measures for the universal diffusion of useful knowledge.

Twenty-Sixth Congress.

TUESDAY, OCT. 29, 1840.

IN SENATE, Mr. Anderson of Tenn., announced the death of his colleague, Hon. FELIX GRUNDY, in a few impressive remarks, and was followed by Mr. Benton in a brief testimony to the worth and public services of the deceased. The Senate passed the customary resolutions and immediately adjourned.

In the House, Messrs. Graves of Ky., and Black of Ga., appeared and took their seats.

Mr. Giddings of O., moved that the House do reconsider the vote of yesterday in the consideration of the Navy Pension bill, by which the act of March 3d, 1837, is repealed. A debate arose on this motion and one of Mr. Reed of Mass., on a postponement to Tuesday next, in which Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Tillinghast of R. I. and Saltonstall of Mass. advocated the reconsideration, and Messrs. Thomas of Md., Pickens of S. C., Shepard of N. C. opposed it. While Mr. Shepard was still speaking—

The Senate's message announcing the death of Hon. Felix Grundy was received through its Secretary. Mr. A. V. Brown of Tenn. pronounced an eloquent tribute to the memory of the deceased. He concluded with the customary resolutions of respect for the memory of the deceased, which were passed, and the House adjourned.

ILLINOIS SENATOR.—Samuel McRoberts (Van Buren) was, on the 16th inst., elected, by the Legislature of Illinois, to be a Senator of the United States from that State for six years from the 3d of March next, when the term of Mr. Senator Robinson will expire. The state of the vote was as follows: For Mr. McRoberts 77; for Cyrus Edwards (Whig) 50 votes.

KENTUCKY SENATOR.—Hon. J. J. Crittenden was re-elected to the Senate of the United States from Kentucky, last week, for six years from the 3d day of March next.—The vote stood for Mr. Crittenden 100; for Mr. Guthrie 29.

Hon. Felix Grundy died on the 19th inst. at Nashville. His place in the U. S. Senate will be supplied by Executive appointment until the next meeting of the Legislature, which does not take place till about a year from this time. Governor Polk will of course appoint a Democrat. The Legislature is decidedly Whig.

Three American fishing schooners have been condemned at Halifax, for encroaching upon the fisheries of that province, under the treaty of 1818.

GOVERNOR OF GEORGIA.—William C. Dawson, member of Congress, has been nominated by the Whigs; Charles J. Macdonald, the incumbent, is nominated by the Democrats.

FROM CANTON.—The ship Lion, which sailed from Macao on the 11th July, a few days later than our last accounts has arrived, but she brings no further intelligence of any interest.

WAYNE COUNTY BANK.—The Comptroller has given notice that the circulating bills of the Wayne County Bank will continue to be received at par at the Treasury for all state dues; and also that such bills will be redeemed from the safety fund when the Comptroller shall have the requisite order to authorize it.

KENTUCKY AND A NATIONAL BANK.—Mr. Bullock's resolutions in favour of Mr. Clay's Land Bill, and also a National Bank, have passed the House of Representatives of that State by a vote of 73 to 18.

TO OLD AND NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

We have received several communications which expostulated with us, because we would not reprint and send to our subscribers certain extra numbers of the Quarto Edition of the New World, which should contain the commencements of all the stories, whose publication was in the last volume and will be, though for a very short time, in the present, continued. A few words will show the unreasonableness of any such demands upon us.

When the New World was begun in this form, we printed five thousand copies, thinking that the demand would at least sustain that number. Owing to the increased price, or to a momentary indifference on the part of the public, but fifteen hundred copies were sold. Of course, we printed only fifteen hundred copies of number two. After this number people began to find out what a capital thing it was to be able to get the New World in a shape fit for preservation. The demand suddenly grew surprising; the edition went up rapidly. Now we print TEN THOUSAND copies; double the number with which we set out, but which was then altogether too great.

Suppose that we were to determine to reprint the commencements of "Poor Jack" and "The Tower of London," and "Guy Fawkes," and "Stanley Thorn" in this shape, where should we leave off? At the commencement of the volume just concluded? No! that would be unfair. Where then? At the third number where two thousand copies were printed? at the tenth where four thousand were printed? or at the thirtieth when a number much larger were every week distributed? The impossibility of answering these questions will show the impossibility of incurring the enormous expense which the unreasonable demands of certain subscribers would impose upon us. Each of our nine thousand readers of to-day have as great a right to demand that we should reprint all of our back numbers, as each of our fifteen hundred readers of six months ago have to ask us to print the first chapters of the continued stories.

We would take this occasion to say to our new subscribers that, which our correspondents, above alluded to, know very well, all the commencements of their stories can be procured from us in the Evergreen Magazine, in a form quite as convenient for the library as this edition of the New World. For the sum of ONE DOLLAR, remitted to us free of postage, we will send eight back numbers of the Evergreen containing all the beginnings of the stories published in this paper. Most of these stories, indeed all except "Ten Thousand A Year" and "Master Humphrey's Clock, draw very near to their conclusion. Two or three numbers more will conclude the "Tower of London," and "Guy Fawkes" and "Stanley Thorn" will not loiter far behind. Of those readers who may not wish to peruse these stories we must beg indulgence for the little space they will henceforth occupy.

As the demand for that best of all the stories TEN THOUSAND A-YEAR is very great and constantly increasing; we have, so as to be sure to meet it, re-printed all that has hitherto appeared, in a neat form so as to send it gratis to those yearly subscribers, who may not wish to purchase back numbers of the EVERGREEN or of the QUARTO NEW WORLD,—some of which still remain on hand.

As a farther inducement to new subscribers, we now state that we will give this commencement of TEN THOUSAND A-YEAR, a copy of Knowles's beautiful play of LOVE, and a copy of our new forthcoming Leviathan Sheet, to all new subscribers, who may send us $3, a year's subscription, in advance, post-paid.

AN OFFER.

Any individual who will forward us $20 free of postage for eight subscribers for the New World, shall receive a copy for one year, and may also retain the balance of the money received for such subscriptions: or in proportion for ten dollars.

Any individual who will send us ten dollars for six subscribers to the EVERGREEN, shall receive a copy for one year, and may retain the balance of the money received on such subscriptions, or in proportion for five dollars. All letters must be post paid or free.

CHRIST THE SHELTER AND STRENGTH OF HIS PEOPLE :

A Sermon,

BY THE REV. G. C. ROLFE, M.A.

Perpetual Curate of Hailey, Oxfordshire, Eng.

ISAIAH XXXII 2.... "AND A MAN SHALL BE AS A HIDING PLACE FROM THE WIND, AND A COVERT FROM THE TEMPEST; AS RIVERS OF WATER IN A DRY PLACE, AS THE SHADOW OF A GREAT ROCK IN A WEARY LAND."

It was the apostle Paul's sentiment, as it is the sentiment of every faithful ambassador of Christ, that all the success of his ministrations must be solely attributed to the agency of an Almighty Power, working mightily in him and by him; and, when there dropped from his lips something which appeared like the confidence of boasting, that he had labored more abundantly than the rest of the apostles, he immediately recalls the words, and acknowledges that all his sufficiency was of God; "yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." It was the same apostle's wish, as it is the wish of every true minister of the gospel, "to preach not himself, but Christ Jesus the Lord," warning every man, and teaching every man, both publicly and privately, that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus at the day of his appearing: it was his first and chief desire for himself, as it is the leading desire of every Christian, who knows his need of a better righteousness than his own wherewith to stand accepted before God, "to win Christ and be found in him;" it was too his humble determination, as it is the determination of every broken-hearted penitent, yet joy-inspired believer, sensible of the freeness and fulness of the salvation wrought out by his compassionate Redeemer, "to glory in nothing save in the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ." Now, the more we imbibe the apostle's spirit, walk in his steps, and aim at attaining his high attainments, the easier will be our pilgrimage through this weary wilderness, and the more triumphant our entrance into the heavenly and eternal land of promise.

The Lord Jesus Christ, then, in his person, his character, and his offices; in his life, his death, and his propitiatory sufferings; in his holy doctrines, his self-denying precepts, and his incomparable example, was the grand theme of the apostle's preached and written discourses; he had the pen of a ready writer, if not the tongue of the eloquent, to show forth the praises of Him, who had miraculously called him out of Jewish darkness into the marvellous light of the gospel. In all the apostle's epistles, which form the main, and most doctrinal part, of the New Testament, every verse is, as it were, a hand-post, pointing out Christ as the way to Heaven, both by example and suffering; his chief object seems to be to build up the believer on the only sure foundation, and to raise a goodly superstructure. In reading the Old Testament—a part of the holy scriptures too much neglected by some, because they can see therein little or nothing of the adorable Immanuel—the apostle was guided by the Spirit of truth to see how abundantly it testified of Christ. In the history of God's chosen people, in the lives of those eminent saints who obtained a good report through faith, and in all the ceremonies and sacrifices of the Mosaic law, he could perceive types and shadows of the nature and blessedness of the gospel; and, what was still more conducive to his spiritual edification, he was taught to understand how copiously, how clearly, and how powerfully "holy men of old," the inspired prophets and the sweet psalmist of Israel, spoke of the sufferings and glory of the Messiah, of the humiliation of his first, and the triumph of his second, coming; of the commencement, the enlargement, and the perpetuity of his kingdom. For instance, we may imagine with what delight and thankfulness the apostle would have read the passage from Isaiah that has been selected as the text; a passage, whose true force, and beauty, and application, may not generally be known to those who read, but do not mark, learn, and inwardly digest the holy scriptures. May that same Spirit, who guided the apostle in his interpretation of the types and prophecies, guide us also to a right and full understanding of the meaning of the text, and enable us to draw from it, in our present meditations, and throughout our future experience, the abundant consolation and the strong encouragement which it holds forth to the believer!

There is something which, at first sight, seems remarkable, in the wording of the text; it is said, "a man shall be as a hiding-place from the wind," &c.: now, had the prophet told us that the Lord God of Israel should be such a security, and such a refreshment to his people, the truth and propriety of the sentiment would at once be admitted by all; but, does it not sound strange in our ears, that poor, fallible, perishing man should be proclaimed as so powerful a stay and support to his fellow man? Are we not therein directed to lean on a bruised reed? Does not this language seem to warrant our placing entire dependence, and building all our expectations on a fellow-mortal? How is it to be reconciled with other passages of scripture, which speak of man as nothing, and of God as every thing? How, for instance, with the psalmist's advice and caution, "it is better to trust in the Lord, than to put any confidence even in princes?" How, with the prophet's exhortation, which speaks of the folly of deriving our hopes and our happiness from the promises of an ever-dying, and an ever-changing mortal, "cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?" How, too, is it to be reconciled with another prophet's most terrible denunciation against such a confidence, "cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart, in consequence, departeth from the Lord?" Surely, then, some being far more exalted than ourselves, far differently constituted from ourselves, must be the individual alluded to in the text. Who, then, is meant? Who is the man that is as a hiding-place from the wind, &c.? He is none other than the Man, Christ Jesus, God manifested in the flesh; he, who was with God from the beginning, and was God, but left the bright regions of the heavenly glory on an errand of mercy and love, to tabernacle in this vale of tears; he, who in his divine character was without body, parts, or passions, and yet a miracle of grace, and love, and humility; became bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, to purchase for us an everlasting redemption from the penalties and the tyranny of sin. And here, be it observed, what a force and propriety there is in the language of the text: the mind and heart of the Christian are more powerfully affected on hearing that the Man, Christ Jesus, is such a stay and refreshment, than they would have been had it been simply stated that the Lord Jehovah should be a source of security and comfort. I mean, the Christian delights to contemplate Christ in his human nature. His becoming man, his dying as man, his ascending as man into heaven, are the circumstances which show his astonishing love and compassion to our fallen race. He most strikingly commendeth his love to us, in that he remembered us in our low estate, took not upon him the nature of angels, but the nature of the children of Adam; and in that nature suffered as our surety and representative. As the great Captain of our salvation, then, was made like unto us, sin only excepted, we seem united to him by a tie of brotherhood, and approach the throne of grace with more confidence, feeling assured that our faithful and merciful High Priest can sympathize with us in our sufferings, can compassionate our infirmities, can succor us in our temptations, can extricate us from our difficulties, and can relieve our most pressing wants and necessities, both for the body and the soul.

But let us now, asking for the divine help, without which nothing is holy, nothing is effectual, proceed to consider what is said of the Man, Christ Jesus; or, rather, what are the great privileges of the believer, through the exercise of faith in the Redeemer. They are stated in the text as two-fold: first, his confidence, his deliverance, his safety, as pointed out in the words, "a man shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest;" secondly, his peace, his repose, his refreshment from weariness, as pointed out in the words, "a man shall be as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

Let us briefly consider the first privilege, the Christian's present and eternal safety through his interest in Christ.—But here, let it be remembered, that the observations made are applicable only to the situation of the true Christian, who has been duly humbled under a sense of his sinfulness, and in the season of anxious inquiry has fled to Christ to lay hold on the hope of eternal life through: let none, then, who are living in ignorance of Christ, and in neglect of his commandment, be saying to themselves, peace, grace, when there is no peace, no safety, no good hope; and cannot possibly be, till they repent, believe, and obey.

The Christian can look back to the time when it was far otherwise with him than at present; his views, his feelings, his hopes and desires, are now different from what they once were: not that his conversion was instantaneous and remarkable, but as in the case of thousands, it might have been quietly wrought, and almost imperceptibly progressive. He, like every son and daughter of Adam, was born in sin, and grew up in sin; every day only added to the number of his transgressions: in this state of alienation from God he was not, perhaps, wholly regardless of moral and religious duties; he might have paid some attention to the observance of the Sabbath, but he did not find the services of that holy day to be a delight and refreshment to his soul; he might have endeavored to walk in the path of the divine commandments, but his obedience was not hearty and uniform, springing from a principle of love; he might have read the scriptures at seasons, but the divine food was not as manna to a hungry soul; he might occasionally, or even regularly, kneel down to prayer, round the family altar, but his petitions were not offered up in faith, and fervor, and sincerity—they were the language of the lips, but not of the heart. The individual we have been supposing, may be chastened by a merciful Providence, with a loss of health, or of property, or of some near and dear friends; or he may be thrown into the society of some truly religious companions; or the divine blessing may more powerfully accompany the preached and written word. What follows? He becomes more and more sensible of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, of the greatness of his own offences, and of his constant need of an intercessor; he comes, with deep self-loathing, in the spirit of the conscience-smitten publican, to God by Christ, seeks to the Saviour, and finds the Saviour, as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest of the wrath of his offended Father.

In this new and happy state, the Christian enjoys great and various privileges; he is justified and accounted righteous through the Lord his righteousness, and sanctified by the Spirit of our God; he is delivered, and delivered for ever from the condemnation and curse of a broken law; the thick clouds of divine wrath are dispersed by the Sun of righteousness, and succeeded by a calm and heavenly sunshine; the gathering tempests of offended justice, so terrible, so overwhelming to the ungodly, have no thunderbolts, no terror for him; he is safe, for ever safe in the sure and only covert, the ark of Christ's church. In that asylum he has discovered a Goshen where no darkness or hail can come, a mountain which the world can never move.

But not only is the Christian, through his knowledge of Christ, delivered from the penal consequences of sin—that is a mercy, an unspeakable mercy, for most assuredly he who has felt the intolerable burden of sin, and found that burden taken away, will cry out of the fulness of his heart, "blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered, blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity,"—not only has the believer experienced this greatest of all deliverances, but he will find Christ to be a hiding-place and a covert from many temporal and unforeseen calamities; he will be as a wall of fire round about their earthly tabernacles; yea, their "walls are continually before him;" he will cover them in the shadow of his hand—yea, he will keep them as the apple of the eye:—angels too, who fulfil the divine will, and are appointed to be ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, form the believer's body-guard by day and by night, and bear him up in their hands lest at any time he should dash his foot against the stones.

Not only, however, is the believer protected from unforeseen and unknown dangers, but what is a far greater mercy, he is delivered, through a firm trust in Christ, the sure hiding-place, the safe covert, even from the apprehension of evil. We may say with the psalmist, "I sought the Lord, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears." In troublous times, when the judgments of the Almighty are abroad, when the winds of his just indignation are sweeping away the false refuges of the sinner, and the clouds of his hidden face are lowering and threatening to overwhelm them with a fearful desolation; at such gloomy seasons, as well as at all times, the believer's heart standeth sure, and he is not afraid of any evil tidings; come what may, his persuasion is, the Lord is on his side, and will in mercy grant, or in mercy withhold, the expected deliverance. It is not, thank God! an uncommon occurrence to see grace triumphing over constitutional timidity, on ordinary as well as extraordinary occasions, by a constant as well as an occasional operation; and this more especially in that sex, where we may usually see less natural fortitude, but more loveliness of piety.

Again, when we read that Christ is "as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest," we are reminded of this comfortable truth, that the believer, through Christ, is sustained in hope, and patience, and resignation, in the trying scene of personal affliction, when the pestilential winds are let loose from the divine treasury, commissioned to execute the divine purposes of grace, and the lowering tempest menaces to shatter to pieces the frail and corruptible tabernacle of the flesh.

Let this truth, too, never be forgotten, though last to be mentioned yet first to be regarded, Christ is as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest of the assaults of Satanic malignity. The enemy is sometimes permitted to come in like a flood, his evil suggestions rush with a torrent's force into the soul, and with one mighty sweep bear down the barriers of hope and confidence; his chilling blasts freeze to numbness the heart of flesh: he thunders in the ear the threatenings of the Mosaic law, and deafens to the sound of the still small voice of the gospel; yea, his fiery darts flash like lightning into the beclouded mind, and strike terror through the whole inner man. At such a crisis, what is the believer's resource? How can he recover himself? He looks up to Christ, who nobly vanquished in the desert, and looks not up in vain; he arms himself from the divine armory, and goes forth successfully in the strength of the Lord of Hosts; he betakes himself to the ranks of the great Captain of his salvation, and so manfully lifts up a standard against the rulers of the darkness of this world: the Lord is nigh at hand to deliver him, the enemy is routed and driven off the field, and the exhausted, but victorious combatant finds, by experience, that Christ is a sure covert from every tempest, but especially from the desolating tempests of Satanic power, and malice, and subtlety.

But let us now pass on to a brief consideration of the second part of our subject, viz. the believer's peace, and repose, and refreshment from weariness, as intimated in the latter words of the text, "a man shall be as rivers of waters in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

And O! what an important, what an encouraging, what a consolatory declaration is contained in these few words! may we be able henceforth to acknowledge their truth, by the testimony of our own experience! Remember, however, the full force of these heart-stirring words can with difficulty be appreciated by us, who, in this our highly favored land, live in a temperate climate, and are, happily, strangers to the extremes of either heat or cold. To catch the liveliness of the prophet's description, we must transfer ourselves, in imagination at least, to the scenes and the perils of the oriental traveller. The imagery is taken from the nature of the seasons and the character of the seasons in hot eastern countries, which were familiar to the prophet's observation; there, I need not remind you, there are large tracts of sandy, pathless deserts, where the weary traveller may walk mile after mile, and day after day, unsheltered from the burning rays of a vertical sun, the aching eyes unrefreshed by the sight of the lively and verdant green, and the parching thirst unquenched from the waters of the pure and bubbling fountain; there, again, the hurricanes are more fearful in their ravages than in our comparatively tranquil atmosphere, uprooting trees, unroofing houses, and spreading desolation far and near; there, the winds to be dreaded are not like ours, cold and bleak, and freezing, but, what is more to be dreaded, burning with a consuming and pestilential heat, and impregnated with the seeds of death; there, the tempests are, indeed, the soul-thrilling voice of an angry God, terrible in their aspect, and overwhelming in their effects. Remember, then, that the prophet spoke in reference to the winds and the tempests, and the soil of his own and surrounding countries. Remember, too, how appalling, how desolating those winds and tempests are, and the language of the first part of the text will then most powerfully remind us that Jehovah is indeed a consuming fire to his rebellious enemies, whilst at the same time he is a never-failing strength and security to his willing and obedient people.

In order, too, I would add, to conceive the full force of the latter words of the text, picture to your mind's eye the traveller bending his weary steps over such a weary land as has been faintly described; behold him almost ready to sink from the combined oppression of heat, fatigue, and exhaustion of spirits, his valuable stock of provisions, and his still more valuable flask of water, almost exhausted too; imagine, if it be possible, with what thankfulness of heart, with what an ecstasy of joy, when reduced to such a pitiable plight, the traveller would hail the sight of the distant river of water in such a dry and thirsty wilderness, or an approach to the cooling shade of the lofty over-hanging rock, in such a barren and sun-smitten desert. The shade of a tree, or a wall, and more especially the cooling shade of a rock, is always agreeable and reviving to the wearied traveller or laborer; and in a tenfold degree must it be so in the hot eastern countries: he reposes beneath its shadow, and feels himself a new man; he breathes, as it were, a different atmosphere, and finds himself in a different element; he drinks, too, at the passing stream, immediately his strength and his spirits revive, and he prosecutes his journey with renewed hope and alacrity.

Now, as with the eastern traveller, so with the Christian pilgrim, as with the wearied laborer, so with the Christian husbandman; he is, perhaps, distracted with the din of the noise, the tumult, and the bustle of the world, or too much captivated with the pleasures and vanities of life, and his thoughts are thereby taken off from the far more important concerns of the soul and of eternity, and a languor and deadness creep over and benumb the whole spiritual frame; or the mind may be oppressed with a weight of afflictions, bereavements, and trials; or he may be, for a time, overwhelmed with the pressure of the cares and uncertainties of business, and give way to unnecessary apprehensions of future embarrassment, and so suffer unbelief to usurp the dominion of faith, or he may be grievously assaulted for a season with the burning heat of sin and sorrow, which, with their pernicious influence, drank up all spiritual warmth and animation; or the fiery darts of Satan may infuse their deadly venom into the soul, and so destroy all that is healthy and vigorous within; or the warfare against the world, the flesh, and the devil, may appear, at the present, too arduous, and the Christian combatant is almost tempted to desert the standard of his general, and to throw away the divine armor as useless and cumbersome. At this critical juncture, how is the sinking Christian raised out of the waves of trouble and darkness? how is he strengthened with divine strength, and enabled to throw off the world's trammels? How can he gird up the loins of his mind, so as to persevere with increased diligence in the Christian pilgrimage? Prayer is his resource, the throne of grace is his refuge; the blood-stained mercy-seat is his hiding-place, the atoning sacrifice of Christ is his plea, his only plea, his all-prevailing plea, the promises of a covenant-keeping God, which are all yea and amen in Christ, are his strong encouragement; his hands, his eyes, his heart, are toward the merciful and faithful High Priest in the heavens; his thirsty soul is crying out and gasping for the living God, and he rushes to the fountain opened in Mount Calvary, more healing than Bethesda's pool, or famed Siloam's flood. What is the result? He is privileged to taste the fountain of living waters, and to find the shadow of the Rock of ages; he drinks, and drinks deeply of the inexhaustible river of life; he reposes with renewed peace and hope beneath that refreshing and never-failing shadow; the barren soil is made fruitful, the wilderness blossoms as the Eden of the Lord, the dew of heaven descending, the soul emits the fragrance of a well-watered and richly planted garden; the Christian principle is impregnated with a fresh stimulus, his drooping graces revive, his spiritual health is re-established, his humility is deepened, his love and zeal burn with a purer flame, his faith is strengthened, his hopes are animated, his affections are spiritualized; a calmness of confidence, a liveliness of joy, and a holiness of peace are diffused through the whole inner man.

In one respect, however, there is a dissimilarity in the situation of the eastern traveller and the Christian pilgrim. Thus far we have traced an analogy, but there is one circumstance which will not admit of comparison. The traveller's expectations are sometimes raised—only to be disappointed: not so the Christian's. Through an optical illusion, peculiar to those countries, the traveller imagines that he can see in the far-distant horizon the long-wished-for sight of a lake or a fountain of water; immediately his hopes revive, his heart is cheered, and his pace quickened only to discover at last that his hope was a mockery, and his imagination a dream. Not so the Christian pilgrim in his search for "the well of water springing up into eternal life," or the rock of his salvation: he never seeks the fountain or the shadow in vain; he is never deceived, never disappointed; yea, he may have more than he expects, desires, or deserves; there is a fullness of blessing, a richness of consolation, an abundance of peace to the anxious, the patient, the believing, thirsty soul. The faithful and true witness hath said, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters," and "Whosoever will, let him to the waters of life freely;" and again, "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground;" yea, he has not only promised, but invited and entreated; for, on the great day of the feast of tabernacles, he cried out and said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink; he that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water:" in other words, he shall be abundantly and inwardly watered himself, and shall abundantly and inwardly water others.

PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF LAFITTE.

BY JAMES REES.

CHAP. VIII. . . . The Bandit's Mountain Home—Social Habits of the Gang—Singfried's Story—Father Nicholas, a legend of the olden time—Bobby's idea of legends, and the Story Telling expressed by his actions.

In a former Passage we introduced the notorious Mason to our readers. It is not generally known that this respectable personage acted as Lafitte's Lieutenant, and occasionally took command of his men on land service, when other and more important matters called the attention of their Chief to the ocean. The broad mountains of the Far West were their abiding place; and one of those numerous caves so celebrated in traditionary love, and subject of wonderment and mystery in history, their home. Immediately after the incidents related in our last Passage, Lafitte sought his horde, and, with Rebecca, soon forgot the world—but was not by the world forgotten.

Rebecca seemed the priestess of the cave. There was none of that delicacy about her which would have tended to mar their festivities. She even sat at the table and drank the Brigand's toast—"A wide sea, a good ship, clear ground, and a swift horse."

It was on one of those social occasions, that Rebecca rallied Lafitte on his wild and peculiar doctrine, "that there was in nature the means of prolonging life." Nay, he even contended that the elixir, spoken of as fabulous, actually existed.

"Well, Captain," observed one of the men, "tell us that story which you have written in your journal, entitled 'Father Nicholas'—it carries out your favorite theory."

"How do you know there is such a tale in my journal?"

"That's a question to ask a gentleman and a scholar! Why, does n't it lay open on the desk in your room?"

"True, Singfried, now I remember, you once told me that in your youth your education was not, like mine, neglected. Your life, no doubt, would furnish a strange mixture of the serious and ludicrous, crime, and a few virtues. You must tell us your history, for our amusement."

"As regards the matter, Captain, there is that in it which is serious enough, and some things which I would rather keep locked up here," laying his hand impressively on his heart.

"Old Barbeaux's death, for instance," whispered Bob.

"Silence, hell-hound, or I'll throttle you! Imp of Satan, you are my bane—my curse! Beware of my vengeance!"

"Yes, old 'un; but see, the Captain waits."

"As I was saying, Captain, when the bright-headed youth interrupted me, my life is a dark catalogue of crimes, some of which still disturb my rest—but no matter. Do you know, Captain, I once denied the existence of a Supreme Being. It was a battle between myself and Reason. The former conquered, but not until my soul was loaded to the brim with heavy crimes. No man should deny the Deity, Captain, though he be a murderer."

"Is there blood upon your conscience, Singfried?" asked the Captain.

Singfried cast one withering look at Bob: that scion of a noble house was mum!

"Ay, Captain, and innocent blood! In the dark hours of the night, when all around is calm and still—when Nature's self is asleep—these crimes are made manifest: the figures of those I have wronged rise up before me, and mock me with hideous gestures. I writhe upon my bed, still are they before me: I arise and approach them—they move, I follow, they vanish! Oh, Captain, such sights are dreadful!"

"Rebecca, can you listen to such things unmoved?" asked Lafitte.

"I could listen to his story with more interest."

"I do not want to hear old Singfried's story of ghosts," cried a robber; "give us the Captain's story."

"Presently, my men; but I should like to hear a portion of Singfried's—that part of it which led him to adopt a robber's life. What caused you to quit the gay world and all its pleasures for these broad hills, and this barren cave?" Singfried hesitated a moment, cast his eyes around the table, took a full glass of brandy, and, in a low voice, began:

"Captain, I will tell you that, but no more. Remember, only that."

SINGFRIED'S STORY.

My life has been one of crime, the retrospection of which drives me to madness. The thought has frequently struck me that a recapitulation of a few scenes would tend to withdraw my mind from the contemplation of them, and relieve me of a heavy load of crime which presses with a giant's strength upon my soul. I question, however, if this will avail much. Nothing but the annihilation of thought—the destruction of memory—can give me relief. The mind, that undefined and intuitive seat of reason, that embryo of eternity, with all its fearful imaginings, can call up at a moment's warning the dark, deep deeds of guilt, and hold them up to the mirrored soul, as messengers from the grave. The recital of one event in my life may teach some of you a lesson, and probably draw from some sympathetic eye the tear of pity for my woes. I shall pass over the earlier years of my life, as they contain nothing that would interest you. They were of an infantine nature compared to the ones in which the event occurred I am now about relating. I was in my twenty-second year when I became acquainted with two sisters of the name of Clifford: they were beautiful and highly accomplished—the pride of their parents, the admiration of their friends.

* * * I was the monster who crushed all their bright hopes, and sent them to an untimely grave, victims of my hellish arts. Each one bore me a child—a daughter and a son. They separated; one left the city and went no one knew whither; the other died a prostitute in a common brothel in Shippen street, Philadelphia. Her child, my son, was brought up in the poor-house, and turned loose upon the world. At the age of eighteen he was committed to prison for theft. Captain, he is one of your gang! Start not: he is not here now, nor does he know me as his father.

"Where is he?" asked Lafitte.

"On duty—absent on duty. On my return home to my native land, after an absence of eighteen years, (during which time I suffered several years' imprisonment for petty crimes,) I learned the fate of my son. I made inquiry of the Cliffords. They were both dead. My daughter—I never heard of her until—but I will not anticipate you in the interest of my story, if it has any. I pressed my feet once more on my native soil: it was not the pressure of innocence and virtue; it was the heavy tread of guilt." [Here follows several pages taken up with reflections, and vain attempts at true philosophy, which result in his forming an acquaintance with a man of some character, whose name was Gilbert.]

"I married the daughter of my friend Gilbert. She was just twenty-one years of age, handsome and accomplished. I was forty-three; the disparity of our ages seemed not to lessen the power of love. I was now comparatively happy. We lived on the borders of a sweet, romantic lake. Our time was spent in rural and rational enjoyment; my wife was fond of reading, and I of hearing her read. I thought then there was music in it. For hours we have sat together beneath a spreading oak, and read alternately to each other some interesting book.

One afternoon, eight months after our marriage, my wife's delicate situation rendered it impracticable to take our accustomed walk. We were seated in our little parlor, looking over some old papers, trinkets, and such matters. Some of these papers belonged to my wife's mother, and she was intent upon them. To me they were of no value; a miniature fell to the floor, and exposed the features of a most beautiful woman. I snatched it up, and uttered an exclamation of surprise, as I recognised the likeness of Mary Clifford! 'Gracious God, what is this?' My wife, alarmed at the exclamation, turned suddenly around, and, seeing the miniature in my hand—'T is my mother,' she exclaimed, 'and is a good likeness.' 'Your mother! speak, for the sake of my soul's salvation—speak! Helen, who art thou? quick; your name ere I go mad! Was not Gilbert your father? In mercy say that he was!' and I called upon heaven to save me from the damning—the worst of crimes. 'Be calm, dear husband; you look wild; Gilbert was not my father!' 'And your mother—who was your mother?' 'Her name was Clifford—Mary Clifford.' 'Go on—go on—let me hear all. Name him she called husband—your father.' My wife held down her head and hesitated. 'Be calm, my dear husband. Hear me confess a mother's frailty: I was not born in wedlock! I am the offspring of guilt. My father's name was—' 'Hold!' I exclaimed, 'one moment! my brain is on fire! reason is deserting me!—now go on—his name?' 'Was Collins!' 'Miserable girl, you have wedded your own father!—'

I remember nothing. Beyond this all was chaos. Years rolled away, and I was the inmate of a mad-house. Reason, however, once more resumed her seat. I learnt that my daughter died in giving birth to a male child—both lay in one grave! Captain, this is an awful confession. Pity me, comrades, for I am miserable."

The wretched man leaned his head upon the table and groaned audibly. The silence was broken by a voice from the lower end of the table, requesting the Captain to read the story of "Father Nicholas."

"I am afraid the story of Singfried has taken away the desire of listening to mine. His is an 'over true one,' Father Nicholas but the phantom of the mind—a playful fancy of the imagination."

"Let us have it—let us have it!" was the cry. A look of unusual kindness from Rebecca decided him, and in a clear, distinct manner he read from his journal the following strange tale, the production of his idle hours, and intended to carry out the idea of his new theory:—

FATHER NICHOLAS,

A TALE OF THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

"I do remember an apothecary,—
And hereabouts he dwells,—whom late I noted
In tattered weeds, with overwhelming brows,
Culling of herbs; meagre were his looks,
Sharp misery had worn him to the bones." Shakespeare.

In a retired lane in the city of London, lived in the year 1330, a man whose outward appearance denoted the extremes of poverty. His beard hung down to his waist, and the abject wretchedness of his person threw around it a wild and unnatural character, which gave rise to dark rumors and deep suspicion of his being a necromancer—a name which allied the individual possessing it, to Satan himself. This man kept a small shop for the sale of herbs, and chemical preparations, the effect of which, upon those who had the courage to take them, was so extraordinary, that it obtained for him the title of the learned doctor. Business, however, came in very slow, and seemingly added nothing to his worldly gear, or limited household. Of an evening, this singular man was frequently seen gathering herb and plants from churchyards, and it is said that he was once seen to pluck a flower of a peculiar color from the grave of a murderer; and he was known to have given the executioner a large sum of money for the toe nails of a noted malefactor; these, and sundry other unspeakable things, he was known to place in a crucible made of the skull of a child murderer! The neighbors said, that on this occasion he invoked the devil and his angels. Be this as it may, Father Nicholas, for such he was called, pursued the even tenor of his way until the evening when we beg leave to introduce another character to our readers.

It was one of those dark nights peculiar to the city of London, that a little man, dressed in black, presented himself at the dirty counter of Father Nicholas. "Good evening, learned sir," was the stranger's salutation. The doctor raised his eyes, fixed them upon the speaker, and inquired his business.

"You purchase herbs and scarce plants, I understand?"

"Yes; have you any for sale?"

"I have a few handful of"—placing his mouth to the ear of the doctor, he whispered the name.

Had a thunderbolt fallen at his feet, the consternation of the poor doctor could not have been greater. He started back, his eyes rolled in his head, his hands relaxed their hold of some glasses, which fell with a crash to the floor.—The stranger in black stood unmoved, and repeated in a careless manner, the former question, "Do you purchase?" "Purchase!" exclaimed Nicholas, "aye, with my soul's salvation, I'll buy them, sir, but speak—where—who—gathered them?"

"Myself," was the answer.

"And there—did you gather them there yourself?—from that spot where mortal footsteps have never trod!"

"Were they are, old man, view them; aye smell them, prepare them, try them upon your whiskered form, ha! ha!" and his wild laugh rang fearful through the house.

"Name your price young man; name it—take it and begone."

"It is easily told, and to be paid this day two hundred years hence on this spot."

"What is the price?"

"Yourself, living or dead."

"And my reward—I mean my gain?"

"The indulgence of life to the fullest extent of your ambition and desires; unbounded wealth and renewed youth!"

A wonderful alteration appeared in the heretofore wretched hovel of Father Nicholas; a splendid new building arose upon the ruins of the old one. It was remarked at the time, that the workmen were forbid to alter, or injure in any manner, the little room wherein the extraordinary scene above described had occurred. The personal appearance of Father Nicholas was also changed; he seemed to be much younger. Riches poured in upon him. At last a dark story was circulated, that the means of its accumulation was dangerous to the morbid institutions of Great Britain. Matters of this kind occurring in the age of which we speak, carried on their front an air of probable witchcraft; then, as well as in after ages, it was looked upon with the utmost horror and detestation. The accumulation of money by any other means than labor, or honest traffic, was at that period considered as alone the work of magic; hence Father Nicholas's sudden rise from the extreme of poverty to the extreme of wealth, became the subject of much conversation among his less fortunate neighbors. It finally reached the ears of England's avaricious king, who summoned the victim of superstition before him: a veil is drawn over this conference. Astonishment, it is said, was depicted on the king's countenance as he was seen suddenly quitting the chamber, and hid himself in his private library for the rest of the day. Father Nicholas was cleared from all imputation heretofore attached to him; he was countenanced by majesty, and taken, as history informs us, into his especial favor!

A short time after this, Father Nicholas decamped in a very mysterious manner, leaving his house under the especial charge of the king, who, to the astonishment of his subjects, gave especial orders that the house of Father Nicholas should stand until it fell of its own accord to the ground!

Strange as this order was, other circumstances of a mysterious nature, led people to believe that Father Nicholas was, or had been leagued with old Nick. The house was looked upon as a doomed one, and one hundred years after the disappearance of the owner, the same old-fashioned uninhabited dwelling stood, the terror of the whole neighborhood and the fruitful subject of many a long winter evening's tale. The grass had grown over the steps, and the running vine completely enveloped its sombre stone in its serpentine folds; it was pointed out by one generation to another, as the place of demons; and posterity did full justice to the old story, by additions rendered ten times more awful by the contrast drawn between the then enlightened age, and the dark one in which such infernal rites were supposed to have been performed. The advancement of knowledge never has, and perhaps, never will clear away that rubbish of superstition from our minds which former ages have been gathering, as it were, for our especial inconvenience; nor does it seem probable that those wild notions of sorcery, magic, &c., will ever be obliterated while the subject forms the theme of some of our ablest writers.

About one hundred years after the sudden and mysterious departure of Father Nicholas from England, a similar character appeared in France, whose immense riches attracted the attention of King Charles, who commissioned his master of requests to enquire into the means by which he became so opulent. The account given by this man differed widely, it is presumed, from the one given by the other. He said that having purchased an old thick book, gilt upon the edges, and written on the bark of a peculiar tree in Latin characters, with a thin cover of copper, on which were sculptured many strange figures and devices—he studied it for twenty-one years without being able to discover more than it was a treatise on the Philosopher's Stone. The book, however, was translated by a converted Jew, named Sanchez, who taught him to decipher the characters. It was the art of turning quicksilver into gold and silver at his pleasure; and he stated that at two different times in the month of April, he had converted a half a pound of quick-silver into pure silver, and the same quantity into pure gold. This account, we are told, satisfied the two, but raised doubts among the many.

"T was on the evening of the 15th March, 1530, that a little boy, living in an obscure lane in London, ran to his mother in the utmost alarm, and in a hurried manner told her that he saw a man whose description answered exactly to the likeness of old Father Nicholas, which hung in the aisle of an old church close by. He was pushing away the stones and rubbish from the door of the old deserted house, and applied a key which opened it, and went in. The mother dropped some work which she held in her hand, and ran hastily to the spot, and to her astonishment discovered the most evident signs of some one having forced his way into the house. The reader no doubt remembers it as well as we do. The woman, as in duty bound, reported the fact to the next magistrate, who as also in duty bound, convened his officers, and concluded to march "seriatim" to the house of terror. By this time the whole neighborhood was informed of the daring stranger, who had entered the house, and resembled the original owner, who had been gone two hundred years that very day. They reached the place, and as numbers make cowards brave, they rushed in a body through the long entry. Not a sound but the hollow echo of their own footsteps was heard; every thing was falling to decay; the tapestry was dropping piecemeal from the damp walls; pictures had by their weight loosened the nails, and they hung in a falling posture; many of them had fallen and were shattered to pieces on the floor. In the middle of the room, a table was set, with a number of dishes completely filled with dust; one of two bottles of wine stood upright, and uncorked, but no one dared to touch them, thinking that a devil had taken up his quarters in them. A dreadful gloom hung over the scene, and a chilly air rushed through the decayed apartments. In another room stood several tables covered with cards and dice; upon a sideboard stood the remains of a supper, which had been prepared two hundred years ago, for those who had long since become food for worms. Strange as it would seem, every thing had lost its original nature but the bread—it had not even moulded, but was as hard as the marble upon which it had stood; a of curious form fell to pieces at the touch. The company who had thus unceremoniously entered the rooms looked upon one another in silence—not a word was spoken; they passed through the various rooms, every thing had withered beneath the hand of time; the beds had been eaten up by the few living inhabitants of this gloomy mansion, a host of whom attempted to escape, which gave additional fears to the already terrified officers of justice. Another door was pushed open. A cry of horror escaped them. Upon a chair beside the table sat the apparent living Father Nicholas, his head resting upon his hands—his eyes were closed. In one hand he held a small phial—it was empty; before him lay a sheet of paper, upon which was written, "my fate is sealed—the tempter claims his price—the price of the infernal drug—I have drank it—I await the issue—it fails—hell claims its victim!"

He was dead! Life had not been long extinct, for a gentle warmth was felt in the vicinity of the heart. The officers returned, locked up the house, reported the extraordinary circumstance to those more particularly concerned. The succeeding week the house, in despite of the King's prohibition, was pulled down, and not a trace remains of this once beautiful, yet dreaded mansion.

That the reader may not conceive this to be altogether an imaginary sketch on my part, I need only refer to the writings of Godwin and others, who not only wrote upon the subject of the Philosopher's Stone, but actually believed in the wild tale of the "Wandering Jew," who, as one grave writer asserts, is still in existence, and doomed to wander upon the earth, without a local habitation or name.*

There was a long pause among the stern followers of the writer of this wild tale, which was broken by the sudden entrance of red-headed Bob, who not being over-fond of story-telling had watched his opportunity and sneaked quietly out, "Well, Bob, what's in the wind now, eh?"

"There are four men well mounted, and well-armed too, even now crossing the bridge."

"Ah! say you so? To arms—to arms! Rebecca to your chamber."

"Why should I to my chamber? Think you there are no charms in a mountain skirmish for me?"

"It is not fitting, Rebecca, nor would I have it so."

"If it fit me to go, I will."

"Ha! say you so, proud one? Then let me tell you that Lafitte has no master, or mistress here. I say again, get to your chamber nor dare dispute my orders."

There was that in the flashing eye of Lafitte, and the curling of his haughty lip, which silenced the proud beauty at once, but it laid the foundation of a new passion, opposed in all its ramifications to the one she heretofore felt for Lafitte, and of which he was soon to feel the effects.

*An imperfect version of the story of Father Nicholas was published in a Philadelphia paper some several years ago.

STANZAS.

Ubi libertas, ibi Patria.

Freedom, high born of heaven! glorious mother

Of a vast progeny, to whom the earth

In heritage descended from each other,

Pure in its purpose as 't was in its birth—

How is thy glorious mission disregarded,

For this boasting man's ascendant day,

When men presume that heaven by earth is guarded,

And strive to darken thy benignant ray.

Were intellect a waste, still, lone and solemn,

Thou 'd'st sit amid the ruins of the mind,

For thou can'st see no relic of its column

Which has not left some monument behind.

And thus the spirit, even in ruin, leaveth,

Where'er we stray, some sun-path, where we see

Some glimpse-ray of the glory which God gaveth

To the broad wings of missioned liberty.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

With this view, she gently opened the drawing-room door, and, glancing around, found that she should be alone. The fire gave the only light. She opened the organ with a sigh, and then sat down before it for some minutes without touching the keys. At length she struck them very gently, as if fearful of disturbing those who, she soon recollected, were too distant to hear her. Ah! how many associations were stirred up as she played over the simple and solemn air! At length, in a low and rather tremulous voice, she began—

"Soon will the evening star, with silver ray,
Shed its mild radiance o'er the sacred day;
Resume we, then, ere night and silence reign,
The rites which holiness and heaven ordain!"

She sung the last line somewhat indistinctly; and, overcome by a flood of tender recollections, ceased playing; then, leaning her head upon her hand, she shed tears. At length she resumed—

"Here humbly let us hope our Maker's smile
Will crown with sweet success our earthly toil—
And here, on each returning Sabbath, join."

Here poor Kate's voice quivered—and, after one or two ineffectual attempts to sing the next line, she sobbed, and ceased playing. She remained for several minutes, her face buried in her handkerchief, shedding tears. At length, "I'll play the last verse," thought she, "and then sit down before the fire, and read over the evening service, (feeling for her little prayer-book,) before I return to poor mamma." With a firmer hand and voice she proceeded—

"Father of Heaven! in whom our hopes confide,
Whose power defends us, and whose precepts guide—
In life our guardian, and in death our friend,
Glory supreme be thine, till time shall end!"

She played and sung these lines with a kind of solemn energy; and she felt as if a ray of heavenly light had trembled for a moment upon her upturned eye. She had not been, as she had supposed, alone; in the farthest corner of the room had been all the while sitting her brother—too exquisitely touched by the simplicity and goodness of his sweet sister, to apprise her of his presence. Several times his feelings had nearly overpowered him; and as she concluded, he arose from his chair, and approaching her, after her first surprise was over—"Heaven bless you, dear Kate!" said he, taking her little hands in his own. Neither of them spoke for a few moments.

"I could not have sung a line, or played, if I had known that you were here," said she.

"I thought so, Kate."

"I do n't think I shall ever have heart to play again."

"Be assured, Kate, that submission to the will of God," said Mr. Aubrey, as, he with his arm round his sister, they walked slowly to and fro, "is the great lesson to be learned from the troubles of life; and for that purpose they are sent. Let us bear up awhile; the waters will not go over our heads!"

"I hope not," replied his sister, faintly, and in tears.

"How did you leave Agnes, Charles?"

"She was asleep: she is still very feeble."—Here the door was suddenly opened, and Miss Aubrey's maid entered hastily, exclaiming, "Are you here, ma'am?—or sir?"

"Here we are," they replied, hurrying towards her; "what is the matter?"

"Oh, madam is talking! She began speaking all of a sudden. She did indeed, sir. She's talking, and"—continued the girl, almost breathless.

"My mother talking!" exclaimed Aubrey, with an amazed air.

"Oh yes, sir! she is—she is, indeed!"

Miss Aubrey sunk into her brother's arms, overcome for a moment with the sudden and surprising intelligence.

"Rouse yourself, Kate!" he exclaimed with animation; "Did I not tell you that Heaven would not forget us? But I must hasten up stairs, to hear the joyful sounds with my own ears—and do you follow as soon as you can."

Leaving her in the care of her maid, he hastened out of the room up stairs, and was soon at the door of his mother's chamber. He stood for a moment in the doorway, and his straining ears caught the gentle tones of his mother's voice, speaking in a low but cheerful tone. His knees trembled beneath him with joyful excitement. Fearful of trusting himself in her presence till he had become calmer, he noiselessly sunk on the nearest chair, with beating heart and straining ear—ay, every tone of that dear voice thrilled through his heart. But I shall not torture my own or my reader's heart by dwelling upon the scene that ensued.—Alas! the venerable sufferer's tongue was indeed loosed; but reason had fled! He listened—he distinguished her words. She supposed that all her children—dead and alive—were romping about her; she spoke of him and his sister as she had spoken to them twenty years ago.

As soon as he had made this sad discovery, overwhelmed with grief he staggered out of the room; and motioning his sister, who was entering, into an adjoining apartment, communicated to her the mournful condition of her mother.

The chief corner stone suddenly found wanting in the glittering fabric of Mr. Timmouse's fortune, so that to the eyes of its startled architects, Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, it seemed momentarily threatening to tumble about their ears, was a certain piece of evidence, which, being a matter-of-fact man, I should like to explain to the reader before we get on any further. In order, however, to do this effectually, I must go back to an earlier period in the history than has been yet called to his attention. If it shall have been unfortunate enough to attract the hasty eye of the superficial and impatient novel reader, I make no doubt that by such a one certain portions of what has gone before, and which could not fail of attracting the attention of long-headed people, as being not thrown in for nothing, (and therefore to be borne in mind with a view to subsequent explanation,) have been entirely overlooked or forgotten.

gotten. Now, I can fancy that the sort of reader whom I have in my eye, as one whose curiosity it is worth some pains to excite and sustain, has more than once asked himself the following question, viz:

How did Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, first come to be acquainted with the precarious tenure by which Mr. Aubrey held the Yatton property? Why, it chanced in this wise.

Mr. Parkinson of Grilston, who has been already introduced to the reader, succeeded to his late father, in one of the most respectable practices, as a country attorney and solicitor in Yorkshire. He was a highly honorable, painstaking man, and deservedly enjoyed the entire confidence of all his numerous and influential clients. Some twelve years before the period at which this history commences, Mr. Parkinson, who was a very kind-hearted nian, had taken into his service an orphan boy of the name of Steggars, at first merely as a sort of errand boy, and to look after the office. He soon, however, displayed so much sharpness, and acquitted himself so creditably in any thing that he happened to be concerned in, a little above the run of his ordinary duties, that in the course of a year or two he became a sort of clerk, and sat and wrote at the desk it had formerly been his sole province to dust. Higher and higher did he rise, in process of time, in his master's estimation; and at length became quite a factotum—as such, acquainted with the whole course of business that passed through the office. Many interesting matters connected with the circumstances and connections of the neighboring nobility and gentry were thus constantly brought under his notice, and now and then set him thinking whether the knowledge thus acquired could not, in some way, and at some time or another, be turned to his own advantage; for I am sorry to say that he was utterly unworthy of the kindness and confidence of Mr. Parkinson, who little thought that in Steggars he had to deal with a rogue in grain. Such being his character, and such his opportunities, this worthy made a practice of minuting down, from time to time, any thing of interest or importance in the affairs which thus came under his notice—even laboriously copying long documents, when he thought them of importance enough for his purpose, and had the opportunity of doing so without attracting the attention of Mr. Parkinson. He thus silently acquired a mass of information which might have enabled him to occasion great annoyance, and even inflict serious injury; and the precise object he had in view, was either to force himself, hereafter, into partnership with his employer, (provided he could get regularly introduced into the profession,) or even compel his master's clients to receive him into their confidence, adversely to Mr. Parkinson, making it worth his while to keep the secrets of which he had become possessed. So careful ought to be, and indeed generally are, attorneys and solicitors, as to the characters of those whom they thus receive into their employ. On the occasion of Mr. Aubrey's intended marriage with Miss St. Clair, with a view to the very liberal settlements which he contemplated, a full abstract of his title was laid by Mr. Parkinson before his conveyancer, in order to advise and prepare the necessary instruments. Owing to inquiries suggested by the conveyancer additional statements were laid before him; and produced an opinion of a somewhat unsatisfactory description, from which I shall lay before the reader the following paragraph:

"There seems no reason for supposing that any descendant of Stephen Dreddington is now in existence: still, as it is by no means physically impossible that such a person may be in esse, it would no doubt be important to the security of Mr. Aubrey's title, to establish clearly the validity of the conveyance by way of mortgage, executed by Henry Dreddington, and which was afterwards assigned to Geoffrey Dreddington on his paying off the money borrowed by his deceased uncle; since the descent of Mr. Aubrey from Geoffrey Dreddington would, in that event, clothe him with an indefeasible title at law, by virtue of that deed; and any equitable rights which were originally outstanding, would be barred by lapse of time. But the difficulty occurring to my mind on this part of the case is, that unless Harry Dreddington, who executed that deed of mortgage, survived his father, (a point on which I have no information,) the deed itself would have been mere waste parchment, as the conveyance of a person who never had any interest in the Yatton property—and, of course, neither Geoffrey Dreddington, nor his descendant Mr. Aubrey, could derive any right whatever under such an instrument. In that case, such a contingency as I have above hinted at—I mean the existence of any legitimate descendant of Stephen Dreddington—might have a most serious effect upon the rights of Mr. Aubrey.

Every line of this opinion, and also even of the Abstract of Title upon which it was written, did this quick-sighted young scoundrel copy out, and deposit, as a great prize, in his desk, among other similar notes and memoranda, little wotting his master the while of what he was doing. Some year or two afterward, the relationship subsisting between Mr. Parkinson and his clerk Steggars, was suddenly determined by a somewhat untoward event, viz: by the latter's decamping with the sum of £700 sterling, being the amount of money due in a mortgage which he had been sent to receive from a client of Mr. Parkinson's. Steggars fled for it—but first having bethought himself of the documents to which I have been alluding, and which he carried with him to London. Hot pursuit was made after the unfortunate delinquent, who was taken into custody two or three days after his arrival in town, while he was walking about the streets, with the whole of the sum which he had embezzled, minus a few pounds, upon his person, in bank notes. He quickly found his way into Newgate. His natural sagacity assured him that his case was rather an ugly one; but he hoped not desert him.

"Well, my kiddy," said the grim-visaged, grey-headed turnkey, as soon as he had ushered Steggars into his snug little quarters: "here you are, you see—is n't you?"

"I think I am," replied Steggars, with a sigh.

"Well—and if you want to have a chance of not going across the water till you are many years older, you'll get yourself defended, and the sooner the better, d'ye see.—There's Quirk, Gammon and Snap—my eyes! how they do thin our place, to be sure! The only thing's to get 'em soon; 'cause, ye see, they're so run after. Shall I send them to you?"

Steggars answered eagerly in the affirmative. In order to account for this spontaneous good-nature on the part of Grasp, (the turnkey in question,) I must explain that old Mr. Quirk had for years secured a large criminal practice, by having in his interest most of the officers attached to the police offices and Newgate, to whom he gave, in fact, systematic gratuities, in order to get their recommendations to the persecuted individuals who came into their power.—Very shortly after Grasp's messenger had reached Saffron Hill, with the intelligence that "there was something new in the trap," old Quirk bustled down to Newgate, and was introduced to Steggars, with whom he was closeted for some time. He took a lively interest in his new companion, whose narrative of his flight and capture he listened to in a very kind and sympathising way, and promised to do for him whatever his little skill and experience could do. He hinted, however, that, as Mr. Steggars must be aware, a little ready money would be required, in order to fee counsel—whereat Steggars looked very dismal indeed, and knowing the state of his exchequer, imagined himself already on shipboard, on his way to Botany Bay. Old Mr. Quirk asked him if he had no friends who would raise a trifle for a "chum in trouble;" and on answering in the negative, he observed the enthusiasm of the respectable old gentleman visibly and rapidly cooling down.

"But I'll tell you what, sir," said poor Steggars, suddenly, "if I have n't money, I may have money's worth at my command; I've a little box, that's at my lodging, which those that got me knew nothing of—and in which there is a trifle or two about the families and fortunes of some of the first folk in Yatton, that would be precious well worth looking after to those that know how to follow up such matters."

Old Quirk hereat pricked up his ears, and asked his young friend how he got possessed of such secrets.

"Oh fie! fie!" said he, gently, as soon as Steggars had told him the practices of which I have already put the reader in possession.

"Ah—you may say fie! fie! if you like," quoth Steggars, earnestly; "but the thing is, not how they were come by, but what can be done with them, now they're got. For example, there's a certain member of parliament in Yorkshire, that, high as he may hold his head, has no more right to the estates that yield him a good ten thousand a year than I have, but keeps some folk out of their own, that could pay some other folk a round sum to be put in the way of getting their own;" and that was only one of the good things he knew of. Here old Quirk rubbed his chin, hemmed, fidgeted about in his seat, took off his glasses, wiped them, replaced them; and presently went through that ceremony again. He then said that he had had the honor of being concerned for a great number of gentlemen in Mr. Steggars's "present embarrassed circumstances," but who had always been able to command at least a five-pound note at starting, to run a heat for liberty.

"Come, come, old gentleman," quoth Steggars, earnestly, "I do n't want to go over the water before my time, if I can help it; and I see you know the value of what I've got! Such a gentleman as you can turn every bit of paper I have in my box into a fifty-pound note."

"All this is moonshine, my young friend," cried old Quirk in an irresolute tone and manner.

"Ah! is it, though? To be able to tell the owner of a fat ten thousand a year, that you can spring a mine under his feet at any moment—eh?—and no one ever know how you came by your knowledge. And if they would n't do what was handsome, couldn't you get at the right heir—and would n't that—Lord! it would make the fortunes of half-a-dozen of the first houses in the profession!" Old Quirk got a little excited.

"But mind, sir—you see," said Steggars, "if I get off, I'm not to be cut out of the thing altogether—eh? I shall look to be taken into your employ, and dealt handsomely by!"

"Oh lord!" exclaimed Quirk, involuntarily—adding quickly—"Yes, yes! to be sure! only fair; but let us first get you out of your present difficulty, you know!" Steggars, having first exacted from him a written promise to use his utmost exertions on his (Steggars's) behalf, and secure him the services of two of the most eminent Old Bailey council, viz: Mr. Bluster and Mr. Slang—gave Mr. Quirk the number of the house where his precious box was, and a written order to the landlord to deliver it up to the bearer; after which Mr. Quirk shook him cordially by the hand, and, having quitted the prison, made his way straight to the house in question, and succeeded in obtaining what he asked for. He faithfully performed his agreement with Steggars; for he retained both Bluster and Slang for him, and got up their briefs with care; but alas! although these eminent men exerted all their great powers, they succeeded not in either bothering the judge, bamboozling the jury, or brow-beating the witnesses, (the principal one of whom was Mr. Parkinson;) Steggars was found guilty, and sentenced to be transported for life. Enraged at this issue, he sent a message the next day to Mr. Quirk, requesting a visit from him. When he arrived, Steggars, in a very violent tone, demanded that his papers should be returned to him. 'Twas in vain that Mr. Quirk explained to him again and again his interesting position with reference to his goods and chattels, and effects, i. e., that, as a convicted felon, he had no further concern with them, and might dismiss all anxiety on that score from his mind. Steggars hereat got more furious than before, and intimated plainly the course he should feel it his duty to pursue—that, if the papers in question were not given up to him as he desired, he should at once write off to his late employer, Mr. Parkinson, and acknowledge how much further he (Steggars) had wronged him and his clients than he supposed of. Old Quirk very feelingly represented to him that he was at liberty to do any thing that he thought calculated to relieve his excited feelings; and then Mr. Quirk took a final farewell of his client, wishing him health and happiness.

"I say, Grasp!" said he, in a whisper, to that grim functionary, as soon as he had secured poor Steggars in his cell, "that bird is a little ruffled just now!"

"Lud, sir, the naturalist thing in the world, considering!"

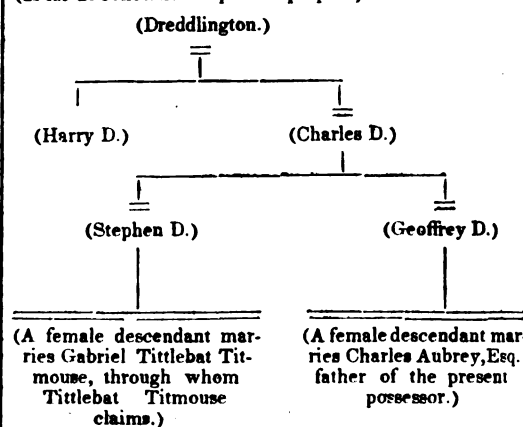

"Well; if he should want a letter taken to any one, whatever he may say to the contrary, you'll send it on to Saffron Hill, eh? Understand? He may be injuring himself, you know;" and old Quirk with one hand clasped the huge arm of Grasp in a familiar way, and with the forefinger of the other touched his own nose, and then winked his eye.

"All right!" quoth Grasp, and they parted. Within a very few hours' time Mr. Quirk received, by the hand of a trusty messenger from Grasp, a letter written by Steggars to Mr. Parkinson; a long and eloquent letter to the purport and effect which Steggars had intimated. Mr. Quirk read it with much satisfaction, for it disclosed a truly penitent feeling, and a desire to undo as much mischief as the writer had done. He (Mr. Quirk) was not in the least exasperated by certain very plain terms in which his own name was mentioned; but, making all due allowance, quietly put the letter into the fire as soon as he had read it. In due time Mr. Steggars, whose health had suffered from close confinement, caught frequent whiffs of the fresh sea-breeze, having set out, under most favorable auspices, for Botany Bay; to which distant but happy place, he had been thus fortunate in securing so early, an appointment for life.

Such, then, were the cruel means by which Mr. Quirk became acquainted with the exact state of Mr. Aubrey's title; on first becoming apprised of which Mr. Gammon either felt, or affected great repugnance to taking any part in the affair. He was at length, however, over-persuaded by Quirk into acquiescence; and, that point gained, worked his materials with a caution, skill, energy, and perseverance, which soon led to important results. Guided by the suggestions of acute and experienced counsel, after much pains and considerable expense, they succeeded in discovering that delectable specimen of humanity, Titlebat Titmouse, who hath already figured so prominently in this history. When they came to set down on paper the result of all their researches and inquiries, in order to submit it in the shape of a case for the opinion of Mr. Mortmain and Mr. Frankpledge, in the manner which has been already described, it looked perfect on paper, as many a faulty pedigree and abstract of title had looked before, and will yet look. It was quite possible for even Mr. Treasyle himself to overlook the defect which had been pointed out by Mr. Subtle. That which is stated to a conveyancer as a fact—any particular event, for instance, as of a death, a birth, or a marriage, at a particular time, which the very nature of the case renders highly probable—he may easily assume to be so. But when the same statement comes under the acute and experienced eye of a visi prius lawyer, who knows that he will have to prove his case, step by step, the aspect of things is soon changed. The first practitioner at the common law before whom the case came, in its roughest and earliest form, in order that he might "lick it into shape," and "advise generally" preparatory to its "being laid before counsel," was Mr. Traverse, a young pleader, whom Messrs. Quirk and Gammon were disposed to take by the hand. He wrote a very showy, but superficial and delusive opinion; and put the intended protege of his clients, as it were by a kind of hop, step, and jump into possession of the Yatton estates. Quirk was quite delighted on reading it; but Gammon shook his head with a somewhat sarcastic smile, and said he would at once prepare a case for the opinion of Mr. Lynx, whom he had pitched upon as the junior counsel in any proceedings which might be instituted in a court of law. Lynx (of whom I shall speak hereafter) was an experienced, hard-headed, vigilant, and accurate lawyer; the very man for such a case, requiring, as it did, most patient and minute examination. With an eye fitted

"To inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven," he crawled, as it were, over a case; and thus, like as one can imagine that a beetle creeping over the floor of St. Paul's would detect minute flaws and fissures that would be invisible to the eye of Sir Christopher Wren himself, spied out defects that much nobler optics would have overlooked. To come to plain matter-of-fact, however, I have beside me the original opinion written by Mr. Lynx; and shall treat the reader to a taste of it—giving him sufficient to enable him to appreciate the ticklish position of affairs with Mr. Titmouse. To make it not altogether unintelligible, let us suppose the state of the pedigree to be something like this (as far as concerns our present purpose):

Be pleased, now, unlearned reader, to bear in mind that "Dreddington," at the top of the above table is the common ancestor; having two sons, the elder "Harry D." the younger "Charles D.," which latter has, in like manner, two sons, "Stephen D." the elder son, and "Geoffrey D." the younger son; that Mr. Aubrey, at present in possession, claims under "Geoffrey D." Now it will be incumbent on Titmouse, in the first instance, to establish in himself a clear independent title to the estates; it being sufficient for Mr. Aubrey, (possession being nineteenth of the law,) to falsify Titmouse's proofs, or show them defective—"because," saith a very learned sergeant, who hath writ a text-book upon the Action of Ejectment, "the plaintiff in an action of ejectment must recover upon the strength of his own title, not the weakness of his adversary's."

Now, things standing thus, behold the astute Lynx advising (inter alia) in manner following: that is to say:

"It appears clear that the lessor of the plaintiff (i. e. Titlebat Titmouse) will be able to prove that Dreddington (the common ancestor) was seized of the estate at Yatton in the year 1740; that he had two sons, Harry and Charles, the former of whom, after a life of dissipation, appears to have died without issue; and that from the latter (Charles) are descended Stephen, the ancestor of the lessor of the plaintiff, and Geoffrey, the ancestor of the defendant. Assuming, therefore, that the descent of the lessor of the plaintiff from Stephen can be made out, as there appears every reason to expect (on this point he had written four brief pages), a clear prima facie case will be established on the part of the lessor of the plaintiff. As, however, it is suspected that Harry D., during his life time, executed a conveyance in fee of the property in order to secure the loan contracted by him from Aaron Moses, it will be extremely important to ascertain, and, if possible, procure satisfactory evidence, that his decease occurred before the period at which, by his father's death, that conveyance could have become operative upon the property: since it is obvious that should he have survived his father, that instrument, being outstanding, may form a complete answer to the case of the lessor of the plaintiff. The danger will be obviously increased, should the debt to Aaron Moses prove to have been paid off, as is stated to be removed, by Geoffrey D., the younger son of Charles D.: for, should that turn out to be the case, he would probably have taken a conveyance to himself, or to trustees for his benefit, from Aaron Moses—which being in the power of the defendant, Mr. Aubrey, would enable him to make out a title to the property, paramount to that now attempted to be set up on behalf of Mr. Titmouse. Every possible exertion, therefore, should be made to ascertain the precise period of the death of Harry D. The registries of the various parishes in which the family may have at any time resided, should be carefully searched, and an examination made in the churches and churchyards, of all tombstones, escutcheons, &c. belonging, or supposed to belong, to the Dreddington family, and by which any light can be thrown upon this most important point. It appears clear that Dreddington (the common ancestor) died on the 7th August, 1742: the question, therefore, simply is, 'whether the death of his eldest son (Harry) took place prior or subsequent to that period.' It is to be feared that the defendant may be in possession of some better evidence on this point than is possessed by the lessor of the plaintiff. The natural presumption certainly seems to be, that the son, being the younger and stronger man, was the survivor."

The above mentioned opinion of Mr. Lynx, together with that of Mr. Subtle, entirely corroborating it, (and which was alluded to in the last part of this history,) and a pedigree, was lying on the table, one day, at the office at Saffron Hill, before the anxious and perplexed parties, Messrs. Quirk and Gammon.

Gammon was looking attentively, and with a very chagrined air, at the pedigree; and Quirk was looking at Gammon.

"Now, Gammon," said the former, "just let me see again where the exact hitch is—eh? Curse me if I can see it."

"See it, my dear sir? here, here!" replied Gammon with sudden impatience, putting his finger two or three times on the words "Harry D."

"Don't be so sharp with one, Gammon! I know as well as you that that's about where the crack is; but what is the precise thing we're in want of, eh?"

"Proof, my dear sir, of the death of Harry Dreddington some time—no matter when—previous to the 7th August, 1742; and in default thereof, Mr. Quirk, we are all flat on our backs, and had better never have stirred in the business."

"You know, Gammon, you're a decided deal better up in these matters than I—(only because I've not been able to turn my attention to 'm lately)—so just tell me, in a word, what good 's to be got by showing that fellow to have died in his father's lifetime?"

"You do n't show your usual acuteness, Mr. Quirk," replied Gammon, blandly. "It is to make waste paper of that conveyance which he executed, and which Mr. Aubrey has, and with which he may, at a stroke, cut the ground from under our feet."

"The very thought makes one feel quite funny—do n't it, Gammon?" quoth Quirk, with a flustered air.

"It may well do so, Mr. Quirk. Now we are fairly embarked in a cause where success will be attended with so many splendid results, Mr. Quirk—though I'm sure you'll always bear me out in saying how very unwilling I was to take advantage of the villany—hem!"

"Gammon, Gammon, you're always harking back to that—I'm tired of hearing on 't."

"Well, now we're in it, I do n't see why we should allow ourselves to be baffled by trifles. The plain question is, undoubtedly, whether we are to stand still, or go on." Mr. Quirk gazed at Mr. Gammon with an anxious and puzzled look.

"How d'ye make out—in a legal way, you know, Gammon—when a man died—I mean, of a natural death?" inquired Quirk, who was familiar enough with the means of proving the exact hour of certain violent deaths at Debtor's Door.

"Oh! there are various methods of doing so, my dear sir," replied Gammon, carelessly. "Entries in family bibles and prayer-books, registers, tombstones—ay, by the way, an old tombstone," continued Gammon musingly, "that would settle the business!"

"An old tombstone!" echoed Quirk, briskly. "Lord, Gammon, so it would! That's an idea—I call that a decided idea, Gammon." "T would be the very thing!"

"The very thing!" repeated Gammon, pointedly. They remained silent for some moments.

"Snap could not have looked about him sharply enough, when he was down at Yatton!" at length observed Quirk, in a low tone, flushing all over as he uttered the last words, and felt Gammon's cold grey eye settled on him like that of a snake.

"He could not, indeed, my dear sir," replied Gammon, while Quirk continued gazing earnestly at him, now and then wriggling about in his chair, rubbing his chin, and drumming with his fingers on the table. "And now that you've suggested the thing, it's not to be wondered at—you know, it would have been an old tombstone—a sort of fragment of a tombstone, perhaps—so deeply sunk in the ground, probably, as easily to have escaped observation, eh? Does not it strike you so, Mr. Quirk?" All this was said by Gammon in a musing manner, and in a very low tone of voice; and he was delighted to find his words sinking into the eager mind of his companion.

"Ah, Gammon!" exclaimed Quirk, with a sound of partly a sigh, and partly a whistle, (the former being the exponent of the true state of his feelings, i. e. anxiety—the latter of what he wished to appear the state of his feelings, i. e. indifference.)

"Yes, Mr. Quirk?"

"You're a deep devil, Gammon—I will say that for you!" replied Quirk, glancing towards each door, and, as it were, unconsciously drawing his chair a little closer to that of Gammon.

"Nay, my dear sir!" said Gammon, with a deferential and deprecating smile, "you give me credit for an acuteness I feel I do not deserve! If, indeed, I had not had your sagacity to rely upon, ever since I have had the honor of being connected with you—ah, Mr. Quirk, you know you lead—I follow!"

"Gammon, Gammon! Come—your name's Oily!"

"In moments like these, Mr. Quirk, I say nothing that I do not feel," interrupted Gammon, gravely, putting to his nose the least modicum of snuff which he could take with the tip of his finger out of the huge box of Mr. Quirk, who, just then, was thrusting immense pinches every half minute up his nostrils.

"It will cost a great deal of money to find that same tombstone, Gammon!" said Quirk, in almost a whisper, and paused, looking intently at Gammon.

"I think this a different kind of snuff from that which you usually take, Mr. Quirk, is n't it?" inquired Gammon, as he inserted the tips of his fingers into the box.

"The same—the same," replied Quirk, mechanically.

"You are a man better equal to serious emergencies than any man I ever came near," said Gammon; "I perceive that you have hit the nail on the head, as indeed you always do."

"Tut! Stuff, Gammon; you're every bit as good a hand as I am." Gammon smiled, shook his head, and shrugged his shoulders.

"T is that practical sagacity of yours," said Gammon; "you know it as well as I can tell you, that has raised you to your present professional eminence." He paused, and looked very sincerely at his senior partner.

"Well, I must own I think I do know a trick or two."

"Ah, and farther, there are some clever men that can never keep their own counsel; but like a hen that has just laid an egg, and then goes foolishly cackling about every where, and then her egg is taken away."

"Ha, ha!" laughed Quirk; "that's devilish good, Gammon!—Capital! Gad, I think I see the hen! Ha, ha!"

"Ha, ha!" echoed Gammon, gently. "But to be serious, Mr. Quirk; what I was going to say was, that I thoroughly appreciate your admirable caution in not confiding to any one—even to me—the exact means by which you intend to extricate us from our present dilemma." Here Quirk got very fidgety.

"Hem! But—hem! Ay—a—," he grunted, looking with an uneasy air at his calm astute companion; "I did n't mean to say so much as all that, either, Gammon; for two heads, in my opinion, are better than one. You must own that, Gammon!" said he, not at all relishing the heavy burden of responsibility which he felt that Gammon was about to devolve upon his (Quirk's) shoulders, exclusively.

"T is undoubtedly rather a serious business on which we are now entering," said Gammon; "and I have always admired a saying which you years ago told me of that great man Machiavel!"

[Oh, Gammon! Gammon! You well knew that poor old Mr. Quirk never heard of the name of that same Machiavel till this moment!]

"That 'when great affairs are stirring, a master-move should be confined to the master-mind that projects it.' I understand! I see! I will not, therefore, inquire into the precise means by which you will make it appear, in due time, (while I am engaged getting up the subordinate, but very harassing details of the general case,) that Henry Dreddington died before the 7th of August, 1742." Here, taking out his watch—"Bless me—two o'clock! I ought to have been at Messrs. Gregson's a quarter of an hour ago."

"Stop—a moment or two can't signify! It—it," said Quirk, hesitatingly, "it was you, was n't it, that thought of the tombstone."

"I! Mr. dear Mr. Quirk," interrupted Gammon, with a look of astonishment.

"Come, come—honor among thieves, you know, Gammon!" said Quirk, trying to laugh.

"No—it shall never be said that I attempted to take the credit of—" said Gammon; when a clerk, entering, put an end to the colloquy between the partners, each of whom, presently, was sitting alone in his room, for Gammon found that he was too late to think of keeping his engagement with Messrs. Gregson; if indeed he had ever made any, which he had not. Mr. Quirk sat in a musing posture for nearly half an hour after he and Gammon had separated. "Gammon is a deep one! I'll be shot if there ever was his equal," said Quirk to himself, at length; and starting off his chair, with his hands crossed behind him, he walked softly to and fro. "I know what he's driving at—though he thought I did n't! He'd let me scratch my hands in getting the blackberries, and then he'd come smiling in to eat 'em! But—share and share alike—share profit, share danger, Master Gammon; you may find that Caleb Quirk is a match for Oily Gammon—I'll have you in for it, one way or another!"

Here occurred a long pause in his thoughts. "Really I doubt the thing's growing unmanageable—the prize can't be worth the risk! Risk indeed, 'fore Gad—'t is neither more nor less than—" Here a certain picture hanging, covered with black crape, in the drawing room at Alibi House, seemed to have glided down from its station, and to stand before his eyes with the crape drawn aside—a ghastly object—ugh! He shuddered, and involuntarily closed his eyes. "Devilish odd that I should just now have happened to think of it!" he inwardly exclaimed, sinking into his chair in a sort of cold sweat.

"D—n the picture!" at length he exclaimed almost aloud, getting more and more flustered, "I'll burn it. It shan't disgrace my drawing-room any longer!" Here Quirk almost fancied that some busy little fiend sat squatting before the grisly picture, writing the words "CALEB QUIRK" at the bottom of it; and a sort of sickness came over him for a moment. Presently he started up, and took down one of several well-worn dingy-looking books that stood on the shelves—a volume of Burns' Justice. Resuming his seat, he put on his glasses, and with a little trepidation turned to the head "Forgery," and glanced over it. At length his eye hit on a paragraph that seemed suddenly to draw his heart up into his throat; producing a sensation that made him involuntarily clap his hand upon his neck.

"Oh, Gammon!" he muttered, drawing off his glasses, sinking back in his chair, and looking toward the door that opened into Gammon's room; in which direction he extended his right arm, and shook his fist. "You precious villain! I've an uncommon inclination," at length thought he, "to go down to Yorkshire—say nothing to any body—make peace with the enemy, and knock up the whole thing!—For a couple of thousand pounds—a trifle to the Aubreys, I'm sure. Were I in his place, I should n't grudge it; and why should he?—By Jove," he got a little heated, "that would be, as Gammon has it, a master-move! and confined, egad! to the master-mind that thought of it! Why should he ever know of the why in which the thing blew up? Really 't would be worth half the money to do Gammon so hollow for once—by George it would—Gammon, that would slip Caleb Quirk's neck so slyly into the halter, indeed!"

"I'll tell you what, Mr. Quirk," said Gammon, suddenly re-entering the room after half an hour's absence, during which he too had, like his senior partner, revolved many things in his mind, "it has occurred to me, that I had better immediately go down to Yatton, alone."

Hereat Mr. Quirk opened both his eyes and his mouth to their very widest; got very red in the face; and stared at his placid partner with a mingled expression of fear and wonder. "Hang me, Gammon!" at length he exclaimed, desperately, slapping his fist upon the table, "if I do n't think you're the very devil himself!" and he sunk back in his chair, verily believing, in the momentary confusion of his thoughts, that what had been passing through his mind was known to Gammon; or that what had been passing through his (Quirk's) mind, had also been occurring to Gammon, who had resolved upon being beforehand in putting his purposes into execution. Gammon was at first completely confounded by Quirk's reception of him, and stood for a few moments, with his hands elevated, in silence. Then he approached the table, and his eye caught the well-thumbed volume of Burns' Justice, open at the head "FORGERY!" and the quick-sighted Gammon saw how matters stood at a glance—the process by which the result he had just witnessed had been arrived at.

"Well, Mr. Quirk, what new vagary, now?" he inquired, with an air of smiling curiosity.

"Vagary be —!" growled old Quirk, sullenly, without moving in his chair.

Gammon stood for a moment or two eyeing him with a keen scrutiny.

"What!" at length he inquired, good-humoredly, "do you then really grudge me any share in the little enterprise?"

"Eh?" quickly interrupted Quirk, pricking up his ears, "Do you intend to play Machiavel? eh?"

"What must you go down alone to Yatton for, Gammon?" inquired Quirk, anxiously.

"Why, simply as a sort of pioneer—to reconnoitre the churchyard—eh? I thought it might have been of service, but if—"

"Gammon, Gammon, your hand! I understand," replied Quirk, evidently vastly relieved, most cordially shaking the cold hand of Gammon.

"But understand, Mr. Quirk," said he, in a very peremptory manner, "no one upon earth is to know of my visit to Yatton except yourself."

He received a solemn pledge to that effect; and presently the partners separated, a little better satisfied with each other. Though not a word passed between them for several days afterward on the topic chiefly discussed during the interview above described, the reader may easily imagine that neither of them dropped it from his thoughts. Mr. Quirk paid one or two visits to the neighborhood of Houndsditch, (a perfect hot bed of clients,) where resided two or three gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion, who had been placed, from time to time, under considerable obligations by the firm of Quirk, Gammon and Snap, in respect of professional services rendered both to themselves and to their friends. One of them, in particular, had a painful consciousness that it was in old Mr. Quirk's power at any time, by a whisper, to place his—the aforesaid Israelite's—neck in an unsightly noose that every now and then might be seen dangling from a beam opposite Debtor's Door, Newgate, about eight o'clock in the morning; him, therefore, every consideration of interest and of gratitude combined to render subservient to the reasonable wishes of Mr. Quirk. He was a most ingenious little fellow, and had a great taste for the imitative arts—so strong a taste in fact, that it had once or twice placed him in some jeopardy with the Goths and Vandals of the law, who characterized the noble art in which he excelled by a very ugly and formidable word, and annexed the most barbarous penalties to its practice. What passed between him and old Quirk on the occasion of their interviews, I know not; but one afternoon the latter, on returning to his office, without saying any thing to any body, having bolted the door, took out of his pocket several little pieces of paper, containing pretty little picturesquedevices of a fragmentary character, with antique letters and figures on them, crumbled pieces of stone, some looking more and some less sunk in the ground, and overgrown with grass; possibly they were designs for ornaments to be added to that tasteful structure, Alibi House—possibly intended to grace Miss Quirk's album. However this might be, after he had looked at them and carefully compared them one with another for some time, he folded them up in a sheet of paper, sealed it up—with certainly not the steadiest hand in the world—and then deposited it in an iron safe.

Yatton, the recovery of which was the object of these secret and formidable movements and preparations, not to say machinations, was all this while the scene of deep affliction. The lamentable condition of his mother plunged Mr. Aubrey, his wife and sister, into profound grief than had been occasioned by the calamity which menaced them all in common. Had he been alone, he would have encountered the sudden storm of adversity with unshrinking, nay cheerful firmness; but could it be so, when he had ever before him those whose ruin was involved in his own?—Poor Mrs. Aubrey, his wife, having been two or three weeks confined to her bed, during which time certain fond hopes of the husband had been blighted, was almost overpowered, when, languid and feeble, supported by Mr. Aubrey and Kate, she first entered the bedroom of the venerable sufferer. What a difference, indeed, was there between the appearance of all of them at that moment, and on the Christmas day when, a happy group, they were cheerfully enjoying the festivities of the season! Kate was now pale, and somewhat thinner; her beautiful features exhibited a careworn expression; yet there was a serene lustre in her blue eye, and a composed resolution in her air, which bespoke the superiority of her soul. What it had cost her to bear with any semblance of self-possession, or fortitude, the sad spectacle now presented by her mother! What a tender and vigilant nurse was she, to one who could no longer be sensible of, or appreciate, her intentions! How that sweet girl humoured all her mother's little eccentricities and occasional excitement, and accommodated herself to every varying phasis of her mental malady! She had so schooled her sensibilities and feelings as to be able to maintain perfect cheerfulness and composure in her mother's presence, on occasions which forced her brother, and his shaken wife, to turn aside with an eye of agony—overcome by some touching speech or wayward action of the unconscious sufferer, who constantly imagined herself, poor soul! to be living over again her early married life; and that in her little grandchildren she beheld Mr. Aubrey and Kate as in their childhood! She would gently chide Mr. Aubrey, her husband, for his prolonged absence, asking many times a day whether he had returned from London. Every morning old Jacob Jones was shown into her chamber, at the hour at which he had been accustomed, in happier days to attend upon her. The faithful old man's eyes would be blinded with tears, and his voice choked, as he was asked how Peggy got over her yesterday's journey; and listened to questions, messages, and directions, which had been familiar to him twenty years before about villagers and tenants who had long lain mouldering in their humble graves—their way thither cheered and smoothed by her Christian charity and benevolence! 'Twas a touching sight to see her two beautiful grand-children, in whose company she delighted, brought, with a timorous and half-reluctant air, into her presence. How strange must have seemed to them the gaiety of the motionless figure always lying in the bed; a gaiety which though gentle as gentle could be, yet sufficed not to assure the little things, or set them at their ease. Though her mild features ever smiled upon them, and her voice was cheerful, still, 'twas from a prostrate figure that never moved, and was always surrounded by calm, quiet figures, with sorrowful constraint in their countenances and gestures! Charles would stand watching her, with apprehensive eye—the finger of one hand raised to his lip, while the other retained the hand that had brought him in, as if fearful of its quitting hold of him; the few words he could be brought to speak were in a subdued tone and hurried utterance;—and when having been lifted up to kiss his grandmother, he and his sisters were taken out of the chamber, their little breasts would heave a sigh which showed how relieved they were from their recent constraint.

How wofully changed was every thing in the once cheerful old hall! Mr. Aubrey sitting in the library, intently engaged upon books and papers—Mrs. Aubrey and Kate now and then arm in arm, walking slowly up and down the galleries, or one of the rooms, or the hall, not with their former sprightly gaiety, but pensive, and often in tears, and then returning to the chamber of their suffering parent.—All this was sad work, indeed, and seemed, as it were, to herald in coming desolation!

But little variation occurred, for several weeks, in the condition of Mrs. Aubrey, except that she grew visibly feeble. One morning, however, about six weeks after her seizure, from certain symptoms the medical men intimated their opinion that some important change was on the eve of taking place, for which they prepared the family. She had been very restless during the night. After frequent intervals of uneasy sleep, she would awake with evident surprise and bewilderment. Sometimes a peculiar smile would flit over her emaciated features; at others, they would be overcast with gloom, and she would seem struggling to suppress tears. Her voice, too, when she spoke, was feeble and tremulous; and she would sigh, and shake her head mournfully. Old Jacob Jones, not being introduced at the accustomed hour, she asked for him. When he made his appearance, she gazed at him for a moment or two, with a puzzled eye, exclaiming, "Jacob! Jacob! is it you?" in a very low tone; and then she closed her eyes, apparently falling asleep. Thus passed the day; her daughter and daughter-in-law sitting on either side the bed, where they had so long kept their anxious and affectionate vigils—Mr. Aubrey sitting at the foot of the bed—and Dr. Goddard and Mr. Whateley in frequent attendance. Towards the evening, Dr. Tatham also, as had been his daily custom through her illness, appeared, and in a low tone read over the service for the visitation of the sick. Shortly afterwards Mr. Aubrey was obliged to quit the chamber, in order to attend to some very pressing matters of business; and he had been engaged for nearly an hour, intending almost every moment to return to his mother's chamber, when Dr. Tatham entered, as Mr. Aubrey was subscribing his name to a letter, and, with a little earnestness, said—"Come, my friend, let us return to your mother; methinks she is on the eve of some decisive change: the issue is with God." Within a few moments they were both at the bedside of Mrs. Aubrey. A large chamber-lamp, standing on a table at a little distance from the bed, diffused a soft light over the room, rendering visible at a glance the silent and sad group collected round the bed, all with their eyes directed towards the venerable figure who lay upon it. Mr. Aubrey sat beside his wife, close to his mother; and taking her thin, emaciated hand into his own, gently raised it to his lips. She seemed dozing; but his action appeared to rouse her for a moment. Presently she fixed her eye upon him,—its expression, the while, slowly but perceptibly changing, and exciting strange feelings within him. He trembled, and removed not his eye from hers. He turned very pale—for the whole expression of his mother's countenance, which was turned full towards him, was changing. Through the clouded window of the falling fabric, behold! its long-imprisoned tenant, THE SOUL, had arisen from its torpor, and was looking at him. Reason was re-appearing. It was indeed, his mother, and in her right mind, that was gazing at him. His scarcely breathed. At length surprise and apprehension yielded before a gush of tenderness and love. With what an unutterable look was his mother at that moment regarding him! His lip quivered—his eye overflowed—and, as he felt her fingers very gently compressing his own, his tears fell down. Gently leaning forward, he kissed her cheek, and sunk on one knee beside the bed.

"Is it you, my son?" said she, in a very low tone, but in her own voice, and it stirred up instantly a thousand fond recollections almost overpowering him. He kissed her hand with great energy but spoke not. She continued gazing at him with mingled solemnity and fondness. Her eye seemed brightening as it remained fixed upon him.—

Again she spoke, in a very low, but clear voice—every thrilling word being heard by every one around her—"Or ever the silver cord be loosened, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern,—Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." It would be in vain to attempt to describe the manner in which these words were spoken; and which fell upon those who heard them as though they were listening to one from the dead.

"My mother!—my mother!" at length faltered Aubrey. "God bless thee, my son!" said she solemnly. And Catharine, my daughter, God bless thee"—she presently added, gently turning round her head towards the quarter whence a stifled sob issued from Miss Aubrey, who rose, trembling, and, leaning over, kissed her mother. "Agnes, are you here—and your little ones?—God bless"—Her voice got fainter, and her eyes closed. Mr. Whateley gave her a few drops of ether, and she presently revived.

"God hath been very good to you, madam," said Dr. Tatham, observing her eye fixed upon him, "to restore you thus to your children."

"I have been long absent—long!—I wake, my children, but to bid you farewell, for ever, upon earth."

"Say not so, my mother—my precious mother!" exclaimed her son, in vain endeavoring to suppress his emotions.

"I do, my son! Weep not for me; I am old, and am summoned away from among you." She ceased, as if from exhaustion; and no one spoke for some minutes.

"It may be that God hath roused me, as it were, from the dead, to comfort my sorrowful children with words of hope," said Mrs. Aubrey, with much more power and distinctness than before. "Hope ye then in God; for ye shall yet praise him who is the health of your countenance, and your God!"

"We will remember, my mother, your words!" faltered her son.

"Yes, my son—if days of darkness be at hand"—She ceased. Again Mr. Whateley placed to her white lips a glass with some reviving fluid—looking ominously at Mr. Aubrey, as he found that she continued insensible. Miss Aubrey sobbed audibly; indeed all present were powerfully affected. Again Mrs. Aubrey revived, and swallowed a few drops of wine and water. A heavenly serenity diffused itself over her emaciated features.

"We shall meet again, my loves! I can no longer see you with the eyes of"—Mr. Whateley observing a sudden change, came nearer to her.

"Peace! peace!" she murmured, almost inarticulately. A dead silence ensued, interrupted only by smothered sobs. Her children sunk on their knees, and buried their faces in their hands, trembling.

Mr. Whateley made a silent signal to Dr. Tatham, that life had ceased—that the beloved spirit had passed away.

"The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord!" said Dr. Tatham, with tremulous solemnity. Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey, no longer able to restrain their feelings, wept bitterly; and overpowered with grief, were supported out of the room by Dr. Tatham and Mr. Aubrey. As soon as it was known that the venerable mother of Mr. Aubrey was no more, universal reverence was testified for her memory, and sympathy for the afflicted survivors, by even those, high and low, in the remotest parts of the neighborhood, who had no personal acquaintance with the family. Two or three days afterwards, Mr. Plume the undertaker, who had received orders from Mr. Aubrey to provide a simple and unexpensive funeral, submitted to him a list of more than thirty names of the nobility and gentry of the country, who had sent to him to know whether it would be agreeable to the family for them to be allowed to attend Mrs. Aubrey's remains to the grave. After much consideration, Mr. Aubrey accepted the spontaneous tribute of respect to the memory of his mother. 'Twas a memorable and melancholy day on which the interment took place—one never to be forgotten at Yatton. What can be more chilling than the gloomy bustle of a great funeral, especially in the country? and when the deceased is one whose memory is enshrined in the holiest feelings of all who knew her? What person was there, for miles around, who could not speak of the courtesies, the charities, the goodness of Madam Aubrey?

"When the ear heard her, then it blessed her; and when the eye saw her, it gave witness to her:

"Because she delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.

"The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon her, and she caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.

"She was eyes to the blind, and feet was she to the lame.

"She was a mother to the poor."

Pale as death, the chief mourner, wrapped in his black cloak, is stepping into the mourning-coach. No one speaks to him; his face is buried in his handkerchief; his heart seems breaking. He thinks of her whose dear dust is before him; then of the beloved beings whom he has left alone in their agony till his return—his wife and sister. The procession is moving slowly on—long, silent rows of the tenantry and villagers, old and young, male and female—not a dry eye among them, not a syllable spoken—stand on each side of the way; no sound heard but of horses' feet, and wheels crushing along the wet gravel—for the day was most gloomy and inclement. As they quit the gates, carriage after carriage followed in the rear; and the sorrowful crowd increases around him. Many have in the hands the Bibles and prayer-books which had been given them by her who now lies in yonder hearse; and few can recollect the day when the late lord of Yatton led her along from the church to the hall, his young and blooming bride, in pride and joy—and they are now going to lay her beside him again. They enter the little churchyard, and are met by good Dr. Tatham, in his surplice, bareheaded, and with book in hand; with full eye and quivering lip he slowly precedes the body into the church. His voice frequently trembles, and sometimes he pauses, while reading the service. Now they are standing bareheaded at the vault's mouth—the last sad rites are being performed; and probably, as is thinking the chief mourner, over the last of his race in that tomb!

Long after the solemn ceremony was over, the little churchyard remained filled with mournful groups of villagers and tenants, who pressed forward to the dark mouth of the vault, to take their last look of the coffin which contained the remains of her whose memory would live long in all their hearts. "Ah, dear old madam," quoth Jonas Higgs to himself, as he finished his dreary day's labor, by temporarily closing up the mouth of the vault, "they might have turned thee by-and-by, out of yonder hall, but they shall not touch thee here!"

Thus died, and was buried, Madam Aubrey; and she is not yet forgotten.

How desolate seemed the hall, the next morning, when, dressed in deep mourning, they met at the cheerless breakfast table! Aubrey kissed his wife and sister—who could hardly answer his brief inquiries. The gloom occasioned through out the hall, for the last ten days, by the blinds being constantly drawn down, now that they were drawn up, had given way to a staring light and distinctness, that almost startled and offended the eyes of those whose hearts were dark with sorrow as ever. Every object reminded them of the absence of one—whose chair stood empty in its accustomed place. There, also, was her Bible, on the little round table near the window. The mourners seemed relieved by the entrance, by-and-by, of the children: but they also were in mourning! Let us, however, withdraw from the scene of suffering, where every object, every recollection, every association, causes the wounded heart to bleed afresh.

Great troubles seemed coming upon them; and now that they have buried their dead out of their sight, and when time shall begin to pour his balm into their present smarting wounds, doubt not that they will look those troubles in the face, calmly and with fortitude, not forgetful of the last words of her for whom they now mourn so bitterly, and whom, beloved and venerable being! God hath mercifully taken away from the evil days that are to come.

After much and anxious consideration, they resolved to go, on the ensuing Sunday morning, to church, where neither Mrs. Aubrey nor Kate had been since the illness of her mother. The little church was crowded; almost every one present, beside wearing a saddened countenance, exhibited some outward mark of respect, in their dress—some badge of mourning—such as their little means admitted of. The pulpit and reading-desk were hung in black, as also was Mr. Aubrey's pew—an object of deep interest to the congregation, who expected to see, at least, some member of the family at the Hall. They were not disappointed. A little before Dr. Tatham took his place in the reading-desk, the well-known sound of the family carriage wheels were heard, as it drew up before the gate, and presently Mr. Aubrey appeared at the church door, with his wife and sister on either arm; all of them, of course, in the deepest mourning. Mrs. and Miss Aubrey's countenances concealed beneath their long crape veils. For some time after taking their seats, they seemed oppressed with emotion, evidently weeping. Mr. Aubrey, however, exhibited great composure, though his countenance bore the traces of the suffering he had undergone. Mrs. Aubrey seldom rose from her seat; but Kate stood up, from time to time, with the rest of the congregation; her white handkerchief, however, might be seen frequently raised to her eyes, beneath her black veil; and thus, for a few minutes, exhibited a countenance inexpressibly beautiful. She could not, however, long bear to face a congregation, every one of whom she felt to be looking on her, and those beside her, with affectionate sympathy; and rather quickly drew her veil again over her face, without again removing it. There was one person present, on whom the brief glimpse of her beauty had produced a prodigious impression. As he gazed at her, the color gradually deserted his cheek; and his eye remained fixed upon her, even after she had drawn down her veil. He experienced emotions such as he had never known before. So that was Miss Aubrey!

Gammon—for he it was, and he had gone thither under the expectation of seeing, for the first time, some of the Aubrey family—generally passed for a cold-blooded person; and in fact few men living had more control over their feeling, or more systematically checked any manifestations of them; but there was something in the person and circumstances of Miss Aubrey—for by a hurried inquiry of the person next to him he learned that it was she—which excited new feeling in him. Her slightest motion his eye watched with intense eagerness; and faint half-formed schemes, purposes, and hopes, passed in rapid confusion through his mind, as he foresaw that circumstances would hereafter arise by means of which—

"Good God! how very—very beautiful she is!" said he to himself, as, the service over, her graceful figure, following her brother and his wife with slow, sad step, approached the pew in which he was standing, on her way to the door. He felt a sort of cold shudder, as her black dress rustled past, actually touching him. What was he doing and meditating against that lovely being? And for whom—disgusting reptile!—for Titmouse? He almost blushed with a conflict of emotions, as he followed almost immediately after Miss Aubrey, never losing sight of her till her brother, having handed her into the carriage, got in after her, and they drove off towards the Hall. The reader will not be at a loss to account for the presence of Gammon on this occasion, nor to connect it with a great trial at the approaching York assizes. As he walked back to Griston to his solitary dinner, he was lost in thought; and on arriving at the inn, repaired at once to his room, where he found a copy of the Sunday Flash, which had, according to orders, been sent to him from town, under his assumed name—"Gibson." He ate but little, and that mechanically; and seemed to feel, for once, little or no interest in his newspaper. He had never paid the least attention to the eulogia upon Miss Aubrey of the little idiot Titmouse, nor of Snap, of whom he entertained but a very little higher opinion than that of Titmouse. One thing was clear, that from that moment, Miss Aubrey formed a new element in Gammon's calculations; and, for aught I know, may occasion very different results from these originally contemplated by that calm and crafty person.

As it proved a moonlight night, he resolved at once to set about the important business which had brought him into Yorkshire; and for that purpose set off about eight o'clock on his walk to Yatton. About ten o'clock he might have been seen gliding into the churchyard, like a dangerous snake. The moon continued to shine—and at intervals with brightness sufficient for his purpose, which was simply to reconnoitre, as closely as possible, the little churchyard—to ascertain what it might contain, and what were its capabilities. At length he approached the old yew-tree, against whose huge trunk he leaned with folded arms, apparently in a reverie. Hearing a noise as if some one opening the gate by which he had entered, he glided further into the gloom behind him; and turning his head in the direction whence the sound came, he beheld some one entering the churchyard. His heart beat quickly; and he suspected that he had been watched; yet there was surely no harm in being seen, at 10 o'clock at night, looking about him in a country churchyard. It was a gentleman who entered, dressed in deep mourning; and Gammon quickly recognized in him Mr. Aubrey—the brother of her whose beautiful image still shone before his mind's eye. What could he be wanting there?—at that time of night? Gammon was not kept long in doubt; for the stranger slowly bent his steps towards a large high tomb, in fact the central object, next to the yew-tree, in the churchyard—and stood gazing at it in silence for some time.

"That is, no doubt, where Mrs. Aubrey was buried the other day," thought he, watching the movements of the stranger, who presently raised his handkerchief to his eyes, and for some moments seemed indulging in great grief. Gammon distinctly heard either a sob or a sigh. "He must have been very fond of her," thought Gammon; "Well, if we succeed, the excellent old lady will have escaped a great deal of trouble—that's all." "If we succeed!" That reminded him of what he had for a few moments lost sight of, namely, his own object in coming thither; and he felt a sudden chill of remorse, which increased upon him till he almost trembled, as his eye continued fixed on Mr. Aubrey, and he thought also of Miss Aubrey—and the misery—the utter ruin into which he was seeking to plunge them both—the unhallowed means which they—which he—contemplated resorting to for that purpose.

Gammon's condition was becoming every moment more serious; for virtue, in the shape of Miss Aubrey, began to shine every moment in more radiant loveliness before him—and he felt an inclination to sacrifice every person connected with the enterprise in which he was engaged, if it would give him a chance of winning the favor of Miss Aubrey. Presently, however, Mr. Aubrey, evidently heaving a deep sigh, bent his steps slowly back again, and quitted the churchyard. Gammon watched his figure out of sight, and then, for the first time, since Mr. Aubrey's appearance, breathed freely. Relieved from the pressure of his presence, Gammon began to take calmer and juster views of his position; and he reflected, that if he pushed on the present affair to a successful issue, he should be much more likely than by prematurely ending it, to gain his objects. He therefore resumed the survey of the scene around him; and which presented appearances highly satisfactory, judging from the expression which now and then animated his countenance. At length he wandered round to the other end of the church, where a crumbling wall, half covered with ivy, indicated that these had formerly stood some building apparently of earlier date than the church. Such was the fact; Gammon found himself standing in a sort of inclosure, which had once been the site of an old chapel. And here he had not been long making his observations, before he achieved a discovery of so extraordinary a nature; one so unlikely, under the circumstances, to have happened; one so calculated to baffle the ordinary calculations concerning the course of events, that the reader may well disbelieve what I am going to tell him, and treat it as absurdly improbable.

In short, not to keep him in suspense, Gammon positively discovered evidence of the death of Harry Dreddington in his father's lifetime; by means of just such a looking tombstone as he had long imaged to himself; and as he had resolved that old Quirk should have got prepared, before the cause came into court. He almost stumbled over it. "T was an old slanting stone, scarce two feet above the ground, partly covered with moss, and partly hid by rubbish and old, damp grass. The moon shone brightly enough to enable Gammon, kneeling down, to decipher, beyond all doubt, what was requisite to establish that part of the case which had been wanting. For a moment or two he was disposed to doubt whether he was not dreaming. When, at length, he took out pencil and paper, his hands trembled so much that he felt some difficulty in making an exact copy of the inestimable inscription. Having done this, he drew a long breath as he replaced the pencil and paper in his pocket-book, and almost fancied he heard a whispering sound in the air—"Verdict for the plaintiff." Quitting the churchyard, he walked back to Grilston at a much quicker rate than that at which he had come, his discovery having wonderfully elated him, and pushed all other thoughts entirely out of his mind. But, thought he, doubtless the other side are aware of the existence of this tombstone—they can hardly be supposed ignorant of it; they must have looked up their evidence as well as we—and their attention has been challenged to the existence or non-existence of proof of the time of the death of Harry Dreddington:—well—if they are aware of it, they know that it cuts the ground from under them, and turns their conveyance, on which, doubtless, they are relying, into waste paper; if they are not, and are under the impression that that deed is valid and effectual, our proof will fall on them like a thunder-bolt. God!"—he held his breath, and stopped in the middle of the road—"how immensely important is this little piece of evidence! Why, if they knew of it—why, in Heaven's name is it there still? What easier than to have got rid of it?—why, they may still: what can that stupid fellow Parkinson have been about? Yet, is it because it has become unimportant, on account of their being in possession of other evidence? What can they have against so plain a case as ours is, with this evidence? Gad, I'll not lose one day's time; but I'll have half-a-dozen competent witnesses to inspect, and to speak to that same tombstone in court." Such were some of the thoughts which passed through his mind as he hastened homeward; and on his arrival, late as it was—only the yawning order being up to let him in—he sat down to write a letter off to Mr. Quirk, and made it into a parcel to go by the mail in the morning, acquainting him with the truly providential discovery he had just made, and urging him to set about getting up the briefs for the trial, without delay; he, himself, purposing to stop at Grilston a day or two longer, to complete one or two other arrangements of an important nature. As soon as Mr. Quirk had read this letter, he devoutly thanked God for his goodness; and, hurrying to his strong-box, unlocked it, took out a small sealed packet, and committed it to the flames.

Mr. Aubrey, as soon as he had recovered from the first shock occasioned by the communication by Mr. Parkinson of the proceedings against him, set about acquainting himself, as minutely as he could, with the true state of the case. He had requested Mr. Parkinson to obtain from one of the counsel in London, Mr. Crystal, a full account of the case, in an elementary form, for his own guidance; and on obtaining a remarkably clear and luminous statement, and also consulting the various authorities cited in it—such, at least, as could be supplied to him by Mr. Parkinson—the vigorous practical understanding of Mr. Aubrey, aided by his patient application, soon mastered the whole case, and enabled him to appreciate the peril in which he was placed.

MRS BARTHOLOMEW WINKS'S "PLEASURE PARTY."

BY SYLVANUS SWANQUIL.

To begin at the beginning, I'll tell you how I became acquainted with the Winkses. I was standing one rainy night in the lobby of Drury Lane Theatre, ogling a pretty black-eyed girl, one of a party of three, when a fat old Surrey-side-looking fellow came elbowing his way towards the place where we stood. "Ah, my dear!" cried the old lady of the group, who turned out to be my inamorata's mamma, "have you found the carriage?" and the lady laid an evident stress on the the; as who should say, "own coach and horses, with fat coachmen up in front, and slim footmen behind." "No, my love," responded the old gentleman, who turned out to be my inamorata's papa; "no, my love, I can't get one at no price."

The lady's countenance at this moment I shall never forget. Taking advantage of her embarrassment, I ventured to make an offer of my cab, giving the black-eyed one pretty plainly to understand by a look that the sacrifice was made entirely to her charms. Mamma, however, who had evidently no other idea of a cab than what she had gained from the coach-stand at the bank, and who took me probably for the tiger of one those elegant vehicles, peremptorily declined; saying that she had never been in the habit of riding in cabs—nor yet in hansom-cabs—and that, for her part, she didn't care twopence for the rain, nor the gels nather; and, much obliged to me, they could walk. The night however becoming perfectly zoological—that is to say, raining cats and dogs—and my offer being gallantly repeated, the old lady, after sundry whisperings with her spouse and daughters, at length consented to accept it.

"We are going to sleep in the city to-night," said she at parting, "but our place is at Blackheath—Queen Elizabeth villa, we call it—where we shall be uncommon 'appy," &c. &c. &c.

The next day accordingly I made my way to Queen Elizabeth villa, which I assailed with my best double-rap. After waiting some time, while the man who was at work in the garden, was summoned by an unseen hand to doff his leathern apron, and don his livery coat, I was at length admitted into the bower of my Dulcinea. The ladies were gone to the infant school, said the horticultural footman, but would be back directly, and master would be with me in a moment. I accordingly took a stare out of the window, and began to speculate upon the results of my adventure, when suddenly from an inner room I heard the voice of old Winks.

"Siddown, siddown, James. There, never mind your hat. And so you say the 'orses are going on pretty well, eh?"

"Oh, uncommon well your honor; never see anythink look so green and nice in all my life."

"And how does Brown get on with the peacocks?" continued the first speaker, "if he ain't done it already, let him get his shears and trim their tails nicely, as I expect a gentleman down from London shortly, and should like 'em to look rather decentish."

Good heavens! though we, what next? green horses, and peacocks' tails trimmed to the pattern of fighting cocks! Were we dreaming: or had we stepped by accident into St. Luke's?

"And where have you put the monkey?" went on 'mine host.

"Close agen the two beehives," answered the factotum.

"And the Indian Ox?"

"Werry honfortinat," replied the interrogatee with a whimper, "werry honfortinat, but am sorry to tell 'ee sir, old Brown has gone and cut off his hump, 'cause vy, says he, who ever heard of sech a thing as a cow with her holders a-growin atop of her shoulders?"

"An infernal ass!" cried Winks, raising his voice to meet the occasion.

"And I'm sorry to hadd," continued James "as how the quagga has been honlocky enough to have von of its ears cut off—not but that'll grow again—and vorse than all, your honor, the high vind of last night blowin off the hephant's trunk close agen his snout."

"The devil," exclaimed Winks, as well as he could for choking.

"But am 'appy to say," went on the other in a soothing-syrupy tone, "werry 'appy to tell you that the camel has arrived safe from Birkhamptead, and his hump's so huncommon big as Brown and me both thinks may without much trouble werry well convert into a hephant with a castle on his back."

If I had been amazed at the enormity of clipping a peacock's tail—if I had been puzzled at the idea of a stud of green horses—if I had been mystified at the notion of a quagga's ear growing again—if I had been startled at the intelligence of a high wind blowing off an elephant's trunk—how much more amazed, puzzled, mystified, and startled was I at the announcement of a metamorphosis like the present! Hitherto I had kept my countenance with the gravity of a zoological gardener, but the last coup of the beef-eater (such I concluded him to be) would have moved the chairman of an anti-risibility society. I burst into an immoderate fit of laughter; Winks appeared inquiringly at the open door, and I of course hastened to apologize for my apparent rudeness; stating that I had been an unwilling listener to his zoological conference, that I was not at all aware of Queen Elizabeth villa's possessing so extensive a menagerie, and still less was I able to comprehend the extraordinary facts alluded to in the account of his head keeper.

"Ha ha ha! menagerie! hextraordinary facts! logical conference! head keeper! ha, ha, ha! well, that's a good one, however. Why, ha, ha, ha! why bless you, ha, ha, ha! it's nothing but hi, hi, hi! nothing in the world but ho, ho, ho! only ha, ha! only hi, hi! only my yew trees!"

Winks's foible, it seems—for what man, let alone what rich retired sugar-baker, has not his foible! Winks's foible is an unbounded attachment to old yew trees. A large field behind his house (the park Mrs. Winks calls it) is entirely filled with these evergreens. There you have them of all possible—and almost impossible shapes, from a castle down to a beehive; for, with Winks, a yew tree in its natural state, or "a yew tree in the raw," as he calls it, is not fit to grow. He will lecture for a twelvemonth on the beauties of his favourite tree, and clips his arguments into as fantastic shapes as his timber. Insist on the exquisite grace of unrestrained branches, he'll ask you why you send your children to school. Talk to him of the absurdity of thus outraging nature, "It is the nature of yew-trees," he will say, "to be clipped." He idolizes his yews, and is as nervous on a windy night as the most hypochondriac underwriter at Lloyd's. If you would win his esteem, accompany him in what he calls "a walk over his trees." If you would gain his affections, send him a yew monster, or a temple in clipped work. The avenue to his heart is, without a word of metaphor, an avenue of yews. His children, whether accidentally or not I cannot pretend to say, partake of the general predilections; for one of the girls is named Eu-phemia, and the youngest boy has been christened Hugh. Whether it is one of those extraordinary coincidences that chance pleases herself now and then to bring about, or whether it is still the effect of Winks's ruling passion, I know not; but certain it is, that our valued friend's religious faith seems to participate in the general mania. Winks is a decided yew-nitarian.

So much for Winks; or "my Bartlemy," as his wife always calls him. Of that wife and her two blooming daughters I shall say little. Their characters—if they have any—must develop themselves in the course of my narrative. Suffice it at present to know, that Mrs. Winks was, in her younger days, a pains-taking, unmanaging, motherly woman, who mended her own stockings and ironed her own caps; but has been changed, by prosperity and the march of mind, into a fine lady, who washes out, and wears kid gloves at breakfast. Her daughters, whose "united ages," as the longevity-mongers say, don't amount to forty, are as dissimilar in their manners and appearance as a Hottentot and Esquimaux. The one (Kate, my inamorata) is all life and spirits, with black laughing eyes, and a face made up of the usual compound of ivory, and roses, and pearls, and lilies. Euphemia, on the contrary, is a mute swan; never uttering two words where one will suffice, nor one where silence may with any degree of decency be substituted. She is as unlike her sister in face and figure as in manners and disposition. Kate is dark, Euphemia is pale; Kate is plump and elastic, Euphemia is bony and slow in her paces. Both have had what Mrs. Winks calls "good schoolings"; that is to say, have read through Telemachus and the family Decameron; and played through Cramer's Studio and Hertz's Preludes; and danced through Strauss's Waltzes, and the Dublin Lancers; sung through the Solfeggio; and tittered through a course of astronomical lectures at the Town Hall: and read by stealth through some hundreds of love novels, smuggled into school by one of the day-scholars from an adjacent circulating library; and, in short, done all that is usually done in those bustling and erudite establishments, called Preparatory and Finishing Schools for young ladies.

So much for Mrs. and the Miss Winks's. And now for the fete announced at the head of this paper. Modesty and want of space forbid me to say how successfully I attacked the hearts and won the esteem of all the inmates of Queen Elizabeth Villa; how I accompanied old Winks "over his trees;" how I discussed the merits and claims to gentility of the inhabitants of Black Heath and its neighborhood, with Mrs. Bartholomew; how I drew landscapes and lace patterns for the lively Kate; or held skeins of cotton in mute admiration, while the fair Euphemia wound them into balls in solemn silence; how I romped with little Hugh when he came home from school on Sundays; and talked of fishing and boating with the elder male branches of the establishment. Suffice it to say that I was become a frequent and a welcome guest at the Villa, and included in all the Winksonian parties—dinner, supper, and pic-nic.

"Next Monday is my wedding day," began Mrs. Winks one fine sunny morning last June, "and Kate and me has been thinking of a pleasure party to Eel Pie Island. My two b'ys will be at home from the university (London University, where one of them was studying for the peale and mortar, and the other for any thing that might turn up); and there's Sir Humphry Duggins, and Captain Cobb, and a few other of our old particulars, I'm sure they'll be 'appy to come, and we shall have the pleasantest do—oh dear me, I wish it was here!—and of course you'll jine, won't you? both the gels'll be there, shan't you loves?"

"O yes, ma!" said Kate. Euphemia nodded assent.

"And we mean to hire a boat express, and row ourselves; without any of your nasty vulgar boatmen eating up all your things, and overhearing all you say. We shall take our own eating and drinking, and the gels have promised to take their music with 'em, and—oh! we shall be so gay, and so 'appy!—do promise, to come, there's a dear."

You see to what a pitch I had arrived in the good graces of Mrs. Winks.

"Aye, do come!" said Kate. Euphemia said nothing; but she looked! In short I consented.

Well; the day arrived. The sun shone, the birds chirped, (singing some people call it,) the thermometer was up to I don't-know-how-many in the shade, and all gave token of a pleasant and a happy day. The place of rendezvous was Winks's house in the city; for though, in fact, retired from business, Winks's name and some of his capital were yet in the concern, and the old house in Knightrider-street still in his occupation. There, in a little back parlor, Mrs. Winks's pleasure-party was assembled. There were herself and spouse, "the gels," and her sons from the University, of whom two words en passant. The eldest, Dick, or "the doctor," as his father always calls him, is the most thorough scape-grace that ever drew breath; the other, Walter, is the very opposite of his brother, as dull and heavy as a treatise on metaphysics. And if that is the scape-grace, this may well be called the scape-goat. In one thing they do agree—their love of the bottle. "The doctor" is generally the ring-leader in their jollifications; but as he can stand his one or two bottles without any manifest effect on his manners, and the other loses his reason at the end of the first pint, Dick gets all the praise of a temperate young man, while his brother has obtained the reputation of a confirmed drunkard. With this Dick I had taken care to establish a strict liason; for with a practical joker one must of necessity become either victim or accomplice. As it was from him that I got my first notions of the present company, I cannot do better than describe them in his words.

"Did you ever see such a quiz of a party as mother's got together?" he began, getting me into a dark corner of the little back parlor; "did you ever? there's that old fool, Sir Humphrey Duggins—old Marybone Duggins, as we call him—I'll tell you why, he once had occasion to give his evidence on some point in the conduct of one of the candidates at a contested election, and as he had no vote, he was put in nomination to qualify him to speak, and the old fellow has talked of nothing else ever since, firmly believing that he was within an ace of being made an M. P. Such a subject for a pic-nic party! mother chose him, I'm sure, for nothing but his knighthood, which he got for taking up an address from his ward on some victory or other in the war times. And Cobb the same, Sir Humphrey Duggins and Captain Cobb she thought would sound grand, and astonish the weak minds of the rest of her party. Cobb—you know Cobb, I dare say, he's the skipper of one of the Boulogne steam-packets, but pretends to have been all over the world, and if you'll listen to him, will spin you yarns as long as from here to the North Pole and back again, or, as Jonathan says, from July to eternity. Then there's those two infernal old maids, the Miss Crabtrees, pulling to pieces every body and every thing they come near to; they're my aunts, and as rich as Jews both of 'em, but if I wouldn't walk forty miles in the snow to see 'em hanged, my name's not Dick. Then look at that quiz, Hicks—Alonso Hicks, I believe they call him, he's the greatest fool that ever was born, let the other be who he may.

"Then why invite him?" I asked.

"We didn't invite him," said the doctor.

"Not invite him?"

"No; we didn't invite him. We invited his horn; but as it was necessary to have somebody to blow it, Hicks was included. The girl he is talking to in the corner is as great a bore as himself. Miss Arathea Dix is the name she answers to; and it's just as much as she can do to answer to her own name. She has n't a single idea in her head; but—she can sing. Then there are the Thomsons, and the Johnsons, and—

Here the doctor was interrupted by old Winks bouncing into the room to announce that every thing was ready for starting.

We arrived safely at the boat, without accident or adventure, where we proceeded to stow ourselves away in the interstices of sundry packages, already occupying the interior of The Rose in June. My mischief loving friend, Dick, was last in the boat, having suffered the whole party to be seated before him, in order that none might escape the fright incidental on his nearly capsizeing her, by jumping with all his weight upon her heaviest side. Shrieks having gone round among the ladies, and the boat having regained its equilibrium, Dick and Captain Cobb took each a pair of oars, and sat down to work, it having been agreed that the gentlemen should row alternately, or, as Mrs. Bartholomew Winks had it, "take turn and turn about." The boat's head having been got round, after some slight discussion as to which was the head, we pulled away into the stream, amidst the gibes of the waterman on the neighboring stairs, and three cheers from the little boys on the bridge; Sir Humphrey Duggins observing, by the way, that if he had succeeded in obtaining a seat for Marybone, he would have taken care to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the manners of watermen in general, and of Thames watermen in particular. Waterloo Bridge was passed in excellent style—the Adelphi was left behind—Hungerford Market was "made" and commented upon—Westminster Bridge was admired, and the Abbey criticised. Mrs. Winks was in ecstasies of delight at the success of her pleasure-party. Bartholomew himself, who retained his habits of thrift, and always liked to have his pennies worth, began to think the money well laid out. Sir Humphrey Duggins indulged in senatorial reminiscences, apropos of the Houses of Parliament, which we had just passed. In short, every thing went swimmingly; nothing occurring to mar our enjoyment—except an occasional shower-bath from the doctor's oars, which created considerable dismay among the ladies, whose ribbons were not proof against spotting.

Lambeth Palace past, two fresh hands were called to the oars, the former retiring with an ample allowance of blisters. The exchange having been effected—providentially without upsetting the boat—Mr. Hicks begged leave to call for a song, and fixed upon Miss Jemima. Miss Jemima, who had been brought up to always do as she was bid, immediately untied her reticule, and drew forth a patent accordion, after a few ups and downs upon which, she sallied forth in The Deep, Deep Sea. Her efforts, however, were no little impeded by the awkward conduct of our new pair of rowers, viz. young Mr. Walter Winks, and Mr. Julius Duodecim Thompson, who being now, for the first time in their lives, entrusted with the management of two pair of oars, made sad duck-and-drake work of it, as you may well suppose. Miss Jemima, however, went on:

"Oh, come with me, my love,
And our fairy home shall be
Where the water spirits rove,
In the deep, deep sea."

I wish you would n't spittle so!

"In the deep, deep sea,
Hopes as fond as thou wouldst prove,
Faith as bright as e'er was told."

Heart as warm as those above,
Dwell under the waters cold.

I declare I'm quite wet through!

Then come and be my love,
Come, come—

"Come, Mr. Thompson! I wish you'd mind what you're about!

Come, come—

"Mr. Thompson, I say!"

--and be my love
In the deep, deep sea,
In the deep—"

"Aciouh! Good heavens, Mr. Winks, you've quite drenched me! I declare I won't stir another step if somebody else don't take the rowers! and if other people choose to sit and be soaked to the skin—"

The rest of Miss Jemima's speech was lost in the apologies of the young gentlemen, and in the complaints of numerous ladies "following on the same side." The result of the altercation was the dismissal of Duodecim Thompson and Walter, and the substitution of fresh hands, who, however, did no more than the first, unless the losing of one of the oars, which floated away beyond "come again," may be taken as an exception in their favor. We were now obliged to fall back on our first organs of locomotion, namely, the doctor and the captain, who, taking an oar a-piece, pulled away with most exemplary zeal till we got near Fulham. Here, however, the doctor again threw up under accumulation of blisters; and the captain, after a little while longer sustaining the whole brunt of the business in his own hands, was glad to follow his example. In vain we drafted the boat for fresh performers; in vain Thompson and Walter Winks again volunteered their services—the ladies would n't hear of it. We were at a regular stand-still. Mrs. Winks began to think her pleasure-party would n't turn out such a hit after all; her husband gave way to his regrets at so much money being thrown away on such nonsense, and wished himself at home amongst his yews. In a word, things looked downright bad, and we all began to regard Eel Pie Island as a second Atlantis, bright but unattainable, when suddenly our hopes were restored, and our joys renewed, by the appearance of the "nick of time" steamer, which was fizzing up the river with a cargo of ruralists for Richmond and Twickenham. She was soon within hail; and, having taken off the kettle while a bargain was struck between old Winks and the skipper, she threw us a rope, and away we went up the river at the rate of—I don't know how many knots an hour.

We passed on without any adventure, and in a little while the wished-for island was in view. We parted company with our convoy, and made the land forthwith. Cobb undertook the disembarkation of the ladies, while Winks hastened to bargain with the landlord of "the house" for such supplies as it was not within the province of a pleasure-boat to provide. As soon as the worthy Bartholomew had completed his arrangements with the Eel Pie House, he returned to the boat, and seizing a wheel-like package, hauled it ashore; and afterwards, with the assistance of "John" the servant man (who had been forwarded by a bus), carried it off to the interior of the island, and there proceeded to unfold it with all the satisfaction of a book-worm unpacking his last bookseller's parcel. I confess I felt no little curiosity to see the solution of the mystery; and I believe my anxiety was pretty generally shared by the company. Winks meanwhile continued to unpack it in solemn silence. Ropes and folds of canvass were displayed and unravelled. "Oh! I know what it is!" cried some one at length, sharper than the rest; "it's a balloon." "No; it ain't a balloon," said Winks with a smirk, "but I'll tell you what it is—take hold of that rope, Isaac—John, I mean—it's my own thought, and my own contrivance; now get up into that 'ere tree; and now every one of you get 'old of one of these 'ere cords—there, hold tight, and stand in a round ring; and now, John, pull away—there! did you ever see a better tent in your life—all my own scheming, and as simple as simple—nothing but pieces of canvass sewed together in a point at the top, and a dozen cords at the bottom to peg it to the ground with, and another at the top to tie it to the branch of a tree—all my own invention, and cost next to nothing; had the canvass by us, and Isaac—John, I mean, and me did all the stitching and sewing. I've no doubt we shall be as comfortable under it as if we'd had one of Benjamin Edgington's grandest marquees; and at one-fifth the expense."

Having expressed our admiration of Mr. Winks's genius for tent building, we proceeded to promenade about the island; leaving our host and his man John to land the eatables and drinkables, and make all snug under the tent. The young ladies were of course all delight, and the young gentlemen all politeness. Mr. Julius Duodecim Thompson, who, it seems, was the ardent admirer of Miss Jemima Johnson (Jemmy Johnson, as the doctor waggishly abbreviated her), carried off that young lady to the most secluded part of the island to entertain her with his amorous cooings. Hicks, the trumpeter, was most harmoniously engaged with the tuneless Arathea Dix, gallantly comparing her to all manner of nightingales, throats, and canary-birds. Captain Cobb, being an old sailor, and not particularly smitten with any one, saw that his best game would be to ingratiate himself with the givers of the party, and accordingly devoted himself especially to the service of Miss Euphemia Winks, who received his numerous tales, battle and murder with silent astonishment. Sir Humphrey Duggins, who had scraped an acquaintance with the landlord, was engaged at "the bar of the house," giving a circumstantial account of his nomination for Marybone. The two Miss Crabtrees divided themselves into equal parts, and made themselves as disagreeable as possible by hooking themselves on to couples of lovers who wished—or looked as if they wished—to be alone. The elders of the party—all fat—had taken refuge in one of the arbors to rest themselves after the fatigues of the passage up the river, all but Mrs. Winks, who of course was busy superintending the arrangement of the banquet under the home-made tent. The brothers Winks were, according to custom, gone to get a rummer a-piece of "cold without" at the inn. Where the lovely Kate was, I leave the reader to guess.

After every epithet of delight and admiration had been lavished on the trees, the water, the prospects, and other agreements of the place, the captain came round to propose a set of quadrilles. Of course the ladies jumped at the offer; at least those that had n't got beaux; those that had, cried "bother!" and jumped after them. But who was to play? Mr. Alonso Hicks gallantly stepped forward with his bugle. And where was the music? Captain Cobb soon rumaged up a copy of The Macbeth Quadrilles, wittily remarking, that nothing could be more fit than Lock's music for the key bugle. Hicks, however, objected playing by himself—he wanted to get Miss Arathea Dix into the concern—so Thompson kindly offered to join with his flute; and Miss Jemima Johnson, who "hated dancing" (she had something the matter with her hip), handsomely volunteered the services of her accordion; and Miss Arathea Dix, who had only held back so long to save appearances, now gladly joined with her "light guitar."

"Lovely island this!" observed Miss Seraphina Thompson, while the symphony was going on.

"Yes, lovely indeed!" echoed half-a-dozen voices.

"Talking of islands," said Captain Cobb, "did I ever tell you of a most extraordinary adventure that happened to me once off the coast of Iceland. The night was as dark as pitch, the sea ran mountains high, the wind blew a hurricane, the ship was without mast or rudder, the lightning blazed about our heads, and the crew ran—"

"Right and left!" cried his vis-à-vis, Miss Terpaichore Tibbs, rushing at him with all the ardor of a Buechante, and whirling him through the mazes of Le Pantaloon. The figure concluded, the Captain resumed his tale.

"As I was saying, the ship was reduced to a mere log, drifting about at the mercy of the wind and waves, the boats were all washed overboard, the old chaplain was called to say prayers—and, by the bye, said grace instead—the compass whirled round like a spinning-wheel—the pumps refused to work—there was five feet water in the hold, and every wave seemed to—"

"Advance and retire, captain!" The captain advanced and retired as he was bid, and went through all the rest of the manoeuvres incidental to that most complicated figure, L'Éc.

"Mount Hecla," he resumed, almost out of breath with exertion, "Mount Hecla was blazing away in the distance, water-spouts were hissing all round us, the thunder roared louder and louder, the mountains were tumbling head over heels along the coast, for there was a terrible earthquake ashore, when down went the vessel, and every soul on board perished, except myself, who had been washed overboard just two minutes before—and there I was, miles and miles from shore, without so much as a stick to lay hold of, or a rock to swim to—my strength was soon spent, and I gave myself up for lost, when, what do you think? why—"

"Two opposite crows over," cried the resolute Miss Terpaichore Tibbs, taking hold of the gallant navigator's right hand, and never ceasing to torment him till he had gone through the whole of La Poule under her immediate superintendence.

The conclusion of the captain's narrative, as well as that of the quadrilles, was prevented by the arrival of John, alias Isaac, to announce that dinner was ready under the tent. The dowagers, tired of sitting mumchance staring at the dancers, and hungry with the exertions of the morning, gladly snapped at John's offer; and I am sorry to say the young couples fell into their views with rather more alacrity than was quite consistent with sentiment. In ten minutes we were all forming ourselves into what Mrs. Winks lucidly termed "a round ring" in the inside of the tent: all but the doctor and his hopeful brother, who could nowhere be found; but who, I happened to know, were cozily engaged in making up and dispatching certain half-pint "mixtures as before," at the Eel-pie house.

"Come, set down, set down, ladies and gentlemen," said Mrs. Winks, "this is our wedding day, you know, and me and my Bartlemy, which we have been married now just twenty-seven 'ear this very day, we're as glad to see you all—as glad as glad! and I only wish what we've got for you to eat was better worth setting down to. But such as it is—and I'm sure I don't know what it is, for Winks has had it all his own way—What is there, Winks? why do n't you tell the ladies and gentlemen what you've got for 'em to eat."

"Why, my love there's that there pie in the middle, I think you will all agree with me in its being apropos."

"Apropos!" "An apropos pie!" "Lor, what's that?" and "Oh! do give me a bit of apropos pie!" were the exclamations which followed this announcement.

"What I mean," resumed Winks, "is being apropos to the place where we are in, namely an eel pie."

A roar of delight welcomed this explanation.

"And next to the eel pie is a pigeon pie, and next to the pigeon pie is another pigeon pie: and this is Doctor Baillie's breakfast bacon, and there is Thorn's Potted Yarmouth Bloaters, and this is Dr. Kitchen's Zest, and this the King of Oude's favorite sarce, and there's 'am and chickens for such as likes 'em, and outside 's a charcoal stove to keep us in hot water, and—but it's no use talking—you see what there is—so, Mrs. Thompson, allow me to 'elp you to a bit of eel pie to begin with."

"Thank you, I'll take a little apropos pie," wittily replied Mrs. Thompson: and all the company fell back in a paroxysm of laughter.

"Lor, Winks, how awkward you are!" exclaimed his gentler self, taking the knife and fork out of his hands, "you 'andle the pie as a bear would a plumcake. (Fresh bursts of laughter at Mrs. Winks's spirituelle remark.) Allow me, Mrs. Thompson, dear," and Mrs. Winks daintily cut a slice of the lilywhite crust, and daintily placed it on Mrs. Thompson dear's blue and white plate.

Every thing now went on very smoothly; the ladies having really never ate so much in all their lives before, and the gentlemen being positively ashamed to trouble one another for "another wing of that fowl," or "another slice of that ham."

"Some wine, Isaac—John, I mean!" cried Winks to his factotum. Mrs. Johnson, may I have the honor—red or white?"

"First, and foremost, I beg leave to propose that we drink Mrs. Winks's good health in a round robin," suggested Captain Cobb.

"Hear, hear!" from Sir Humphrey Duggins; and cries of "Brayvo!" and "Very good!" from the unparliamentary part of the company.

"Bumpers!" added Cobb.

Bumpers were filled! of red to the men, of white to the ladies. "Mrs. Winks!" "Mrs. Winks's good health!" resounded from all sides.

"Good heavens! this is walnut catsup!" cried half-a-dozen male voices.

"Oh, lawk!" and this is Chili Vinegar!" shrieked half-a-dozen female.

"Ha, ha, ha! ho, ho, ho!" horse-laughed the doctor through a slit in the tent.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" cried Mrs. Winks, who had been contemplating a speech of thanks to the company, "what a torment that Dick is! I declare he's quite spoilt my pleasure-party with his confounded nonsense. Winks, why do n't you get up and say something to him. He do n't mind me. He would you—You're his father."

"I do n't know that," replied Winks, referring to the penultimate sentence. The equivocal, however, was irresistible, and had this happy effect, that it set us all a laughing, and laughing set us all in good humor again.

"Well, never mind, ladies," said our hostess, "there's some made-wine locked up in the cellar, and we can get some other, I suppose, for the gentlemen, from the house yonder."

But the gentlemen all protested they preferred made-wine; and a bottle of brandy having, by good fortune, been found among it, the banquet once again looked bright and gay.

"A few nuts, Mrs. Thompson?"

"Thankee, cappen—and the nut-cracks, if you please."

"Let me give you some almonds and raisins, Mrs. Johnson."

"I'll trouble you, Sir 'Umphry."

"Oh, lawk! I've blew my mouth up!" cried Mrs. Thompson.

"Oh, Lord, I'm poisoned!" shrieked Mrs. Johnson.

The fact was, the almonds were all bitter ones, and the nuts had got detonating balls in 'em. The rest of the desert was of the same nature. Seville oranges had been substituted for sweet ones, and a fine plate of American apples had been replaced by a dish of quinces. The jellies turned out to be coagulated gravy; the marmalade to be carpenter's glue; and the damson cheese to be Warren's paste blacking. But the gentlemen all declared they did n't like desserts, and the ladies all said, they never ate sweets; so the blacking and glue were quietly put on one side.

"Once again, then, ladies and gentlemen," began Capt. Cobb, "Once again, I say, let me beg of you to fill your glasses [glasses here filled—and sipped, to be sure of 'em], and let me have the honor—with Sir Humphrey Duggins's permission—the delight—the—the—the honor of proposing the health of a lady—of a lady, ladies and gentlemen..."

What all this might have led to, it is impossible to say; but fortunately, the doctor having just then climbed the tree to which our tent was tied, and cut in sunder the cord thereof, down came the "glorious canopy," about our ears, and effectually put a stop to the Captain's oration. The first effect of this coup de theatre, was to make us empty our wine-glasses into each other's faces. The next to set us scrambling and kicking one another's shins, in vain endeavors at extrication. Some of the old ladies who had fainted on the first alarm, tumbled into the vacuum of a half-demolished pigeon-pie; others, rolling about in heedless agony, fell squashed among the catsup bottles; the younger branches, flying equally from the gushing fluids, and their ponderous mammae, sought refuge in the arms of the young men; and the young men nothing loth, took such means of reassuring the young ladies, as the circumstances of the case would admit.

"How are we to get out? Winks, which is the way out?" were the first words distinguishable from the general howl. It was the maternal voice of Mrs. Winks.

"The devil knows!" shouted Winks, in a paroxysm; "I can't find the opening," never, likely, for the doctor, who had confided the whole plan to me, had taken advantage of our first commotion, to sew it firmly up.

"It's Dick's done it all!" cried Mrs. Winks, with a groan; "my poor pleasure-party!"

"Ours the lad!" cried Winks; "give me a knife."

"Good heavens!" shrieked Mrs. Winks, "seize him! hold him! take the knife from him; he's going to kill his own child!"

Winks was going to do no such thing. He only wanted to cut his own way out. A rush was made upon him, however, and the knife wrested out of his hands, amidst renewed commotion. The doctor, meantime, seeing the first of his trick succeed so well, hastened to complete it. He upset the charcoal stove, helped the cinders to set fire to the tent, knocked down John, who wanted to rescue his master and missis from their unpleasant situation, and then, having seen the whole fairly lighted, retired to a distance, and began to play upon it with a garden engine, which he had provided for the purpose; his brother Walter working the pump, and himself guiding the pipe. Sir Humphrey Duggins was the first to poke out his head from among the smoking tent, and was immediately saluted with a jet of Thames water full in his face. Captain Cobb next made his appearance, and met with a like reception. Most of the others came in for a salute of the same kind; the Miss Crabtree's, in particular, getting such a regular sousing that they looked like two drowned rats—or rather cats. The gentlemen having liberated themselves from the burning mass, and performed a like office for the ladies, now turned their attention toward the malicious cause of their mishaps. Captain Cobb was the first to rush up to the engine, and demand of Walter (Dick had already slipped off) "what the devil he meant?" Young Thompson and Alonzo Hicks, repeated the question with increased asperity. Sir Humphrey Duggins echoed the terms of the query, and went the length of seizing the young man by the collar.—Poor Walter, who was completely tipsy, had no more idea of what he meant than they themselves, and so he would have told them, only a sudden fit of the hiccup prevented him from speaking. If he had lost the use of his tongue, however, he had retained that of his arms; and no sooner had Sir Humphrey Duggins laid hands upon him, than the young man put himself in a fighting attitude, and sent the old fellow spinning back towards the tent like an over-fed tee-totum. A general idea of war taking place of the simple notion of assault in the mind of Walter, that valorous youth now attacked indiscriminately all who came in his way; and having silenced Captain Cobb, and upset both aunts, he finally tripped himself up over a stray wheelbarrow, and was carried off kicking and roaring to the Eel Pie House.

Poor Mrs. Winks was all this while in tears. She'd never come a pleasure-partying again. All the rest looked very dolorous, and it was unanimously resolved that the fete "do cease and determine." The ruins of the banquet were hastily huddled together in the remnant of the extemporized tent, and the beaux and belles, damp and dispirited, tumbled themselves into the mis-named pleasure-boat, at the bottom of which was laid out the unhappy Walter, with the cellaret under his head by way of a pillow. All were now seated except our friend Winks, who had gone into the house to settle "the little bill." That worthy soon reappeared at the door, followed by "mine host" and the head waiter.

"Corks! I'll see you d——d first!" cried Mr. Winks. "Me pay a sovereign for drawing corks! I'll see you and your corks at the bottom of the Thames first."

"Quite reg'lar, sir," said the waiter, with as much equanimity as if he was ordering "von beef and van new potatoes." "Quite reg'lar, sir, I assure you. Ven gentlemen bring their own wine, v always charges for drawing the corks."

"But you did n't draw the corks."

"No, sir; but it's all as von as if I had. Quite reg'lar, sir, I do assure you. Twenty; hempty bottles, vich I 'elped the servant to pack 'em up."

"Yes, and most of 'em catsup bottles."

"Catsup! Vell, if gentlemen likes to drink catsup; but, begging your pardon, sir, it do n't stand to reason that gentlemen'd come a picknicking with such stuff as that. But, in course, if the ladies likes it"—(with a sneering look towards the ladies.) This brought up Mrs. Winks in a great fury, and her liege lord losing all patience under the imputation of lying, and feeding ladies with walnut ketchup, such a storm of words ensued as it is not easy to conceive—impossible to describe. Suffice it to say, that Winks was resolute in his determination to resist payment, not, as he said, that he cared two-pence about the money, but it was the extortion that he looked at. The landlord, of course, could not brook the term—extortion, and despatched a messenger to Twickenham for a constable. That worthy appearing on the opposite bank, things began to look truly tragical, and the ladies began to put themselves into fainting attitudes, when the doctor suddenly entering upon the scene, pushed his father into the boat, jumped in after him, thrust the boat from the side, and began to pull away lustily for home. The constable, accompanied by the head waiter, was sent after us in the other boat, and thus attended, we proceeded down the river, Winks still holding firm against the corks, and Mrs. Bartholomew deploring the failure of her pleasure party. "Only to think, them that oughted to have been so 'appy and comfortable, and to be axually running away like thieves and vagabonds, pursued by the mermaids of justice!"

Having conveyed our friend the catchpole almost as far as Blackfriars Bridge, the doctor now drew the attention of the neighboring watermen to the nature of his employ, and they, with that loving kindness which gentlemen of their rank of life generally exhibit towards the humbler servants of the law, made him the butt of all manner of amphibious jokes and petty annoyances. The doctor, now delegating the conduct of our boat to Captain Cobb, begged to be taken on board that of our pursuer, to see if some plan could not be devised to put an end to this unpleasant business. The limb of the law, brightening up at the prospect of a fee, readily consented, and Dick accordingly stepped into the other boat. We now pulled towards land, and the doctor, watching his opportunity, gave the waiter, who was rowing, a pull backward over the benches, sent the oars right and left into the river, jumped in after them, and quietly swam to the neighboring stairs, the poor knight of the napkin and our friend the "mermaid of justice" floating helplessly down the stream, amidst the jibes and jeers of the delighted watermen.

Thus ended Mrs. Bartholomew Winks's pleasure party.

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH,

Book the Second.... Mary the Queen.

XXX....How Queen Mary comforted herself during the siege; how Lord Daulford Gudeley was captured; and how Sir Thomas Wyatt and the Duke of Suffolk were routed.

Throughout the whole of the siege, the Queen maintained her accustomed firmness; and to her indomitable courage, and the effect produced by it upon her followers, the successful issue of the conflict to the royalist party is mainly to be attributed. Startled from her slumbers by the roar of the artillery, Mary arose, and hastily arrayed herself, quitted the palace with Gardiner, Renard, and a few other attendants, who had flown to her on the first rumor of the attack, and repaired to the lieutenant's lodgings, where she found Sir Henry Bedingfeld in the entrance hall, surrounded by armed men, busied in giving them instructions, and despatching messages to the officers in command of the different fortifications.

At the Queen's appearance, the old knight would have flung himself at her feet, but she motioned him not to heed her, and contented herself with saying, as each messenger departed: "Tell my soldiers that I will share their danger. I will visit every fortification in turn, and I doubt not I shall find its defenders at their posts. No courageous action shall pass unrequited: and as I will severely punish these rebels, so I will reward those who signalise themselves in their defeat. Bid them fight for their Queen—for the daughter of the English Henry, whose august spirit is abroad to watch over and direct them. He who brings me Wyatt's head, shall receive knighthood at my hands, together with the traitor's forfeited estates. Let this be proclaimed. And now fight—and valiantly—for you fight for the truth."

Charged with animating addresses like these, the soldiers hurried to their various leaders. The consequence may be easily imagined. Aware that they were under the immediate eye of their sovereign, and anticipating her coming each moment, the men, eager to distinguish themselves, fought with the utmost order; and such was the loyalty awakened by Mary's energy and spirit, that even those secretly inclined toward the opposite party, of whom there were not a few, did not dare to avow their real sentiments.

While Mary remained in the lieutenant's lodgings, word was brought that the fortress was attacked on all sides, and the thunder of the ordnance now resounding from the whole line of ramparts, and answered by the guns of the besiegers, confirmed the statement. As she heard these tidings, and listened to the fearful tumult without, her whole countenance underwent a change; and those who remembered her kingly sire, recognised his most terrible expression, and felt the same awe they had formerly experienced in his presence.

"Oh! that I had been born a man!" she cried, "that with my own hand I might punish these traitors. But they shall find, though they have a woman to deal with, they have no feeble and faint-hearted antagonist. I cannot wield a sword; but I will stand by those who can. Sir Henry Bedingfeld, take these orders from me, and they are final. Let the siege go how it may, I will make no terms with the rebels, nor hold further parley with them. Show them no quarter—exterminate them utterly. I no longer regard them as subjects—children; but as aliens—foes. Deal with them as such. And look you yield not this fortress—for by God's grace! I never will yield it. Where is your own post, Sir Henry?"

"At the By-ward Tower, your highness," replied Bedingfeld. "The traitor Wyatt directs the attack in that quarter; and he is most to be feared of all our opponents. I will not quit the fortification with my life. But who shall succeed me if I fall?"

"The Queen," replied Mary. "But you will not fall, good Bedingfeld. You are appointed by Heaven to be my preserver. Go to your post; and keep it, in my name. Go, and fight for your royal mistress, and for the holy Catholic faith which we both of us profess, and which these rebels—these heretics, would overthrow. Go, and the Virgin prosper you, and strengthen your arm."

"I obey your majesty," replied Bedingfeld; "and yet I cannot but feel that my place is by your side."

"Ah! do you loiter, sir?" cried Mary fiercely. "You have tarried here too long already. Do you not hear you loud-voiced cannon summon you hence? Are you deaf to those cries? To you post, sir—and quit it not for your head. Stay!" she added, as the knight was about to obey her. "I meant not this. I have been over-hasty. But you will bear with me. Go. I have no fears, and have much to do. Success be with you. We meet again as victors, or we meet no more."

"We shall meet ere day-break," replied the knight. And, quitting the presence, he hurried to the By-ward Tower.

"In case fate declares itself against your highness, and the insurgents win the fortress," observed Renard, "I can convey you beyond their reach. I am acquainted with a subterranean passage communicating with the farther side of the moat, and have stationed a trusty guard at its entrance."

"In the event your excellency anticipates," returned Mary, sternly, "but which I am assured will never occur, I will not fly. While one stone of that citadel stands upon another it shall never be surrendered: and while life remains to her, Mary of England will never desert it. In your next despatch to the prince your master, tell him his proposed consort proved herself worthy—in resolution, at least—of the alliance."

"I will report your intrepid conduct to the prince," replied Renard. "But I would, for his sake, if not for your own, gracious madam, that you would not further expose yourself."

"To the ramparts!" cried Mary, disregarding him. "Let those follow me, who are not afraid to face these traitors."

Quitting the entrance-hall, she mounted a broad staircase of carved oak, and traversing a long gallery, entered a passage leading to the Bell Tower—a fortification already described as standing on the west of the lieutenant's lodgings, and connected with them. The room to which the passage brought her, situated on the upper story, and now used as part of the domestic offices of the governor, was crowded with soldiers, busily employed in active defensive preparations. Some were discharging their calivers through the loopholes at the besiegers, while others were carrying ammunition to the roof of the building.

Addressing a few words of encouragement to them, and, crossing the room, Mary commanded an officer to conduct her to the walls. Seeing from her manner that remonstrance would be useless, the officer obeyed. As she emerged from the low arched doorway opening upon the ballium wall, the range of wooden houses on the opposite side of the moat burst into flames, and the light of the conflagration, while it revealed the number of her enemies and their plan of attack, rendered her situation infinitely more perilous, inasmuch as it betrayed her to general observation. Directed by the shouts, the besiegers speedily discovered the occasion of the clamor; and though Sir Thomas Wyatt, who was engaged at the moment in personally directing the assault on the Bulwark Gate, commanded his men to cease firing in that quarter, his injunctions were wholly disregarded, and several shots struck the battlements close to the Queen. Seriously alarmed, Gardiner earnestly entreated her to retire, but she peremptorily refused, and continued her course as slowly as if no danger beset her—ever and anon pausing to watch the movements of the besiegers, or to encourage and direct her own men. Before she reached the Beauchamp Tower, the Bulwark Gate was carried, and the triumphant shouts of the insurgents drew from her an exclamation of bitter anger.

"It is but a small advantage gained, your highness," remarked the officer, "they will be speedily repulsed."

"Small as it is, sir," rejoined the Queen, "I would rather have lost the richest jewel from my crown than they had gained so much. Look! they are gathering together before the Lion's Gate. They are thundering against it with sledge-hammers, battering-rams, and other engines. I can hear the din of their blows above all this tumult. And see! other troops are advancing to their aid. By their banners and white coats, I know they are the London trained-bands, headed by Bret. Heaven confound the traitor! He who will bring him to me, dead or alive, shall have whatever he asks. Ah, God's death! they have forced the Lion's Gate, they drive all before them. Recreants! why do you not dispute it inch by inch, and you may regain what you have lost? Confusion! Wyatt and his rebel band press onward, and the others fly. They pass through the Middle Tower. Ah! that shout—those fearful cries! They put my faithful subjects to the sword. They are in possession of the Middle Tower, and direct its guns on the By-ward Tower. Wyatt and his band are on the bridge. The press forward, the others retreat. Retreat! ah, cowards that you are, you must fight now, if you have a spark of loyalty left. They fly. They have neither nor valor. Where is Bedingfield—where is my lieutenant?—why does he not rally forth upon them? If I were there, I would myself lead the attack."

"Your majesty's desires are fulfilled," remarked the officer; "a sally is made by a party from the gate—the rebels are checked."

"I see it!" exclaimed the Queen, joyfully; "but what valiant men are they who thus turn the tide? Ah! I know them now, they are my famous giants—my loyal warders. Look how the rebel ranks are cleared by the sweep of their mighty arms. Brave yeomen! you have fought as no belted knights have hitherto fought, and have proved the truth of your royal descent. Ah! Wyatt is down. Stay him! spare him not, brave giant! his lands, his title are yours. Heaven's curse upon him, the traitor has escaped! I can bear this no longer," she added, turning to her conductor. "Lead on: I would see what they are doing elsewhere."

The command was obeyed, but the officer had not proceeded many yards when a shot struck him, and he fell mortally wounded at the queen's feet.

"I fear you are hurt, sir," said Mary, anxiously.

"To death, madam," gasped the officer. I should not care to die, had I lived to see you victorious. When all others were clamoring for the usurper Jane, my voice was raised for you, my rightful queen; and now my last shout shall be for you."

"Your name?" demanded Mary, bending over him.

"Gilbert," replied the officer—"I am the grandson of Gunnora Brasse."

"Live, Gilbert," rejoined Mary—"live for my sake!"

Raising himself upon one arm, with a dying effort, Gilbert waved his sword over his head, and cried, "God save Queen Mary, and confusion to her enemies!" And with these words, he fell backwards, and instantly expired. The queen gazed for a moment wistfully at the body.

"How is it," she mused, as she suffered herself to be led onward by Renard, "that, when hundreds of my subjects are perishing around me, this man's death should affect me so strongly?—I know not. Yet, so it is."

Her attention, however, was speedily attracted to other matters. Passing through the Beauchamp Tower, she proceeded to the next fortification.

The main attacks of the besiegers, as has been previously stated, were directed against the Brass Mount, Saint Thomas's Tower, and the By-ward Tower—the western and north-western ramparts, including the Leg Mount, a large bastion corresponding with the Brass Mount, being comparatively unmolested. Taking up a position on the roof of the Devilin Tower, which flanked the north-west angle of the ballium wall, Mary commanded two sides of the fortress, and the view on either hand was terrific and sublime. On the left, the blazing habitations, which being of highly-combustible material were now, in a great measure, consumed, cast a red and lurid glare on the moat, lighting up the ramparts, the fortifications behind them, and those on the bridge—two of which, she was aware, were in the possession of the besiegers. In this quarter the firing had ceased; and it seemed that both parties had by mutual consent suspended hostilities, to renew them in a short time with greater animosity than ever. On the right, however, the assault continued with unabated fury. A constant fire was kept up from the temporary batteries placed before the postern gate; clouds of arrows whizzed through the air, shot by the archers stationed on the banks of the moat; and another ladder having been placed against the ramparts, several of the scaling party had obtained a footing, and were engaged hand to hand with the besieged. Ever and anon, amid this tumultuous roar was heard a loud splash, proclaiming that some miserable wretch had been hurled into the moat.

After contemplating the spectacle for some time in silence, Mary proceeded to the Flint Tower—a fortification about ninety feet nearer the scene of strife. Here the alarming intelligence was brought her that Lord Guilford Dudley was in possession of the Brass Mount, and that other advantages had been gained by the insurgents in that quarter. The fight raged so fiercely, it was added, that it would be tempting Providence in her majesty to proceed further. Yielding, at length, to the solicitations of her attendants, Mary descended from the walls, and shaped her course toward the White Tower; while Renard, by her command, hastened to the Martin Tower (now the Jewel Tower) to ascertain how matters stood. His first step was to ascend the roof of this structure, which, standing immediately behind the Brass Mount, completely overlooked it.

It must be borne in mind that the Tower is surrounded by a double line of defences, and that the ballium wall and its fortifications are much loftier than the outer ramparts. Renard found the roof of the Martin Tower thronged with soldiers, who were bringing their guns to bear upon the present possessors of the Brass Mount. They were assisted in their efforts to dislodge them by the occupants of the Brick Tower and the Constable Tower; and notwithstanding the advantage gained by the insurgents, they sustained severe loss from the constant fire directed against them. Renard's glance sought out Lord Guilford Dudley; and after a few moments' search, guided by the shouts, he perceived him with Cholmondeley driving a party of royalists before him down the steps leading to the eastern ramparts. Here he was concealed from view, and protected by the roofs of a range of habitations from the guns on the ballium wall.

A few moments afterwards, intelligence was conveyed by the soldiers on the Broad Arrow Tower to those on the Constable Tower, and thence from fortification to fortification, that Dudley having broken into one of the houses covering the ramparts, was descending with his forces into the eastern ward.

Renard saw that not a moment was to be lost. Ordering the soldiers not to relax their fire for an instant, he put himself at the head of a body of men, and hurrying down a spiral stone staircase, which brought him to a subterranean chamber, unlocked a door in it, and traversing with lightning swiftness a long narrow passage, speedily reached another vaulted room. At first no outlet was perceptible; but snatching a torch from one of his band, Renard touched a knob of iron in the wall, and a stone dropping from its place discovered a flight of stairs, up which they mounted. These brought them to a wider passage, terminated by a strong door clamped with iron, and forming a small sally-port opening upon the eastern ward, a little lower down than Lord Guilford Dudley and his party had gained admittance to it. Commanding his men to obey his injunctions implicitly, Renard flung open the sally-port, and dashed through it at their head.

Dudley was pressing forward in the direction of the Iron Gate when Renard appeared. Both parties were pretty equally matched in point of number, though neither leader could boast more than twenty followers. Still, multitudes were hastening to them from every quarter. A detachment of royalists were issuing from a portal near the Salt Tower; while a host of insurgents were breaking through the house lately forced by Lord Guilford Dudley, and hurrying to his assistance. In a few seconds, the parties met. By the light of the torches, Dudley recognized Renard; and, uttering a shout of exultation, advanced to the attack.

As soon as it was known to the insurgents that the abhorred Spanish ambassador was before them, with one accord they turned their weapons against him, and if their leader had not interposed, would have inevitably slain him.

"Leave him to me," cried Dudley, "and I will deliver my country from this detested traitor. Fellow soldiers," he added, addressing Renard's companions, "will you fight for Spain, for the Inquisition, for the idolatries of Rome, when swords are drawn for your country—and for the Reformed religion? We are come to free you from the yoke under which you labor. Join us, and fight for your liberties, your laws—for the gospel, and for Queen Jane."

"Ay, fight for Jane, and the gospel!" shouted Cholmondeley. "Down with Renard and the See of Rome. No Spanish match! no Inquisition!"

"Who are you fighting for? Who is your leader?" continued Dudley—"a base Spanish traitor. Who are you fighting against?—Englishmen, your friends, your countrymen, your brothers—members of the same faith, of the same family."

This last appeal proved effectual. Most of the royalists went over to the insurgents, shouting, "No Spanish match! no Inquisition! Down with Renard!"

"Ay, down with Renard!" cried Dudley. "I will no longer oppose your just vengeance. Slay him, and we will fix his head upon a spear. It will serve to strike terror into our enemies."

Even in this extremity, Renard's constitutional bravery did not desert him; and, quickly retreating, he placed his back against the wall. The few faithful followers who stood by him, endeavored to defend him, but they were soon slain, and he could only oppose his single sword against the array of partizans and pikes raised against him. His destruction appeared inevitable, and he had already given himself up for lost, when a rescue arrived.

The detachment of soldiers, headed by Sir Thomas Brydges, already described as issuing from the gate near the Salt Tower; seeing a skirmish taking place, hurried forward, and reached the scene of strife just in time to save the ambassador, whose assailants were compelled to quit him to wield their weapons in their own defence. Thus set free, Renard sprang like a tiger upon his foes, and, aided by the new-comers, occasioned fearful havoc among them. But his deadliest fury was directed against those who had deserted him, and he spared none of them whom he could reach with his sword.

Lord Guilford Dudley and his esquire performed prodigies of valor. The former made many efforts to reach Renard, but, such was the confusion around him, that he was constantly foiled in his purpose. At length, seeing it was in vain to contend against such superior force, and that his men would be speedily cut in pieces, and himself captured, he gave the word to retreat, and fled towards the north-east angle of the ward. The royalists started after them; but such was the speed at which the fugitives ran, that they could not overtake them. A few stragglers ineffectually attempted to check their progress, and the soldiers on the walls above did not dare to fire upon them, for fear of injuring their own party. In this way, they passed the Martin Tower, and were approaching the Brick Tower, when a large detachment of soldiers were seen advancing towards them.

LONGEVITY.—One evening, the other week, a small party sat down to an entertainment in Mr. Mollison's Hotel, there being two persons in the company whose united ages amounted to one hundred and ninety years. One of them was an intelligent and healthy old gentleman of eight-five, who was obliged to confess himself a mere youth in comparison with the other veteran, Alexander Duncan, who was born in the year 1736, and is now in his hundred and fifth year, in the possession of good health, and only somewhat troubled with deafness. Duncan served in the army, but has been a dear bargain to the Crown, having persisted in drawing a pension for the last sixty years—for which, on this occasion, he very cordially drank Queen Victoria's health "and a happy time to her." He had, he said, been an early riser in the mornings, and had been a temperate man, though he never, as he added, "gaed the length o' the tee-totalers." In the course of the evening a number of old stories were raked up, and the greatest sociality prevailed. On the breaking up of the party, at a respectably late hour, Duncan, with the aid of his staff, took the lead in going out; one of the gentlemen present remarking, that he had seen many young men coming down the stairs of a hotel, after a party, far less steadily than the old soldier. —[Aberdeen Journal.]

MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP.

CHAPTER LVI.

A day or two after the Quilp tea-party at the Wilderness, Mr. Swiveller walked into Sampson Brass's office at the usual hour, and being alone in that Temple of Probity, placed his hat upon the desk, and taking from his pocket a small parcel of black crape, applied himself to folding and pinning the same upon it, after the manner of a hatband. Having completed the construction of this appendage, he surveyed his work with great complacency, and put his hat on again—very much over one eye, to increase the mournfulness of the effect. These arrangements perfected to his entire satisfaction, he thrust his hands into his pockets, and walked up and down the office with measured steps.

"It has always been the same with me," said Mr. Swiveller, "always. 'Twas ever thus—from childhood's hour I've seen my fondest hopes decay, I never loved a tree or flower but 'twas the first to fade away. I never nursed a dear gazelle, to glad me with its soft black eye, but when it came to know me well, and love me, it was sure to marry a market-gardener."

Overpowered by these reflections, Mr. Swiveller stopped short at the client's chair, and flung himself into its open arms.

"And this," said Mr. Swiveller, with a kind of bantering composure, "is life, I believe. Oh, certainly. Why not? I'm quite satisfied. I shall wear," added Richard, taking off his hat again and looking hard at it, as if he were only deterred by pecuniary considerations from spurning it with his foot, "I shall wear this emblem of woman's perfidy, in remembrance of her with whom I shall never again thread the windings of the mazy; whom I shall never more pledge in the rosy; who, during the short remainder of my existence, will murder the balmy. Ha, ha, ha!"

It may be necessary to observe, lest there should appear any incongruity in the close of this soliloquy, that Mr. Swiveller did not wind up with a cheerful hilarious laugh, which would have been undoubtedly at variance with his solemn reflections, but that, being in a theatrical mood, he merely achieved that performance which is designated in melo-dramas "laughing like a fiend,"—for it seems that your fiends always laugh in syllables, and always in three syllables, never more nor less, which is a remarkable property in such gentry, and one worthy of remembrance.

The baleful sounds had hardly died away, and Mr. Swiveller was still sitting in a very grim state in the client's chair, when there came a ring—or, if we may adapt the sound to his then humor, a knell—at the office bell. Opening the door with all speed, he beheld the expressive countenance of Mr. Chuckster, between whom and himself a fraternal greeting ensued.

"You're devilish early at this pestiferous old slaughter-house," said that gentleman, poisoning himself on one leg, and shaking the other in an easy manner.

"Rather," returned Dick.

"Rather!" retorted Mr. Chuckster, with that air of graceful trifling which so well became him. "I should think so. Why, my good feller, do you know what o'clock it is—half-past nine a. m. in the morning?"

"Won't you come in!" said Dick. "All alone. Swiveller solus. 'Tis now the witching—"

"Hour of night!"

"When churchyards yawn,"

"And graves give up their dead."

At the end of this quotation in dialogue, each gentleman struck an attitude, and immediately subsiding into prose, walked into the office. Such morsels of enthusiasm were common among the Glorious Apollos, and were indeed the links that bound them together, and raised them above the cold dull earth.

"Well, and how are you my buck?" said Mr. Chuckster, taking a stool. "I was forced to come into the city upon some little private matters of my own, and could n't pass the corner of the street without looking in, but upon my soul I did n't expect to find you. It is so everlastingly early."

Mr. Swiveller expressed his acknowledgments; and it appearing on further conversation that he was in good health, and that Mr. Chuckster was in the like enviable condition, both gentlemen, in compliance with a solemn custom of the ancient Brotherhood to which they belonged, joined in a fragment of the popular duet of "All's Well," with a long shake at the end.

"And what's the news?" said Richard.

"The town's as flat, my dear feller," replied Mr. Chuckster, "as the surface of a Dutch oven. There's no news. By-the-bye, that lodger of yours is a most extraordinary person. He quite eludes the most vigorous comprehension you know. Never was such a feller!"

"What has he been doing now?" said Dick.

"By Jove, sir," returned Mr. Chuckster, taking out an oblong snuff-box, the lid whereof was ornamented with a fox's head, curiously carved in brass, "that man is an unfathomable. Sir, that man has made friends with our articulated clerk. There's no harm in him, but he is so amazingly slow and soft. Now, if he wanted a friend, why could n't he have one that knew a thing or two, and could do him some good by his manners and conversation. I have my faults to, sir," said Mr. Chuckster.

"No, no," interposed Mr. Swiveller.

"Oh yes I have, I have my faults, no man knows his faults better than I know mine. But," said Mr. Chuckster, "I'm not meek. My worst enemies—every man has his enemies, sir, and I have mine—never accused me of being meek. And I tell you what, sir, if I had n't more of these qualities that commonly endear man to man, than our articulated clerk has, I'd steal a Cheshire cheese, tie it round my neck, and drown myself. I'd die degraded, as I had lived. I would upon my honor."

Mr. Chuckster paused, rapped the fox's head exactly on the nose with the knuckle of the fore-finger, took a pinch of snuff, and looked steadily at Mr. Swiveller, as much as to say that if he thought he was going to sneeze, he would find himself mistaken.

"Not contented, sir," said Mr. Chuckster, "with making friends with Abel, he has cultivated the acquaintance of his father and mother. Since he came home from that wild-goose chase, he has been there—actually been there. He patronizes young Snobby besides; you'll find that he'll be constantly coming backwards and forwards to this place: yet I do not suppose that beyond the common forms of civility, he has ever exchanged half-a-dozen words with me. Now, upon my soul, you know," said Mr. Chuckster, shaking his head gravely, "this is altogether such a low-minded affair, that if I did not feel for the governor, and knew that he could never get on without me, I should be obliged to cut the connexion. I should have no alternative."

Mr. Swiveller, who sat on another stool opposite to his friend, stirred the fire to an excess of sympathy, but said nothing.

"As to young Snob, sir," pursued Mr. Chuckster with a prophetic look, "you'll find he'll turn out bad. In our profession we know something of human nature, and take my word for it, that the feller that come back to work out that shilling, will show himself one of these days in his true colors. He's a low thief, sir. He must be."

Mr. Chuckster being roused, would probably have pursued this subject further, and in more emphatic language, but for a tap at the door, which seemed to announce the arrival of somebody on business, caused him to assume a greater appearance of meekness than was perhaps quite consistent with his late declaration. Mr. Swiveller, hearing the same sound, caused his stool to revolve rapidly on one leg until it brought him to his desk, into which, having forgotten in the sudden flurry of his spirits to part with the poker, he thrust it as he cried "Come in!"

Who should present himself but that very Kit who had been the theme of Mr. Chuckster's wrath! Never did man pluck up his courage so quickly, or look so fierce, as Mr. Chuckster when he found it was he. Mr. Swiveller stared at him for a moment, and then leaping from his stool, and drawing out the poker from its place of concealment, performed the broadsword exercise with all the cuts and guards complete, in a species of frenzy.

"Is the gentleman at home?" said Kit, rather astonished by this uncommon reception.

Before Mr. Swiveller could make any reply, Mr. Chuckster took occasion to enter his indignant protest against this form of inquiry; which he held to be of a disrespectful and snobbish tendency, inasmuch as the inquirer, seeing two gentlemen then and there present, should have spoken of the other gentleman; or rather (for it was not impossible that the object of his search might be of inferior quality) should have mentioned his name, leaving it to his hearers to determine his degree as they thought proper. Mr. Chuckster further remarked, that he had some reason to believe this form of address was personal to himself, and that he was not a man to be trifled with, as certain snobs (whom he did not more particularly mention or describe) might find to their cost.

"I mean the gentleman up stairs," said Kit, turning to Richard Swiveller, "Is he at home?"

"Why?" rejoined Dick.

"Because, if he is, I have a letter for him."

"From whom?" said Dick.

"From Mr. Garland."

"Oh!" said Dick, with extreme politeness. "Then you may hand it over, sir. And if you're to wait for an answer, sir, you may wait in the passage, sir, which is an airy and well-ventilated apartment, sir."

"Thank you," returned Kit. "But I am to give it to himself, if you please."

The excessive audacity of this retort so overpowered Mr. Chuckster, and so moved his tender regard for his friend's honor, that he declared, if he were not restrained by official considerations, he must certainly have annihilated Kit upon the spot; a resentment of the affront which he did consider, under the extraordinary circumstances of aggravation attending it, could not but have met with the proper sanction and approval of a jury of Englishmen, who, he had no doubt, would have returned a verdict of Justifiable Homicide, coupled with a high testimony to the morals and character of the Avenger. Mr. Swiveller, without being quite so hot upon the matter, was rather ashamed by his friend's excitement, and not a little puzzled how to act (Kit being quite cool and good-humored,) when the single gentleman was heard to call violently down the stairs.

"Did not I see somebody for me, come in?" cried the lodger.

"Yes, sir," replied Dick. "Certainly, sir."

"Then where is he?" roared the single gentleman.

"He's here, sir," rejoined Mr. Swiveller. "Now young man, don't you hear you're to go up stairs? Are you deaf?"

Kit did not appear to think it worth his while to enter into any further altercation, but hurried off and left the Glorious Apollos gazing at each other in silence.

"Did not I tell you so?" said Mr. Chuckster. "What do you think of that?"

Mr. Swiveller being in the main a good-natured fellow, and not perceiving in the conduct of Kit any villany of enormous magnitude, scarcely knew what answer to return. He was relieved from his perplexity, however, by the entrance of Mr. Sampson and his sister, Sally, at sight of whom Mr. Chuckster precipitately retired.

Mr. Brass and his lovely companion appeared to have been holding a consultation over their temperate breakfast, upon some matter of great interest and importance. On the occasion of such conferences, they generally appeared in the office some half an hour after their usual time, and in a very smiling state, as though their late plots and designs had tranquillized their minds and shed a light upon their toilsome way. In the present instance, they seemed particularly gay. Miss Sally's aspect being only kind, and Mr. Brass rubbing his hand in an exceedingly jocose and light-hearted manner.

"Well, Mr. Richard," said Brass. "How are we this morning? Are we pretty fresh and cheerful, sir—eh, Mr. Richard?"

"Pretty well, sir," replied Dick.

"That's well," said Brass. "Ha! ha! We should be gay as larks Mr. Richard—why not? It's a pleasant world to live in, sir, a very pleasant world. There are bad people in it, Mr. Richard, but if there were no bad people, there would be no good lawyers. Ha, ha! Any letters by the post this morning, Mr. Richard?"

Mr. Swiveller answered in the negative.

"Ha!" said Brass, "no matter. If there's little business to-day, there'll be more to-morrow. A contented spirit, Mr. Richard, is the sweetness of existence. Any body been here, sir?"

"Only my friend"—replied Dick. "May we ne'er want a—"

"Friend," Brass chimed in quickly. "or a bottle to give him. Ha, ha! That's the way the song runs, is it? A very good song, Mr. Richard, very good. I like the sentiment of it. Ha, ha! Your friend's the young man from Witherden's office, I think—yes—May we ne'er want a—Nobody else at all, been, Mr. Richard?"

"Only somebody to the lodger," replied Mr. Swiveller. "Oh indeed!" cried Brass. "Somebody to the lodger, eh? Ha, ha! May we ne'er want a friend, or a—Somebody to the lodger, eh Mr. Richard?"

"Yes," said Dick, a little disconcerted by the excessive buoyancy of spirits which his employer displayed. "With him now."

"With him now!" cried Brass; "Ha, ha! There let 'em be, merry and free, toor rul lollie. Eh, Mr. Richard? Ha, ha!"

"Oh certainly," replied Dick.

"And who," said Brass, shuffling among his papers, "who is the lodger's visitor—not a lady visitor I hope, eh, Mr. Richard? The morals of the Marks you know, sir—when lovely woman stoops to folly—and all that—eh, Mr. Richard?"

"Another young man, who belongs to Witherden's too, or half belongs there," returned Richard. "Kit, they call him."

"Kit, eh!" said Brass. "Strange name—name of a dancing-master's fiddle, eh, Mr. Richard? Ha, ha! Kit's there, is he? Oh!"

Dick looked at Miss Sally, wondering that she did not check this uncommon exuberance on the part of Mr. Sampson; but as she made no attempt to do so, and rather appeared to exhibit a tacit acquiescence in it, he concluded that they had just been cheating somebody, and receiving the bill.

"Will you have the goodness, Mr. Richard," said Brass, taking a letter from his desk, "just to step over to Peckham Rye with that? There's no answer, but it's rather particular and should go by hand. Charge the office with your coach hire back, you know; do not spare the office; get as much out of it as you can—clerk's motto—Eh, Mr. Richard? Ha, ha!"

Mr. Swiveller solemnly doffed the aquatic jacket, put on his coat, took down his hat from its peg, pocketed the letter, and departed. Directly he was gone, uprose Miss Sally Brass, and smiling sweetly at her brother (who nodded and smote his nose in return) withdrew also.

Sampson Brass was no sooner left alone, than he set the office door wide open, and establishing himself at his desk directly opposite, so that he could not fail to see any body who came down stairs and passed out at the street door, began to write with extreme cheerfulness and assiduity; humming as he did so, in a voice that was any thing but musical, certain vocal snatches which appeared to have reference to the union between Church and State, inasmuch as they were compounded of the Evening Hymn and God save the King.

Thus, the attorney of Bevis Marks sat, and wrote, and hummed, for a long time, except when he stopped to listen with a very cunning face, and hearing nothing, went humming louder, and writing slower than ever. At length, in one of those pauses, he heard his lodger's door opened and shut, and footsteps coming down the stairs. Then Mr. Brass left off writing entirely, and with his pen in his hand hummed his very loudest; shaking his head meanwhile from side to side like a man whose whole soul was in the music, and smiling in a manner quite seraphic.

It was towards this moving spectacle that the staircase and the sweet sounds guided Kit, on whose arrival before his door, Mr. Brass stopped his singing, but not his smiling, and nodded affably, at the same time beckoning to him with his pen.

"Kit," said Mr. Brass, in the pleasantest way imaginable, "how do you do?"

Kit being rather shy of his friend, made a suitable reply, and had his hand upon the lock of the street door when Mr. Brass called him softly back.

"You are not to go, if you please, Kit," said the attorney in a mysterious and yet business-like way. "You are to step in here, if you please. Dear me, dear me! When I look at you," said the lawyer, quitting his stool, and standing before the fire with his back towards it, "I am reminded of the sweetest little face that ever my eyes beheld. I remember your coming there twice or thrice when we were in possession. Ah Kit, my dear fellow, gentlemen in my profession have such painful duties to perform sometimes that you need not envy us—you need not indeed!"

"I don't, sir," said Kit, "though it isn't for the like of me to judge."

"Our only consolation, Kit," pursued the lawyer, looking at him in a sort of pensive abstraction, "is, that although we cannot turn away the wind, we can soften it; we can temper it, if I may say so, to the shorn lambs."

"Shorn indeed!" thought Kit. "Pretty close!" But he did not say so.

"On that occasion, Kit," said Mr. Brass, "on that occasion that I have just alluded to, I had a hard battle with Mr. Quilp (for Mr. Quilp is a very hard man) to obtain them the indulgence they had. It might have cost me a client. But suffering virtue inspired me, and I prevailed."

"He's not so bad after all," thought honest Kit, as the attorney pursed up his lips and looked like a man who was struggling with his better feelings.

"I respect you, Kit," said Brass with emotion. "I saw enough of your conduct at that time to respect you, though your station is humble, and your fortune lowly. It isn't the waistcoat that I look at. It is the heart. The checks in the waistcoat are but the wires of the cage. But the heart is the bird. Ah! How many such birds are perpetually moulted, and putting their beaks through the wires to peck at all mankind!"

This poetic figure, which Kit took to be in special allusion to his own checked waistcoat, quite overcame him; Mr. Brass's voice and manner added not a little to its effect, for he discoursed with all the mild austerity of a hermit, and wanted but a cord round the waist of his rusty surt-out, and a skull on the chimney-piece, to be completely set up in that line of business.

"Well, well," said Sampson, smiling as good men smile when they compassionate their own weakness or that of their fellow creatures, "this is wide of the bull's-eye. You're to take that, if you please." As he spoke, he pointed to a couple of half-crowns upon the desk.

Kit looked at the coins, and then at Sampson, and hesitated.

"For yourself," said Brass.

"From—"

"No matter about the person they came from," replied the lawyer. "Say me, if you like. We have eccentric friends overhead, Kit, and we mustn't ask questions or talk too much—you understand. You're to take them, that's all; and between you and me, I don't think they'll be the last you'll have to take from the same place. I hope not. Good bye, Kit. Good bye!"

With many thanks, and many more self-reproaches for having on such slight grounds suspected one who in their very first conversation turned out such a different man from what he had supposed, Kit took the money and made the best of his way home. Mr. Brass remained airing himself at the fire; and resumed his vocal exercise, and his seraphic smile, simultaneously.

"May I come in?" said Miss Sally, peeping.

"Oh yes, you may come in," returned her brother.

"Ahem!" coughed Miss Brass, interrogatively.

"Yes," returned Sampson, "I should say as good as done."

CHAPTER LVII.

Mr. Chuckster's indignant apprehensions were not without foundation. Certainly the friendship between the single gentleman and Mr. Garland was not suffered to cool, but had a rapid growth and flourished exceedingly. They were soon in habits of constant intercourse and communication; and the single gentleman laboring at this time under a slight attack of illness—the consequence most probably of his late excited feelings and subsequent disappointment—furnished a reason for their holding yet more frequent correspondence; so that some one of the inmates of Abel Gottage, Finchley, came backwards and forwards between that place and Bevis Marks, almost every day.

As the pony had now thrown off all disguise, and without any mincing of the matter or beating about the bush, studiously refused to be driven by anybody but Kit, it generally happened that whether old Mr. Garland came, or Mr. Abel, Kit was of the party. Of all messages and inquiries, Kit was in right of his position the bearer; thus it came about that, while the single gentleman remained indisposed, Kit turned into Bevis Marks every morning with nearly as much regularity as the General Postman.

Mr. Sampson Brass, who no doubt had his reasons for looking sharply about him, soon learnt to distinguish the pony's trot and the clatter of the little chaise at the corner of the street. Whenever this sound reached his ears, he would immediately lay down his pen and fall to rubbing his hands and exhibiting the greatest glee.

"Ha, ha!" he would cry. "Here's the pony again. Most remarkable pony, extremely docile, eh, Mr. Richard, eh, sir?"

Dick would return some matter-of-course reply, and Mr. Brass, standing on the bottom rail of his stool, so as to get a view of the street over the top of the window-blind, would take an observation of the visitors.

"The old gentleman again!" he would exclaim, "a very prepossessing old gentleman, Mr. Richard—charming countenance—extremely calm—benevolence in every feature, sir. He quite realises my idea of King Lear, as he appeared when in possession of his kingdom, Mr. Richard—the same good-humor, the same white hair and partial baldness, the same liability to be imposed upon. Ah! A sweet subject for contemplation sir, very sweet!"

Then, Mr. Garland, having alighted and gone up-stairs, Sampson would nod and smile to Kit from the window, and presently walk out into the street to greet him, when some such conversation as the following would ensue.

"Admirably groomed, Kit"—Mr. Brass is patting the pony—"does you great credit—amazingly sleek and bright to be sure. He literally looks as if he had been varnished all over."

Kit touches his hat, smiles, pats the pony himself, and expresses his conviction, "that Mr. Brass will not find many like him."

"A beautiful animal indeed!" cries Brass. "Sagacious too!"

"Bless you!" replies Kit, "he knows what you say to him as well as a Christian does."

"Does he indeed?" cries Brass, who has heard the same thing in the same place from the same person in the same words a dozen times, but is paralysed with astonishment notwithstanding. "Dear me!"

"I little thought the first time I saw him, sir," says Kit, pleased with the attorney's strong interest in his favorite, "that I should come to be as intimate with him as I am now."

"Ah!" rejoins Mr. Brass, brim-full of moral precepts and love of virtue. "A charming subject of reflection for you, very charming. A subject of proper pride and congratulation, Christopher. Honesty is the best policy. I always find it so myself. I lost forty-seven pound ten by being honest this morning. But it's all gain, it's all gain!"

Mr. Brass slyly tickles nose with his pen, and looks at Kit with the water standing in his eyes. Kit thinks that if ever there was a good man who belied his appearance, that man is Sampson Brass.

"A man," says Sampson, "who loses forty-seven pound ten in one morning by his honesty, is a man to be envied. If it had been eighty pound, the luxuriousness of feeling would have been increased. Every pound lost would have been a hundred weight of happiness gained. The still, small voice, Christopher," cries Brass smiling, and tapping himself on the bosom, "is a singing comic songs within me, and all is happiness and joy!"

Kit is so improved by the conversation, and finds it go so completely home to his feelings, that he is considering what he shall say, when Mr. Garland appears. The old gentleman is helped into the chaise with great obsequiousness by Mr. Sampson Brass; and the pony, after shaking his head several times, and standing for three or four minutes with all his four legs planted firmly on the ground as if he had made up his mind never to stir from that spot, but there to live and die, suddenly darts off without the smallest notice, at the rate of twelve English miles an hour. Then Mr. Brass and his sister (who has joined him at the door) exchange an odd kind of smile—not at all a pleasant one in its expression—and return to the society of Mr. Richard Swiveller, who, during their absence, has been regaling himself with various feats of pantomime, and is discovered at his desk, in a very flushed and heated condition, violently scratching out nothing with half a penknife.

Whenever Kit came alone, and without the chaise, it always happened that Sampson Brass was reminded of some mission, calling Mr. Swiveller, if not to Peckham Rye again, at all events to some pretty distant place from which he could not be expected to return for two or three hours, or in all probability a much longer period, as that gentleman was not, to say the truth, renowned for using great expedition on such occasions, but rather for protracting and spinning out the time to the very utmost limit of possibility. Mr. Swiveller out of sight, Miss Sally immediately withdrew. Mr. Brass would then set the office-door wide open, hum his old tune with great gayety of heart, and smile seraphically as before. Kit coming down-stairs would be called in; entertained with some moral and agreeable conversation; perhaps entreated to mind the office for an instant while Mr. Brass stepped over the way; and afterward presented with one or two half-crowns as the case might be. This occurred so often, that Kit, nothing doubting but that they came from the single gentleman, who had already rewarded his mother with great liberality, could not enough admire his generosity; and bought so many cheap presents for her, and for little Jacob, and for the baby, and for Barbara to boot, that one or other of them was having some new trifle every day of their lives.

While these acts and deeds were in progress in and out of the office of Sampson Brass, Richard Swiveller, being often left alone therein, began to find the time hang heavy on his hands. For the better preservation of his cheerfulness therefore, and to prevent his faculties from rusting, he provided himself with a cribbage-board and pack of cards, and accustomed himself to play at cribbage with a dummy, for twenty, thirty, or sometimes even fifty thousand pounds a side, besides many hazardous bets to a considerable amount. As these games were very silently conducted, notwithstanding the magnitude of the interests involved, Mr. Swiveller began to think that on those evenings when Mr. and Miss Brass were out (and they often went out now) he heard a kind of snorting or hard-breathing sound in the direction of the door, which it occurred to him, after some reflection, must proceed from the small servant, who always had a cold from damp living. Looking intently that way one night, he plainly distinguished an eye gleaming and glistening at the keyhole; and having now no thought that his suspicions were correct, he stole softly to the door, and pounced upon her before she was aware of his approach.

"Oh! I did n't mean any harm, indeed. Upon my word I did n't," cried the small servant, struggling like a much larger one. "It's so very dull, down stairs. Please do n't tell upon me; please do n't."

"Tell upon you!" said Dick. "Do you mean to say you were looking through the keyhole for company?"

"Yes, upon my word I was," replied the small servant. "How long have you been cooling your eye there?" said Dick.

"Oh, ever since you first began to play them cards, and long before."

Vague recollections of several fantastic exercises with which he had refreshed himself after the fatigues of business, and to all of which, no doubt, the small servant was a party, rather disconcerted Mr. Swiveller; but he was not very sensitive on such points, and recovered himself speedily.

"Well—come in"—he said, after a little consideration. "Here—sit down, and I'll teach you how to play."

"Oh! I durst n't do it," rejoined the small servant; "Miss Sally 'd kill me, if she know'd I came up here."

"Have you got a fire down stairs?" said Dick. "A very little one," replied the small servant.

"Miss Sally could n't kill me if she know'd I went down there, so I'll come," said Richard, putting the cards into his pocket. "Why how thin you are! What do you mean by it?"

"It ain't my fault."

"Could you eat any bread and meat?" said Dick, taking down his hat. "Yes! Ah! I thought so. Did you ever taste beer?"

"I had a sip of it once," said the small servant.

"Here's a state of things!" cried Mr. Swiveller, raising his eyes to the ceiling. "She never tasted it—it can't be tasted in a sip! Why, how old are you?"

"I do n't know."

Mr. Swiveller opened his eyes very wide, and appeared thoughtful for a moment; then bidding the child mind the door until he came back, vanished straightway.

Presently he returned, followed by the boy from the public house, who bore in one hand a plate of bread and beef, and in the other a great pot, filled with some very fragrant compound, which sent forth a grateful steam, and was indeed choice purl, made after a particular recipe which Mr. Swiveller had imparted to the landlord at a period when he was deep in his books and desirous to conciliate his friendship. Relieving the boy of his burden at the door, and charging his little companion to fasten it to prevent surprise, Mr. Swiveller followed her into the kitchen.

"There!" said Richard, putting the plate before her. "First of all, clear that off, and then you'll see what's next."

The small servant needed no second bidding, and the plate was soon empty.

"Next," said Dick, handing the purl, "take a pull at that; but moderate your transports, you know, for you're not used to it. Well, is it good?"

"Oh! is n't it?" said the small servant.

Mr. Swiveller appeared gratified beyond all expression by this reply, and took a long draught himself, steadfastly regarding his companion while he did so. These preliminaries disposed of, he applied himself to teaching her the game, which she soon learnt tolerably well, being both sharp-witted and cunning.

"Now," said Mr. Swiveller, putting two sixpences into a saucer, and trimming the wretched candle, when the cards had been cut and dealt, "those are the stakes. If you win, you get 'em all. If I win, I get 'em. To make it seem more real and pleasant, I shall call you the Marchioness, do you hear?"

The small servant nodded.

"Then, Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, "fire away!"

The Marchioness, holding her cards very tight in both hands, considered which to play, and Mr. Swiveller, assuming the gay and fashionable air which such society required, took another pull at the tankard, and waited for her lead.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1841

[G.] We have been deeply impressed and gratified with the kind and liberal manner in which our literary enterprises have been noticed by our brethren of the press in various parts of the country. We wish that we could possibly command any facility of expression, by which our grateful sentiments could be conveyed to them. We shall hail any opportunity of reciprocation with the most sincere pleasure. We would travel many a weary mile to take our noble-hearted contemporaries by the hand, and say to them, "Gentlemen, from our heart of hearts we thank you. You have conferred great benefits upon us. God bless you—friends; and a happy New Year to you all!"

GOV. SEWARD'S MESSAGE.

The message of the Governor to the Legislature of New-York was delivered at Albany on Tuesday at 1 o'clock, P. M., and received in this city by express at 2 o'clock A. M. on Wednesday. It is an able and interesting document, but its great length (eight close columns of the Albany Argus) forbids its insertion entire in our columns. We devote some time and patience to the gleanings of its most important facts and recommendations.

After a clever preliminary flourish, the Governor gives the following statement (substantially) of the finances and pecuniary condition of the State:

1. Revenue for 1840.—Auction duties.....$164,621 38
Salt do..... 156,961 16

This is a falling off from the receipts of last year of $60,780 46 on Auctions, and $33,301 96 on Salt, owing to the general depression of business. But three new salt Springs of the best quality have been discovered at Salina, and one at Montezuma, which will probably induce an increase of the quantity manufactured.

2. Canals. The Canal Tolls and Water Rents of 1840 amounted in all to.....$1,006,827 45

Deduct Superintendence, Repairs, &c., (except interest)..... 598 011 87

And the net revenue remaining was.....$1,020,815 58

Falling below the net revenue of 1839 by.. 36,981 18

The total Canal Receipts of 1840 are.....1,775,747 57

Being an increase on 1839 of..... 159,365 55

3. Literature and School Funds.—School Fund, Jan. 1st, 1840.....2,033,897 95

Interest on U. S. Deposit Fund for 1840.... 165,000 09

Total School Fund Revenue for 1840, inclusive..... 268,400 85

Total paid out for the support of Common Schools..... 275,010 10

Capital of the Literature Fund..... 268,777 99

Revenue of do. incl. $28,000 from U. S. Deposit..... 46,935 84

Amount paid out of do. in 1840..... 47,871 97

4. Scholars. The number of students in all the colleges of New-York is 662: viz., Columbia, 120; New-York University, 115; Union, 273; Hamilton, 94; Geneva, 60.

Number of students in all the Academies of the State. 34,803

Do. in the Common Schools, about.....570,000

Whole number of children in the State between 5 and 16.....600,000

Number of School Districts in the State, about.....11,000

Average duration of schools, eight months in the year.

The School District Libraries are warmly and justly commended by the Governor. He estimates that 1,000,000 volumes have through them already been distributed through the State.

The Asylum for the Insane (at Utica) will be completed so as to be ready to go into operation next season. It will accommodate 250 persons.

The Geological survey of the State will be completed next June. The state offices will by that time be transferred to the new State Hall, and the old one be fitted up for the reception of Botanical, Mineralogical and Geological specimens. The collection will be larger than any ever before gathered in this country.

The Governor thinks the currency bill of last session, requiring all the banks of the State to redeem their notes in New York or Albany, has had a good effect. The state currency has generally been kept in good condition.

Of the Bank Safety Fund $282,333 83, with $52,795 17 received from the contributing Banks, have been applied to the redemption of the notes of the broken City Bank of Buffalo, now in the process of liquidation. The Wayne County Bank has lately been placed under injunction, but its notes are redeemed at the State Treasury, out of the Safety Fund. The remaining capital of that Fund is $556,486 76.

The number of convicts in the Auburn State Prison on the 30th Sept. last was 667; 215 received during the preceding year, 12 died, 35 were pardoned, and of 134 the terms expired. Receipts for labor during the year, $61,355 35; expenses of the prison (including improvements and the payment of debts), $57,928 10. Excess of earnings over ordinary expenses, $6,917 39.

The number of convicts in the Sing-Sing prison at the same time was 832; admitted during the year, 356; discharged by death, 16; pardon, 20; expiration of term, 192; earnings, $83,504 14; expenses, $77,460.

"The fiscal condition of the prisons is highly satisfactory, and their discipline has been improved. The complaints of cruelty which heretofore engaged public sympathy, and brought our penitentiary system into disrepute, have altogether ceased. Sunday schools have been maintained; and in pursuance of my recommendation, the cell of each prisoner is always supplied with a volume of the School District Library. This measure was followed by a gratifying improvement in the conduct of the prisoners. Many wearisome hours of solitary confinement are beguiled, resolutions of repentance and reformation are formed, and the minds of the unhappy convicts, accustomed to the contemplation of virtue and expanded by knowledge, are gradually prepared to resist the temptations which await them on their return to society."

The number of pardons granted during the last two years have been much less than in former years. Sixteen persons have been convicted of murder during these two years, of whom nine have suffered the penalty of the law, and two more now await the same fate. The sentences of three have been commuted to imprisonment for life, one reversed by the Court Errors, and one (who plead guilty) has been proved insane. The Governor recommends a consideration of the policy of inflicting the punishment of death.

The Commissioners appointed to mediate between the patroon and tenants of the manor of Rensselaerwyck, have attended to their duties, and will soon submit a report.

The canals were navigable during 1840 from the 20th of April to the 4th of December, with very little interruption. The repair of the dam across the Hudson at Troy and other important constructions has increased the cost of repairs during the last year.

The enlargement of the Erie Canal is prosecuted with vigor. The total amount expended upon it prior to 1840, was $4,669,661; appropriation of 1840, $2,500,000; surplus canal revenue of do. applicable to the same purpose, $369,171. Thus between January 1st, 1840, and March 1, 1841, $2,569,171, will have been expended on this work making an aggregate of $7,538,832. It is believed by the present Canal Commissioners that the work can be completed at a cost not exceeding the corrected estimates of their predecessors—viz: $23,112,766. Of course, the sum required to complete the work is $15,573,934. It may be finished from Albany to Rome in 1843; thence to Rochester in 1845; and thence to Buffalo in 1847.

The Black River Canal is estimated to cost $2,431,699, of which about $1,200,000 has been expended.

The Genesee Valley Canal is estimated to cost $4,900,122, of which sum $2,500,000 will have been expended by 1st of March next. This work is partly in operation.

Of the New York and Erie Railroad, 45 miles, reaching from Piermont on the Hudson to Goshen, will be put in operation within the present month. Seventy-one miles further are graded, ninety-one more under contract, and the company are about closing contracts for one hundred and eighty-eight miles further. The whole length of the road will be four hundred and forty-six miles, and the company hope to complete it in two years more, at an aggregate expense of $9,000,000. They solicit further aid from the State.

The Auburn and Rochester Railroad will be completed within eighteen months, leaving only forty miles wanting, (from Batavia to Buffalo,) to a complete Railroad communication from the Hudson to Lake Erie.

The Commissioners have completed their survey of the route of the Ogdensburg and Lake Champlain Railroad. The Governor recommends this work, as calculated to aid in developing the vast mineral resources of the Northern region of the State.

All the Railroad and other Companies aided by the State have promptly paid their interest and fulfilled their engagements to the State during the past year.

The following is the aggregate liability of the State, not including the old canal debt, which is regarded as paid by the accumulation and appropriation of funds for that purpose, nor the received loans of the credit of the State in aid of works of Internal Improvement:

Debt of the general fund, exclusive of what is called the permanent loan to the Treasury from the canal revenues..... $1,412,961 62
Debts for the lateral canals that are completed, including the recent loan for the Chemung canal..... 3,551,784 71
Debts contracted for unfinished works, viz: For the enlargement of the Erie canal.... 6,500,000 00
For the Black River canal..... 1,050,000 00
For the Genesee Valley canal..... 2,500,000 00
For the Oneida River improvement..... 50,000 00
Aggregate State debt.....$15,064,746 33
The nett revenues of all the canals during the last fiscal year, after deducting all expenditures, and the deficiencies of the lateral canals, were.....	$1,020,815 57

Leaving a clear surplus, after paying an interest on the debt for the enlargement of the Erie canal, and the $400,000 annually loaned to the Treasury, of.....	$398,095 95
The commissioners of the canal fund estimate that the clear surplus of the current fiscal year will be.....	$570,000 00
The expenditures from the general fund, during the fiscal year, exclusive of the deficiencies of the lateral canals, were..	$779,324 36
The receipts from the sources provided by law were.....	$379,211 01
From the payment of the balance due the preceding year from the canal fund, and from other sources.....	$400,113 35

The enrolled Militia of the State amount to 193,100 men, of whom 7,336 are cavalry, and 9,052 artillery.

The Governor strenuously objects to any withdrawing of the United States surplus revenue of 1837 deposited with the States; recommends a reduction of the salt duties; a review and revision of the subject of legal reform; the establishment of schools in our prisons; the refusal of our jails for the imprisonment of debtors arrested under process from Federal Courts; a revision of our Election Laws; and the establishment of new safeguards for the Elective Franchise, especially that wilful voting, or registering illegally be punished as felony; special efforts to secure the education of the Children of Foreigners; a decisive settlement and declaration of the policy of the State with regard to Internal Improvements; the reduction of Militia duty to a single yearly parade of companies; a relief of the Society of Friends from the penalties to which they are liable for refusing to do military duty; and zealously urges the Distribution of the Proceeds of the Public Lands among the States, &c. &c. We have less misgivings in curtailing these recommendations, as we feel certain that a great proportion of our New York readers will have already perused or will otherwise receive the Message. They will find it richly deserving an earnest and careful perusal.

Our articles upon the Navy of the United States have excited much observation and comment. Their truth no less than their severity has been acknowledged. There is no doubt but that they will arouse public attention to a subject most important to our national welfare and our national honor. The American flag has been too long disgraced by the conduct of those who should have been prompt to yield up their lives sooner than suffer stain or blot to rest upon a single stripe or star in its ample folds. These high officers can no longer escape exposure; their injustice, their oppression, their cruelties, their iniquities, their vices—so practised and persevered in as to put the service to open shame—will no longer be suffered to rot in obscurity, but they shall be unseparated and displayed, till their very putrescence shall compel an immediate abatement and removal.

We invite all to whom the respectability of the Navy is dear, to aid in our efforts in destroying this nuisance, by free and unreserved communications. Let us be informed of every case of tyranny, every mean and contemptible assumption of authority, every instance of villainy, and we will publish them, and bring down a popular retribution, if not official punishment, on the heads of the perpetrators. Let it be borne in mind, however, that we can give circulation to no facts which are anonymously conveyed; we must know the names of our correspondents. They may rely upon our observing the strictest secrecy. Fully aware of the persecutions to which the junior officers would be liable, if they were known to assist in any exposition of the crimes of their superiors, we shall scrupulously conceal the sources from which all our information has been or is to be derived. Simple names attached to letters will not be sufficient; we must have either direct personal interviews with the writers, or with those who can attest their credibility. The reasonableness of this requisition on our part cannot fail to be understood and acknowledged, when we state that we are subject to deceptions, and that hoaxes will undoubtedly be attempted to be practised upon us by fools who try to be funny, or by enemies, who may wish to injure our cause by casting it into ridicule. We shall vigilantly guard against any such impositions. We have engaged in this labor for the good of the Navy; and though we may be accused of incompetency to effect what we have undertaken, nobody shall reproach us for a lack of perseverance.

THE EVERGREEN, published by J. Winchester.—The January number of this cheap and generous Magazine is ready for subscribers. It is the first of the second volume. Some of the novels which were commenced last year are continued; but the matter is for the most part as new as it is interesting. Of the tales that are continued, the commencements can be obtained: and, in no other form, can so copious a quantity of entertaining reading be procured at so reasonable a charge. (Price 18 3-4 cents a single number, $2 a year.)

COLD.—The thermometer at Northampton, Mass., on the morning of the 5th inst. stood at 26 degrees below zero.

LATER FROM EUROPE.

The packet ship ENGLAND, Capt. Waite, arrived Wednesday evening from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 9th ult. She brings London dates to the evening of the 8th—five days later than our previous advices. The intelligence is favorable and interesting.

Full particulars of all important occurrences will be found in the letters of our attentive correspondents. Our best thanks, and those of our readers, are due to them both for the promptitude and fidelity with which such interesting intelligence is communicated.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, Monday evening, Dec. 7, 1840.

EGYPT, SYRIA, AND TURKEY.

We have received intelligence this morning of a late date from Egypt, Syria and Turkey, but the overland mail from India, should there be one for this month, has not yet reached town, although hourly expected. The news from Alexandria reach down to the 17th, at which time no formal submission of the Pacha was known, but at Constantinople on the 18th it was believed currently that a despatch had arrived making some proposals which might possibly be accepted. These were—that Mehemet Ali would deliver up the Turkish fleet and recall his troops from Syria, but, with the sole condition of his being allowed hereditary possession of Egypt. In the meantime the fleet at Alexandria have been to a certain extent dismantled, their sails unbent, their ammunition withdrawn, and most of their crews landed to assist in defending the batteries. The blockade announced for the 21st, as far as known, will be rigorously enforced, and fifteen vessels belonging to the Allies had already congregated, but many believe that some cessation of hostilities had been applied for to the English Admiral, who was looked for every moment. The Pacha has concluded that the friendship of France would be of little assistance in his extremities, and high words had passed between him and M. Cochelet, the Consul General. The breach had however been again smoothed over.

Three days after the fall of Acre another magazine exploded from some cause which still is undiscovered. About 280 persons were killed and maimed, more than half of whom were native women and children. There were only a small number of the English in the immediate vicinity of the explosion, who escaped with the loss of about twenty men and two or three officers wounded. Ibrahim Pacha was, at last accounts, at Zaachally, a valley close to the Lebanon hills. The forces under his control including those of Solymann and Hussein Pachas, are stated at 12,000 infantry and 2000 cavalry. The coast road is in the possession of the Allies, and there is but one way left for his retreat, by Tiberias, which may also be cut off by the Napoleonse mountaineers, who are believed to have risen against him. Under any circumstances he can only escape with great loss of men and abandonment of his artillery and materials.

FRANCE.

The address to the King of France by the Chambers has been carried by a large majority. This matter has occupied the attention of the House during the past fortnight, and in discussing its wordings much angry and impolitic language has been used against the recent course of England. The new Ministry have withstood the ordeal well, and in proportion to the dignity maintained by M. Guizot. The miserable charlatan, Thiers, has been exposed and degraded in the eyes of all honorable men. Towards the close of the debate, his own personal honor was severely brought in question by one of the Deputies, in which the coincidence of a fall of five per cent. at the Bourse on the funds, was remarked as taking place when arming ordinances had been signed, but withheld for four days from publication. "True," said the accuser, "a mock enquiry was instituted, but the curtain is still drawn over this disgraceful affair." But this is nothing to the duplicity which has been revealed as to the ex-Minister's diplomatic conduct. For a season we were to have an armed peace, but in the approaching spring, should the allies persevere in the East, the intention of the French Government were distinctly to extend their provinces to the Rhine. It was also openly acknowledged that the fleet were ordered from the Levant to cover, in case of difficulties, the Balearic Islands, and if war occurred with England, to take them for a stronghold, as part and parcel of French territory. What will Spain say to this, and what must Austria and Germany?

The virulence against England as delivered in the French Chambers has, on one or two days of the past week, operated on the English funds, but they have now rallied and stand about the highest point at which they have lately been quoted. This afternoon they close at 89 to 89 1-3 ex-dividend for the January account, but in the morning they opened at less prices from some renewed fears of the contemplated loan for France. The French funds continue about the same, the five per cents 110.80. No fears are felt as to any outbreak at the funeral pageant of the 15th, but strong bodies of military have been collected in Paris and likewise planted on the line from Cherbourg. Louis Napoleon, it is stated, will on that day be released from his imprisonment.

LONDON, Tuesday Evening, December 8, 1840.

The overland mail from India has been received this morning by extraordinary express. The news is of the utmost importance.

EGYPT.

By this conveyance dates are received from Alexandria to the 26th. The blockade which was to have commenced on the 21st had been recalled, and on the 22d a communication was conveyed from Commodore Napier to the Pacha, informing him of the Sultan's willingness to restore him the hereditary Pachalic of Egypt if the fleet was immediately restored and the troops withdrawn from Syria. This has been officially acceded to, and the war in the Levant has now terminated. The arrangements were not finally concluded until the 26th, the main difference being as to the manner of evacuating Syria. The Pacha wished to march his army homeward by land, but Commodore Napier insisted on their being transported by sea under his own immediate inspection. This the Pacha has submitted to. The port of embarkation is not yet, however, publicly announced, but most probably Beyrout has been agreed on.

CHINA.

From Bombay this mail brings dates to the 31st October and Macao to the 4th of August. The island of Chusan was taken by the English on the 5th of July, the Chinese having fled on the discharge of two broadsides. The squadron anchored in the harbor the day previous, opposite the chief town. A conference was held with the leading Mandarins, who, on being told they must surrender, promised an answer next morning, at the same time stating that they dare not for their own safety give up the place without some contest. As no communication was received on the following day, a shot was fired over the town. This the Chinese answered by discharging their batteries and war junks. A couple of broadsides from the fleet produced a general scamper, and the British flag was soon hoisted on the fortifications. The loss of the Chinese was but trifling, not exceeding 25 killed, among whom was the Governor of the island. The English sustained no damage of any description excepting the Mellville frigate, which struck on a sunken rock, and will probably be sent to Bombay for repairs. Admiral and Captain Elliot went a few days afterwards to Ning-po, a large town in the neighborhood, where they were courteously received by the Mandarins, but who declined to forward an official letter to the Emperor. It is since stated that they were preparing to go to Peking themselves.

A proclamation has been issued from one of Lin's sub-governors calling on the people to go out and destroy the English rebels. Likewise to cut off the heads of all Englishmen, on producing which a handsome bonus will be given. Honors, rewards, and happiness will be the lot of the Chinese patriots, and why, says Lin, "will you continue poor and servile when by one effort you may be rich and honored." An order has also been issued compelling the Hong merchants to enlist soldiers to the number of five thousand whom they must support, in conjunction with the salt monopolists and Chin-chew dealers. Several men of war were sent to the Bogue forts at the Macao entrance on the 3d of August, the day before this intelligence left, to reduce the batteries and clear the channel. Some dissatisfaction has been stated at this proceeding being deferred so long as a greater moral effect might have been easier produced on the Chinese people. We see no accounts whether the American merchants were at Macao.

INDIA.

The Indian news also possesses strong interest, by intelligence of the defeat of Dost Mahomed, near Berneau, on the 18th Sept. The Dost, supported by the Walee of Kohistan, had collected from 7,000 to 10,000 men, to make one more desperate attempt to recover his throne, and was fast advancing on Cabul. The British troops, numbering only 700, and these swarthy natives made an attack, which they executed with such precision as to throw the enemy into immediate confusion. They soon rallied, however, and charged in the most ferocious manner. The British stood the shock with great coolness, and after an action of several hours, forced the enemies' troops to flight, leaving 500 men dead on the field, and all their camp equipage, and all the heavy pieces of ordnance in their possession. They carried their wounded with them, which are reckoned at 1500, among whom the Dost himself, and who has since fled into Kohistan, with only a few followers. The loss on the British side is said to be 18 killed and wounded. This signal defeat is most important in a political point of view, and will certainly prevent any further attempts from the same quarter.

A general feeling of satisfaction has been felt throughout the city to-day, by the news received per the London mail and which is considered to add fresh lustre to British valor and British statesmanship. We hope sincerely the results may conduce to the peace of the world. Every one must feel grieved at the late sickening details of war and bloodshed.

FRANCE.

We have nothing of importance from Paris. The preparations for the reception of Napoleon's remains go on actively, and will be in readiness by the 15th. General Mentholon, now a prisoner in Ham, has addressed Marshal Soult, entreating his liberty for that day, to attend the ceremony. His appeal dare not be refused.

COMMERCIAL.

LONDON, Monday Evening, Dec. 7.

The tightness of the money market which we spoke of by the steamer of the 3d has been somewhat relieved and at the close of the week, the rates of discounts had fallen a half per cent. A large amount of bills falling due on the 10th, may account for this improvement and it is remarked that these engagements were honored with unusual promptness. The ruling rates on first class paper may now be quoted at five and a half to three quarters for four months, and a quarter per cent less on sixty day bills.

The foreign exchanges last Friday, looked somewhat better than on the previous post day, and there now exists but little inducement to continue any shipments of bullion. Still the Bank Directors have great anxiety on this score, and the recovering balance with the continent may be very severely retarded should the foreign loans now agitated be carried into effect. The French issue of £24,000,000 is not yet announced officially, but during the present week when the secret service money will be granted, we shall be able to see the intentions across the channel. Turkey, Belgium and the Brazils are also ready with their issues, and this state of matters must keep the Bank of England from any extension of the currency until events shall have shewn themselves.

The Cotton Market at Liverpool, maintains its briskness and gives promise of still further improvement. In Manchester the trade has increased, and on some description of yarns an advance has taken place. Since last August the prices of this article for export, has fallen eight to ten per cent., caused by the stoppage of the Levant trade and the very trifling shipments to India. Within a fortnight a fresh spur has been given to the market by parties speculating in anticipation of large orders by the overland mail, which, from all that may be judged, will likely be supported. An estimate has been lately published of the spinning business of the Continent, from which we observe that 6,500,000 spindles are now in operation, 3,500,000 of which are in France, and the wages of labor is stated to be 7s. there to 10s. 6d. in England. The Havre market is looking better, and last week's sales were 3766 bales. The stock there is now estimated at 106,000 bales. No improvement in prices is however yet noted.

LONDON, Tuesday Evening, Dec. 8.

The English securities have improved to-day to some extent. Last evening they closed at 89 to 1-8 and are this afternoon 89 1-2 ex-dividend for January. They will go up still higher unless the money market should be more discouraging.

The news from China has somewhat affected the tea trade, which at the public sales this morning opened very dull. They have partially recovered and we may quote Company's congons at 29 3 1-4d. to 20 3 1-2d.

The exchanges for to-nights mail are about the same range as our last quotations.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, Saturday, Dec. 5, 1840.

On Thursday last, the greatest surprise was excited throughout the metropolis on learning that a boy had been found under a sofa in her Majesty's dressing room. He was immediately given into custody. He stated on being questioned, that he had, on Monday night, at nine o'clock, scaled the wall at Constitution Hill, and, having reached the palace, effected an entrance at one of the windows. He had not, however, been long inside before he considered it unsafe to stay, as he heard the steps of several persons moving about; and he therefore left by the same mode as he entered.

The next day (Tuesday), about nine o'clock in the evening, he again effected an entrance over the wall on Constitution-hill, and by a window, in the same manner as on the previous night; and he went on to state that he remained in the Palace the whole of Tuesday night, the whole day on Wednesday, and up till one o'clock on Thursday morning, when he was discovered under a sofa in her Majesty's dressing-room, as above described. The prisoner pointed out, as we are told, all the passages and places he had gone through previous to his arrival at the room in which he was discovered and apprehended, and there appears no reason to doubt his statement. The hiding place of the intruder was first discovered by one of her Majesty's pages, and when he was asked what brought him there, he replied, as we heard in an audible tone of voice, that he wanted to see what was going forward in the Palace, that he might write about it, and if he was discovered he should be as well off as Oxford, who fared better in Bedlam than he (prisoner) did out of it. He was also asked, we are told, if, during the time he was in the Palace, he saw the Queen or the infant Princess, and he replied that he did not, but that he had heard a noise, which he thought came from her Majesty's room.

The prisoner name is Jones. His age is about 17. He is the same youth who effected an entrance into Buckingham Palace, under somewhat similar circumstances two years ago. He has worked with his father for some time as a tailor, but had latterly acted as boy in the shop of a chemist in Westminster. His father thinks he is of unsound mind. A more repulsive looking young man is rarely seen. At his examination at the Home office he assumed very consequential airs, desiring the police and others to address him in a respectful manner. As no weapons were found on him, he was sentenced to three months imprisonment in the House of Correction as a rogue and a vagabond. The greatest secrecy has been enjoined on the police and other persons present, as to what took place at the prisoner's examination at the Home office.

The general impression is that the French government are in possession of the submission of Mehemet Ali.

The latest intelligence from Spain represents that country as being still in a very unsettled state, owing to the dissensions which exist in the government.

The remains of Napoleon have arrived at Cherbourg, in France. They reached that place on the 30th ult. The voyage was performed with greater expedition than was expected. The funeral ceremony is fixed for Thursday next, the 10th inst. It will be a memorable occasion in the estimation of all Frenchmen, and in the history of France.

Advices were yesterday received from the Cape of Good Hope, up to the 20th of September, from which it would appear that some further trouble on the frontier is anticipated, the Caffres having manifested a restless and predatory spirit. The poor farmers in the Wineberg and Fish River districts are so dreadfully harassed by them, that they have found it necessary to apply to Government for protection.

On Wednesday an accident occurred on the Birmingham and Derby railway, owing to the train coming in contact with a truck. The carriages were thrown off the line into the fields, and one of the passengers was killed by the occurrence. Another passenger was severely injured. The accident, it appears, was caused by some unaccountable impropriety of conduct on the part of two persons on the line.

The Queen is now considered perfectly recovered. The Princess Royal continues in the best health.

Mr. Macready has so far recovered from the grief caused by the death of his daughter as to allow his appearance on Monday evening next in Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer's new drama, to be announced in the playbills. Mr. Charles Kemble is lying seriously ill in London. His friends are apprehensive of the worst. He is attended by Mr. Liston, the celebrated surgeon, and two other medical men.

Louis Philippe, King of the French, it is understood, a sufferer to a considerable extent by the failure of Messrs. Wright & Co., bankers, Huntratta street.

We have just seen a gentleman who has been with the father of the young man who entered Buckingham Palace, and he states that he has received the most rigid injunction from the Home Office as to the preservation of secrecy respecting his examination here. He mentions, however, that he believes the cause of the conduct of his son is a wish to bring himself into notice, as Oxford did by firing at the Queen. Her Majesty was a good deal discomposed for two or three hours after the discovery of the youth having been under the sofa in her dressing room, was made known to her; but she has not felt any other inconvenience from the circumstance.

New-York Legislature.

The Legislature of this State assembled at Albany yesterday. Lieut. Governor BRADISH took the chair of the Senate ex officio, and the old officers continued without re-election.

In the House, PETER B. PORTER, Jr. of Niagara co. was chosen Speaker, over Levi S. Chatfield, (V. B.) PHILANDER B. PRINGLE of Chenango co. was re-elected Clerk. Daniel H. Bromley of Albany was chosen Sergeant-at-Arms; Joseph S. Lockwood of Chautauque Door keeper, and Abiel W. Howard of Washington co. Assistant Door-keeper—all Whigs, of course.

FATAL DISEASE.—A disease, most fatal in its attacks, has made its appearance in Tennessee. The Paris Press of the 4th inst. records four deaths in one family, and a number of others had taken place. The victims were taken with a dull, heavy pain across the forehead, accompanied with some difficulty in breathing, and soreness of the throat, a slight, vague shudder of the system that could scarcely be called a chill, followed by a general and rapid prostration of the nervous system, which terminated in death in the course of a few hours.

GEORGIA.—The Legislature of Georgia adjourned on the 22d inst. The day before the adjournment the bill quarantining vessels from the ports of Maine was passed with an amendment proposed by the Senate. The amendment provides that whenever the Governor of the State of Maine shall comply with his constitutional obligations to the State of Georgia, the Governor of Georgia shall suspend the operation of the law.

Congressional.

THURSDAY, Dec. 31, 1840.

A message was received from the President in answer to the call of the House of the 21st of this month, for copies of all papers not already communicated, concerning the burning of the steamboat Caroline on the Niagara frontier, two years ago. Mr. Fillmore moved the printing a large extra number of this document. On this motion a very animated debate arose, in which Mr. Alford of Georgia, speaking of the conduct of Great Britain, took occasion to condemn the conduct of the Administration in relation to an intercourse with that nation, and observed that "the American Eagle had too long cowered to the British Lion." Mr. Holmes of South Carolina seized upon this expression as an indication of the course which Gen. Harrison's Administration intended to pursue—that is, the policy was to be warlike. Mr. Alford explained—he spoke only for himself—he had never been consulted, and was glad of it, as it relieved him from responsibility, &c.

Mr. Cushing took the floor, and made an exciting speech against the course of British officers. The extra numbers were ordered.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, got leave to introduce his resolution, calling on the Secretary of War for a full account of all that has been done under that part of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, with the Choctaw Indians, which provides a very large fund for the education of Indian youths.

Mr. Barnard tried to get in his bill for a General Bankrupt Law, but it was objected to till it was in order to introduce it.

The Navy Pension Fund then came up in order, the question was taken without further debate on the motion to reconsider the repeal of the act of the 3d March 1837, granting pensions to widows and orphans. The House refused to reconsider, 61 Ayes—106 Noes—So, so far as the House is concerned the law will stand repealed.

MONDAY, Jan. 4, 1841.

In SENATE, a bill making compensation to the State of Maine for the services of her militia in the Aroostook troubles, passed the Committee of the Whole.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Francis Mallory, new member from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

A great number of memorials, reports, &c. were received; and Mr. Barnard, of New-York, spoke about half an hour in support of his call on the Secretary of the Treasury for a clearer statement of the National Finances; when he was interrupted by a call for the orders of the day, to which the House passed of course. A message from the President, concerning certain documents in relation to the burning of the Caroline, was received, and a debate ensued on its contents, which lasted until the hour of adjournment.

THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

BURNING OF THE CAROLINE.

The following Official Correspondence has been transmitted to Congress, by the President, in answer to a call of the House for documents connected with or growing out of the Burning of the Caroline, and the recent arrest of McLeod. It will be seen that they are of grave importance. We publish those portions only of the debate thereon which are of strongest interest.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13, 1840.

SIR: I am informed by his Excellency the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, that Mr. Alexander McLeod, a British subject, and late deputy sheriff of the Niagara district in Upper Canada, was arrested at Lewiston, in the State of New-York, on the 12th of last month, on a pretended charge of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the piratical steamboat "Caroline," in the month of December, 1837. After a tedious and vexatious examination, Mr. McLeod was committed for trial, and he is now imprisoned in Lockport jail.

I feel it my duty to call upon the Government of the United States to take prompt and effectual steps for the liberation of Mr. McLeod. It is well known that the destruction of the steamboat "Caroline" was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities. That act, therefore, according to the usages of nations, can only be the subject of discussion between the two National Governments; it cannot justly be made the ground of legal proceedings in the United States against the individuals concerned, who were bound to obey the authorities appointed by their own Government.

I may add that I believe it is quite notorious that Mr. McLeod was not one of the party engaged in the destruction of the steamboat "Caroline;" and that the pretended charge upon which he has been imprisoned rests only upon the perjured testimony of certain Canadian outlaws and their abettors, who, unfortunately for the peace of that neighborhood, are still permitted by the authorities of the State of New-York to infest the Canadian frontier.

The question, however, of whether Mr. McLeod was or was not concerned in the destruction of the "Caroline," is beside the purpose of the present communication. That act was the public act of persons obeying the constituted authorities of her Majesty's Province. The National Government of the United States thought themselves called upon to remonstrate against it; and a remonstrance which the President did accordingly address to her Majesty's Government is still, I believe, a pending subject of diplomatic discussion between her Majesty's Government and the United States Legation in London. I feel, therefore, justified in expecting that the President's Government will see the justice and the necessity of causing the present immediate release of Mr. McLeod, as well as of taking such steps as may be requisite for preventing others of her Majesty's subjects from being persecuted or molested in the United States in a similar manner for the future.

It appears that Mr. McLeod was arrested on the 12th ult.; that, after the examination of witnesses, he was finally committed for trial on the 18th, and placed in confinement in the jail of Lockport, awaiting the assizes, which will be held there in February next. As the case is naturally occasioning a great degree of excitement and indignation within the British frontier, I earnestly hope that it may be in your power to give me an early and satisfactory answer to the present representation.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration. H. S. Fox.
Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, December 26, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge, and have laid before the President, your letter of the 13th inst., touching the arrest and imprisonment of Alexander McLeod, a British subject, and late Deputy Sheriff of the Niagara District, in Upper Canada, on a charge of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the steamboat "Caroline," in the month of December, 1837; in respect to which you state that you feel it your duty to call upon the Government of the United States to take prompt and effectual steps for the liberation of Mr. McLeod, and to prevent others of the subjects of her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain from being persecuted or molested in a similar manner for the future.

This demand, with the grounds upon which it is made, has been duly considered by the President, with a sincere desire to give to it such a reply as will not only manifest a proper regard for the character and rights of the United States, but, at the same time, tend to preserve the amicable relations which so advantageously for both, subsist between this country and England. Of the reality of this disposition, and of the uniformity with which it has been evinced in the many delicate and difficult questions which have arisen between the two countries in the last few years, no one can be more convinced than yourself. It is then with unfeigned regret that the President finds himself unable to recognise the validity of a demand, a compliance with which you deem so material to the preservation of the good understanding which has been hitherto manifested between the two countries.

The jurisdiction of the several States which constitute the Union is, within its appropriate sphere, perfectly independent of the Federal Government. The offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, was committed within the territory, and against the laws and citizens of the State of New York, and is one that comes clearly within the competency of her tribunals. It does not, therefore, present an occasion where, under the Constitution and laws of the Union, the interposition called for would be proper, or for which a warrant can be found in the powers with which the Federal Executive is invested. Nor would the circumstances to which you have referred, or the reasons you have urged, justify the exertion of such a power, if it existed. The transaction out of which the question arises, presents the case of a most unjustifiable invasion, in time of peace, of a portion of the territory of the United States, by a band of armed men from the adjacent territory of Canada, the forcible capture by them within our own waters, and the subsequent destruction of a steamboat, the property of a citizen of the United States, and the murder of one or more American citizens. If arrested at the time, the offenders might unquestionably have been brought to justice by the judicial authorities of the State within whose acknowledged territory these crimes were committed; and their subsequent voluntary entrance within that territory places them in the same situation.

The President is not aware of any principle of international law, or, indeed, of reason and justice, which entitles such offenders to impunity before the legal tribunals, when coming voluntarily within their independent and undoubted jurisdiction, because they acted in obedience to their superior authorities, or because their acts have become the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two Governments. These methods of redress, the legal prosecution of the offenders, and the application of their Government for satisfaction, are independent of each other, and may be separately and simultaneously pursued. The avowal or justification of the outrage by the British authorities might be a ground of complaint with the Government of the United States distinct from the violation of the territory and laws of the State of New York. The application of the Government of the Union to that of Great Britain, for the redress of an authorized outrage of the peace, dignity, and right of the United States, cannot deprive the State of New York of her undoubted right of vindicating, through the exercise of her judicial power, the property and lives of her citizens. You have very properly regarded the alleged absence of Mr. McLeod from the scene of the offence at the time when it was committed, as not material to the decision of the present question. This is a matter to be decided by legal evidence; and the sincere desire of the President is, that it may be satisfactorily established. If the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities, this fact has not been before communicated to the Government of the United States by a person authorized to make the admission; and it will be for the court which has taken cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, to decide upon its validity when legally established before it.

The President deems this to be a proper occasion to remind the Government of Her Britannic Majesty that the case of the "Caroline" has been long since brought to the attention of her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who, up to this day, has not communicated its decision thereupon. It is hoped that the Government of her Majesty will perceive the importance of no longer leaving the Government of the United States uninformed of its views and intentions upon a subject which has naturally produced much exasperation, and which has led to such grave consequences.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX, Esq., &c. &c.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, December 29, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant, in which, in reply to a letter which I had addressed to you on the 13th, you acquaint me that the President is not prepared to comply with my demand for the liberation of Mr. Alexander McLeod of Upper Canada, now imprisoned at Lockport, in the State of New York, on a pretended charge of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, on the 29th of December, 1837.

I learn with deep regret that such is the decision of the President of the United States; and I cannot but foresee the very grave and serious consequences that must ensue, if, besides the injury already inflicted upon Mr. McLeod, of a vexatious and unjust imprisonment, any further harm may be done to him in the progress of this extraordinary proceeding.

I have lost no time in forwarding to her Majesty's Government in England, the correspondence that has taken place, and I shall await the further orders of her Majesty's Government with respect to the important question which that correspondence involves.

But I feel it my duty not to close this communication without likewise testifying my vast regret and surprise at the expressions which I find repeated in your letter with reference to the destruction of the steamboat Caroline. I had confidently hoped that the first erroneous impressions of the character of that event, imposed upon the mind of the United States Government by partial and exaggerated representations, would, long since, have been effaced by a more strict and accurate examination of the facts. Such an investigation must even yet, I am willing to believe, lead the United States Government to the same conviction with which her Majesty's authorities on the spot were impressed, that the act was one, in the strictest sense, of self-defence, rendered absolutely necessary by the circumstances of the occasion, for the safety and protection of her Majesty's subjects, and justified by the same motives and principles which, upon similar and well known occasions, have governed the conduct of illustrious officers of the United States. The steamboat Caroline was a hostile vessel, engaged in piratical war against her Majesty's people; hired from her owners for that express purpose, and known to be so beyond the possibility of doubt. The place where it was destroyed was nominally, it is true, within the territory of a friendly power; but the friendly power had been deprived, through overbearing, piratical violence, of the use of its proper authority over that vast portion of territory. The authorities of New York had not even been able to prevent the artillery of the State from being carried off publicly at mid-day, to be used as instruments of war against her Majesty's subjects. It was under such circumstances, which, it is to be hoped, will never recur, that the vessel was attacked by a party of her Majesty's people, captured, and destroyed. A remonstrance against the act in question has been addressed by the United States to her Majesty's Government in England. I am not authorized to pronounce the decision of her Majesty's Government upon that remonstrance; but I have felt myself bound to record, in the mean time, the above opinion, in order to protest in the most solemn manner against the spirited and loyal conduct of her Majesty's officers and people being qualified, through an unfortunate misapprehension, as I believe, of the facts, with the appellation of outrage or of murder.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, Dec. 31, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 29th inst. in reply to mine of the 26th, on the subject of the arrest and detention of Alexander McLeod, as one of the perpetrators of the outrage committed in New-York when the steamer Caroline was seized and burnt. Full evidence of that outrage has been presented to her Britannic Majesty's Government, with a demand for redress, and of course no discussion of the circumstances here can be either useful or proper; nor can I suppose it to be your desire to invite it. I take leave of this subject with this single remark, that the opinion so strongly expressed by you on the facts and principles involved in the demand for reparation on her Majesty's Government by the United States, would hardly have been hazarded, had you been possessed of the carefully collected testimony which has been presented to your Government in support of this demand.

I avail myself of the occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

They yet remain in the Post-Office.

MISSING NUMBERS.

We receive complaints by the dozen every week of the loss or miscarriage of the New Worlds forwarded to its subscribers, which is annoying to them and vexing to us; especially as unusual care is taken to have them correctly mailed and put in the Post-Office in season—never later than Fridays. We assure our subscribers that the fault is not in our office; but, still, being disposed to obviate the difficulty to the fullest extent in our power, we will supply all missing numbers, so far as we have them on hand, if the request comes to us free of expense. We trust they will be satisfied with our disposition to oblige them, though at much cost to ourselves.

THE WILD TURKEY.

Audubon's Ornithology.

THE WILD TURKEY.*

BY JOHN JAMES AUDUBON, F. R. SS. L. &amp; E.

The great size and beauty of the wild turkey, its value as a delicate and highly prized article of food, and the circumstance of its being the origin of the domestic race now generally dispersed over both continents, render it one of the most interesting of the birds indigenous to the United States of America.

The unsettled parts of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, and Indiana, an immense extent of country to the North-West of these districts, upon the Mississippi and Missouri, and the vast regions drained by these rivers from their confluence to Louisiana, including the wooded parts of Arkansas, Tennessee, and Alabama, are the most abundantly supplied with this magnificent bird. It is less plentiful in Georgia and the Carolinas, becomes still scarcer in Virginia and Pennsylvania, and is now very rarely seen to the eastward of the last mentioned States. In the course of my rambles through Long Island, the State of New-York, and the country around the Lakes, I did not meet with a single individual, although I was informed that some exist in those parts. Turkeys are still to be found along the whole line of the Alleghany Mountains, where they have become so wary as to be approached only with extreme difficulty. While in the Great Pine Forest, in 1829, I found a single feather that had been dropped from the tail of a female, but saw no bird of the kind. Farther eastward I do not think they are now to be found. I shall describe the manners of this bird as observed in the countries where it is most abundant, and having resided for many years in Kentucky and Louisiana, may be understood as referring chiefly to them.

The Turkey is irregularly migratory, as well as irregularly gregarious. With reference to the first of these circumstances, I have to state, that whenever the most of one portion of the country happens greatly to exceed that of another, the turkeys are insensibly led toward that spot, by gradually meeting in their haunts with more fruit the nearer they advance toward the place where it is most plentiful. In this manner flock follows after flock, until one district is entirely deserted, while another is, as it were, overflowed by them. But as these migrations are irregular, and extend over a vast expanse of country, it is necessary that I should describe the manner in which they take place.

About the beginning of October, when scarcely any of seeds and fruits have yet fallen from the trees, these birds assemble in flocks, and gradually move toward the rich bottom lands of the Ohio and Mississippi. The males, or, as they are more commonly called, the gobblers, associate in parties of from ten to a hundred, and search for food apart from the females; while the latter are seen either advancing singly, each with its brood of young, then about two-thirds grown, or in connection with other families, forming parties often amounting to seventy or eighty individuals, all intent on shunning the old cocks, which, even when the young birds have attained this size, will fight with, and often destroy them by repeated blows on the head. Old and young, however, all move in the same course, and on foot, unless their progress be interrupted by a river, or the hunter's dog force them to take wing. When they come upon a river, they betake themselves to the highest eminences, and there often remain a whole day, or sometimes two, as if for the purpose of consultation. During this time the males are heard gobbling, calling, and making much ado, and are seen strutting about, as if to raise their courage to a pitch befitting the emergency. Even the females and young assume something of the same pompous demeanor, spread out their tails, and run round each other, purring loudly, and performing extravagant leaps. At length, when the weather appears settled, and all around is quiet, the whole party mounts to the tops of the highest trees, whence, at a signal, consisting of a single cluck, given by a leader, the flock takes flight for the opposite shore. The old and fat birds easily get over, even should the river be a mile in breadth; but the younger and less robust frequently fall into the water—not to be drowned, however, as might be imagined. They bring their wings close to their body, spread out their tail as a support, stretch forward their neck, and, striking out their legs with great vigor, proceed rapidly toward the shore; on approaching which, should they find it too steep for landing, they cease their exertions for a few moments, float down the stream until they come to an accessible part, and, by a violent effort, generally extricate themselves from the water. It is remarkable, that immediately after thus crossing a large stream, they ramble about for some time, as if bewildered. In this state they fall an easy prey to the hunter.

† In America, the term most is not confined to the fruit of the beach, but is used as a general name for all kinds of forest fruits, including even grapes and berries.

Good dogs scent the turkeys, when in large flocks, at extraordinary distances—I think I may venture to say half a mile. Should the dog be well trained to this sport, he sets off at full speed, and in silence, until he sees the birds, when he instantly barks, and pushing as much as possible into the centre of the flock, forces the whole to take wing in different directions. This is of great advantage to the hunter, for should the turkeys all go one way, they would soon leave their perches and run again. But when they separate in this manner, and the weather happens to be calm and lowering, a person accustomed to this kind of sport finds the birds with ease, and shoots them at pleasure.

When turkeys alight on a tree, it is sometimes very difficult to see them, which is owing to their standing perfectly motionless. Should you discover one, when it is down on its legs upon the branch, you may approach it with less care. But if it is standing erect, the greatest precaution is necessary, for should it discover you, it instantly flies off, frequently to such a distance that it would be in vain to follow.

When a turkey is merely winged by a shot, it falls quickly to the ground in a slanting direction. Then, instead of losing time by tumbling and rolling over, as other birds often do when wounded, it runs off at such a rate, that unless the hunter be provided with a swift dog, he may bid farewell to it. I recollect coming on one shot in this manner more than a mile from the tree where it had been perched, my dog having traced it to this distance, through one of those thick canebrakes that cover many portions of our rich alluvial lands near the banks of our Western rivers. Turkeys are easily killed if shot in the head, the neck, or the upper part of the breast; but if hit in the hind parts only, they often fly so far as to be lost to the hunter. During winter, many of our real hunters shoot them by moonlight, on the roosts, where these birds will frequently stand a repetition of the reports of a rifle, although they would fly from the attack of an owl, or even perhaps from his presence. Thus sometimes nearly a whole flock is secured by men capable of using these guns in such circumstances. They are often destroyed in great numbers when most worthless, that is, early in the fall or autumn, when many are killed in their attempt to cross the rivers, or immediately after they reach the shore.

While speaking of the shooting of turkeys, I feel no hesitation in relating the following circumstance, which happened to myself. While in search of game, one afternoon late in autumn, when the males go together, and the females are by themselves also, I heard the clucking of one of the latter, and immediately finding her perched on a fence, made toward her. Advancing slowly and cautiously, I heard the yelping notes of some gobblers, when I stopped and listened in order to ascertain the direction in which they came. I then ran to meet the birds, hid myself by the side of a large, fallen tree, cocked my gun, and waited with impatience for a good opportunity. The gobblers continued yelping in answer to the female, which all this while remained on the fence. I looked over the log, and saw about thirty fine cocks advancing rather cautiously toward the very spot where I lay concealed. They came so near the the light of their eyes could easily be perceived, when I fired one barrel and killed three. The rest, instead of flying off, fell a strutting around their dead companions, and had I not looked on shooting again as murder without necessity, I might have secured at least another. So I shewed myself, and marching to the place where the dead birds were, drove away the survivors. I may also mention, that a friend of mine shot a fine hen, from his horse, with a pistol, as the poor thing was probably returning to her nest to lay.

Should you, good-natured reader, be a sportsman, and now and then have been fortunate in the exercise of your craft, the following incident, which I shall relate to you as I had it from the mouth of an honest farmer, may prove interesting. Turkeys were very abundant in his neighborhood, and, resorting to his corn fields, at the period when the maize had just shot up from the ground, destroyed great quantities of it. This induced him to swear vengeance against the species. He cut a long trench in a favorable situation, put a great quantity of corn in it, and having heavily loaded a famous duck gun of his, placed it so as that he could pull the trigger by means of a string, when quite concealed from the birds. The turkeys soon discovered the corn in the trench, and quickly disposed of it, at the same time continuing their ravages in the fields. He filled the trench again, and one day seeing it quite black with the turkeys, whistled loudly, on which all the birds raised their heads, when he pulled the trigger by the long string fastened to it. The explosion followed of course, and the turkeys were seen scampering off in all directions, in utter discomfiture and dismay. On running to the trench, he found nine of them extended in it. The rest did not consider it expedient to visit his corn again for that season.

During spring, turkeys are called, as it is termed, by drawing the air in a particular way through one of the second joint bones of a wing of that bird, which produces a sound resembling the voice of the female, on hearing which the male comes up, and is shot. In managing this, however, no fault must be committed, for turkeys are quick in distinguishing counterfeit sounds, and when half civilised are very wary and cunning. I have known many to answer to this kind of call, without moving a step, and thus entirely defeat the scheme of the hunter, who dared not move from his hiding place, lest a single glance of the gobbler's eye should frustrate all further attempts to decoy him. Many are shot when at roost, in this season, by answering with a rolling gobble to a sound in imitation of the cry of the barred owl.

But the most common method of procuring wild turkeys, is by means of pens. These are placed in parts of the woods where turkeys have been frequently observed to roost, and are constructed in the following manner. Young trees of four or five inches diameter are cut down, and divided into pieces of the length of twelve or fourteen feet. Two of these are laid on the ground parallel to each other, at a distance of ten or twelve feet. Two other pieces are laid across the ends of these, at right angles to them; and in this manner successive layers are added, until the fabric is raised to the height of about four feet. It is then covered with similar pieces of wood, placed three or four inches apart, and loaded with one or two heavy logs to render the whole firm. This done, a trench about eighteen inches in depth and width is cut under one side of the cage, into which it opens slantingly and rather abruptly. It is continued on its outside to some distance, so as gradually to attain the level of the surrounding ground. Over the part of this trench within the pen, and close to the wall, some sticks are placed so as to form a kind of bridge about a foot in breadth. The trap being now finished, the owner places a quantity of Indian corn in its centre, as well as in the trench, and as he walks off drops here and there a few grains in the woods, sometimes to the distance of a mile. This is repeated at every visit to the trap, after the turkeys have found it. Sometimes two trenches are cut, in which case the trenches enter on opposite sides of the trap, and are both strewn with corn. No sooner has a turkey discovered the train of corn, than it communicates the circumstance to the flock by a cluck, when all of them come up, and searching for the grains scattered about, at length come upon the trench, which they follow, squeezing themselves one after another through the passage under the bridge. In this manner the whole flock sometimes enters, but more commonly six or seven only, as they are alarmed by the least noise, even the cracking of a tree in frosty weather. Those within, having gorged themselves, raise their heads, and try to force their way through the top or sides of the pen, passing and repassing on the bridge, but never for a moment looking down, or attempting to escape through the passage by which they entered. Thus they remain until the owner of the trap arriving, closes the trench, and secures his captives. I have heard of eighteen turkeys having been caught in this manner at a single visit to the trap. I have had many of these pens myself, but never found more than seven in them at a time. One winter I kept an account of the produce of a pen which I visited daily, and found that seventy-six had been caught in it, in about two months. When these birds are abundant, the owners of the pens sometimes become satiated with their flesh, and neglect to visit the pens for several days, in some cases for weeks. The poor captives thus perish for want of food; for, strange as it may seem, they scarcely ever regain their liberty, by descending into the trench and retracing their steps. I have, more than once, found four or five, and even ten, dead in a pen through inattention. When wolves or lynxes are numerous, they are apt to secure the prize before the owner of the trap arrives. One morning I had the pleasure of securing in one of my pens a fine, black wolf, which, on seeing me, squatted, supposing me to be passing in another direction.

Wild turkeys often approach and associate with tame ones, or fight with them, and drive them off from their food. The cocks sometimes pay their addresses to the domesticated females, and are generally received by them with great pleasure, as well as by their owners, who are well aware of the advantages resulting from such intrusions, the half-breed being much more hardy than the tame, and, consequently, more easily reared.

While at Henderson, on the Ohio, I had, among many other wild birds, a fine, male turkey, which had been reared from its earliest youth under my care, it having been caught by me when probably not more than two or three days old.

It became so tame that it would follow any person who called it, and was the favorite of the little village. Yet it would never roost with the tame turkeys, but regularly took itself at night to the roof of the house, where it remained until dawn. When two years old, it began to fly to the woods, where it remained for a considerable part of the day, to return to the enclosure as night approached. It continued this practice until the following spring, when I saw it several times fly from its roosting place to the top of a high cotton tree, on the bank of the Ohio, from which, after resting a little, it would sail to the opposite shore, the river being there nearly half a mile wide, and return toward night. One morning I saw it fly off at a very early hour to the woods, in another direction, and took no particular notice of the circumstance. Several days elapsed, but the bird did not return. I was going toward some lakes near Green River to shoot, when, having walked about five miles, I saw a fine, large gobbler cross the path before me, moving leisurely along. Turkeys being then in prime condition for the table, I ordered my dog to chase it and put it up. The animal went off with great rapidity, and as it approached the turkey, I saw, with great surprise, that the latter paid little attention. Juno was on the point of seizing it, when she suddenly stopped and turned her head toward me. I hastened to them, but you may easily conceive my surprise when I saw my own favorite bird, and discovered that it had recognised the dog and would not fly from it; although the sight of a strange dog would have caused it to run off at once. A friend of mine happening to be in search of a wounded deer, took the bird on his saddle before him and carried it home for me. The following spring it was accidentally shot, having been taken for a wild bird, and brought to me on being recognised by the red ribbon which it had around its neck. Pray, reader, by what word will you designate the recognition made by my favorite turkey of a dog which had been long associated with it in the yard and grounds? Was it the result of instinct or of reason—an unconsciously revived impression, or the act of an intelligent mind?

At the time when I removed to Kentucky, rather more than a fourth of a century ago, turkeys were so abundant that the price of one in the market was not equal to that of a common barn fowl now. I have seen them offered for the sum of three pence each, the birds weighing from ten to twelve pounds. A first rate turkey, weighing from twenty-five to thirty pounds avoirdupois, was considered well sold when it brought a quarter of a dollar.

MISS MARTINEAU'S NEW WORK.

Miss Martineau, by her Deerbrook—a story of which it may justly be said that every sentence is worth reading, and can be read with pleasure and profit—placed herself in the front rank of modern novel-writers. We knew her well before, in her little works illustrative of the principles of Political Economy, as an ingenious story-teller, but we did not know that she possessed those great narrative powers which she has since exhibited. In consequence of her ultra views on the subject of abolition—a res mala and a res prohibita in America—prejudices the most unenlightened and the most unjust, are entertained toward her. We absolutely are weak enough to prohibit our minds from enjoying the fruits of her exuberant talents in fiction, because we choose to be offended with their productions in the field of social and political opinions. Let us abjure so absurd an error, and take up her forthcoming work with the willingness to be gratified by its narrative, and by its descriptive passages, even though it may trench upon the dreadful domain of slavery. We are as determinately opposed to political abolition as our most strenuous Southern friends; but we cannot think that its very mention, even the remotest allusion to it, should be suppressed. The harm of the rattlesnake is diminished by the sound which gives warning of its proximity; as long as disorganization makes itself heard, little is to be apprehended—the most danger lies in a stealthy and silent approach. Do not let us strive, then, so earnestly to shut the mouths of the abolitionists—their talking will do no harm.

We all know what Miss Martineau's sentiments are: she has forewarned us, therefore we are forewarned. Even though her new novel be loaded with anti-slavery to the very muzzle, let us approach it with courage, quite resolved to gratify our curiosity to see what it is all about—and there are ten chances to one that we shall not be blown to atoms, and that the country, which has been on the brink of ruin anytime these sixty-four years, will remain there, and not be tumbled into the gulf.

The title of Miss Martineau's new novel is, "The Hour and the Man." Toussaint L'Ouverture is The Man, and The Hour is that remarkable period when the slaves at St. Domingo first declared themselves freemen. The picture drawn by Miss Martineau is one of great moral interest; and she has treated the subject, as she was sure to treat it, with care and ability. In giving our extracts, we say only just enough to show what they are about; supplying, as it were, only a thread to hold them together.

After Fortune had showered her highest favors on Toussaint in his new course, he still exhibits the same quiet, unselfish spirit of endurance in his palace that had sustained him in a hotel. In the following scene he speaks with his wife, Margot:—

Margot stopped, as a turn in the walk brought them in view of the house. The long ranges of verandah stood in the moonlight, checkered with the still shadows of the neighboring trees. Every window of the large white mansion gave out a stream of yellow light, to contrast with the silvery shining of the moon. "This is very unlike the hut we went to when we were married, Toussaint. Yet I was quite happy and contented. It is, indeed, the greatest thing to be loved."

"And have you not that greatest thing here too? Do I not love you, my Margot?"

"O yes! Yes, indeed, we love each other as much as we did then—in that single room, with its earthen floor, and its cribs against the wall, and the iron-pot in the fire-place, and the hen pecking before the door. But, Toussaint, look at the difference now! Look at this beautiful house, and all the gardens and cane-pieces—and think of our palace at Port-au-Prince—and think of the girls as they look at church, or in the boat to-day—and how the country is up, rejoicing, wherever you go—and how the Assembly consider you—think of all that has happened since that wedding-day of ours at Breda! It is so fine—so wonderful, that you shall not frighten me about anything that can happen. I am sure the blessing of God is upon you, my husband; and you shall not make me afraid."

"I would have none be afraid while God reigns, Margot. May you ever say that you will not fear! The blessing of God may be on us now, love; but it was never more so than when we went home to our huts at Breda. When I lay under the trees at noon, taking care of the cattle, how many things I used to think of to say to you when I came home!"

"And so did I, as I kneeled at my washing by the brook-side, and you were driving M. Bayou twenty miles off, and were expected home in the evening. How much there was to say at the end of those days!"

"It was not for ourselves, then, Margot, that we have been raised to what we are. We were as happy drawing water in the wood, and gathering plaintains in the negro-grounds, as we have ever been in these shrubberies. We were as merry in that single room at Breda as in this mansion, or in our palace. It is not for our own sakes that we have been so raised."

"It is pleasant for our children."

"It is. And it is good for our race. It is to make us their servants. O! Margot, if ever you find a thought of pride stirring at your heart, remember that if the blacks were less ignorant and more wise, it would not matter whether we lived as we used to do, or as we live now. It is because we negroes are vain and corrupted that show and state are necessary: and the sight of our show and state should, therefore, humble us."

"I am sure you are not fond of show and state. You eat and drink, and wait upon yourself, as you did at Breda: and your uniform is the only fine dress you like to wear. I am sure you had rather have no court."

"Very true. I submit to such state as we have about us, for the sake of the negroes who need it. To me it is a sacrifice; but Margot we must make sacrifices—perhaps some which you may little dream of, while looking round upon our possessions and our rank, and our children, worshipped as they are. We must carry the same spirit of sacrifice into all our acts; and be ready to suffer, and perhaps to fall, for the sake of the blacks. The less pride now, Margot, the less shame and sorrow then!"

"I wish not to be proud," said Margot, trembling—"I pray that I may not be proud; but it is difficult."

"Hark! there is a footstep. Let us turn into this alley."

"Nay," said Toussaint, "it is M. Pascal. No doubt I am wanted."

"For ever wanted!" exclaimed Margot. "No peace!"

"It was not so at Breda," said Toussaint, smiling. "I was just speaking of sacrifice you know; and this is not the last night that the moon will shine.—News, M. Pascal?"

"News from Cap," replied M. Pascal, in a depressed tone. "Bad news! Here are despatches. Not a moment is to be lost."

"There is light enough," said Toussaint, turning so that the moonlight fell upon the page.

When his fortunes lower again, and he stands with his friend and comrade, Christophe, within view of the fleet that Bonaparte had sent from France to strangle the nascent liberties of his race—this is the high thoughted language he holds:

"I see who they are that are there. There are the troops of the Rhine—troops that have conquered a fairer river than our Artibonite, storming the castles on her steep, and crowning themselves from her vineyards. There are the troops of the Alps—troops that have soared above the eagle, and stormed the clouds, and plucked the ice-king by the beard upon his throne. There are the troops of Italy—troops that have trodden the old Roman ways, and fought over again the old Roman wars—that have drunk of the Tiber, and once more conquered the armies of the Danube. There are the troops of Egypt—troops that have heard the war-cry of the desert tribes, and encamped in the shadow of the pyramids."

"Yet he is not afraid," said Henri to himself, as he watched the countenance of his friend.

"All these," continued Toussaint, "all these are brought hither against a poor, depressed, insulted, ignorant race;—brought as conquerors, eager for the spoil before a blow is struck. They come to disembarass our paradise of us, as they would clear a fragrant and fruitful wood of apes and reptiles. And if they find that it takes longer than they supposed to crush and disperse us, France has more thousands ready to come and help. The laborer will leave his plough at a word, and the vine-dresser his harvest, and the artisan his shop—France will pour out the youth of all her villages, to seize upon the delights of the tropics, and the wealth of the savages, as they are represented by the emigrants who will not take me for a friend, but eat their own hearts far away, with hatred and jealousy. All France is coming to St Domingo!"

"But," interposed Christophe.

"But, Henri," interrupted his friend, laying his hand on his shoulder, "not all France, with her troops of the Rhine, of the Alps, of the Nile, nor with all Europe to help her, can extinguish the soul of Africa. That soul, when once the soul of a man, and no longer that of a slave, can overthrow the pyramids and the Alps themselves, sooner than be again crushed down into slavery."

"With God's help," said Christophe, crossing himself.

"With God's help," repeated Toussaint. "See here," he continued, taking up a handful of earth from the broken ground on which they stood, "see here what God has done! See, here are shells from the depth of yonder ocean, lying on the mountain top. Cannot he who thus uprears the dust of his ocean floor, and lifts it above the clouds, create the societies of men anew, and set their lowest order but a little below the stars?"

"He can," said Christophe, again crossing himself.

"Then let all France come to St. Domingo!"

When, from the depths of the murderous prison into which the treachery of Napoleon has cast him, his voice struggles across the sea to his wife and children, its tone of quiet and unselfish faith is still the same:

"My wife, my children! I may name you all now—name you in my thoughts and in my song. Placide! are you rousing the nations to ask the tyrant where I am? Henri! have you buried the dead whites yet in St. Domingo? and have your rains done weeping the treason of those dead against freedom? Let it be so, Henri! Your rains have washed out the blood of this treason; and your dews have brought forth the verdure of your plains, to cover the graves of the guilty and fallen. Take this lesson home, Henri! Forget—not me, for you must remember me in carrying on my work—but forget how you lost me. Believe that I fell in the moans, and that you buried me there; believe this, rather than shed one drop of blood for me. Learn of God, not of Bonaparte, how to bless our race. Poison their souls no more with blood! The sword and the fever have done their work, and tamed your tyrants. As for the rest, act with God for our people! Give them harvests to their hands; and open the universe of knowledge before their eyes. Give them rest and stillness in the summer heats; and shelter them in virtuous and busy homes from the sheeted rains. It is enough that blood was the price of freedom—a heavy price, which has been paid. Let there be no such barter for vengeance! My children, hear me! Wherever you are, in the court of our tyrant, or on the wide sea, or on the mountain-top, where the very storms cannot make themselves heard so high, yet let your father's voice reach you from his living grave! No vengeance! Freedom, freedom to the last drop of blood in the veins of our race! Let our island be left to the wild herds and the reptiles, rather than be the habitation of slaves; but if you have established freedom there, it is holy ground, and no vengeance must profane it. If you love me and my race, you must forgive my murderers. Yes, murderers," he pursued in thought, after dwelling awhile on the images of home and familiar faces—"murderers they already are, doubtless, in intent. I should have been sent hence long ago, but for the hope of reaching my counsels through Mars Plaisir. From the eyes of the world I have already disappeared; and nothing hinders the riddance of me now. Feeble as I am, the waiting for death may yet be tedious. If tedious for him who has this day done with me, how tedious for me, who have done with him and with all the world!—done with them, except as to the affections with which one may look back upon them from the clear heights on the other side of the dark valley. That I should pine and shiver long in the shadows of that valley would be tedious to him who drove me there before my time, and to me. He has never submitted to what is tedious, and he will not now.

And the same is his last vindication, before he uncomplainingly sinks into death:

"It is true that I erred, according to the common estimate of affairs, in not making myself a king and separating my country from France, as France herself is compelling her to separate at last. It is true, I might now have been reigning there, instead of dying here; and, what is more worthy of meditation, my people might now have been laying aside their arms, and beginning a long career of peace. It might possibly have been so: but at what cost! Their career of freedom (if freedom it could then have been called) would have begun in treason and in murder; and the stain would have polluted my race for ever. Now, they will have freedom still;—they cannot but have it, though it is delayed. And upon this freedom will rest the blessing of Heaven. We have not sought for dominion, nor for plunder; nor, as far as I could govern the passions of men, for revenge. We began our career of freedom in fidelity, in obedience, and in reverence towards the whites; and therefore may we take to ourselves the blessing of Him who made us to be free, and demands that we be so with clean hands and a pure heart. Therefore will the freedom of St. Domingo be but the beginning of freedom to the negro race. Therefore may we hope that in this race will the spirit of Christianity appear more fully than it has yet shown itself among the proud whites;—show itself in its gentleness, its fidelity, its disinterestedness, and its simple trust. The proud whites may scorn this hope, and point to the ignorance and the passions of my people, and say, 'Is this your exhibition of the spirit of the Gospel?' But not for this will we give up our hope. This ignorance, these passions, are natural to all men, and are in us aggravated and protracted by our slavery. Remove them by the discipline and the stimulus of freedom, begun in obedience to God and fidelity to men, and there remain the love that embraces all—the meek faith that can bear to be betrayed, but is ashamed to doubt—the generosity that can forgive offences seventy and seven times renewed—the simple, open, joyous spirit which marks such as are of the kingdom of heaven. Lord! I thank thee that thou hast made me the servant of this race!"

It needs no more to show, how richly this book, will reward a right perusal. We will only subjoin another extract, in proof that Miss Martineau's well known powers of graphic and animated description remain quite unimpaired. She introduces Toussaint in one of his rapid journeys on horseback between distant parts of the Colony:

"He had cleared the plain, with his trumpet at his heels, before the woods and fields had melted together into the purple haze of evening; and the laborers returning from the cane pieces, with their tools on their shoulders, offered their homage to him as he swept by. Some shouted, some ran beside him, some knelt in the road and blessed him, or asked his blessing. He came to the river, and found the ford lined by a party of negroes, who, having heard and known his horse's tread above the music of pipe and drum, had thrown themselves into the water to point out the ford, and save his precious moments. He dashed through uncovered, and was lost in the twilight before their greeting was done. The evening star was just bright enough to show its image in the still small lake, when he met the expected relay, on the verge of the mountain woods. Thence the ascent was so steep, that he was obliged to relax his speed. He had observed the birds winging home to these woods; they had reached it before him, and the chirp of their welcome to their nests was sinking into silence; but the whirring beetles were abroad. The frogs were scarcely heard from the marshes below; but the lizards and crickets vied with the young monkeys in noise, while the wood was all alight with luminous insects. Wherever a twisted fantastic cotton tree, or a drooping wild fig, stood out from the thicket and apart, it appeared to send forth streams of green flame from every branch; so incessantly did the fire-flies radiate from every projecting twig.

As he ascended, the change was great. At length, there was no more sound; there were no more fitting fires. Still as sleep rose the mountain peaks to the night. Still as sleep lay the woods below. Still as sleep was the outspread western sea, silvered by the steady stars which shone, still as sleep in the purple depths of heaven. Such was the starlight on that pinnacle, so large and round the silver globes, so bright in the transparent atmosphere were their arrowy rays, that the whole vault was as one constellation of little moons, and the horse and his rider saw their own shadows in the white sands of their path. The ridge passed, down plunged the horseman, hurrying to the valley and the plain; like rocks loosened by the thunder from the mountain top. The hunter, resting on the heights from his day's chase of the wild goats, started from his sleep, to listen to what he took for a threatening of storm. In a little while, the child in the cottage in the valley nestled close to its mother, scared at the flying tramp; while the trembling mother herself prayed for the shield of the Virgin's grace against the night-fiends that were abroad. Here, there was a solitary light in the plain; there beside the river; and yonder behind the village; and at each of these stations were fresh horses, the best in the region, and smiling faces to tender their use. The panting animals that were left behind were caressed for the sake of the burden they had carried, and of the few kind words dropped by their rider during his momentary pause.

Thus was the plain beyond Mirbalais passed soon after midnight. In the dark, the horsemen swam the Artibonite, and leaped the sources of the Petite Rivere. The eastern sky was beginning to brighten as they mounted the highest steep above Atalaye; and, from the loftiest point, the features of the wide landscape became distinct in the cool grey dawn. Toussaint looked no longer at the fading stars. He looked eastward, where the green savannahs spread beyond the reach of human eye. He looked northward, where towns and villages lay in the skirts of the mountains, and upon the verge of the rivers, and in the green recesses where the springs burst from the hill-sides. He looked westwards, where the broad and full Artibonite gushed into the sea, and where the yellow bays were thronged with shipping, and every green promontory was occupied by its plantation or fishing hamlet. He paused, for one instant, while he surveyed what he well knew to be virtually his dominions. He said to himself that with him it rested to keep out strife from this paradise—to detect whatever devilish cunning might lurk in its by-ways, and rebuke whatever malice and revenge might linger within its bounds. With the thought he again sprang forward, again plunged down the steep, scudded over the wilds, and splashed through the streams; not losing another moment till his horse stood trembling and foaming under the hot sun, now touching the Haut-du-Cap, where the riders had at length pulled up."

MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP.

CAPATER LXVIII.

Mr. Swiveller and his partner played several rubbers with varying success, until the loss of three sixpences, the gradual sinking of the purl, and the striking of ten o'clock, combined to render that gentleman mindful of the flight of Time, and the expediency of withdrawing before Mr. Sampson and Miss Sally Brass returned.

"With which object in view, Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller gravely, "I shall ask your ladyship's permission to put the board in my pocket, and to retire from the presence when I have finished this tankard; merely observing, Marchioness, that since life like a river is flowing, I care not how fast it rolls on, ma'am, on, while such purl on the bank still is growing, and such eyes light the waves as they run. Marchioness, your health. You will excuse my wearing my hat, but the palace is damp, and the marble floor is—if I may be allowed the expression—sloppy."

As a precaution against this latter inconvenience, Mr. Swiveller had been sitting for some time with his feet on the hob, in which attitude he now gave utterance to these apologetic observations, and slowly sipped the last choice drops of nectar.

"The Baron Sampson Brass and his fair sister are (you tell me) at the Play?" said Mr. Swiveller, leaning his left arm heavily upon the table, and raising his voice and his right leg after the manner of a theatrical bandit.

The Marchioness nodded.

"Ha!" said Mr. Swiveller, with a portentous frown.

"Tis well. Marchioness—but no matter. Some wine there. Ho!" He illustrated these melo-dramatic morsels by handing the tankard to himself with great humility, receiving it haughtily, drinking from it thirstily, and smacking his lips fiercely.

The small servant, who was not so well acquainted with theatrical conventionalities as Mr. Swiveller (having indeed never seen a play, or heard one spoken of, except by chance through chinks of doors and in other forbidden places), was rather alarmed by demonstrations so novel in their nature, and showed her concern so plainly in her looks, that Mr. Swiveller felt it necessary to discharge his brigand manner for one more suitable to private life, as he asked:

"Do they often go where glory waits 'em, and leave you here?"

"Oh, yes; I believe you they do," returned the small servant. "Miss Sally's such a one-er for that, she is."

"Such a what?" said Dick.

"Such a one-er," returned the Marchioness.

After a moment's reflection, Mr. Swiveller determined to forego his responsible duty of settling her right, and to suffer her to talk on; as it was evident that her tongue was loosened by the purl, and her opportunities for conversation were not so frequent as to render a momentary check of little consequence.

"They sometimes go to see Mr. Quilp," said the small servant with a shrewd look; "they go to a many places, bless you."

"Is Mr. Brass a winner?" said Dick.

"Not half what Miss Sally is, he isn't," replied the small servant, shaking her head. "Bless you, he'd never do anything without her."

"Oh! He wouldn't wouldn't he?" said Dick.

"Miss Sally keeps him in such order," said the small servant; "he always asks her advice, he does; and he catches it sometimes. Bless you, you wouldn't believe how much he catches it."

"I suppose," said Dick, "that they consult together a good deal, and talk about a great many people—about me, for instance, sometimes, eh, Marchioness?"

The Marchioness nodded amazingly.

"Complimentary?" said Mr. Swiveller.

The Marchioness changed the motion of her head, which had not yet left off nodding, and suddenly began to shake it from side to side with a vehemence which threatened to dislocate her neck.

"Humph!" Dick muttered. "Would it be any breach of confidence, Marchioness, to relate what they say of the humble individual who has now the honor to?"

"Miss Sally says you're a funny chap," replied his friend.

"Well, Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, "that's not uncomplimentary. Merriment, Marchioness, is not a bad or degrading quality. Old King Cole was himself a merry old soul, if we may put any faith in the pages of history."

"But she says," pursued his companion, "that you an't to be trusted."

"Why, really, Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, thoughtfully; "several ladies and gentlemen—not exactly professional persons, but tradespeople, ma'am, tradespeople—have made the same remark. The obscure citizen who keeps the hotel over the way, inclined strongly to that opinion to-night when I ordered him to prepare the banquet. It's a popular prejudice, Marchioness; and yet I am sure I don't know why, for I have been trusted in my time to a considerable amount, and I can safely say that I never forsook my trust until it deserted me—never. Mr. Brass is of the same opinion, I suppose?"

His friend nodded again, with a cunning look, which seemed to hint that Mr. Brass held stronger opinions on the subject than his sister; and seeming to recollect herself, added imploringly, "But don't you ever tell upon me, or I shall be beat to death."

"Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, rising, "the word of a gentleman is as good as his bond—sometimes better; as in the present case, where his bond might prove but a doubtful sort of security. I am your friend, and I hope we shall play many more rubbers together in this same saloon. But, Marchioness," added Richard, stopping in his way to the door, and wheeling slowly round upon the small servant, who was following with the candle; "it occurs to me that you must be in the constant habit of airing your eye at keyholes, to know all this."

"I only wanted," replied the trembling Marchioness, "to know where the key of the safe was hid; that was all; and I wouldn't have taken much, if I had found it—only enough to quench my hunger."

"You didn't find it, then?" said Dick. "But of course you did n't, or you'd be plumper. Good night, Marchioness. Fare thee well, and if for ever, then for ever fare thee well—and put up the chain, Marchioness, in case of accidents."

With this parting injunction, Mr. Swiveller emerged from the house; and feeling that he had by this time taken quite as much to drink as promised to be good for his constitution, (purl being a rather strong and heady compound,) wisely resolved to betake himself to his lodgings, and to bed at once. Homeward he went therefore; and his apartments (for he still retained the plural fiction) being at no great distance from the office, he was soon seated in his own bed-chamber, where, having pulled off one boot and forgotten the other, he fell into deep cogitation.

"This Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, folding his arms, is a very extraordinary person—surrounded by mysteries, ignorant of the taste of beer, unacquainted with her own name (which is less remarkable,) and taking a limited view of society through the keyholes of the doors—can these things be her destiny, or has some unknown person started an opposition to the degrees of fate? It is a most inscrutable and unmitigated staggerer!"

When his meditations had attained this satisfactory point, he became aware of his remaining boot, of which, with unimpaired solemnity he proceeded to divest himself; shaking his head with exceeding gravity all the time, and sighing deeply.

"These rubbers," said Mr. Swiveller, putting on his night-cap in exactly the same style as he wore his hat, "remind me of the matrimonial fireside. Chegg's wife plays cribbage; all-fours likewise. She rings the changes on 'em now. From sport to sport they hurry her, to banish her regrets, and when they win a smile from her, they think that she forgets—but she don't. By this time, I should say," added Richard, getting his left cheek into profile, and looking complacently at the reflection of a very little scrap of whisker in the looking-glass; "by this time, I should say, the iron has entered into her soul. It serves her right!"

Melting from this stern and obdurate, into the tender and pathetic mood, Mr. Swiveller groaned a little, walked wildly up and down, and even made a show of tearing his hair, which however he thought better of, and wrenched the tassel from his nightcap instead. At last, undressing himself with a gloomy resolution, he got into bed.

Some men in his blighted position would have taken to drinking; but as Mr. Swiveller had taken to that before, he only took, on receiving the news that Sophy Wackles was lost to him for ever, to playing the flute; thinking after mature consideration that it was a good, sound, dismal occupation, not only in unison with his own sad thoughts, but calculated to awaken a fellow-feeling in the bosoms of his neighbors. In pursuance of this resolution, he now drew a little table to his bedside, and arranging the light and a small oblong music-book to the best advantage, took his flute from its box, and began to play most mournfully.

The air was "Away with melancholy"—a composition, which, when it is played very slowly on the flute in bed, with the further disadvantage of being by a gentleman but imperfectly acquainted with the instrument, who repeats one note a great many times before he can find the next, has not a lively effect. Yet for half the night, or more, Mr. Swiveller, lying sometimes on his back with his eyes upon the ceiling, and sometimes half out of bed to correct himself by the book, played this unhappy tune over and over again; never leaving off, save for a minute or two at a time, to take breath and soliloquize about the Marchioness and then beginning again with renewed vigor. It was not until he had quite exhausted his several subjects of meditation, and had breathed into the flute the whole sentiment of the purl down to its very dregs, and had nearly maddened the people of the house, and at both the next doors, and over the way,—that he shut up the music-book, extinguished the candle, and finding himself greatly lightened and relieved in his mind, turned round, and fell asleep.

He awoke in the morning, much refreshed; and having taken half an hour's exercise on the flute, and graciously received a notice to quit from his landlady, who had been in waiting on the stairs for that purpose since the dawn of day, repaired to Bevis Marks; where the beautiful Sally was already at her post, bearing in her looks a radiance mild as that which beareth from the virgin moon.

Mr. Swiveller acknowledged her presence by a nod, and exchanged his coat for the aquatic jacket; which usually took some time fitting on, for in consequence of a tightness in the sleeves, it was only to be got into by a series of struggles. This difficulty overcome, he took his seat at the desk.

"Isay," quoth Miss Brass, abruptly breaking silence, "you have 'nt seen a silver pencil-case this morning, have you?"

"I did n't meet many in the street," rejoined Mr. Swiveller. "I saw one—a stout pencil-case of respectable appearance—but as he was in company with an elderly penknife and a young toothpick, with whom he was in earnest conversation, I felt a delicacy in speaking to him."

"No, but have you?" returned Miss Brass. "Seriously, you know."

"What a dull dog you must be to ask me such a question seriously," said Mr. Swiveller. "Have a't I this moment come?"

"Well, all I know is," replied Miss Sally, "that it's not to be found, and that it disappeared one day this week, when I left it on the desk."

"Halloa!" thought Richard, "I hope the Marchioness has n't been at work here."

"There was a knife too," said Miss Sally, "of the same pattern. They were given to me by my father, years ago, and are both gone. You have n't missed any thing yourself, have you?"

Mr. Swiveller involuntarily clapped his hands to the jacket to be quite sure that it was a jacket and not a skirted coat; and having satisfied himself of the safety of this, his only moveable in Bevis Marks, made answer in the negative.

"It's a very unpleasant thing, Dick," said Miss Brass, pulling out the tin box and refreshing herself with a pinch of snuff; but between you and me—between friends you know, for if Sammy knew it, I should never hear the last of it—some of the office money, too, that has been left about, has gone in the same way. In particular, I have missed three half-crowns at three different times."

"You do n't mean that," cried Dick. "Be careful what you say, old boy, for this is a serious matter. 'Are you quite sure? Is there no mistake?'"

"It is so, and there can't be any mistake at all," rejoined Miss Brass emphatically.

"Then by Jove," thought Richard, laying down his pen, "I am afraid the Marchioness is done over!"

The more he discussed the subject in his thoughts, the more probable it appeared to Dick that the miserable little servant was the culprit. When he considered on what a spare allowance of food she lived, how neglected and untaught she was, and how her natural cunning had been sharpened by necessity and privation, he scarcely doubted it. And yet he pitied her so much, and felt so unwilling to have a matter of such gravity disturbing the oldity of their acquaintance, that he thought, and thought truly, that rather than receive fifty pounds down, he would have the Marchioness proved innocent.

While he was plunged in very profound and serious meditation upon this theme, Miss Sally sat shaking her head with an air of great mystery and doubt, when the voice of her brother Sampson, carolling a cheerful strain, was heard in the passage, and the gentleman himself, beaming with virtuous smiles, appeared.

"Mr. Richard, sir, good morning. Here we are again, sir, entering upon another day, with our bodies strengthened by slumber and breakfast, and our spirits fresh and flowing. Here we are, Mr. Richard, rising with the sun to run our little course—our course of duty, sir—and like him get through our day's work with credit to ourselves and advantage to our fellow creatures. A charming reflection, sir, very charming!"

While he addressed his clerk in these words, Mr. Brass was somewhat ostentatiously engaged in minutely examining and holding up against the light a five-pound bank note, which he had brought in, in his hand.

Mr. Richard not receiving his remarks with any thing like enthusiasm, his employer turned his eyes to his face, and observed that it wore a troubled expression.

"You're out of spirits, sir," said Brass. "Mr. Richard sir, we should fall to work cheerfully, and not in a despondent state. It becomes us, Mr. Richard, sir, to—"

Here the chaste Sarah heaved a loud sigh. "Dear me!" said Mr. Sampson, "you too! Is anything the matter? Mr. Richard, sir—"

Dick, glancing at Miss Sally, saw that she was making signals to him, to acquaint her brother with the subject of their recent conversation. As his own position was not a very pleasant one until the matter was set at rest one way or other, he did so; and Miss Brass, plying her snuff-box at a most wasteful rate, corroborated his account.

The countenance of Sampson fell, and anxiety overspread his features. Instead of passionately bewailing the loss of his money, as Miss Sally had expected, he walked on tiptoe to the door, opened it, looked outside, shut it softly, returned on tiptoe, and said in a whisper,

"This is a most extraordinary and painful circumstance—Mr. Richard, sir, a most painful circumstance. The fact is, that I myself have missed several small sums from the desk of late, and have refrained from mentioning it, hoping that accident would discover the offender—it has not done so. Sally—Mr. Richard, sir—this is a particularly distressing affair!"

As Sampson spoke, he laid the bank-note upon the desk among some papers, in an absent manner, and thrust his hands into his pockets. Richard Swiveller pointed to it, and admonished him to take it up.

"No, Mr. Richard sir," rejoined Brass with emotion, "I will not take it up. I will let it lie there, sir. To take it up, Mr. Richard sir, would imply a doubt of you; and in you sir, I have unlimited confidence. We will let it lie there sir, if you please, and we will not take it up by any means." With that, Mr. Brass patted him twice or thrice upon the shoulder, in a most friendly manner, and entreated him to believe that he had as much faith in his honesty as he had in his own.

Although at another time Mr. Swiveller might have looked upon this as a doubtful compliment, he felt it, under the then-existing circumstances, a great relief to be assured that he was not wrongfully suspected. When he had made a suitable reply, Mr. Brass wrung him by the hand, and fell into a brown study, as did Miss Sally likewise. Richard too remained in a thoughtful state; fearing every moment to hear the Marchioness impeached, and unable to resist the conviction that she must be guilty.

When they had severally remained in this condition for some minutes, Miss Sally all at once gave a loud rap upon the desk with her clenched fist, and cried, "I've hit it!"—as indeed she had, and chipped a piece out of it too; but that was not her meaning.

"Well," cried Brass anxiously. "Go on, will you?"

"Why," replied his sister with an air of triumph, "has n't there been somebody always coming in and out of this office for the last three or four weeks; has n't that somebody been left alone in it sometimes—thanks to you; and do you mean to tell me that somebody is n't the thief?"

"What somebody?" blustered Brass.

"Why, what do you call him—Kit?"

Mr. Garland's young man?"

"To be sure."

"Never!" cried Brass. "Never. I'll not hear of it. Do n't tell me—" said Sampson, shaking his head, and working with both his hands as if he were clearing away ten thousand cobwebs. "I'll never believe it of him. Never."

"I say," repeated Miss Brass, taking another pinch of snuff, "that he's the thief."

"I say," returned Sampson violently, "that he is not. What do you mean? How dare you? Are characters to be whispered away like this? Do you know that he's the honestest and faithfulest fellow that ever lived, and that he has an irreproachable good name? Come in, come in."

These last words were not addressed to Miss Sally, though they partook of the tone in which the indignant remonstrances that preceded them had been uttered. They were addressed to some person who had knocked at the office-door; and they had hardly passed the lips of Mr. Brass, when this very Kit himself looked in.

"Is the gentleman up-stairs sir, if you please?"

"Yes, Kit," said Brass, still fired with an honest indignation, and frowning with knotted brows upon his sister; "Yes Kit, he is. I am glad to see you Kit, I am rejoiced to see you. Look in again as you come down-stairs, Kit. That lad a robber!" cried Brass when he had withdrawn,

"with that frank and open countenance. I'd trust him with untold gold. Mr. Richard sir, have the goodness to step directly to Wrasp and Co.'s in Broad Street, and inquire if they have had instructions to appear in Carkem and Painter. That lad a robber," sneered Sampson, flushed and heated with his wrath. "Am I blind, deaf, silly; do I know nothing of human nature when I see it before me? Kit a robber! Bah!"

Flinging this final interjection at Miss Sally with immeasurable scorn and contempt, Sampson Brass thrust his head into his desk as if to shut the base world from his view, and breathed defiance from under its half-closed lid.

CHAPTER LIX.

When Kit, having discharged his errand, came down stairs from the single gentleman's apartment, after the lapse of a quarter of an hour or so, Mr. Sampson Brass was alone in his office. He was not singing as usual, nor was he seated at his desk. The open door showed him standing before the fire with his back towards it, and looking so very strange that Kit supposed he must have been suddenly taken ill.

"Is any thing the matter, sir?" said Kit.

"Matter!" cried Brass. "No. Why any thing the matter?"

"You are so very pale," said Kit "that I should hardly have known you."

"Pooh, pooh! mere fancy," cried Brass, stopping to throw up the cinders. "Never better Kit, never better in all my life. Merry too. Ha, ha! How's our friend, above stairs, eh?"

"A good deal better," said Kit.

"I'm glad to hear it," rejoined Brass; "thankful, I may say. An excellent gentleman—worthy, liberal, generous, gives very little trouble—an admirable lodger. Ha! ha!

Mr. Garland—he's well, I hope, Kit—and the pony—my friend, my particular friend, you know. Ha! ha!"

Kit gave a satisfactory account of all the little household at the Abel Cottage. Mr. Brass, who seemed remarkably inattentive and impatient, mounted on his stool, and beckoning him to come nearer, took him by the button-hole.

"I have been thinking, Kit," said the lawyer, "that I could throw some little emoluments into your mother's way—You have a mother, I think? If I recollect right, you told me—"

"Oh yes sir, yes certainly."

"A widow I think? an industrious widow?"

"A harder-working woman or a better mother never lived, sir."

"Ah!" cried Brass. "That's affecting, truly affecting! A poor widow struggling to maintain her orphans in decency and comfort, is a delicious picture of human goodness. Put down your hat, Kit."

"Thank you sir, I must be going directly."

"Put it down while you stay, at any rate," said Brass, taking it from him, and making some confusion among the papers, in finding a place for it on the desk. "I was thinking, Kit, that we have often houses to let for people we are concerned for. Now you know we're obliged to put people into those houses to take care of 'em—very often underserving people, that we can't depend upon. What's to prevent our having a person that we can depend upon, and enjoying the delight of doing a good action at the same time? Isay, what's to prevent our employing this worthy woman, your mother? What with one job and another, there's lodging—and good lodging too—pretty well all the year round, rent free, and a weekly allowance besides, Kit, that would provide them with a great many comforts they do n't at present enjoy. Now what do you think of that? Do you see any objection? My only desire is to serve you, Kit; therefore if you do, say so freely."

"As Brass spoke, he moved the hat twice or thrice, and shuffled among the papers again, as if in search of something."

"How can I see any objection to such a kind offer sir?" replied Kit with his whole heart. "I don't know how to thank you, sir, I do n't indeed."

"Why then," said Brass, suddenly turning upon him and thrusting his face close to Kit's with such a repulsive smile that the latter, even in the very height of his gratitude, drew back quite startled. "Why, then, it's done?"

Kit looked at him in some confusion.

"Done, I say," added Sampson, rubbing his hands and veiling himself again in his usual oily manner. "Ha! ha! and so you shall find Kit, so you shall find. But dear me," said Brass, "what a time Mr. Richard is gone! A sad loiterer to be sure! Will you mind the office one minute, while I run up stairs? Only one minute. I'll not detain you an instant longer, on any account, Kit."

Talking as he went, Mr. Brass bustled out of the office, and in a very short time returned. Mr. Swiveller came back almost at the same instant; and as Kit was leaving the room hastily, to make up for lost time, Miss Brass herself encountered him in the doorway.

"Oh!" sneered Sally, looking after him, as she entered. "There goes your pet, Sammy, eh?"

"Ah! there he goes," replied Brass. "My pet, if you please. An honest fellow, Mr. Richard, sir, a worthy fellow indeed!"

"Hem!" coughed Miss Brass.

"I tell you, you aggravating vagabond," said the angry Sampson, "that I'd stake my life upon his honesty. Am I always to be baited, and beset, by your mean suspicions? Have you no regard for true merit, you malignant fellow? If you come to that, I'd sooner suspect your honesty than his."

Miss Sally pulled out the tin snuff-box, and took a long, slow pinch, regarding her brother with a steady gaze all the time.

"She drives me wild, Mr. Richard, sir," said Brass, "she exasperates me beyond all bearing. I am heated and excited, sir, I know I am. These are not business manners, sir, nor business looks, but she carries me out of myself."

"Why do n't you leave him alone?" said Dick.

"Because she can't sir, retorted Brass; because to chafe and vex me is a part of her nature, sir, and she will and must do it, or I don't believe she'd have her health. But never mind," said Brass, "never mind. I've carried my point. I've shown my confidence in the lad. He has minded the office again. Ha ha! Ugh, you viper!"

The beautiful virgin took another pinch, and put the snuff-box in her pocket; still looking at her brother with perfect composure.

"He has minded the office again," said Brass triumphantly; "he has had my confidence, and he shall continue to have it; he—why, where's the—"

"What have you lost?" inquired Mr. Swiveller.

"Dear me!" said Brass, slapping all his pockets one after another, and looking into his desk, and under it, and upon it, and wildly tossing the papers about, "the note, Mr. Richard, sir, the five-pound note—what can have become of it? I laid it down here—God bless me!"

"What!" cried Miss Sally, starting up, clapping her hands, and scattering the papers on the floor. "Gone! Now who's right? Now who's got it? Never mind five pounds—what's five pounds? He's honest you know, quite honest. It would be mean to suspect him. Do n't run after him. No, no, not for the world!"

"Is it really gone though?" said Dick, looking at Brass, with a face as pale as his own.

"Upon my word, Mr. Richard, sir," replied the lawyer, feeling in all his pockets, with looks of the greatest agitation, "I fear this is a black business. It's certainly gone, sir. What's to be done?"

"Do n't run after him," said Miss Sally, taking more snuff. "Do n't run after him on any account. Give him time to get rid of it, you know. It would be cruel to find him out!"

Mr. Swiveller and Sampson Brass looked from Miss Sally to each other in a state of utter bewilderment, and then, as by one impulse, caught up their hats and rushed into the street—darting along in the middle of the road, and dashing aside all obstructions, as though they were running for their lives.

It happened that Kit had been running too, though not so fast, and having the start of them by some few minutes, was a good distance ahead. As they were pretty certain of the road he must have taken, however, and kept on at a great pace, they came up with him, at the very moment when he had taken breath, and was breaking into a run again.

"Stop!" cried Sampson, laying his hand on one shoulder, while Mr. Swiveller pounced upon the other. "Not so fast sir. You're in a hurry?"

"Yes, I am," said Kit, looking from one to the other, in great surprise.

"I—I—can hardly believe it," panted Sampson, "but something of value is missing from the office. I hope you do not know what."

"Know what! good Heaven, Mr. Brass!" cried Kit, trembling from head to foot; "you don't suppose—"

"No, no," rejoined Brass quickly, "I don't suppose anything. Don't say I said you did. You'll come back quietly, I hope?"

"Of course I will," returned Kit. "Why not?"

"To be sure!" said Brass. "Why not? I hope there may turn out to be no why not. If you knew the trouble I've been in this morning through taking your part, Christopher, you'd be sorry for it."

"And I am sure you'll be sorry for having suspected me sir," replied Kit. "Come. Let us make haste back."

"Certainly!" cried Brass, "the quicker, the better. Mr. Richard—have the goodness, sir, to take that arm. I'll take this one. It's not easy walking three abreast, but under these circumstances it must be done sir; there's no help for it."

Kit did turn from white to red, and from red to white again, when they secured him thus, and for a moment seemed disposed to resist. But quickly recollecting himself, and remembering that if he made any struggle, he would perhaps be dragged by the collar through the public streets, he only repeated, with great earnestness and with the tears standing in his eyes, that they would be sorry for this—and suffered them to lead him off. While they were on the way back, Mr. Swiveller, upon whom his present functions sat very irksomely, took an opportunity of whispering in his ear that if he would confess his guilt, even by so much as a nod, and promise not to do so any more, he would connive at his kicking Sampson Brass on the shins and escaping up a court; but Kit indignantly rejecting this proposal, Mr. Richard had nothing for it, but to hold him tight until they reached Bevis Marks, and ushered him into the presence of the charming Sarah, who immediately took the precaution of locking the door.

"Now you know," said Brass, "if this is a case of innocence, it is a case of that description, Christopher, where the fullest disclosure is the best satisfaction for every body. Therefore if you'll consent to an examination," he demonstrated what kind of examination he meant by turning back the cuffs of his coat, "it will be a comfortable and pleasant thing for all parties."

"Search me," said Kit, proudly, holding up his arms. "But mind, sir—I know you'll be sorry for this, to the last day of your life."

"It is certainly a very painful occurrence," said Brass, with a sigh, as he dived into one of Kit's pockets, and fished up a miscellaneous collection of small articles: "very painful. Nothing here, Mr. Richard, sir, all perfectly satisfactory. Nor here, sir. Nor in the waistcoat, Mr. Richard, nor in the coat tails. So far I am rejoiced, I am sure."

Richard Swiveller, holding Kit's hat in his hand, was watching the proceedings with great interest, and bore upon his face the slightest possible indication of a smile, as Brass, shutting one of his eyes, looked with the other up the inside of one of the poor fellow's sleeves, as if it were a telescope, when Sampson turning hastily to him, bade him search the hat.

"Here's a handkerchief," said Dick.

"No harm in that, sir," rejoined Brass, applying his eye to the other sleeve, and speaking in the voice of one who was contemplating an immense extent of prospect. "No harm in a handkerchief, sir, whatever. The faculty do not consider it a healthy custom, I believe, Mr. Richard, to carry one's handkerchief in one's hat—I have heard that it keeps the head too warm—but in every other point of view, it's being there, is extremely satisfactory—extremely so."

An exclamation, at once from Richard Swiveller, Miss Sally, and Kit himself, cut the lawyer short. He turned his head, and saw Dick standing with the bank note in his hand.

"In the hat?" cried Brass, in a sort of shriek.

"Under the handkerchief, and tucked beneath the lining," said Dick, aghast at the discovery.

Mr. Brass looked at him, at his sister, at the walls, at the ceiling, at the floor—every where but at Kit, who stood quite stupefied and motionless.

"And this," cried Sampson, clasping his hands, "is the world that turns upon its own axis, and has Lunar influences, and revolutions round Heavenly Bodies, and various games of that sort! This is human nature, is it? Oh nature, nature! This is the miscreant that I was going to benefit with all my little arts, and that even now I feel so much for, as to wish to let him go!" But, added Mr. Brass with greater fortitude, "I am myself a lawyer, and bound to set an example in carrying the laws of my happy country into effect. Sally my dear, forgive me, and catch hold of him on the other side. Mr. Richard, sir, have the goodness to run and fetch a constable. The weakness is past and over, sir, and moral strength returns. A constable, sir, if you please!"

SELF-CRITICISM.—It has been said, that the best means to correct our faults is to remove our work out of sight for some space of time, that we may hereafter review it, as it were, with other eyes, or as the effort of another. Our own productions do but too much flatter us: they are always too pleasing, and it is impossible not to be partial to them at the moment of their conception: they are children of a tender age, which are not capable of drawing our hatred on them. It is supposed that apes keep their eyes constantly fixed on their new-born offspring, and are never weary of admiring their beauty; yet a few weeks bring satiety and indifference. Nature doats upon her productions, but nature herself is changeable—if we let some weeks, or at least days, pass over our heads without looking at our compositions, that intermission will faithfully point out the faults and bring to light the real beauties if such exist.

Lockhart's Spanish Ballads.

THE CID AND THE LEPER.

[Like our own Robert the Bruce, the great Spanish hero is represented as exhibiting, on many occasions, great gentleness of disposition and compassion. But while old Barbour is contented with such simple anecdotes as that of a poor landress being suddenly taken ill with the pains of childbirth, and the King stopping the march of his army rather than leave her unprotected, the minstrels of Spain, never losing an opportunity of gratifying the superstitious propensities of their audience, are sure to let no similar incident in their champion's history pass without a miracle.]

I.
He has ta'en some twenty gentlemen, along with him to go,
For he will pay that ancient vow he to Saint James doth owe;
To Compostello, where the shrine doth by the altar stand,
The good Rodrigo de Bivar is riding through the land.

II.
Where'er he goes, much alms he throws, to feeble folk and poor;
Beside the way for him they pray, him blessings to procure;
For, God and Mary Mother, their heavenly grace to win,
His hand was ever bountiful! great was his joy therein.

III.
And there, in middle of the path, a leper did appear;
In a deep slough the leper lay, none would to help come near.
With a loud voice he thence did cry, "For God our Saviour's sake,
From out this fearful jeopardy a Christian brother take."

IV.
When Roderick heard that piteous word, he from his horse came down;
For all they said, no stay he made, that noble champion;
He reached his hand to pick him forth, of fear was no account,
Then mounted on his steed of worth, and made the leper

V.
Behind him rode the leprous man; when to their hostelry
They came, he made him eat with him at table cheerfully;
While all the rest from that poor guest with loathing shrunk away,
To his own bed the wretch he led, beside him there he lay

VI.
All at the mid hour of the night, while good Rodrigo slept,
A breath came from the leprous man, it through his shoulders crept;
Right through the body, at the breast, passed forth that I wot he leaped up with a start, in terrors manifold.

VII.
He groped for him in the bed, but him he could not find,
Through the dark chamber groped he, with very anxious mind;
Loudly he lifted up his voice, with speed a lamp was brought,
Yet nowhere was the leper seen, though far and near they sought.

VIII.
He turned him to his chamber, God wot, perplexed sore
With that which had befallen—when lo! his face before,
There stood a man, all clothed in vesture shining white:
Thus said the vision, "Sleepest thou, or wakest thou, Sir Knight?"

IX.
"I sleep not," quoth Rodrigo; "but tell me who art thou,
For, in the midst of darkness, much light is on thy brow!"
"I am the holy Lazarus, I come to speak with thee;
I am the same poor leper thou say'st for charity."

X.
"Not vain the trial, nor in vain thy victory hath been;
God favors thee, for that my pain thou didst relieve yestern.

There shall be honor with thee, in battle and in peace,
Success in all thy doings, and plentiful increase.

XI.
"Strong enemies shall not prevail, thy greatness to undo;
Thy name shall make men's cheeks full pale—Christians and Moslem too;
A death of honor shalt thou die, such grace to thee is given,
Thy soul shall part victoriously, and be received in heaven."

XII.
When he these gracious words had said, the spirit vanished quite.
Rodrigo rose and knelt him down—he knelt till morning
Unto the Heavenly Father, and Mary Mother dear,
He made his prayer right humbly, till dawned the morning clear.

PETER RUGG, THE MISSING MAN.

BY WILLIAM AUSTIN.

From Jonathan Dunsell of New York, to Mr. Herman Krauff.

Sir:—Agreeably to my promise, I now relate to you all the particulars of the lost man and child which I have been able to collect. It is entirely owing to the humane interest you seemed to take in the report, that I have pursued the inquiry to the following result.

You may remember that business called me to Boston in the summer 1830. I sailed in the packet to Providence and when I arrived there, I learned that every seat in the stage was engaged. I was thus obliged either to wait a few hours, or accept a seat with the driver, who civilly offered me that accommodation. Accordingly I took my seat by his side, and soon found him intelligent and communicative. We had travelled about ten miles, the horses suddenly threw their ears on their necks, as flat as a hare's. Said the driver, "Have you a surtout with you?"

"No," said I; why do you ask?
"You will want one soon," said he. "Do you observe the ears of all the horses?"

"Yes," and was just about to ask the reason.
"They see the storm breeder, and we shall see him soon."

At this moment there was not a cloud visible in the firmament. Soon after, a small speck appeared in the road. "There," said my companion, "comes the storm breeder; he always leaves a Scotch mist behind him. By many a wet jacket do I remember him. I suppose the poor fellow suffers much himself—much more than is known to the world."

Presently a man with a child beside him, with a black horse, and a weather-beaten chair, once built for a chaise body, passed in great haste, apparently at the rate of twelve miles an hour. He seemed to grasp the reins of his horse with firmness, and appeared to anticipate his speed. He seemed dejected, and looked anxiously at the passengers, particularly at the stage driver and myself. In a moment after he passed us, the horses' ears were up, and bent themselves forward so that they nearly met.

"Who is that man?" said I; "he seems in great trouble."

"Nobody knows who he is, but his person and the child are familiar to me. I have met him more than a hundred times, and have been so often asked the way to Boston by that man, even when he was travelling direct from town, that of late I have refused any communication with him; and that is the reason he gave me such a fixed look."

"But does he never stop any where?"

"I have never known him to stop any where, longer than to inquire the way to Boston; and let him be where he may, he will tell you he cannot stay a moment, for he must reach Boston that night."

We were now ascending a high hill in Walpole; and as we had a fair view of the heavens, I was rather disposed to jeer the driver for thinking of his surtout, as not a cloud as big as a marble could be discerned.

"Do you look," said he, "in the direction whence the man came; that is the place to look. The storm never overtakes him, it follows him."

We presently approached another hill; and when at the height the driver pointed out in an eastern direction a little black speck about as big as a hat—"There," said he, "is the seed storm; we may possibly reach Polley's before it reaches us, but the wanderer and his child will go to Providence through rain, thunder and lightning."

And now the horses, as though taught by instinct, hastened with increased speed. The little black cloud came on rolling over the turnpike, and doubled and trebled itself. The appearance of this cloud attracted the notice of all the passengers, for after it had spread itself to a great bulk, it suddenly became more limited in circumference, grew more compact, dark and consolidated. And now the successive flashes of chain lightning caused the whole cloud to appear like a sort of irregular net work, and displayed a thousand fantastic images. The driver bespoke my attention to a remarkable configuration in the cloud: he said that every flash of lightning near its centre discovered to him distinctly the form of a man sitting in an open carriage drawn by a black horse. But in truth I saw no such thing. The man's fancy was doubtless at fault. It is a very common thing for the imagination to paint for the senses, both in the visible and invisible world. In the mean time the distant thunder gave notice of a shower at hand; and just as we reached Polley's tavern the rain poured down in torrents. It was soon over, the cloud passing in the direction of the turnpike towards Providence. In a few moments after, a respectable looking man in a chaise stopped at the door. The man and child in the chair having excited some little sympathy among the passengers, the gentleman was asked if he had observed them. He said he had met them; that the man seemed bewildered, and inquired the way to Boston; that he was driving at great speed, as though he expected to outstrip the tempest; that the moment he had passed him, a thunder clap broke directly over the man's head, and seemed to envelope both man and child, horse and carriage. "I stopped," said the gentleman, "supposing the lightning had struck him, but the horse only seemed to loom up and increase his speed; and as well as I could judge, he travelled just as fast as the thundercloud."

While this man was speaking, a pedlar with a cart of tin merchandize came up, all dripping; and on being questioned, he said he had met that man and carriage, within a fortnight, in four different states; that at each time he had inquired the way to Boston, and that a thunder shower, like the present, had each time deluged his wagon and his wares, setting his tin pots, &c., afloat, so that he had determined to get marine insurance done for the future. But that which excited his surprise most, was the strange conduct of his horse, for that long before he could distinguish the man in the chair, his own horse stood still in the road, and flung back his ears. "In short," said the pedlar, "I wish never to see that man and horse again; they do not look to me as though they belonged to this world."

This was all I could learn at that time; and the occurrence soon after would have become with me, "like one of those things which had never happened," had I not, as I stood recently on the door-step of Bennett's hotel in Hartford, heard a man say, "There goes Peter Rugg and his child! he looks wet and weary, and farther from Boston than ever." I was satisfied it was the same man I had seen more than three years before; for whoever has once seen Peter Rugg, can never be deceived as to his identity.

"Peter Rugg!" said I, "and who is Peter Rugg?"

"That," said the stranger, "is more than any one can tell exactly. He is a famous traveller, held in light esteem by all janholders, for he never stops to eat, drink or sleep. I wonder why the government do not employ him to carry the mail."

"Ay," said a bystander, "that is a thought bright only on one side; how long would it take in that case to send a letter to Boston, for Peter has already, to my knowledge, been more than twenty years travelling to that place."

"But," said I, "does the man never stop any where; does he never converse with any one? I saw the same man more than three years since, near Providence, and I heard a strange story about him. Pray, sir, give me some account of this man."

"Sir," said the stranger, "those who know the most respecting that man, say the least. I have heard it asserted that heaven sometimes sets a mark on a man, either for judgment or a trial. Under which Peter Rugg now labors, I cannot say; therefore I am rather inclined to pity than to judge."

"You speak like a humane man," said I, "and if you have known him so long, I pray you will give me some account of him. Has his appearance much altered in that time?"

"Why, yes. He looks as though he never ate, drank or slept; and his child looks older than himself, and he looks like time broke off from eternity, and anxious to gain a resting place."

"And how does his horse look?" said I.

"As for his horse, he looks fatter and gayer, and shows more animation and courage, than he did twenty years ago. The last time Rugg spoke to me, he inquired how far it was to Boston. I told him just one hundred miles."

"Why," said he, "how can you deceive me so? It is cruel to mislead a traveller. I have lost my way. Pray direct me the nearest way to Boston."

I repeated, it is one hundred miles.

"How can you say so?" said he. "I was told last evening it was but fifty, and I have travelled all night."

"But," said I, "you are travelling from Boston. You must turn back."

"Alas," said he, "it is all turn back! Boston shifts with the wind, and plays all around the compass. One man tells me it is to the east—another, to the west. And the guide-posts, too—they all point the wrong way."

"But will you not stop and rest?" said I. "You seem wet and weary."

"Yes," said he, "it has been foul weather since I left home."

"Stop, then, and refresh yourself."

"I must not stop. I must reach home to-night, if possible; though I think you must be mistaken in the distance to Boston."

He then gave the reins to his horse, which he restrained with difficulty, and disappeared in a moment. A few days afterwards, I met the man a little this side of Claremont, winding around the hills in Unity, at the rate, I believe, of twelve miles an hour.

"Is Peter Rugg his real name, or has he accidentally gained that name?"

"I know not, but presume he will not deny his name: you can ask him—for see, he has turned his horse, and is passing this way."

In a moment, a dark colored, high spirited horse approached, and would have passed without stopping, but I had resolved to speak to Peter Rugg, or whoever the man might be. Accordingly I stepped into the street, and as the horse approached, I made a feint of stopping him. The man immediately reined in his horse. "Sir," said I, "may I be so bold as to inquire if you are not Mr. Rugg?"

"My name is Peter Rugg," said he. "I have unfortunately lost my way; I am wet and weary, and will take it kindly of you to direct me to Boston."

"You live in Boston, do you, and in what street?"

"In Middle street."

"When did you leave Boston?"

"I cannot tell precisely; it seems a considerable time."

"But how did you and your child become so wet? It has not rained here to-day."

"It has just rained a heavy shower up the river. But I shall not reach Boston to-night if I tarry. Would you advise me to take the old road, or the turnpike?"

"Why the old road is one hundred and seventeen miles, and the turnpike is ninety-seven."

"How can you say so? you impose on me; it is wrong to trifle with a traveller; you know it is but forty miles from Newburyport to Boston."

"But this is not Newburyport; this is Hartford."

"Do not deceive me, sir. Is not this town Newburyport, and the river that I have been following, the Merrimack?"

"No, sir; this is Hartford, and the river the Connecticut."

He wrung his hands and looked incredulous.

"Have the rivers, too, changed their courses, as the cities have changed places? But see! the clouds are gathering in the south, and we shall have a rainy night. Ah, that fatal oath!"

He would tarry no longer; his impatient horse leaped off, his hind flanks rising like wings, he seemed to devour all before him, and to scorn all behind.

I had now, as I thought, discovered a clue to the history of Peter Rugg, and I determined, the next time my business called me to Boston, to make a further inquiry. Soon after, I was enabled to collect the following particulars from Mrs. Croft, an aged lady in Middle street, who has resided in Boston during the last twenty years. Her narration is this:

The last summer, a person, just at twilight, stopped at the door of the late Mrs. Rugg. Mrs. Croft, on coming to the door, perceived a stranger, with a child by his side, in an old weather-beaten carriage, with a black horse. The stranger asked for Mrs. Rugg, and was informed that Mrs. Rugg had died in a good old age, more than twenty years before that time.

The stranger replied, "How can you deceive me so? do ask Mrs. Rugg to step to the door."

"Sir, I assure you Mrs. Rugg has not lived here these nineteen years; no one lives here but myself, and my name is Betsey Croft."

The stranger paused and looked up and down the street, and said,—"Though the painting is rather faded, this looks like my house."

"Yes," said the child, "that is the stone before the door that I used to sit on to eat my bread and milk."

"But," said the stranger, "it seems to be on the wrong side of the street. Indeed, every thing here seems to be misplaced. The streets are all changed, the people are all changed, the town seems changed, and what is strangest of all, Catharine Rugg has deserted her husband and child. Pray," continued the stranger, "has John Foy come home from sea? He went a long voyage; he is my kinsman. If I could see him, he could give me some account of Mrs. Rugg."

"Sir," said Mrs. Croft, "I never heard of John Foy. Where did he live?"

"Just above, here, in Orange Tree lane."

"There is no such place in this neighbourhood."

"What do you tell me! Are the streets gone? Orange Tree lane is at the head of Hanover street, near Pemberton's Hill."

"There is no such lane now."

"Madam! you cannot be serious. But you doubtless know my brother, William Rugg. He lives in Royal Exchange lane, near King street."

"I know of no such lane; and I am sure there is no such street as King street in this town."

"No such street as King street! Why, woman! you mock me. You may as well tell me there is no King George. However, madam, you see I am wet and weary, I must find a resting place. I will go to Hart's tavern, near the market."

"Which market, sir? for you seem perplexed; we have several markets."

"You know there is but one market near the Town dock."

"Oh, the old market; but no such person has kept there these twenty years."

Here the stranger seemed disconcerted, and uttered to himself quite audibly—"Strange mistake, how much this looks like the town of Boston! It certainly has a great resemblance to it; but I perceive my mistake now. Some other Mrs. Rugg, some other Middle street."

"Then," said he, "madam, can you direct me to Boston?"

"Why this is Boston, the city of Boston; I know of no other Boston."

"City of Boston it may be; but it is not the Boston where I live. I recollect, now, I came over a bridge instead of a ferry. Pray what bridge is that I just came over?"

"It is Charles River bridge."

"I perceive my mistake; there is a ferry between Boston and Charlestown; there is no bridge. Ah, I perceive my mistake. If I were in Boston, my horse would carry me directly to my own door. But my horse shows, by his impatience, that he is in a strange place. Absurd, that I should have mistaken this place for the old town of Boston! it is a much finer city than the town of Boston. It has been built long since Boston. I fancy it must lie at a distance from this city, as the good woman seems ignorant of it."

At these words his horse began to chafe, and strike the pavement with his fore feet. The stranger seemed a little bewildered and said, "no home to-night;" and giving the reins to his horse passed up the street, and I saw no more of him.

It was evident that the generation to which Peter Rugg belonged, had passed away.

This was all the account of Peter Rugg I could obtain from Mrs. Croft; but she directed me to an elderly man, Mr. James Felt, who lived near her, and who had kept a record of the principal occurrences for the last fifty years. At my request she sent for him; and, after I had related to him the object of my inquiry, Mr. Felt told me he had known Rugg in his youth; that his disappearance had caused some surprise; but as it sometimes happens that men run away, sometimes to be rid of others, and sometimes to be rid of themselves; and Rugg took his child with him, and his own horse and chair; and as it did not appear that any creditors made a stir, the occurrence soon mingled itself in the stream of oblivion, and Rugg and his child, horse, and chair, were soon forgotten.

"It is true," said Mr. Felt, "sundry stories grew out of Rugg's affair, whether true or false I cannot tell; but stranger things have happened in my day, without even a newspaper notice."

"Sir," said I, "Peter Rugg is now living. I have lately seen Peter Rugg and his child, horse, and chair; therefore I pray you to relate to me all you know or ever heard of him."

"Why, my friend," said James Felt, "that Peter Rugg is now a living man, I will not deny; but that you have seen Peter Rugg and his child is impossible, if you mean a small child; for Jenny Rugg, if living, must be at least—let me see—Boston Massacre, 1770—Jenny Rugg was about ten years old. Why, sir, Jenny Rugg, if living must be more than sixty years of age. That Peter Rugg is living, is highly probable, as he was only ten years older than myself; and I was only eighty last March; and I am as likely to live twenty years longer as any body."

Here I perceived that Mr. Felt was in his dotage, and I despaired of gaining any intelligence from him, on which I could depend.

I took my leave of Mrs. Croft, and proceeded to my lodgings at the Marlborough Hotel.

Master Rugg, thought I, has been travelling since the Boston massacre, there is no reason why he should not as until the end of time. If the present generation know little of him, the next will know less, and Peter and his child will have no hold of this world.

In the course of the evening, I related my adventure in Hammond street.

"Peter!" said one of the company, smiling, "do you really think you have seen Peter Rugg? I have heard my grandfather speak of him as though he really believed his own story."

"Sir," said I, "pray let us compare your grandfather's story of Mr. Rugg with that of my own."

"Peter Rugg, sir, if my grandfather was worthy of credit, once lived in Middle street in this city. He was a man in comfortable circumstances: had a wife and one daughter, and was generally esteemed for his sober life and manners. But unhappily, his temper, at times, was altogether ungovernable, and then his language was terrible. In these fits of passion, if a door stood in his way, he would never do less than kick a pannel through. He would sometimes throw his heels over his head, and come down on his feet, uttering oaths in a circle; and thus in a rage, he was the first who performed a somerset, and did what others have since learned to do for merriment and money. Once Rugg was seen to bite a tennypenny nail in halves. In those days, every body, both men and boys, wore wigs; and Peter, at these moments of violent passion, would become so profane, that his wig would rise up from his head. Some said it was on account of his terrible language. Others accounted for it in a more philosophical way, and said it was caused by the expansion of his scalp; as violent passion, we know, will swell the veins and expand the head. While these fits were on him, Rugg had no respect for heaven or earth. Except this infirmity all agreed that Rugg was a good sort of a man; for when his fits were over, nobody was so ready to command a placid temper as Peter."

"It was late in autumn, one morning, that Rugg, in his own chair, with a fine large bay horse, took his daughter and proceeded to Concord. On his return a violent storm overtook him. At dark he stopped in Menotomy, now West Cambridge, at the door of a Mr. Cutter, a friend of his, who urged him to tarry the night. On Rugg's declining to stop, Mr. Cutter urged him vehemently. 'Why Mr. Rugg, said Cutter, 'the storm is overwhelming you; the night is exceeding dark; your little daughter will perish; you are in the open chair, the tempest is increasing.' 'Let the storm increase,' said Rugg, with a fearful oath, 'I will see home to-night, in spite of the last tempest! or may I never see home.' At these words he gave his whip to his high-spirited horse, and disappeared in a moment. But Peter Rugg did not reach home that night, nor the next; nor, when he became a missing man, could he ever be traced beyond Mr. Cutter's in Menotomy."

For a long time after, on every dark and stormy night, the wife of Peter Rugg would fancy she heard the crack of a whip, and the fleet tread of a horse, and the rattling of a carriage passing her door. The neighbors, too, heard the same noises, and some said they knew it was Rugg's horse; the tread on the pavement was perfectly familiar to them. This occurred so repeatedly, that at length the neighbors watched with lanterns, and saw the real Peter Rugg, with his own horse and chair, and child sitting beside him, pass directly before his own door, his head turned towards his house, and himself making every effort to stop his horse, but in vain.

The next day, the friends of Mrs. Rugg exerted themselves to find her husband and child. They inquired at every public house and stable in town; but it did not appear that Rugg made any stay in Boston. No one, after Rugg had passed his own door, could give any account of him; though it was asserted by some that the clatter of Rugg's horse and carriage over the pavements shook the houses on both sides of the streets. And this is credible, if indeed Rugg's horse and carriage did pass on that night. For at this day, in many of the streets, a loaded truck or team, in passing, will shake the houses like an earthquake. However, Rugg's neighbors never afterwards watched; some of them treated it all as a delusion, and thought no more of it. Others, of a different opinion, shook their heads and said nothing.

Thus Rugg, and his child, horse and chair, were soon forgotten: and probably many in the neighborhood never heard a word on the subject.

There was indeed a rumor, that Rugg afterwards was seen in Connecticut, between Suffield and Hartford, passing through the country with headlong speed. This gave occasion to Rugg's friends to make further inquiry. But the more they inquired, the more they were baffled. If they heard of Rugg one day in Connecticut—the next, they heard of him winding round the hills of New Hampshire and soon after a man in a chair, with a small child, exactly answering the description of Peter Rugg, would be seen in Rhode Island, inquiring the way to Boston.

But that which chiefly gave a color of mystery to the story of Peter Rugg, was the affair at Charlestown bridge. The toll-gatherer asserted that sometimes, on the darkest and most stormy nights, when no object could be discerned about the time Rugg was missing, a horse and wheel carriage, with a noise equal to a troop, would at midnight, in utter contempt of the rates of toll, pass over the bridge. This occurred so frequently that the toll-gatherer resolved to attempt a discovery. Soon after, at the usual time, apparently the same horse and carriage approached the bridge from Charlestown square. The toll-gatherer, prepared, took his stand as near the middle of the bridge as he dared, with a large three-legged stool in his hand. As the appearance passed, he threw the stool at the horse, but heard nothing, except the noise of the stool skipping across the bridge. The toll-gatherer next day asserted that the stool went directly through the body of the horse; and he persisted in that belief ever after. Whether Rugg, or whoever the person was, ever passed the bridge again, the toll-gatherer would never tell—and when questioned, seemed anxious to waive the subject. And thus Peter Rugg and his child, horse and carriage, remain a mystery to this day.

This, sir, is all that I could learn of Peter Rugg in Boston.

FURTHER ACCOUNT OF PETER RUGG, BY JONATHAN DONWELL.

In the autumn of 1835, I attended the races at Richmond in Virginia. As two new horses of great promise were run, the race ground was never better attended, nor was expectation ever more deeply excited. The partisans of Dart and Lightning, the two race horses, were equally anxious, and equally dubious of the result. To an indifferent spectator, it was impossible to perceive any difference. They were equally beautiful to behold, alike in color and height, and as they stood side by side, they measured from heel to fore feet within half an inch of each other. The eyes of each were full, prominent and resolute; and when at times they regarded each other, they assumed a lofty demeanor, seemed to shorten their necks, project their eyes, and rest their bodies equally on their four hoofs. They certainly discovered signs of intelligence, and displayed a courtesy to each other, unusual even with stallions.

It was now nearly 12 o'clock, the hour of expectation, doubt and anxiety. The riders mounted their horses; and so trim, light and airy they sat on the animals, they seemed a part of them. The spectators, many deep, in a solid column, had taken their places; and as many thousand breathing statues were there as spectators. All eyes were turned to Dart and Lightning, and their two fairy riders. There was nothing to disturb this calm, except a busy woodpecker on a neighboring tree. The signal was given, and Dart and Lightning answered the signal with ready intelligence. At first they proceed on a slow trot, then they quicken to a canter, and then a gallop. Presently they sweep the plain; both horses lay themselves flat on the ground, and their riders bending forward, and resting their chins between their horses' ears. Had not the ground been perfectly level, had there been any undulation, the least rise or fall, the spectator, every moment, for a moment, would have lost sight of both horses and riders.

While these horses, side by side, thus appeared, flying without wings, flat as a hare, and neither gained on the other, all eyes were diverted to a new spectacle. Directly in the rear of Dart and Lightning, a majestic black horse, of unusual size, drawing an old weather-beaten chair, strode over the plain; and, although he appeared to make no effort, for he maintained a steady trot, before Dart and Lightning approached the goal, the black horse and chair had overtaken the racers, who, on perceiving this new competitor pass them, threw back their ears, and suddenly stopped in their course. Thus neither Dart nor Lightning carried away the purse.

The spectators now were exceedingly curious to learn whence came the black horse and chair. With many it was the opinion that nobody was in the vehicle. Indeed this began to be the prevalent opinion, for those at a short distance, so fleet was the black horse, could not easily discern who, if any body, was in the carriage. But both the riders, whom the black horse passed very nearly, agreed in this particular, that a sad looking man with a little girl, was in the chair. When they stated this, I was satisfied it was Peter Rugg. But what caused no little surprise, John Spring, one of the riders, he who rode Lightning, asserted that no earthly horse without breaking his trot, could, in a carriage, outstrip his race horse: and he persisted with some passion that it was not a horse, he was sure it was not a horse, but a large black ox. "What a great black ox can do," said John, "I cannot pretend to say; but no race horse, not even Flying Childers, could out-trot Lightning in a fair race."

This opinion of John Spring excited no little merriment, for it was clearly obvious to every one, that it was a powerful black horse that interrupted the race; but John Spring, jealous of Lightning's reputation as a horse, would rather have it thought than any other beast, even an ox, had been the victor. However, the horse-laugh at John Spring's expense was soon suppressed; for as soon as Dart and Lightning began to breathe more freely, it was observed that both of them walked deliberately to the tract of the race ground, and putting their heads to the earth, they suddenly raised them again, and began to snort. They repeated this, till John Spring said, "These horses have discovered something strange; they suspect foul play; but let me go and talk with Lightning."

And he went up to Lightning and took hold of his mane; and Lightning put his nose toward the ground, and smelt of the earth without touching it, and then reared his head very high, and snorted so loudly, that the sound echoed from the next hill. Dart did the same. John Spring stooped, down to examine the spot where Lightning smelt. In a moment he raised himself up, and the countenance of the man was changed; his strength failed him, and he sidled against Lightning.

At length John Spring recovered from his stupor, and exclaimed, "it was an ox! I told you it was an ox; no real horse ever yet beat Lightning."

And now on a close inspection of the black horse's tracks in the paths it was evident to every one, that the fore feet of the black horse were cloven. Notwithstanding these appearances, to me it was evident that the strange horse was in reality a horse. Yet when the people left the race ground, I presume one half of all those present, would have testified that a large black ox had distanced two of the fleetest coursers that ever trod the Virginia turf. So uncertain are all things called historical facts.

While I was proceeding to my lodgings, pondering on the events of the day, a stranger rode up to me, and accosted me thus—"I think your name is Dunwell, sir?"

"Yes, sir," I replied.

"Did I not see you a year or two since in Boston, at the Marlborough Hotel?"

"Very likely, sir, for I was there."

"And you heard a story about one Peter Rugg?"

"I recollect it all," said I.

"The account you heard in Boston must be true, for here he was to-day. The man has found his way to Virginia, and for aught that appears, has been to Cape Horn. I have seen him before to-day, but never saw him travel with such fearful velocity. Pray, sir, where does Peter Rugg spend his winters? for I have seen him only in summer, and always in foul weather, except at this time."

I replied, "No one knows where Peter Rugg spends his winters; where or when he eats, drinks, sleeps or lodges. He seems to have an indistinct idea of day and night, time and space, storm and sunshine. His only object is Boston. It appears to me that Rugg's horse has some control of the chair; and that Rugg himself is, in some sort, under the control of his horse."

I then inquired of the stranger, where he first saw the man and horse.

"Why, sir," said he, "in the summer of 1824, I travelled to the North for my health; and soon after I saw you at the Marlborough Hotel, I returned homeward to Virginia, and, if my memory is correct, I saw this man and horse in every state between here and Massachusetts. Sometimes he would meet me, but oftener overtake me. He never spoke but once, and that once was in Delaware. On his approach, he checked his horse with some difficulty. A more beautiful horse I never saw; his hide was as fair, and round, and glossy as the skin of a Congo beauty. When Rugg's horse approached mine, he reined in his neck, bent his ears forward until they met, and looked my horse full in the face. My horse immediately withered into half a horse; his hide curled up like a piece of burnt leather; spell-bound, he was fixed to the earth as though a nail had been driven through each hoof."

"Sir," said Rugg, "perhaps you are travelling to Boston; and if so, I should be happy to accompany you, for I have lost my way, and I must reach home to-night. See how sleepy this little girl looks. Poor thing, she is a picture of patience."

"Sir," said I, "it is impossible for you to reach home to-night, for you are in Concord, in the county of Sussex, in the state of Delaware."

"What do you mean," said he, "by the state of Delaware? If I was in Concord, that is only twenty miles from Boston, and my horse Lightfoot could carry me to Charleston ferry in two hours. You mistake, sir. You are a stranger here. This town is nothing like Concord. I am well acquainted with Concord. I went to Concord when I left Boston."

"But," said I, "you are in Concord, in the state of Delaware."

"What do you mean by state," said Rugg.

"Why, one of the United States."

"States!" said he, in a low voice; "the man is a wag, and would persuade me I am in Holland." Then raising his voice, he said, "You seem, sir, to be a gentleman, and I entreat you to mislead me not. Tell me, quickly, for pity's sake, the right road to Boston; for you see my horse will swallow his bits, for he has eaten nothing since I left Concord."

"Sir," said I, "this town is Concord, Concord in Delaware, not Concord in Massachusetts; and you are now five hundred miles from Boston."

"Rugg looked at me for a moment more in sorrow than resentment, and then repeated, 'Five hundred miles!—unhappy man! who would have thought he had been so deranged! But nothing is so deceitful as appearances, in this world. Five hundred miles!—this beats Connecticut river.'

"What he meant by Connecticut river, I knew not. His horse broke away, and Rugg disappeared in a moment."

I explained to the stranger the meaning of Rugg's expression, "Connecticut river," and the incident respecting him, that occurred at Hartford, as I stood on the door stone of Mr. Bennett's excellent hotel. We both agreed that the man we had seen that day was the true Peter Rugg.

Soon after, I saw Rugg again, at the toll-gate on the turnpike between Alexandria and Middleburgh. While I was paying the toll, I observed to the toll-gatherer, that the drought was more severe in his vicinity than farther south.

"Yes," said he, "the drought is excessive; but if I had not heard yesterday, by a traveller, that the man with the black horse was seen in Kentucky a day or two since, I should be sure of a shower in a few minutes."

I looked all around the horizon, and could not discern a cloud that could hold a pint of water.

"Look, sir," said the toll-gatherer, "you perceive to the eastward, just rising that hill, a small black cloud not bigger than a blackberry, and while I am speaking it is doubling and trebling itself, and rolling up the turnpike steadily, as if its sole design was to deluge some object."

"True," said I, "I do perceive it; but what connexion is there between a thunder cloud and a man and horse?"

"More than you imagine, or I can tell you;—but stop a moment, sir, I may need your assistance. I know that cloud; I have seen it several times before, and can testify to its identity. You will soon see a man and black horse under it."

While he was speaking, true enough, we began to hear the distant thunder, and soon the chain lightning performed all the figures of a country dance. About a mile distant, we saw the man and black horse under the cloud; but before he arrived at the toll-gate, the thunder cloud had spent itself, and not even a sprinkle fell near us.

As the man whom I instantly knew to be Rugg, attempted to pass, the toll-gatherer swung the gate across the road, seized Rugg's horse by the reins; and demanded two dollars.

Feeling some little regard for Rugg, I interfered, and began to question the toll-gatherer, and requested him not to be wroth with the man.

The toll-gatherer replied he had just cause, for the man had run his toll ten times, and moreover that the horse had discharged a cannon ball at him, to the great danger of his life; that the man had always before approached so rapidly that he was too quick for the rusty hinges of the toll-gate; but that now he would have full satisfaction.

Rugg looked wistfully at me, and said, "I entreat you, sir, to delay me not: I have found at length the direct road to Boston, and shall not reach home before night if you detain me; you see I am dripping wet, and ought to change my clothes."

The toll-gatherer then demanded why he had run the toll so many times?

"Toll! why," said Rugg, "do you demand toll? There is no toll to pay on the king's highway."

"King's highway! do you not perceive this is a turnpike?"

"Turnpike! there are no turnpikes in Massachusetts."

"That may be, but we have several in Virginia."

"Virginia! do you pretend I am in Virginia?"

Rugg then appealing to me asked how far it was to Boston?

Said I, "Mr. Rugg, I perceive you are bewildered, and am sorry to see you so far away from home; you are indeed in Virginia."

"You know me, then, sir, it seems, and you say I am in Virginia; Give me leave to tell you, sir, you are the most impudent man alive; for I was never forty miles from Boston, and I never saw a Virginian in my life. This beats Delaware!"

"Your toll sir, your toll!"

"I will not pay you a penny," said Rugg; "you are both of you highway robbers, there are no turnpikes in this country. Take toll on the king's highway! Robbers take toll on the king's highway." Then in a low tone he said, "here is evidently a conspiracy against me; alas, I shall never see Boston! The highways refuse me a passage, the rivers change their courses, and there is no faith in the gate, and you will get it again."

I then questioned the toll-gatherer respecting his knowledge of this man; and he related the following particulars:

"The first time," said he, "that man ever passed this toll-gate was in the year 1806, at the moment of the great eclipse. I thought the horse was frightened at the sudden darkness, and concluded he had run away with the man. But within a few days after, the same man and horse repassed with equal speed, without the least respect to the toll-gate or to me, except by a vacant stare. Some few years afterwards during the late war, I saw the same man approaching again and I resolved to check his career. Accordingly I stepped into the middle of the road, and stretched wide both of my arms, and cried stop, sir, on your peril! At this, the man said, 'Now, Lightfoot, confound the robber!' at the same time, he gave the whip liberally to the flank of his horse, who bounded off with such force, that it appeared to me, two such horses, gave them a place to stand, would check the diurnal motion of the earth. An ammunition compass."

But Rugg's horse had no idea of stopping more than one minute, for in the midst of this altercation, the horse, whose nose was resting on the upper bar of the turnpike gate, seized it between his teeth, lifted it gently off its staples, and trotted off with it. The toll-gatherer, confounded, strained his eyes after his gate.

"Let him go," said I, "the horse will soon drop your wagon which had just passed on to Baltimore, had dropped an eighteen pounder in the road; this unlucky ball lay in the way of the horse's heels, and the beast, with the sagacity of a demon, clenched it with one of his heels, and hurled it behind him. I feel dizzy in relating the fact, but so nearly did the ball pass my head, that the wind thereof blew off my hat, and the ball bedded itself in the gate post, as you may see, if you will cast your eye to the post. I have permitted it to remain there in memory of the occurrence, as the people of Boston, I am told, preserve the eighteen pounder, which is now to be seen half bedded in Brattle street church."

I then took leave of the toll-gatherer, and promised him, if I saw or heard of his gate, I would send him notice.

A strong inclination had possessed me to arrest Rugg, and search his pockets, thinking great discoveries might be made in the examination; but what I saw and heard that day convinced me that no human force could detain Peter Rugg against his consent. I therefore determined if I ever saw Rugg again to treat him in the gentlest manner.

In pursuing my way to New York, I entered the turnpike in Trenton; and when I arrived at New Brunswick, I perceived the road was newly McAdamized. The small stones had just been laid thereon. As I passed this piece of road, I observed at regular distances of about eight feet, the stones entirely displaced from spots as large as the circumference of a half bushel measure. This singular appearance induced me to inquire the cause of it at the turnpike gate.

"Sir," said the toll-gatherer, "I wonder not at the question, but I am unable to give you a satisfactory answer. Indeed, sir, I believe I am bewitched, and that the turnpike is under a spell of enchantment: for what appeared to me last night cannot be a real transaction; otherwise a turnpike gate is a useless thing."

"I do not believe in witchcraft or enchantment," said I, "and if you will relate circumstantially what happened last night, I will endeavor to account for it by natural means."

"You may recollect, the night was uncommonly dark. Well, sir, just after I had closed the gate for the night, down the turnpike, as far as my eye could reach, I beheld, what at first appeared to me, two armies engaged. The report of the musketry and the flashes of their firelocks were incessant and continuous. As this strange spectacle approached me with the fury of a tornado, the noise increased, and the appearance rolled on in one compact body over the surface of the ground. The most splendid fireworks rose out of the earth, and encircled this moving spectacle. The divers tints of the rainbow, the most brilliant dyes that the sun lays on the lap of spring, added to the whole family of gems, could not display a more beautiful, radiant, and dazzling spectacle, than accompanied the black horse. You would have thought all the stars of heaven had met in merriment on the turnpike. In the midst of this luminous configuration sat a man, distinctly to be seen, in a miserable looking chair, drawn by a black horse. The turnpike gate ought, by the laws of nature and the laws of the state, to have made a wreck of the whole, and have dissolved the enchantment; but no! the horse, without an effort, passed over the gate, and drew the man and chair horizontally after him without touching the bar. This was what I call enchantment—what think you, sir?"

"My friend," said I, "you have grossly magnified a natural occurrence. The man was Peter Rugg, on his way to Boston. It is true, his horse travelled with unequalled speed, but as he reared high his fore feet, he could not help displacing the thousand small stones on which he trod, which flying in all directions struck each other, and resounded and scintillated. The top bar of your gate is not more than two feet from the ground, and Rugg's horse at every vault could easily lift the carriage over that gate."

This satisfied Mr. McDoubt, and I was pleased at that occurrence; for otherwise Mr. McDoubt, who is a worthy man late from the Highlands, might have added to his calendar of superstitions. Having thus disenchanting the McAdamized road and the turnpike gate, and also Mr. McDoubt, I pursued my journey homeward to New York.

Little did I expect to see or hear any thing further of Mr. Rugg, for he was now more than twelve hours in advance of me. I could hear nothing of him on my way to Elizabethtown. I therefore concluded that during the past night he had turned off from the turnpike and pursued a westerly direction. But just before I arrived at Powles Hook, I observed a considerable number of passengers in the ferry boat, all standing motionless, and steadily looking at the same object. One of the ferrymen, Mr. Hardy, who well knew me, observing my approach, delayed a minute, in order to afford me a passage, and coming up, said, "Mr. Dunwell, we have got a curiosity on board that would puzzle Dr. Mitchell."

"Some strange fish, I suppose, has found its way into the Hudson."

"No," said he, "it is a man, who looks as if he had lain in the ark, and had just now ventured out. He has a little girl with him, the counterpart of himself; and the finest horse you ever saw, harnessed to the queerest looking carriage that ever was made."

"Ah, Mr. Hardy," said I, "you have, indeed, hooked a prize; no one before you could ever detain Peter Rugg long enough to examine him."

"Do you know the man?" said Mr. Hardy.

"No, nobody knows him, but every body has seen him. Detain him as long as possible; delay the boat under any pretence; cut the gear of the horse; do any thing to detain him."

As I entered the ferry boat, I was struck at the spectacle before me; there, indeed, sat Peter Rugg and Jenny Rugg in the chair, and there stood the black horse, all as quiet as lambs, surrounded by more than fifty men and women, who seemed to have lost all their senses but one. Not a motion, not a breath, not a nestle. They were all eye. Rugg appeared to them to be a man not of this world, and they appeared to Rugg a strange generation of men. Rugg spoke not, and they spoke not; nor was I disposed to disturb the calm; satisfied to reconnoitre Rugg in a state of rest. Presently, Rugg observed in a low voice, addressed to nobody, "a new contrivance—horses instead of oars; Boston folks are full of notions."

It was plain that Rugg was of Dutch extract. He had on three pair of small clothes, called in former days of simplicity, breeches, not much the worse for wear; but time had proved the fabric, and shrunk each of them more than the other, so that they discovered at the knees, their different qualities and colors. His several waistcoats, the flaps of all which rested on his knees, gave him an appearance rather corpulent. His capacious drab coat would supply the stuff for half a dozen modern ones. The sleeves were like meal bags—in the cuffs of which you might nurse a child to sleep. His hat, probably once black, now of a drab color, was neither round nor crooked, but much in shape like the one President Monroe wore on his late tour. This dress gave the rotund face of Rugg an antiquated dignity. The man, though deeply sunburnt, did not appear to be more than thirty years of age. He had lost his sad and anxious look, was quite composed, and seemed happy. The chair in which Rugg sat, was very capacious, evidently made for service, and calculated to last for ages. The timber would supply material for three modern carriages. This chair, like a Nantucket coach, would answer for every thing that ever went on wheels. The horse, too, was an object of curiosity. His majestic height, his natural mane and tail, gave him a commanding appearance, and his large open nostrils indicated inexhaustible wind. It was apparent that the hoofs of his fore feet had been split, probably on some newly McAdamized road, and were now growing together again; so that John Spring was not altogether in the wrong.

How long this dumb scene would otherwise have continued, I cannot tell. Rugg discovered no sign of impatience. But Rugg's horse having been quiet more than five minutes, had no idea of standing idle; he began to whinny, and in a moment after, with his right foot he started a plank. Said Rugg, "My horse is impatient, he sees the North End. You must be quick, or he will be ungovernable."

At these words, the horse raised his left fore foot; and when he laid it down, every inch of the ferry boat trembled. Two men immediately seized Rugg's horse by the nostrils. The horse nodded, and both of them were in the Hudson. While we were fishing up the men, the horse was perfectly quiet.

"Fret not the horse," said Rugg, "and he will do no harm. He is only anxious, like myself, to arrive at yonder beautiful shore. He sees the North Church, and smells his own stable."

"Sir," said I to Rugg, practising a little deception, "pray tell me, for I am a stranger here, what river is this, and what city is that opposite? for you seem to be an inhabitant of it."

"This river, sir, is called Mystic river, and this is Win-nisimmet ferry—we have retained the Indian names—and that town is Boston. You must, indeed, be a stranger in these parts, not to know that yonder is Boston, the capita of the New England provinces."

"Pray, sir, how long have you been absent from Boston?"

"Why, that I cannot exactly tell. I lately went with this little girl of mine to Concord to see my friends, and I am ashamed to tell you, in returning, lost the way, and have been travelling ever since. No one would direct me right. It is cruel to mislead a traveller. My horse, Lightfoot, has boxed the compass, and it seems to me he has boxed it back again. But, sir, you perceive my horse is uneasy; Lightfoot, as yet, has only given a hint and a nod. I cannot be answerable for his heels."

At these words Lightfoot reared his long tail, and snapped it as you would a whip lash. The Hudson reverberated with the sound. Instantly the six horses began to move the boat. The Hudson was a sea of glass, smooth as oil, not a ripple. The horses, from a smart trot, soon pressed into a gallop; water now ran over the gunwale: the ferry boat was soon buried in an ocean of foam, and the noise of the spray was like the roaring of many waters. When we arrived at New York, you might see the beautiful white wake of the ferry boat across the Hudson.

Though Rugg refused to pay toll at turnpikes, when Mr. Hardy reached his hand for the ferrage, Rugg readily put his hand into one of his many pockets, and took out a piece of silver, and handed it to Hardy.

"What is this?" said Mr. Hardy.

"It is thirty shillings," said Rugg.

"It might have been once thirty shillings, old tenor," said Mr. Hardy, "but it is not at present."

"The money is good English coin," said Rugg; "my grandfather brought a bag of them from England, and had them hot from the mint." Hearing this, I approached near to Rugg, and asked permission to see the coin. It was a half crown, coined by the English Parliament, dated in the year 1649. On one side, "The Commonwealth of England" and St. George's cross encircled with a wreath of laurel. On the other, "God with us," and a harp and St. George's cross united. I winked to Mr. Hardy, and pronounced it good current money; and said loudly, I would not permit the gentleman to be imposed on, for I would exchange the money myself. On this, Rugg spoke—"Please to give me your name, sir."

"My name is Dunwell, sir," I replied.

"Mr. Dunwell, you are the only honest man I have seen since I left Boston. As you are a stranger here, my house is your home; dame Rugg will be happy to see her husband's friend. Step into my chair, sir, there is room enough; move a little, Jenny, for the gentleman, and we will be in Middle street in a minute."

Accordingly I took a seat by Peter Rugg.

"Were you never in Boston before?" said Rugg.

"No," said I.

"Well, now you will see the queen of New England, a town second only to Philadelphia in all North America."

"You forget New York," said I.

"Poh, New York is nothing; though I never was there. I am told you might put all New York in our Mill pond. No, sir, New York, I assure you, is but a sorry affair, no more to be compared to Boston than a wigwam to a palace."

As Rugg's horse turned into Pearl street, I looked Rugg as fully in the face as good manners would allow, and said, "Sir, if this is Boston, I acknowledge New York is not worthy to be one of its suburbs."

Before we had proceeded far in Pearl street, Rugg's countenance changed; he began to twitter under his ears; his eyes trembled in their sockets; he was evidently bewildered. "What is the matter, Mr. Rugg; you seem disturbed."

"This surpasses all human comprehension; if you know, sir, where we are, I beseech you to tell me."

"If this place," I replied, "is not Boston it must be New York."

"No, sir, it is not Boston; nor can it be New York. How could I be in New York, which is nearly two hundred miles from Boston?"

By this time we had passed into Broadway, and then Rugg, in truth, discovered a chaotic mind. "There is no such place as this in North America; this is all the effect of enchantment; this is a grand delusion, nothing real; here is seemingly a great city, magnificent houses, shops and goods, men and women innumerable, and as busy as in real life, all sprang up in one night from the wilderness. Or what is more probable, some tremendous convulsion of nature has thrown London or Amsterdam on the shores of New England. Or, possibly, I may be dreaming, though the night seems rather long; but before now I have sailed in one night to Amsterdam, bought goods of Voodoo, and returned to Boston before morning."

At this moment, a hue and cry was heard, "Stop the madmen, they will endanger the lives of thousands!" In vain hundreds attempted to stop Rugg's horse. Lightfoot interfered with nothing; his course was straight as a shooting star. But on my part, fearful that before night I should find myself behind the Alleghenies, I addressed Mr. Rugg in a tone of entreaty, and requested him to restrain the horse and permit me to alight.

"My friend," said he, "we shall be in Boston before dark, and dame Rugg will be most exceeding glad to see us."

"Mr. Rugg," said I, "you must excuse me, pray look to the west, see that thunder cloud swelling with rage, as if in pursuit of us."

"Ah," said Rugg, "it is vain to attempt to escape; I know that cloud is collecting new wrath to spend on my head." Then checking his horse, he permitted me to descend, saying, "farewell Mr. Dunwell, I shall be happy to see you in Boston; I live in Middle street."

It is uncertain in what direction Mr. Rugg pursued his course, after he disappeared in Broadway; but one thing is sufficiently known to every body, that in the course of two months after he was seen in New York, he found his way most opportunely to Boston.

It seems the estate of Peter Rugg had recently escheated to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for want of heirs; and the legislature had ordered the Solicitor General to advertise and sell it at public auction. Happening to be in Boston at the time, and observing his advertisement, which described a considerable extent of land, I felt a kindly curiosity to see the spot where Rugg once lived. Taking the advertisement in my hand, I wandered a little way down Middle street, and, without asking a question of any one, when I came to a certain spot, I said to myself, "This is Rugg's estate—I will proceed no further—this must be the spot; it is a counterpart of Peter Rugg." The premises, indeed, looked as if they had accomplished a sad prophecy. Fronting on Middle street, they extended in the rear to Ann street, and embraced about half an acre of land. It was not uncommon in former times to have half an acre for a house lot; for an acre of land then, in many parts of Boston, was not more valuable than a foot in some places at present. The old mansion house had become a powder-post, and had been blown away. One other building, uninhabited, stood ominous, courting dilapidation. The street had been so much raised, that the bed chamber had descended to the kitchen, and was level with the street. The house seemed conscious of its fate and, as though tired of standing there, the front was fast retreating from the rear, and waiting the next south wind to project itself into the street. If the most weary animals had sought a place of refuge, here they would have rendezvoused. Here, under the ridge-pole, the crow would have perched in security; and in the recesses below, you might have caught the fox and the weasel asleep. The hand of destiny, said I, has pressed heavy on this spot; still heavier on the former owners. Strange that so large a lot of land as this should want an heir! Yet Peter Rugg, at this day, might pass by his own door stone, and ask, "who once lived there?"

The auctioneer, appointed by the Solicitor to sell this estate, was a man of eloquence, as many of the auctioneers of Boston are. The occasion seemed to warrant, and his duty urged him to make a display. He addressed his audience as follows:

"The estate, gentlemen, which we offer you this day, was once the property of a family now extinct. It has escheated to the Commonwealth for the want of heirs. Let any one of you should be deterred from bidding on so large an estate as this, for fear of a disputed title, I am authorized, by the Solicitor General, to proclaim that the purchaser shall have the best of all titles, a warranty deed from the Commonwealth. I state this, gentlemen, because I know there is an idle rumor in this vicinity, that one Peter Rugg, the original owner of this estate, is still living. This rumor, gentlemen, has no foundation, and can have no foundation in the nature of things. It originated about two years since, from the incredible story of one Jonathan Dunwell, of New York. Mrs. Croft, indeed, whose husband I see present, and whose mouth waters for this estate, has countenanced this fiction. But gentlemen, was it ever known that any estate, especially an estate of this value, lay unclaimed for nearly half a century, if any heir, ever so remote, was existing? For, gentlemen, all agree, that old Peter Rugg, if living, would be at least one hundred years of age. It is said that he and his daughter, with a horse and chaise, were missed more than half a century ago; and because they never returned home, forsooth, they must be now living, and will, some day, come and claim this great estate. Such logic, gentlemen, never led to a good investment. Let not this idle story cross the noble purpose of consigning these ruins to the genius of architecture. If such a contingency could check the spirit of enterprise, farewell to all mercantile excitement. Your surplus money, instead of refreshing your sleep with the golden dreams of new sources of speculation, would turn to the nightmare. A man's money, if not employed, serves only to disturb his rest. Look, then, to the prospect before you. Here is half an acre of land, more than twenty thousand square feet, a corner lot, with wonderful capabilities; none of your contracted lots of forty feet by fifty, where, in dog days, you can breathe only through your scuttles. On the contrary, an architect cannot contemplate this extensive lot without rapture, for here is room enough for his genius to shame the temple of Solomon. Then, the prospect, how commanding! To the east, so near to the Atlantic, that Neptune, freighted with the select treasures of the whole earth, can knock at your door with his trident. From the west, all the produce of the river of paradise, the Connecticut, will soon, by the blessings of steam, rail ways and canals, pass under your windows; and thus, on this spot, Neptune shall marry Ceres, and Pomona from Roxbury, and Flora from Cambridge, shall dance at the wedding.

Gentlemen of science, men of taste, ye of the Literary Emporium, for I perceive many of you present: to you, this is holy ground. If the spot over which, in times past, a hero left only the print of a footstep, is now sacred, of what price is the birth-place of one, who, all the world knows, was born in Middle street, directly opposite to this lot; and who, if his birth-place was not well known, would now be claimed by more than seven cities. To you, then, the value of these premises must be incalculable. For, ere long, there will arise in front view of the edifice to be erected here, a monument, the wonder and veneration of the world. A column shall spring to the clouds; and on that column will be engraven one word, that will convey all that is wise in intellect, useful in science, good in morals, prudent in counsel, and benevolent in principle; a name, when living, the patron of the poor, the delight of the cottage, and the admiration of kings; now dead, worth the whole seven wise men of Greece. Need I tell you his name? He fixed the thunder and guided the lightning.

Men of the North End! Need I appeal to your patriotism, in order to enhance the value of this lot? The earth affords no such scenery as this; there, around that corner, lived James Otis; here, Samuel Adams; there, Joseph Warren; and around that other corner, Josiah Quincy. Here was the birth-place of Freedom; here, Liberty was born, and nursed, and grew to manhood. Here, man was new created. Here is the nursery of American Independence—I am too modest—here commenced the emancipation of the world! A thousand generations hence, millions of men will cross the Atlantic, just to look at the North End of Boston. Your fathers—what do I say? Yourself, yes, this moment I behold several attending this auction who lent a hand to rock the cradle of Independence.

Men of speculation! Ye who are deaf to every thing except the sound of money, you, I know, will give me both of your ears when I tell you, the city of Boston must have a piece of this estate, in order to widen Ann street. Do you hear me? Do you all hear me? I say the city must have a large piece of this land in order to widen Ann street. What a chance! The city scorns to take a man's land for nothing. If they seize your property, they are generous beyond the dreams of avarice. The only oppression is, you are in danger of being smothered under a load of wealth. Witness the old lady who lately died of a broken heart, when the Mayor paid her for a piece of her kitchen garden. All the faculty agreed that the sight of the treasure, which the Mayor incautiously paid her in dazzling dollars, warm from the mint, sped joyfully all the blood of her body into her heart, and rent it in raptures. Therefore, let him who purchases this estate, fear his good fortune, and not Peter Rugg. Bid, then, liberally, and do not let the name of Rugg damp your ardor. How much will you give per foot for this estate?

Thus spoke the auctioneer, and gracefully waved his ivory hammer. From fifty to seventy-five cents per foot, were offered in a few moments. It labored from seventy-five to ninety. At length one dollar was offered. The auctioneer seemed satisfied; and looking at his watch, said he would knock off the estate in five minutes, if no one offered more.

There was a deep silence during this short period. While the hammer was suspended, a strange rumbling noise was heard, which arrested the attention of every one.

Presently it was like the sound of many ship-wrights driving home the bolts of a seventy-four. As the sound approached nearer, some exclaimed, "the buildings in the new market are falling in promiscuous ruins." Others said not so; the sound proceeds from Hanover street, and approaches nearer; and this proved true, for presently Peter Rugg was in the midst of us.

"Alas, Jenny," said Peter, "I am ruined; our house has been burnt, and here are all our neighbors around the ruins. Heaven grant your mother dame Rugg is safe."

"They don't look like our neighbors," said Jenny; "but sure enough our house is burnt, and nothing left but the door stone, and the old cedar post—do ask where mother is!"

In the mean time more than a thousand men had surrounded Rugg, and his horse and chair. Yet neither Rugg, personally, nor his horse and carriage attracted more attention than the auctioneer. The confident look and searching eye of Rugg, to every one present, carried more conviction, that the estate was his, than could any parchment or paper with signature and seal. The impression which the auctioneer had just made on the company was effaced in a moment: and although the latter words of the auctioneer were, "fear not Peter Rugg," the moment the auctioneer met the eye of Rugg, his occupation was gone, his arm fell down to his hips, his late lively hammer hung heavy in his hand, and the auction was forgotten. The black horse, too, gave his evidence. He knew his journey was ended, for he stretched himself into a horse and a half, rested his cheek bone over the cedar post and whinced thrice, causing his harness to tremble from headstall to crupper.

Rugg then stood upright in his chair, and asked with some authority, "Who has demolished my house, in my absence, for I see no signs of a conflagration? I demand by what accident this has happened and wherefore this collection of strange people has assembled before my doorstep? I thought I knew every man in Boston, but you appear to me as a new generation of men. Yet I am familiar with many of the countenances here present, and I can call some of you by name; but in truth I do not recollect that before this moment, I ever saw any one of you."

There, I am certain, is a Winslow, and here a Sargent; there stands a Sewall, and next to him a Dudley. Will none of you speak to me? Or is this all a delusion? I see indeed many forms of men, and no want of eyes, but of motion, speech and hearing, you seem to be destitute. Strange! will no one inform me who has demolished my house?"

Then spake a voice from the crowd, whence it came I could not discern. "There is nothing strange here but yourself, Mr. Rugg. Time which destroys and renews all things, has dilapidated your house, and placed us here. You have suffered many years under an illusion. The tempest which you profanely defied at Menotomy has at length subsided; but you will never see home; for your house and wife and neighbors have all disappeared.

Your estate indeed remains, but no home. You were cut off from the last age, and you can never be fitted to the present. Your home is gone and you can never have another home in this world."

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Since he could derive no title through the conveyance of Harry Dreddlington (which had been got in by Geoffrey Dreddlington,) owing to the death of the former in his father's lifetime, as he (Mr. Aubrey) understood from his advisers could be easily proved by the present claimant of the property; the right of accession of Geoffrey Dreddlington's descendants depended entirely upon the fact whether or not Stephen Dreddlington had really died without issue; and as to that, certain anxious and extensive inquiries instituted by Messrs. Runnington and Mr. Parkinson, in pursuance of the suggestions of their able and experienced counsel, had led them to entertain serious doubts concerning the right of Geoffrey's descendants to enter into possession. By what means his opponents had obtained their clue to the state of his title, neither he nor any of his advisers could frame a plausible conjecture. It was certainly possible that Stephen Dreddlington, who was known to have been a man, like his uncle Harry, of wild and eccentric habits, and to have been supposed to leave no issue, might have married privately some woman of inferior station, and left issue by her, who, living in obscurity, and at a distance from the seat of the family property, could have no opportunity of inquiring into or ascertaining their position with reference to the estates, till some acute and enterprising attorneys, like Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, happening to get hold of them, and family papers in their possession, had taken up their case. When, with impressions such as these, Mr. Aubrey perused and re-perused the opinions of the conveyancer given on the occasion of his (Mr. Aubrey's) marriage, he was confounded at the supineness and indifference which he had even twice exhibited, and felt disposed now greatly to overvalue the importance of every adverse circumstance. The boldness, again, and systematic energy with which the case of the claimant was prosecuted, and the eminent legal opinions which were alleged, and with every appearance of truth, to concur in his favor, afforded additional grounds for rational apprehension. He looked the danger, however, full in the face, and as far as lay in his power, prepared for the evil day which might so soon come upon him. Certain extensive and somewhat costly alterations which he had been on the point of commencing at Yatton, he abandoned. But for the earnest interference of friends, he would have at once given up his establishment in Grosvenor street, and applied for the Chiltern Hundreds, in order to retire from political life. Considering the possibility of his soon being declared the wrongful holder of the property, he contracted his expenditure as far as he could, without challenging unnecessary public attention; and paid into his banker's hands all his Christmas rents, sacredly resolving to abstain from drawing out one farthing of what might soon be proved to belong to another. At every point occurred the dreadful question—If I am declared never to have been the rightful owner of the property, how am I to discharge my frightful liabilities to him who is? Mr. Aubrey had nothing, except the Yatton property. He had but an insignificant sum in the funds; Mrs. Aubrey's settlement was out of lands at Yatton, as also was the little income bequeathed to Kate by her father. Could any thing, now, be conceived more dreadful, under these circumstances, than the mere danger—the slightest probability—of their being deprived of Yatton?—and with a debt of at the very least sixty thousand pounds, due to him who had been wrongfully kept out of his property? That was the millstone which seemed to drag them all to the bottom. Against that, what could the kindness of the most generous friends, what could his own most desperate exertions, avail? All this had poor Aubrey constantly before his eyes, together with—his wife, his sister, his children. What was to become of them? It was long before the real nature and extent of his danger became known amongst his friends and neighbors. When, however, they were made aware of it, an extraordinary interest and sympathy were excited throughout almost the whole county. Whenever his attorney, Mr. Parkinson, appeared in public, he was besieged by most anxious inquiries concerning his distinguished client, whose manly modesty and fortitude, under the pressure of his sudden and almost unprecedented difficulty and peril, endeared him more than ever to all who had an opportunity of appreciating his position. With what intense and absorbing interest were the ensuing assizes looked for! At length they arrived.

The ancient city of York exhibited, on the commission day of the Spring Assizes for the year 18—, the usual scene of animation and excitement. The High Sheriff, attended by an imposing retinue, went out to meet the Judges, and escorted them, amidst the shrill clangor of trumpets, to the Castle, where the commission was opened with the usual formalities. The Judges were Lord Widdrington, the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and Mr. Justice Grayley, a pious judge of the same court—both admirable lawyers. The former was possessed of the more powerful intellect. He was what may be called a great scientific lawyer, referring every thing to principle, as extracted from precedent. Mr. Justice Grayley was almost unrivalled in his knowledge of the details of the law; his governing maxim being ita lex scripta. Here his knowledge was equally minute and accurate, and most readily applied to every case brought before him. Never sat there upon the bench a more pains-taking judge—one more anxious to do right equally in great things as in small. Both were men of rigid integrity: 'tis a glorious thing to be able to add—when, for centuries, have other than men of rigid integrity sat upon the English Bench? Lord Widdrington, however, in temper was stern, arbitrary, and overbearing, and his manners were tinged with not a little coarseness; while his companion was a man of exemplary amiability, affability, and forbearance. Lord Widdrington presided at the Civil Court (where, of course, would come on the important cause in which we are interested), and Mr. Justice Grayley in the Criminal Court.

Soon after the sitting of the court, on the ensuing morning—"Will your lordship allow me," rose and inquired the sleek, smiling, and portly Mr. Subtle, dead silence prevailing as soon as he had mentioned the name of the cause about which he was inquiring, "to call your attention to a cause of Doe on the demise of Titmouse v. Joller—a special jury cause, in which there are a great many witnesses to be examined on both sides—and to ask that a day may be fixed for it to come on?"

"Whom do you appear for, Mr. Subtle?" inquired his Lordship.

"For the plaintiff, my Lord."

"And who appears for the defendant?"

"The Attorney-General leads for the defendant, my Lord," replied Mr. Sterling, who, with Mr. Crystal, was also retained for the defendant.

"Well, perhaps you can agree between yourselves upon a day, and in the mean time similar arrangements may be made for any other special jury causes that may require it." After due consultation, Monday week was agreed upon by the parties, and fixed by his lordship, for the trial of the cause. During the Sunday preceding it, York was crowded with persons of the highest distinction from all parts of the county, who felt interested in the result of the great cause of the assizes. About mid-day a dusty travelling carriage and four dashed into the streets from the London road, and drove up to the principal inn; it contained the Attorney-General (who had just finished reading his brief as he entered York,) and his clerk. The Attorney-General was a man of striking and highly intellectual countenance; but he looked, on alighting, somewhat fatigued with his long journey. He was a man of extraordinary natural talents, and also a first-rate lawyer—one whose right to take the woolpack, whenever it should become vacant, was recognised by all the profession. His professional celebrity, and his coming down special on the present occasion, added to the circumstance of his being well known to be a personal friend of his client, Mr. Aubrey—whence it might be inferred that his great powers would be exerted to their utmost—was well calculated to enhance the interest, if that were possible, of the occasion which had brought him down at so great an expense, and to sustain so heavy a responsibility as the conduct of a cause of such magnitude.

He came to lead against a formidable opponent. Mr. Subtle was the leader of the Northern circuit, a man of matchless tact and practical sagacity, and most consummately skilful in the conduct of a cause. The only thing he ever looked at was the verdict, to the gaining of which he directed all his energies, and sacrificed every other consideration. As for display, he despised it. A speech, as such, was his aversion. He entered into a friendly, but exquisitely crafty conversation with the jury; for he was so quick at perceiving the effect of his address on the mind of each of the twelve, and dexterous in accommodating himself to what he detected to be the passing mood of each, that they felt as if they were all the while reasoning with, and being convinced by him. His placid, smiling, handsome countenance, his gentlemanly bearing and inimitable address, full of good-natured, cheerful confidence in his cause, were irresistible. He flattered, he soothed, he fascinated the jury, producing an effect upon their minds which they often felt indignant at his opponent's attempting to efface. In fact, as a visi prius leader he was unrivalled, as well in stating as in arguing a case, as well in examining as cross examining a witness. It required no little practical skill to form an adequate estimate of Mr. Subtle's skill in the management of a cause; for he did every thing with such a smiling, careless, unconcerned air, in the great pinch and strain of a case, equally as in the pettiest details, that you would be apt to suspect that none but the easiest and most straight-forward cases fell to his lot.

Titmouse, Titmouse, methinks the fates favored you in assigning to you Mr. Subtle!

Next came Mr. Quicksilver, a man of great but wild energy, who received what may be called a suffring retainer. What a contrast was he to Mr. Subtle! The first and the last thing he thought of in a cause, was—himself. His delight was to make the jury feel as if a whirlwind was raging about them, and he the spirit who had raised it. His object was either to dazzle or terrify them. He wrapped himself round in the gleaming garment of display; the gaudy patchwork of multifarious superficial acquirements: this was the strange, noisy object, flinging about wildly, in all directions, the firebrands and arrows of sarcasm and invective, that occupied their eye and ear till he had ceased; neither he nor they were thinking all the while of his dismayed and injured client, till reminded of him by the adverse charge of the judge, accompanied by a slight sneer and shrug of the shoulders from Mr. Subtle. As for law, probably there was no man in court, wearing wig and gown, who was not his superior, or at least his equal. Why, then, was such a man retained in the cause? 'Twas a fancy of Quirk's, a vast political admirer of Quicksilver's who had made one or two most splendid speeches for him in libel cases brought against the Sunday Flash. Gammon most earnestly expostulated, but Quirk was inexorable; and himself carried his retainer to Mr. Quicksilver. Gammon, however, was somewhat consoled by the reflection, that this wild elephant would be in a manner held in check by Mr. Subtle and Mr. Lynx, who, he hoped, would prevent any serious mischief from happening. Lynx possessed the qualities which his name would suggest to you. I have partly described him already. He was a man of minute accuracy; and "got up" every case in which he was engaged as if his life had depended on the result. Nothing escaped him. He kept his mind constantly even with the current of the cause. He was a man to steer a leader, if ever that leader should get, for an instant, on the wrong tack, or be uncertain as to his course. His suggestion and interference—rare, indeed, with such a man as Mr. Subtle, incessant with Mr. Quicksilver—were always worth attending to, and consequently received with deference.

For Mr. Aubrey also was retained a formidable bar. Mr. Attorney-General was a man much superior in point of intellect and legal knowledge, to Mr. Subtle. His mind was distinguished by its tranquil power. He had a rare and invaluable faculty of arraying before his mind's eye all the facts and bearings of the most intricate case, and contemplating them, as it were, not successively, but simultaneously. His perception was quick as light; and, at the same time—rare, most rare accomplishment!—his judgement sound, his memory signally retentive. Inferior, possibly, to Mr. Subtle in rapid and delicate appreciation of momentary advantages, he was sagacious where Mr. Subtle was only ingenious. Mr. Attorney-General had as much weight with the judge as Mr. Subtle with the jury. With the former, there was a candor and straightforwardness—a dignified simplicity—which insensibly won the confidence of the judge: who, on the other hand, felt himself obliged to be ever on his guard against the slippery sophistries of Mr. Subtle, whom he thus got to regard with constant suspicion.

Mr. Sterling, the second counsel for the defendant, was a king's counsel, add a rival of Mr. Subtle upon the circuit. He was a man of great power; and, on important occasions, no man at the bar could acquit himself with more distinction. As a speaker, he was eloquent and impressive, perhaps deficient in vivacity; but he was a man of clear and powerful intellect; prompt in seizing the bearings of a case; a capital lawyer; and possessing, even on the most trying occasions, imperturbable self-possession.

Mr. Crystal, with all his faults of manner and bearing, was an honorable high-minded man; clear-sighted and strong-headed; an accurate and ready lawyer; vigilant and acute—but of him I have spoken before.

See, then, the combatants: for Titmouse—Mr. Subtle, Mr. Quicksilver, Mr. Lynx: for Mr. Aubrey—Mr. Attorney-General, Mr. Sterling, Mr. Crystal.

The consultation of each party was long and anxious.

About eight o'clock on the Sunday evening, at Mr. Subtle's lodgings, Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, accompanied by Mr. Mortmain, whom they had brought down to watch the case, made their appearance shortly after Mr. Quicksilver and Mr. Lynx.

"Our case seems complete, now," said Mr. Subtle, casting a penetrating and most significant glance at Messrs. Quirk and Gammon, and then at his juniors, to whom, before the arrival of their clients and Mr. Mortmain, he had been mentioning the essential link which, a month before, he had pointed out as missing, and the marvellous good fortune by which they had been able to supply it at the eleventh hour.

"That Tombstone's a godsend, Subtle, is n't it?" said Quicksilver, with a grim smile. Lynx neither smiled nor spoke. He was a very matter-of-fact person. So as the case came out clear and nice in court, he cared about nothing more. But whatever might be the insinuation or suspicion implied in the observation of Mr. Subtle, the reader must, by this time, be well aware how little it was warranted by the facts.

"I shall open it very quietly," said Mr. Subtle, putting into his pocket his penknife, with which he had been paring his nails, while Mr. Quicksilver had been talking very fast. "What do you think, Mr. Lynx? Had I better allude boldly to the conveyance executed by Harry Dreddlington, and which becomes useless as soon as we prove his death in his father's life-time?"

"Ah! there's that blessed tombstone again," interposed Quicksilver.

"Or," resumed Mr. Subtle, "content myself with barely making out our pedigree, and let it come from the other side?"

"I think, perhaps, that the latter would be the quieter and safer course," replied Lynx.

"By the way, gentlemen," said Mr. Subtle, suddenly, addressing Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, "how do we come to know any thing about the mortgage executed by Harry Dreddlington?"

"Oh! that you know," replied Quirk quickly, "we first got scent of in Mr. —" Here he paused suddenly, and turned quite red.

"It was suggested," said Gammon calmly, "by one of the gentlemen whose opinions we have taken in the case—I forget by whom—that, from some recital, it was probable that there existed some such an instrument; and that put us on making inquiry."

"Nothing more likely," added Mortmain, "than that it, or an abstract, or minute of it, should get into Stephen Dreddlington's hands."

"Ah! well! well!—I must say there's rather an air of mystery about the case. But—about the tombstone—what sort of witnesses will speak?"

"Will that evidence be requisite," inquired Lynx, "in the plaintiff's case? All we shall have to do, will be to prove the fact that Harry died without issue, of which there's satisfactory evidence; and as to the time of his death, that will become material only if they put in the conveyance of Harry."

"True—true; ah! I'll turn that over in my mind. Rely upon it, I'll give Mr. Attorney-General as little to lay hold of as possible. Thank you, Mr. Lynx, for the hint. Now, gentlemen, one other question. What kind of looking people are the witnesses who prove the later steps of the pedigree of Mr. Titmouse? Respectable? Eh? You know a great deal will depend on the credit they will obtain with the jury."

"They're very decent, creditable persons, you will find, sir," said Gammon.

"Good, good. Who struck the special jury?"

"We did, sir."

"Well, I must say that was a very prudent step for you to take! considering the rank in life and circumstances of the respective parties! However, to be sure, if you did n't, they would—so—well; good night, gentlemen, good night." So the consultation broke up; and Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap returned home to their inn, in a very serious and anxious mood.

"You're a marvellous prudent person, Mr. Quirk," said Gammon, in a somewhat fierce whisper, as they walked along, "I suppose you would have gone on to explain the little matter of Steggers, and so have had our brief thrown at our heads."

"Well, well, that was a slip." Here they reached their inn. Titmouse was staying there; and in Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap's absence, he had got very drunk, and was quarrelling under the archway with Boots; so they ordered him to bed, they themselves sitting up till a very late hour in the morning.

The consultation at the Attorney-General's had taken place about three o'clock in the afternoon, within an hour after his arrival; and had been attended by Messrs. Sterling, Crystal and Mansfield—by Mr. Runnington and by Mr. Parkinson, and by Mr. Aubrey, whom the Attorney-General received with the most earnest expressions of sympathy and friendship; listening to every question and every observation of his with the utmost deference.

"It would be both idle and unkind to disguise from you, Aubrey," said he, "that our position is somewhat precarious. It depends entirely on the chance we may have of breaking down the plaintiff's case; for we have but a slender case of our own. I suppose they can bring proof of the death of Harry Dreddlington in his father's lifetime?"

"Oh, yes, sir," answered Mr. Parkinson, "there is an old tombstone behind Yatton church which establishes that fact beyond all doubt; and a week or two ago no fewer than five or six persons have been carefully inspecting it; doubtless they will be called as witnesses to-morrow."

"I feared as much. Then are ours more than watching briefs. Depend upon it, they would not have carried on the affair with so high a hand, if they had not pretty firm ground under foot! Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap are tolerably well known in town—not over-scrupulous, eh, Mr. Runnington?"

"Indeed, Mr. Attorney, you are right. I do not doubt they are prepared to go all lengths."

"Well, we'll sift their evidence pretty closely at any rate. So you really have reason to fear, as you intimated when you entered the room, that they have valid evidence of Stephen Dreddlington having left issue?"

"Mr. Snap told me," said Mr. Parkinson, "this morning, that they would prove issue of Stephen Dreddlington, and issue of that issue, as clean as a whistle—that was his phrase."

"We must not take all for gospel that he would say."

"They've got two houses filled with witnesses, I understand," said Mr. Runnington.

"Do they seem Yorkshire people, or strangers?"

"Why, most of them that I have seen," replied Parkinson, "seem strangers."

"Ah, they will prove, I suppose, the later steps of the pedigree, when Stephen Dreddlington married at a distance from his native country."

They then entered into a very full and minute examination of the case; after which, "Well," said the Attorney-General, evidently fatigued with his long journey, and rising from his chair, "we must trust to what will turn up in the chapter of accidents to-morrow. I shall be expected to dine with the bar to-day," he added, "but immediately after dinner—say at seven o'clock, I shall be here, and at your service, if any thing should be required." Then the consultation broke up. Mr. Aubrey had, at their earnest entreaty, brought Mrs. Aubrey and Kate from Yatton, on Saturday; for they declared themselves unable to bear the dreadful suspense in which they should be left at Yatton. Yielding, therefore, to these their very reasonable wishes, he had engaged private lodgings at the outskirts of the town. On quitting the consultation, which, without at the same time affecting over-strictness, he had regretted being fixed on Sunday—but the necessity of the case appeared to warrant it—he repaired to the magnificent minister, where the evening prayers were being read, and where were Mrs. Aubrey and Kate. They were chanting the prayers as he entered, and was placed in a stall nearly opposite to where those he loved so fondly were standing. The psalms allotted for the evening were those in which the royal sufferer, David, was pouring forth the deepest sorrows of his heart; and their appropriateness to his own state of mind, added to the effect produced by the melting melody in which they were conveyed to his ears, excited in him, and he perceived also, in those opposite, the deepest emotion. The glorious pile was beginning to grow dusky with the stealing shadows of evening; and the solemn and sublime strains of the organ, during the playing of the anthem, filled the minds of all present who had any pretensions to sensibility, with mingled feelings of tenderness and awe. Those in whom we are so deeply interested felt their minds at once subdued and elevated; and as they quitted the darkening fabric through which the pealing tones of the organ were yet reverberating, they could not help inquiring, should they ever enter it again, and in what altered circumstances it might be?

To return, however—though it is, indeed, like descending from the holy mountain into the bustle and hubbub of the city at its foot—Mr. Parkinson being most unexpectedly and unfortunately summoned to Grilston that afternoon, in order to send up some deeds of one of his distinguished clients to London, for the purpose of immediately effecting a mortgage, set off in a post-chaise, at top speed, in a very unenviable frame of mind; and by seven o'clock was seated in his office at Grilston, busily turning over a great number of deeds and papers, in a large tin-case, with the words "Right Honorable the Earl of Yelverton," painted on the outside. Having turned over almost every thing inside, and found all that he wanted, he was going to toss back again all the deeds which were not requisite for his immediate purpose, when he happened to see one lying at the very bottom, which he had not before observed. It was not a large, but an old deed—and he took it up and hastily examined it.

We have seen a piece of unexpected good fortune on the part of Gammon and his client; and the reader will not be disappointed at finding something of a similar kind befalling Mr. Aubrey, even at the eleventh hour. Mr. Parkinson's journey, which he had execrated a hundred times over as he came down, produced a discovery which made him tremble all over with agitation and excitement, and begin to look upon it as almost owing to an interference of Providence. The deed he looked at bore an endorsement of the name of "Dreddlington." After a hasty glance over its contents, he tried to recollect by what accident a document belonging to Mr. Aubrey, could have found its way into the box containing Lord Yelverton's deeds; and it at length occurred to him that, about a twelvemonth before, Mr. Aubrey had proposed advancing several thousand pounds to Lord Yelverton, on mortgage of a portion of his lordship's property—but which negotiation had afterwards been broken off; that Mr. Aubrey's title-deeds happened to be at the same time open and loose in his office—and he recollected having considerable trouble in separating the respective documents which had got mixed together. This one, after all, had been, by some accident, overlooked, till it turned up in this most timely and extraordinary manner! Having hastily effected the object which had brought him back to Grilston, he ordered a post-chaise and four, and within a quarter of an hour was thundering back, at top speed, on his way to York, which, the horses reeking and foaming, he reached a little after ten o'clock. He jumped out, with the precious deed in his pocket, the instant that his chaise-door was opened, and ran off, without saying more than—"I'm gone to the Attorney-General's." This was heard by many passers-by and persons standing round; and it spread far and wide that something of the utmost importance had transpired, with reference to the great ejection case of Mr. Aubrey. Soon afterward messengers and clerks belonging to Mr. Runnington and Mr. Parkinson, were to be seen running to and fro, summoning Mr. Sterling, Mr. Crystal, Mr. Mansfield, and also Mr. Aubrey, to a second consultation at the Attorney-General's. About eleven o'clock they were all assembled. The deed which had occasioned all this excitement, was one calculated indeed to produce that effect; and it filled the minds of all present with astonishment and delight. In a word, it was a deed of confirmation by old Dreddlington, the father of Harry Dreddlington, of the conveyance by the latter to Geoffrey Dreddlington, who, in the manner already mentioned to the reader, had got an assignment of that conveyance to himself. After the Attorney-General had satisfied himself as to the account to be given of the deed—the custody from whence it came, namely, the attorney for the defendant; Mr. Parkinson undertaking to swear, without any hesitation, that whatever deeds of Mr. Aubrey's he possessed he had taken from the manor-house at Yatton, the second consultation broke up. Mr. Aubrey, on hearing the nature and effect of the instrument explained by the Attorney-General, and Mr. Mansfield—and all his counsel, in short concurring in opinion as to the triumphant effect which this instrument would produce on the morrow, may be pardoned for regarding it, in the excitement of the moment, as almost a direct interference of Providence.

A few minutes before nine o'clock on the ensuing morning, the occasional shrill blasts of the trumpets announced that the judges were on their way to the castle, the approaches to which were crowded with carriages and pedestrians of a highly respectable appearance. As the clock finished striking nine, Lord Widdrington took his seat, and the swearing of the special jury commenced. The court was crowded almost to suffocation; all the chief places being filled with persons of distinction in the county. The benches on each side of the judge were occupied by ladies, who—especially the Countess of Oldacre, and Lady De La Zouch—evinced a painful degree of anxiety and excitement in their countenances and demeanor. The bar also mustered in great force; the crown court being quite deserted, although a great murder case was going on there. The civil court was, on the present occasion, the point of attraction, not only on account of the interesting nature of the case to be tried, but of the keen contest that was expected between the Attorney-General and Mr. Subtle. The former, as he entered—his commanding features gazed at by many an anxious eye with hope, and a feeling that on his skill and learning depended that day the destination of the Yatton property—bowed to the judge, and then nodded and shook hands with several of the counsel nearest to him; then he sat down, and opening his bag, took out his huge brief, and began turning over its leaves with a calm and attentive air, occasionally turning round and conversing with his juniors. Every one present observed that the defendant's counsel and attorneys wore the confident looks of winning men; while their opponents, quick-sighted enough, also observed the circumstance, and looked, on that account alone, a shade more anxious than when they had entered the court. Mr. Subtle requested Gammon, whose ability he had soon detected, to sit immediately beneath him; next to Gammon sat Quirk, then Snap, and beside him, Mr. Titmouse, with a staring sky-blue flowered silk handkerchief round his neck, a gaudy waistcoat, a tight surtout, and white kid gloves. He looked exceedingly pale, and dared hardly interchange a word with even Snap, who was just as irritable and excited as his senior partners.

It was quickly known all over the court who Titmouse was. Mr. Aubrey scarcely showed himself in court all day, though he stood at the door near the bench, and could hear all that passed; Lord De la Zouch, and one or two other personal friends, standing with him, engaged, from time to time, in anxious conversation. The jury having been sworn, Mr. Lynx rose, and in a few hurried sentences, intimated the nature of the pleadings in the cause. The Attorney-General then rose, and requested that all the witnesses might leave the court. As soon as the little disturbance occasioned by this move had ceased, Mr. Subtle rose, and in a low but distinct tone, said, "May it please your Lordship—Gentlemen of the Jury—in this cause I have the honor to appear before you as counsel for the plaintiff; and it now becomes my duty to state, as briefly as I can, the nature of his case. It is impossible, gentlemen, not to notice the unusual interest excited by the cause; and which may be accounted for by the very large estates in this county which are sought this day to be transferred to a comparative stranger, from the family who have long enjoyed them, and of whom I am anxious to say every thing respectful; for you will very soon find that the name on the record is that of only the nominal defendant: and although all that is professed to be this day sought for, is a very trifling portion of the property, your verdict will undoubtedly decide the question as to the true ownership and enjoyment of the large estates now held by the gentleman who is the substantial defendant—I mean Mr. Aubrey, the member of Parliament for the borough of Yatton." Aware of the watchful and formidable opponent who would in due time answer him, and also of being himself entitled to the general reply—to the last word—Mr. Subtle proceeded to state the nature of the plaintiff's case with the utmost brevity and clearness. Scarcely any sound was heard but that of the pens of the short-hand writers, and of the counsel taking their notes. Mr. Subtle, having handed up two or three copies of the pedigree which he held in his hand to the judge and jury, pointed out with distinctness and precision every link in the chain of evidence which he intended to lay before the jury; and having done this—having presented as few salient points of attack to his opponent as he possibly could—he sat down, professing his entire ignorance of what case could be set up in answer to that which he had opened. He had not been on his legs quite half an hour; and when he ceased—how he had disappointed every one present, except the judge and the bar! Instead of a speech befitting so great an occasion—impressive and eloquent—here had been a brief, dry statement of a few uninteresting facts—dates, births, deaths, marriages—without a single touch of feeling or ray of eloquence. The momentary feeling of disappointment in the audience, however—almost all of whom, it may easily be believed, were in the interest of the Aubreys—quickly yielded to one of satisfaction and relief; as they thought they might regard so meagre a speech as heralding in as meagre a case. As soon as he had sat down, Mr. Quicksilver rose, and called the first witness. "We're safe!" whispered the Attorney-General to Mr. Sterling and Mr. Crystal; and the witness having been sworn they resumed their seats and their writing. He and the subsequent one established one or two preliminary and formal points—the Attorney-General scarcely rising to put a question to them. The third witness was examined by Mr. Subtle, with apparent unconcern, but really with exquisite anxiety. From the earnestness and attention with which the words of the witness were watched, and taken down by both the judge and the counsel, who knew much better than the audience where the strain of the case commenced, it must have appeared to the latter, that either Mr. Subtle underestimated, or his opponents overestimated, the value of the evidence now in process of being extracted by Mr. Subtle, in short, easy, pointed questions, and with a smiling countenance.

"Not so fast, sir," gruffly interposed Lord Widdrington, addressing the witness.

"Take time, Mr. Jones," said Mr. Subtle, blandly, fearful of ruffling or discomposing an important witness. The Attorney-General rose to cross-examine; he pressed him quietly but closely; varied the shape of his questions; now he soothed, then he flattered; but sat down, evidently having produced no impression. Thus it was with one or two succeeding witnesses; the Attorney-General, on each occasion, resuming his seat after his abortive efforts with perfect composure. At length, however, by a very admirable and well-sustained fire of cross-questioning, he completely demolished a material witness; and the hopes of all interested in behalf of his clients rose high. Mr. Subtle, who had been all the while paring his nails, and from time to time smiling with a careless air, (though you might as safely have touched a tigress sucking her cub, as attempted at that moment to disturb Mr. Subtle, so absorbed was he with intense anxiety,) knowing that he could establish the same facts by another and, as he believed, a better witness, did not re-examine; but calling that other, with an air of nonchalance, succeeded in extracting from him all that the other had failed in, and in baffling all the attempts of the Attorney-General to affect his credit, or disturb his equanimity. At length, another witness being in the box—

"My Lord, I object to that question," said Mr. Attorney-General, as Mr. Subtle, amidst many indifferent and apparently irrelevant questions, quietly slipped in one of the greatest possible importance, had it been answered as he desired. "It was quite delightful to see the Attorney-General and his experienced and watchful juniors, all rise at one and the same instant; showing how vain were the tricks and ingenuity of their sly opponent. Mr. Attorney-General stated his objection briefly and pointedly; Mr. Subtle answered him, followed by Quicksilver and Lynx; and then Mr. Attorney-General replied, with great force and clearness. This keen encounter of their wits over—

"I shall allow the question to be put," said Lord Widdrington, after a pause: "But I have great doubts as to its propriety. I will therefore take a note of Mr. Attorney-General's objection."

Four or five similar conflicts arose during the course of the plaintiff's case: now concerning the competency of a witness—then as to the admissibility of a document, or the propriety of a particular question. On each of these occasions there were displayed on both sides consummate logical skill and acuteness, especially by the two leaders. Distinctions the most delicate were suggested with suddenness, and as promptly encountered; the most artful manoeuvres to secure dangerous admissions resorted to, and baffled; the more recondite principles of evidence brought to bear with admirable readiness on both sides. To deal with them, required indeed the practised, penetrating, and powerful intellect of Lord Widdrington. Some points he disposed of promptly, to the satisfaction of both parties; on others he hesitated, and at length reserved them. Though none but the more experienced and able members of the bar could in the least degree enter into and appreciate the nature of these conflicts, they were watched with untiring attention and eagerness by all present, both ladies and gentlemen—by the lowly and the distinguished. And though the intensity of the feelings of all was manifest by a mere glimpse round the court, yet any momentary display of eccentricity on the part of a witness, or petulance or repartee on the part of counsel, would occasion a momentary merriement that really served only as a sort of relief to the strained feelings, and instantly disappeared. The tomb-stone part of the case was got through easily: scarce any attempt being made on the part of Mr. Aubrey's counsel, to resist or interfere with it. But the great—the hottest part of the fight—occurred at that point of the case, where Titmouse's descent from Stephen Dreddlington was sought to be established. This gentleman, who had been a very wild person, whose movements were very difficult to be traced or accounted for, had entered the navy, and ultimately died at sea, as had always been imagined, single and childless. It was proved, however, that so far from such being the case, he had married a person at Portsmouth, of inferior station; and that by her he had a daughter, only two years before his death, which happened at sea, as has been stated. Both mother and daughter, after undergoing great privation, and no notice being taken of the mother by any of her late husband's family, removed to the house of a humble and distant relative, in Cumberland, and afterward died, leaving her daughter only fifteen years old. When she grew up, she lived in some menial capacity at Cumberland, and ultimately married one Gabriel Tittlebat Titmouse; who, after living for some years a cordwainer at Whitehaven, found his way to Grilston, in Yorkshire, in the neighborhood of which town he had lived for some years, in very humble circumstances. There he had married; and about two years afterward his wife died, leaving a son—our friend Tittlebat Titmouse. Both of them afterward came to London; where, in four or five years' time, the father died, leaving the little Titmouse to flutter and hop about in the wide world as best he could. The little documentary evidence of which Gammon, at his first interview with Titmouse, found him possessed, proved, at the trial, as Gammon had foreseen, of essential importance. The evidence in support of this part of the case, and which took till two o'clock on the ensuing afternoon to get through, was subjected to a most determined and skilful opposition by the Attorney General, but in vain. The case had been got up with the utmost care, under the excellent management of Lynx; and Mr. Subtle's consummate tact and ability brought it, at length, fully and distinctly out before the jury.

"That, my lord," said he, as he sat down after re-examining his last witness, "is the case on the part of the plaintiff." On this the judge and jury withdrew for a short time, to obtain refreshments. During their absence, the Attorney-General, Mr. Sterling, Mr. Crystal, and Mr. Mansfield, might have been seen, with their heads laid close together, engaged in anxious consultation—a group gazed at by the eager eyes of many a spectator whose beating heart wished their cause god-speed. The Attorney-General then withdrew for a few moments, also to seek refreshments; and returning at the same time with the judge, after a moment's pause, rose and opened the defendant's case. His manner was calm and impressive; his person was dignified; and his clear, distinct voice fell on the listening ear like the sound of silver. After an exceedingly graceful and simple allusion to the distinguished character of his friend and client, Mr. Aubrey, to whose eminent position in the House of Commons he bore his personal testimony, and the magnitude of the interest at stake, he proceeded—"On every account, therefore, I feel sensible, gentlemen, to an unusual and most painful extent, of the very great responsibility now resting upon my learned friends and myself; lest any miscarriage of mine should prejudice in any degree the important interests committed to us, or impair the strength of the case which I am about to submit to you on the part of Mr. Aubrey; a case which, I assure you, unless some extraordinary mischance should befall us, will, I believe, annihilate that which, with so much pains and ability, has just been laid before you by my learned friend Mr. Subtle, and establish the defendant in the safe possession of that large property which is the subject of the present most unexpected litigation. But, gentlemen, before proceeding so far as that, it is fitting that I should call your attention to the nature of the case set upon the part of the plaintiff, and the sort of evidence by which it has been attempted to be supported; and I am very sanguine of success, in showing you that the plaintiff's witnesses are not entitled to the credit to which they lay claim; and, consequently, that there is no case made out for the defendant to answer." He then entered into a rigorous analysis of the plaintiff's evidence, contrasting each conflicting portion with the other, with singular force and cogency; and commented with powerful severity upon the demeanor and character of many of the witnesses. On proceeding, at length, to open the case of the defendant—"And here, gentlemen," said he, "I am reminded of the observation with which my learned friend concluded—that he was entirely ignorant of the case which I meant to set up in answer to that which he had opened on the part of the plaintiff. Gentlemen, it would have been curious, indeed, had it been otherwise—had my friend's penetrating eye been able to inspect the contents of our strong-box—and so become acquainted with the evidence on which my client rests his title to the property. He has, however, succeeded in entitling himself to information on the point; and he shall have it—and to his heart's content." Here Mr. Subtle cast a glance of smiling incredulity towards the jury, and defiance toward the Attorney-General: he took his pen into his hand, however, and his juniors looked very anxious.

ANECDOTE OF M. PAER.—In the Rue Poissonniere is a small cafe, which is used as a sort of bureau, or house of call for musicians out of employment, and where persons engaging performers for balls and concerts are in the habit of resorting, with the certainty of finding a supply of artists. Not many years ago, one of these purveyors of harmony entered the coffee-house, and announced that he wanted a violin player for the Sunday's dance at Ranelagh. A little decrepit old man stepped forward and offered his services; but the purveyor declined them on the ground of his age. "You shall see," said the fiddler, brushing from the breast of his coat a quantity of snuff which had fallen upon it. "Give me three francs and you shall not regret your bargain." The orchestral director, allured by the lowness of the price, and the apparent confidence of the applicant, suffered himself to be persuaded, and two hours afterward the little old man of the bow was installed with the rest of the orchestra, in the open air, at the Bois de Boulogne. Only a few bars had been played, when all eyes and ears were turned with astonishment and delight to the most pure and melodious tones issuing from a source whence, ordinarily nothing but sounds of harshness, if not actual discord, were uttered. All at once a law student, who was a frequent visitor in higher circles, although he was then dancing with a pretty modiste, recognised and proclaimed the magic creator of the unaccustomed harmony, to be M. Paer, the composer. The amiable and gay old man, who often cracked jokes of this kind, laughed till the tears ran from his eyes at the hubbub he had created, and was carried out of the orchestra in triumph by the company.

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH,

Book the Second.... Mary the Queen.

"Long live Queen Jane!" shouted Dudley and his companions, vainly hoping they were friends.

"Long live Queen Mary, and death to the rebels!" responded the others.

At the cry, Dudley and his little band halted. They were hemmed in on all sides, without the possibility of escape; and the royalists on the fortifications above being now able to mark them, opened a devastating fire upon them. By this time, Renard and his party had turned the angle of the wall, and the voice of the ambassador was heard crying—"Cut them in pieces! Spare no one but their leader. Take him alive!"

Hearing the shout, Dudley observed to Cholmondeley—"You have ever been my faithful esquire, and I claim one last service from you. If I am in danger of being taken, slay me. I will not survive defeat."

"Nay, my lord, live," cried Cholmondeley. "Wyat or the Duke of Suffolk may be victorious, and deliver you."

"No," replied Dudley, "I will not run the risk of being placed again in Mary's power. Obey my last injunctions. Show me escape, fly to Jane. You know where to find her. Bid her embark instantly for France, and say her husband with his last breath blessed her."

At this moment, he was interrupted by Cholmondeley, who pointed out an open door in the ramparts opposite them. Eagerly availing himself of the chance, Dudley called to his men to follow him, and dashed through it, uncertain whither it led, but determined to sell his life dearly. The doorway admitted them into a low vaulted chamber, in which were two or three soldiers, and a stand of arms and ammunition. The men fled at their approach along a dark, narrow passage, and endeavored to fasten the inner door, but the others were too close upon them to permit it. As Dudley and his band advanced, they found themselves at the foot of a short flight of steps, and rushing up them, entered a semi-circular passage, about six feet wide, with a vaulted roof, and deep embrasures in the walls, in which cannon were planted. It was, in fact, the casemate of the Brass Mount. By the side of the cannon stood the gunners, and the passage was filled with smoke. Alarmed by the cries of their companions, and the shouts of Dudley and his band, these men, who were in utter ignorance of what had passed, except that they were made aware that the summit of the bastion was carried, threw down their arms, and sued for quarters.

"You shall have it friends," cried Dudley, "provided you will fight for Queen Jane."

"Agreed!" replied the gunners. "Long live Queen Jane."

"Stand by me," returned Dudley, "and these stout walls shall either prove our safeguard, or our tomb."

The gunners then saw how matters stood, but they could not retract; and they awaited a favourable opportunity to turn against their new masters.

Perceiving the course taken by Dudley and his companions, Renard felt certain of their capture, and repeated his injunctions to the soldiers to take him alive if possible, but on no account to suffer him to escape.

Dudley, meanwhile, endeavored with Cholmondeley to drag one of the large pieces of ordnance out of the embrasure in which it was placed, with the view of pointing it against their foes. But before this could be accomplished, the attack commenced. Darting to the head of the steps, Dudley valiantly defended the pass for some time; and the royalist soldiers, obedient to the injunctions of Renard, forbore to strike him, and sought only his capture. The arched roof rang with the clash of weapons, with the reports of shot, and with the groans of the wounded and dying. The floor beneath them soon became slippery with blood. Still, Dudley kept his ground. All at once, he staggered and fell. A blow had been dealt him from behind by one of the gunners, who had contrived to approach him unawares.

"It is over," he groaned to his esquire, "finish me, and fly, if you can, to Jane."

Cholmondeley raised his sword to comply with his lord's injunctions, but the blow was arrested by the strong arm of Renard, who bestriding his prey, cried, in a voice of exultation, "He is mine! Bear him to the Queen before he expires."

Cholmondeley heard no more, but darting backwards, sprang into the embrasure whence he had endeavored to drag the cannon, and forcing himself through the aperture, dropped from the dizzy height into the moat.

While this was passing, Mary proceeded to Saint John's Chapel in the White Tower. It was brilliantly illuminated, and high mass was being performed by Bonner, and the whole of the priesthood assembled within the fortress. The transition from the roar and tumult without to this calm and sacred scene was singularly striking, and calculated to produce a strong effect on the feelings. There, all was strife and clamor; the air, filled with smoke, was almost stifling; and such places as were not lighted up by the blaze of the conflagration or the flashing of the ordnance and musquetry, were buried in profound gloom. Here, all was light, order, serenity, sanctity. Without, fierce bands were engaged in deadly fight—nothing was heard but the clash of arms, the thunder of cannon, the shouts of the victorious, the groans of the dying. Within, holy men were celebrating their religious rites, undisturbed by the terrible struggle around them, and apparently unconscious of it; tapers shone from every pillar; the atmosphere was heavy with incense; and the choral hymn mingled with the scarce-heard roar of cannon. Mary was so affected by the scene, that for the first time she appeared moved. Her bosom heaved, and a tear started to her eye.

"How peaceful is the holy place," she observed to Gardiner, "and what a contrast it presents to the scene we have just quitted! I could almost wish that Heaven had destined me to the cloister instead of the throne, that I might pass my days in the exercise of my religion."

"Heaven has destined you to be the restorer and defender of our religion, madam," replied Gardiner. "Had you not been called to the high station you occupy, the Catholic worship, so long discontinued in these holy walls, would not now be celebrated. To you we owe its restoration;—to you we must owe its continuance."

As Mary advanced to the altar, the anthem ceased, and silence prevailed throughout the sacred structure. Prostrating herself, she prayed for a few moments fervently, and in an audible voice. She then arose, and observed to Gardiner, "I feel so much comforted, that I am assured Heaven will support me and our holy religion."

As she spoke, solemn music resounded through the chapel, the anthem was again chanted, and the priests resumed their holy rites. With a heart strengthened and elated, Mary ascended the staircase behind the altar, and passing through the gallery proceeded to the council-chamber, where she was informed that Xit, having captured a prisoner of importance, waited without to ascertain her pleasure concerning him. Mary ordered the dwarf to be brought into her presence with his captive, and in a few moments he was introduced with Bret, who was guarded by a couple of halberdiers.

On no previous occasion had Xit exhibited so much consequence as the present, and his accoutrements and fantastically plumed casque added to his ludicrous appearance. He advanced slowly and majestically towards the chair of State in which Mary was seated, ever and anon turning his head to see that Bret was close behind him, and when within a short distance of the royal person he made a profound salutation. Unluckily, in doing so, his helmet fell from his head and rolled to the queen's feet. Slightly discomposed by the accident, and still more by Mary's frown, he picked up his helmet, and stammered forth—

"I am come to inform your highness that I have taken a prisoner—taken him with my own hands!"

"Who is it?" interrupted Mary, glancing sternly at the captive, who remained with his arms folded upon his breast, and his eyes cast upon the floor. "Who is it?" she asked, in an imperious tone.

"The arch traitor Bret," answered Xit—"the captain London of the Trained Bands, who revolted from the Duke of Norfolk, and joined the rebels at Rochester."

"Bret!" ejaculated Mary, in a tone that made Xit recoil several steps with fright, while the prisoner himself looked up. "Aha! is the traitor then within our power? Take him without, and let the headman deal with him!"

"Your highness!" cried Bret, prostrating himself.

"Away with him!" interrupted Mary. "Do you, my lord," she added to Gardiner, "see that my commands are obeyed."

The prisoner was accordingly removed, and Xit, who was completely awed by the Queen's furious looks, was about to slink off, when she commanded him to remain.

"Stay!" she cried. "I have promised on my Queenly word, that whoso brought this traitor Bret to me, should have whatever he demanded. Art thou in good truth his captor? Take heed thou triflest not with me. I am in no mood for jesting."

"So I perceive, gracious madam," replied Xit. "But I swear to you, I took him with my own hand, in fair and open combat. My companion Magog, if he survives the fray, will vouch for the truth of my statement—nay, Bret himself will not gainsay it."

"Bret will gainsay little more," rejoined Mary sternly; "his brain will contrive no further treason against us, nor his tongue give utterance to it. But I believe thee—the rather that I am persuaded thou dar'st not deceive me. Make thy request—it is granted."

"If I dared to raise my hopes so high," said Xit, bashfully.

"What means the knave?" cried Mary. "I have said the request shall be granted."

"Whatever I ask?" inquired Xit.

"Whatever thou mayest ask in reason, sirrah!" returned Mary, somewhat perplexed.

"Well, then," replied Xit, "I should have claimed a dukedom. But as your highness might possibly think the demand unreasonable, I will limit myself to knighthood."

In spite of herself, Mary could not repress a smile at the dwarf's extravagant request, and the terms in which it was couched.

"I have made many efforts to obtain this distinction," pursued Xit—"and for a while unsuccessfully. But fortune, or rather my bravery, has at length favored me. I desire knighthood at your Majesty's hands."

"Thou shalt have it," replied Mary; "and it will be a lesson to me to make no rash promises in future. Hereafter, when affairs are settled, thou wilt not fail to remind me of my promise."

"Your highness may depend upon it, I will not fail to do so," replied Xit, bowing and retiring. "Huzza!" he cried, as soon as he gained the antechamber. "Huzza!" he repeated, skipping in the air, and cutting as many capers as his armor would allow him, "at length, I have reached the height of my ambition. I shall be knighted. The Queen has promised it. Aha! my three noble giants, I am now a taller man than any of you. My lofty title will make up for my want of stature. Sir Xit!—that does not sound well. I must change my name for one more euphonious, or at least find out my surname. Who am I? It is strange I never thought of tracing out my history before. I feel I am of illustrious origin. I must clear up this point before I am knighted. Stand aside, base grooms," he continued to the grinning and jeering attendants, "and let me pass."

While pushing through them, a sudden bustle was heard behind, and he was very unceremoniously thrust back by Simon Renard, who was conducting Dudley to the Queen's presence.

"Another prisoner!" exclaimed Xit. "I wonder what Renard will get for his pains. If I could but take Wyat, my fortune were indeed made. First, I will go and see what has become of Bret; and then, if I can do so without much risk, I will venture outside the portcullis of the Byward Tower. Who knows but I may come in for another good thing!"

Thus communing with himself, Xit went in search of the unfortunate captain of the Trained Bands, while Renard entered the council chamber with Dudley. The latter, though faint from loss of blood, on finding himself in the Queen's presence, exerted all his strength, and stood erect and unsupported.

"So far your highness is victorious," said Renard; "one of the rebel leaders is in your power, and ere long all will be so. Will it please you to question him? or shall I bid Mauger to take off his head at once?"

"Let me reflect a moment," replied Mary, thoughtfully. "He shall die," she added, after a pause; "but not yet."

"It were better to behead him now," rejoined Renard.

"I do not think so," replied Mary. "Let him be removed to some place of safe confinement—the dungeon beneath Saint John's Chapel."

"The only grace I ask from your highness is speedy death," said Dudley.

"Therefore I will not grant it," replied Mary. "No, traitor! you shall perish with your wife."

"Ah!" exclaimed Dudley, "I have destroyed her."

And as the words were pronounced, he reeled backwards, and would have fallen, if the attendants had not caught him.

"Your Majesty has spared Mauger a labor," observed Renard, sarcastically.

"He is not dead," replied Mary; "and if he were so, it would not grieve me. Remove him; and do with him as I have commanded."

Her injunctions were obeyed, and the inanimate body of Dudley was carried away.

Renard was proceeding to inform the Queen that the insurgents had been driven from the Brass Mount, when a messenger arrived, with tidings that another success had been gained—Sir Henry Jerningham having encountered the detachment under the Duke of Suffolk, and driven them back to their vessels, was about to assist the Earl of Pembroke and Sir Henry Bedingfield in a sally upon Sir Thomas Wyatt's party. This news so enchanted Mary, that she took a valuable ring from her finger and presented it to the messenger, saying: "I will double thy fee, good fellow, if thou wilt bring me word that Wyatt is slain, and his traitorous band utterly routed."

Scarcely had the messenger departed, when another appeared. He brought word that several vessels had arrived off the Tower, and attacked the squadron under the command of Admiral Winter; that all the vessels, with the exception of one, on board which the Duke of Suffolk had taken refuge, had struck; and that her majesty might now feel assured of a speedy conquest. At this news, Mary immediately fell on her knees, and cried: "I thank thee, O Lord! not that thou hast vouchsafed me a victory over my enemies, but that thou hast enabled me to triumph over thine."

"The next tidings your highness receives will be that the siege is raised," observed Renard, as the Queen arose; "and, with your permission, I will be the messenger to bring it."

"Be it so," replied Mary. "I would now gladly be alone."

As Renard issued from the principal entrance of the White Tower, and was about to cross the Green, he perceived a small group collected before Saint Peter's Chapel, and at once guessing its meaning, he hastened toward it. It was just beginning to grow light, and objects could be imperfectly distinguished. As Renard drew nigh, he perceived a circle formed round a soldier whose breast-plate, doublet, and ruff had been removed, and who was kneeling with his arms crossed upon his breast beside a billet of wood. Near him, on the left, stood Mauger, with his axe upon his shoulder, and on the right, Gardiner holding a crucifix toward him, and earnestly entreating him to die in the faith of Rome; promising him, in case of compliance, a complete remission of his sins. But, for he it was, made no answer, but appeared, from the convulsive movement of his lips, to be muttering a prayer. Out of patience, at length Gardiner gave the signal to Mauger, and the latter motioned the rebel captain to lay his head upon the piece of timber. The practised executioner performed his task with so much celerity that a minute had not elapsed before the head was stricken from the body, and placed on the point of a spear. While the apparatus of death and the blood-streaming trunk were removed, Xit, who was one of the spectators, seized the spear with its grisly burden, and, bending beneath the load, bore it toward the Byward Tower. A man-at-arms preceded him, shouting in a loud voice, "Thus perish all traitors!"

Having seen this punishment inflicted, Renard hastened toward the Byward Tower, and avoiding the concourse that flocked round Xit and his sanguinary trophy, took a shorter cut, and arrived there before them. He found Pembroke and Bedingfield, as the messenger had stated, prepared with a large force to make a sally upon the insurgents. The signal was given by renewed firing from the roof and loopholes of the Middle Tower. Wyatt, who had retired under the gateway of that fortification, and had drawn up his men in the open space behind it, now advanced at their head to the attack. At this moment, the portcullis of the Byward Tower was again raised, and the royalists issued from it. Foremost among them were the giants. The meeting of the two hosts took place in the centre of the bridge, and the shock was tremendous. For a short time, the result appeared doubtful. But the superior numbers, better arms, and discipline, of the Queen's party, soon made it evident on which side victory would incline.

If conquest could have been obtained by personal bravery, Wyatt would have been triumphant. Wherever the battle raged most fiercely he was to be found. He sought out Bedingfield, and failing in reaching him, cut his way to the Earl of Pembroke, whom he engaged and would have slain, if Ogl had not driven him off with his extraordinary mace. The tremendous prowess of the gigantic brethren, indeed, contributed in no slight degree to the speedy termination of the fight. Their blows were resistless, and struck such terror into their opponents, that a retreat was soon begun, which Wyatt found it impossible to check. Gnashing his teeth with anger, and uttering ejaculations of rage, he was compelled to follow his flying forces. His anger was vented against Gog. He aimed a terrible blow at him, and cut through his partizan, but his sword shivered against his morion. A momentary rally was attempted in the court between the Lion's Gate and the Bulwark Gate; but the insurgents were speedily driven out. On reaching Tower Hill, Wyatt succeeded in checking them; and though he could not compel them to maintain their ground, he endeavored, with a faithful band, to cover the retreat of the main body to London Bridge. Perceiving his aim, Pembroke sent off a detachment under Bedingfield, by Tower street, to intercept the front ranks while he attacked the rear. But Wyatt beat off his assailants, made a rapid retreat down Thames street, and after a skirmish with Bedingfield at the entrance of the bridge, in which he gained a decided advantage, contrived to get his troops safely across it, with much less loss than might have been anticipated. Nor was this all. He destroyed the planks which had afforded him passage, and took his measures so well and so expeditiously on the Southwark side, that Pembroke hesitated to cross the bridge and attack him.

The Tower, however, was delivered from its assailants. The three giants pursued the flying foe to the Bulwark Gate, and then returned to the Middle Tower, which was yet occupied by a number of Wyatt's party, and summoned them to surrender. The command was refused, unless accompanied by a pardon. The giants said nothing more, but glanced significantly at each other. Magog seized a ram, which had been left by the assailants, and dashed it against the door on the left of the gateway. A few tremendous blows sufficed to burst it open. Finding no one within the lower chamber, they ascended the winding stone staircase, their progress up which was opposed, but ineffectually, by the insurgents. Magog pushed forward like a huge bull, driving his foes from step to step till they reached the roof, where a short but furious encounter took place. The gigantic brethren fought back to back, and committed such devastation among their foes, that those who were left alive threw down their arms, and begged for quarter. Disregarding the entreaties, the giants hurled them over the battlements. Some were drowned in the moat, while others were dashed to pieces in the court below.

"It is thus," observed Magog with a grim smile to his brethren, as the work of destruction was ended, "that the sons of the Tower avenge the insults offered to their parent."

On descending, they found Xit stationed in the centre of the bridge, carrying the spear with Bret's head upon it. The dwarf eagerly inquired whether they had taken Wyatt; and being answered in the negative, expressed his satisfaction.

"The achievement is reserved for me," he cried; "no more laughter, my masters—no more familiarity. I am about to receive knighthood from the queen." This announcement, however, so far from checking the merriment of the giants, increased it to such a degree, that the irascible mannikin dashed the gory head in their faces, and would have attacked them with the spear, if they had not disarmed him.

By this time Sir Henry Bedingfield had returned from the pursuit of the rebels. Many prisoners had been taken, and conveyed, by his directions, to a secure part of the fortress. Exerting himself to the utmost, and employing a large body of men in the work, the damages done to the different defences of the fortress were speedily repaired, the bodies of the slain thrown into the river, and all rendered as secure as before. The crews on board Winter's squadron had surrendered; but their commander, together with the Duke of Suffolk, had escaped, having been put ashore in a small boat. Conceiving all lost, and completely panic-stricken, the Duke obtained horses for himself and a few companions, and riding to Shene, where he had appointed a meeting with his brother, Lord Thomas Grey, set off with him, at full speed, for Coventry, the inhabitants of which city he imagined were devoted to him. But he soon found out his error. Abandoned by his adherents, and betrayed into the hands of the Earl of Huntingdon, who had been sent after him, he was shortly afterward brought a prisoner to the Tower.

Not to anticipate events, such was the expedition used that in less than an hour, Bedingfield conveyed to the queen the intelligence that all damage done by the besiegers was repaired, and that her loss had been trifling compared with that of her enemies. He found her surrounded by her nobles; and on his appearance she arose, and advanced a few steps to meet him.

"You have discharged your office right well, Sir Henry," she said; "and if we deprive you of it for a while, it is because we mean to intrust you with a post of yet greater importance."

"Whatever office your majesty may intrust me with, I will gladly accept it," replied Bedingfield.

"It is my pleasure, then, that you set out instantly with the Earl of Sussex to Ashbridge," returned Mary, "and attach the person of the Princess Elizabeth. Here is your warrant. Bring her alive or dead."

"Alas!" exclaimed Bedingfield, "is this the task your highness has reserved for me?"

"It is," replied Mary; and she added in a lower tone, "you are the only man to whom I could confide it."

"I must perforce obey, since your majesty wills it—but—"

"You must set out at once," interrupted Mary—"Sir Thomas Brydges shall be lieutenant of the Tower in your stead. We reserve you for greater dignities."

Bedingfield would have remonstrated, but seeing the Queen was immovable, he signified his compliance, and having received further instructions, quitted the presence to make preparations for his departure.

The last efforts of the insurgents must be briefly told. After allowing his men a few hours' rest, Wyatt made a forced march to Kingston, and hastily repairing the bridge, which had been broken down, with planks, ladders, and beams tied together, passed over it with his ordnance and troops in safety, and proceeded towards London. In consequence of a delay that occurred on the road, his plan was discovered, and the Earl of Pembroke, having by this time collected a considerable army, drew up his forces in Saint James's fields to give him battle.

A desperate skirmish took place, in which the insurgents, disheartened by their previous defeat, were speedily worsted. Another detachment, under the command of Knevet, were met and dispersed at Charing Cross, by Sir Henry Jerningham, and would have been utterly destroyed, but that they could not be distinguished from the royalists, except by their muddy apparel, which occasioned the cry among the victors of "Down with the drizzle-tails."

Wyatt himself, who was bent upon entering the city, where he expected to meet with great aid from Throckmorton, dashed through all opposition, and rode as far as the Belle Sauvage (even then a noted hostel), near Ludgate. Finding the gate shut, and strongly defended, he rode back as quickly as he came to Temple Bar, where he was encountered by Sir Maurice Berkeley, who summoned him to surrender, and seeing it was useless to struggle further, for all his companions had deserted him, he complied. His captor carried him to the Earl of Pembroke; and as soon as it was known that the rebel-leader was taken, the army was disbanded, and every man ordered to return to his home. Proclamation was next made that no one, on pain of death, should harbor any of Wyatt's faction, but should instantly deliver them up to the authorities.

That same night Wyatt, together with Knevet, Cobham, and others of his captains, were taken to the Tower by water. As Wyatt, who was the last to disembark, ascended the steps of Traitor's Gate, Sir Henry Brydges, the new lieutenant, seized him by the collar, crying, "Oh! thou base and unhappy traitor! how couldst thou find in thy heart to work such detestable treason against the Queen's majesty? Were it not that the law must pass upon thee, I would stab thee with my dagger."

Holding his arms to his side, and looking at him, as the old chroniclers report, "grievously, with a grim look," Wyatt answered, "It is no mastery now." Upon which, he was conveyed with the others to the Beauchamp Tower.

CHAPTER XXXI.—How Jane surrendered herself a prisoner; and how she brought Queen Mary to spare her husband.

Towards the close of the day following that on which the rebels were defeated, a boat, rowed by a single waterman, shot London Bridge, and swiftly approached the Tower wharf. It contained two persons, one of whom, apparently a female, was so closely muffled in a cloak that her features could not be discerned; while her companion, a youthful soldier, equipped in his full accoutrements, whose noble features were clouded with sorrow, made no attempt at concealment. As they drew near the stairs, evidently intending to disembark, the sentinels presented their arquebuses at them, and ordered them to keep off; but the young man immediately arose, and said that having been concerned in the late insurrection, they were come to submit themselves to the Queen's mercy. This declaration excited some surprise among the soldiers, who were inclined to discredit it, and would not have suffered them to land, if an officer of the guard, attracted by what was passing, had not interfered, and granted the request. By his command, they were taken across the draw-bridge opposite the stairs, and placed within the guard-room near the Byward Tower. Here the officer who had accompanied them demanded their names and condition, in order to report them to the lieutenant.

"I am called Cuthbert Cholmondeley," replied the young man, "somewhere esquire to Lord Guilford Dudley."

"You bore that rebel lord's standard in the attack on the Brass Mount—did you not?" demanded the officer, sternly.

"I did," replied Cholmondeley.

"Then you have delivered yourself to certain death, young man," rejoined the officer. "What madness has brought you hither? The Queen will show you no mercy; and blood enough will flow upon the scaffold without yours being added to the stream."

"I desire only to die with my master," replied Cholmondeley.

"Where is Lord Guilford Dudley?" demanded the muffled female, in a tone of the deepest emotion.

"Confined in one of the secret dungeons—but I may not answer you further, madam," replied the officer.

"Are his wounds dangerous?" she continued, in a tone of the deepest anxiety.

"They are not mortal, madam," he answered. "He will live long enough to expiate his offences on the scaffold."

"Ah!" she exclaimed with difficulty, repressing a scream.

"No more of this—if you are a man, cried Cholmondeley, fiercely. "You know not whom you address."

"I partly guess," replied the officer, with a compassionate look. "I respect your sorrows, noble lady—but oh! why—why are you here? I would willingly serve you—nay, save you—but it is out of my power."

"My presence here must show you, sir, that I have no wish to avoid the punishment I have incurred," she replied. "I am come to submit myself to the Queen. But if you would serve me—serve me, without danger to yourself, or departure from your duty—you will convey this letter without delay to her highness's own hand."

"It may be matter of difficulty," rejoined the officer, "for her majesty is at this moment engaged in a secret conference in the Ball Tower, with the chancellor and the Spanish ambassador. Nay, though I would not further wound your feelings, madam, she is about to sign the death warrants of the rebels."

"The more reason, then," she replied, in accents of supplicating eagerness, "that it should be delivered instantly. Will you take it?"

The officer replied in the affirmative.

"Heaven's blessing upon you!" she fervently ejaculated.

Committing the captives to the guard, and desiring that every attention, consistent with their situation, should be shown them, the officer departed. Half an hour elapsed before his return, and during the interval but few words were exchanged between Cholmondeley and his companion. When the officer re-appeared, she rushed toward him, and inquired what answer he brought.

"Your request is granted, madam," he replied. "I am commanded to bring you to the Queen's presence; and may your suit with her highness prove as successful as your letter. You are to be delivered to the chief jailor, sir," he added to Cholmondeley, "and placed in close custody."

As he spoke, Nightgall entered the guard-room. At the sight of his hated rival, an angry flush rose to the esquire's countenance—nor was his wrath diminished by the other's exulting looks.

"You will not have much further power over me," he observed, in answer to the jailor's taunts. "Cicely, like Alexia, is out of the reach of your malice. And I shall speedily join them."

"You are mistaken," retorted Nightgall, bitterly. "Cicely yet lives; and I will wed her on the day of your execution. Bring him away," he added, to his assistants. "I shall take him, in the first place, to the torture-chamber, and thence to the subterranean dungeons. I have an order to rack him."

"Farewell, madam," said the esquire, turning from him, and prostrating himself before his companion, who appeared in the deepest anguish; "we shall meet no more on earth."

"I have destroyed you," she cried. "But for your devotion to me, you might now be in safety."

"Think not of me, madam, I have nothing to live for," replied the esquire, pressing her hand to his lips. "Heaven support you in this your last, and greatest, and—as I can bear witness—most unmerited trial. Farewell, for ever!"

"Ay, for ever!" repeated the lady. And she followed the officer; while Cholmondeley was conveyed by Night-gall and his assistants to the secret entrance of the subterranean dungeons near the Devilin Tower.

Accompanied by his charge, who was guarded by two halberdiers, the officer proceeded along the southern ward, in the direction of the Hall Tower—a vast circular structure, standing on the east of Bloody Tower. This fabric, (sometimes called the Wakefield Tower from the prisoners confined within it, after the battle of that name in 1460, and more recently the Record Tower, from the use to which it has been put,) is one of the oldest in the fortress, and though not coeval with the White Tower, dates back as far as the reign of William Rufus, by whom it was erected. It contains two large octagonal chambers—that on the upper story being extremely lofty, with eight deep and high embrasures, surmounted by pointed arches, and separated by thin columns, springing from the groined arches formerly supporting the ceiling, which, though unfortunately destroyed, corresponded, no doubt, with the massive and majestic character of the apartment. In this room tradition asserts that —"the aspiring blood of Lancaster Sank in the ground."

—it being the supposed scene of the murder of Henry the Sixth by the ruthless Gloster. And whatever doubts may be entertained as to the truth of that dark legend, it cannot be denied that the chamber itself seems stamped with the gloomy character of the occurrence. In recent times, it has been devoted to a more peaceful purpose, and is now fitted up with presses, containing the most ancient records of the kingdom. The room on the basement floor is of smaller dimensions, and much less lofty. The recesses, however, are equally deep, though not so high, and are headed by semicircular arches. At high tides it is flooded, and a contrivance for the escape of the water has been made in the floor.

Passing through an arched doorway on the east of this structure, where the entrance to the Record Office now stands, the officer conducted his prisoner up a spiral stone staircase, and left her in a small antechamber, while he announced her arrival. The unhappy lady still kept herself closely muffled. But though her features and figure were hidden, it was evident she trembled violently. In another moment, the officer reappeared, and motioning her to follow him, led the way along a narrow passage, at the end of which hangings were drawn aside by two ushers, and she found herself in the presence of the Queen.

Mary was seated at a table, near which stood Gardiner and Renard, and at the new-comer's appearance she instantly arose.

The interview about to be related took place in the large octagonal chamber previously described. It was sumptuously furnished: the walls were hung with arras from the looms of Flanders, and the deep recesses occupied with couches, or side-beards loaded with costly cups and vessels.

Hastily advancing towards the Queen, the lady prostrated herself at her feet, and, throwing aside her disguise, revealed the features of Jane. She extended her hands supplicatingly towards Mary, and fixed her streaming eyes upon her, but was for some moments unable to speak.

"I am come to submit myself to your highness's mercy," she said, as soon as she could find utterance.

"Mercy!" exclaimed Mary, scornfully. "You shall receive justice, but no mercy."

"Neither deserve nor desire it," replied Jane. "I have deeply, but not wilfully—Heaven is my witness!—offended your majesty, and I will willingly pay the penalty of my fault."

"What would you with me?" demanded Mary. "I have acceded to this interview in consideration of your voluntary submission. But be brief. I have important business before me, and my heart is steeled to tears and supplications."

"Say not so, gracious madam," rejoined Jane. "A woman's heart can never be closed to the pleadings of the unfortunate of her own sex, still less the heart of one so compassionate as your highness. I do not sue for myself."

"For whom, then?" demanded the Queen.

"For my husband," replied Jane.

"I am about to sign his death-warrant," replied Mary, in a freezing tone.

"I will not attempt to exculpate him, madam," returned Jane, restraining her emotion by a powerful effort, "for his offence cannot be extenuated. Nay, I deplore his rashness as much as your highness can condemn it. But I am well aware that vindictiveness is no part of your royal nature—that you disdain to crush a fallen foe—and that, when the purposes of justice are answered, no sentiments but those of clemency will sway your bosom. I myself, contrary to my own wishes, have been the pretext for the late insurrection, and it is right I should suffer, because while my life remains, your highness may not feel secure. But my husband has no claims, pretended or otherwise, to the throne, and when I am removed, all fear of him will be at an end. Let what I have done speak my sincerity. I could have escaped to France, if I had chosen. But I did not choose to accept safety on such terms. Well knowing with whom I had to deal—knowing also that my life is of more importance than my husband's, I have come to offer myself for him. If your highness has any pity for me, extend it to him, and heap his faults on my head."

"Jane," said Mary, much moved—"you love your husband devotedly."

"I need not say that I love him better than my life, madam," replied Jane, "for my present conduct will prove that I do so. But I love him so well that even his treason to your highness, to whom he already owes his life, cannot shake it. Oh, madam! as you hope to be happy in your union with the Prince of Spain—as you trust to be blessed with a progeny which shall continue on the throne of this kingdom—spare my husband—spare him for my sake."

"For your sake, Jane, I would spare him," replied Mary, in a tone of great emotion, "but I cannot."

"Cannot, madam!" replied Jane, "you are an absolute Queen, and who shall say you nay? Not your council—not your nobles—not your people—not your own heart. Your majesty can and will pardon him. Nay, I read your gracious purpose in your looks. You will pardon him, and your clemency shall do more to strengthen your authority than the utmost severity could do."

"By Saint Paul!" whispered Renard to Gardiner, who had listened with great interest to the conference, and now saw with apprehension the effect produced on Mary, "she will gain her point if we do not interfere."

"Leave it to me," replied Gardiner. "Your majesty will do well to accede to the Lady Jane's request," he remarked aloud to the Queen, "provided she will comply with your former proposition, and embrace the faith of Rome."

"Ay," replied Mary, her features suddenly lighting up, "on these terms I will spare him. But your reconciliation with our holy church," she added to Jane, "must be public."

"Your highness will not impose these fatal conditions upon me?" cried Jane, distractedly.

"On no other will I accede," replied Mary, peremptorily.

"Nay, I have gone too far already. But my strong sympathy for you as a wife, and my zeal for my religion, are my inducements. Embrace our faith, and I pardon your husband."

"I cannot," replied Jane, in accents of despair; "I will die for him, but I cannot destroy my soul alive."

"Then you shall perish together," replied Mary, fiercely.

"What he! guards. Let the Lady Grey be conveyed to the Brick Tower, and kept a close prisoner during our pleasure."

And, waving her hand, Jane was removed by the attendants, while Mary seated herself at the table, and took up some of the papers, with which it was strewn, to conceal her agitation.

"You struck the right key, my lord—bigotry," observed Renard, in an under tone to Gardiner.

XXXII. . . . . How the Princess Elizabeth was brought a prisoner to the Tower.

Charged with the painful and highly responsible commission imposed upon him by the Queen, Sir Henry Bedingfeld, accompanied by the Earl of Sussex and three others of the Council, Sir Richard Southwell, Sir Edward Hastings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, with a large retinue, and a troop of two hundred and fifty horse, set out for Ashbridge, where Elizabeth had shut herself up previously to the outbreak of Wyatt's insurrection. On their arrival, they found her confined to her room with real or feigned indisposition, and she refused to appear; but as their mission did not admit the delay, they were compelled to force their way to her chamber. The haughty princess, whose indignation was roused to the highest pitch by the freedom, received them in such manner as to leave no doubt how she would sway the reins of government, if they should ever come within her grasp.

"I am guiltless of all design against my sister," she said, "and I shall easily convince her of my innocence. And then look well, sirs—you that have abused her authority—that I requite not your scandalous treatment."

"I would have willingly declined the office," replied Bedingfeld; "but the Queen was peremptory. It will rejoice me to find you can clear yourself with her highness, and I am right well assured, when you think calmly of the matter, you will acquit me and my companions of blame."

And he formed no erroneous estimate of Elizabeth's character. With all her proneness to anger, she had the strongest sense of justice. Soon after her accession, she visited the old knight at his seat, Oxburgh Hall, in Norfolk, still in the possession of his lineal descendant, the present Sir Henry Bedingfeld, and one of the noblest mansions in the county, and, notwithstanding his adherence to his ancient faith, manifested the utmost regard for him, playfully terming him "her jailor."

Early the next morning Elizabeth was placed in a litter, with her female attendants; and whether from the violence of her passion, or that she had not exaggerated her condition, she swooned, and on her recovery appeared so weak that they were obliged to proceed slowly. During the whole of the journey, which occupied five days, though it might have been easily accomplished in one, she was strictly guarded; the greatest apprehension being entertained of an attempt at rescue by some of her party. On the last day, she robed herself in white, in token of her innocence; and on her way to Whitehall, where the Queen was staying, she drew aside the curtains of her litter, and displayed a countenance, described in Renard's despatches to the Emperor, as "proud, lofty and superbly disdainful—an expression assumed to disguise her mortification." On her arrival at the palace, she earnestly entreated an audience of her majesty, but the request was refused.

That night Elizabeth underwent a rigorous examination by Gardiner and nineteen of the Council, touching her privacy to the conspiracy of De Noailles, and her suspected correspondence with Wyatt. She admitted having received letters from the French ambassador on behalf of Courtenay, for whom, notwithstanding his unworthy conduct, she still owned she entertained the warmest affection, but denied any participation in his treasonable practices, and expressed the utmost abhorrence of Wyatt's proceedings. Her assertions, though stoutly delivered, did not convince her interrogators, and Gardiner told her that Wyatt had confessed on the rack that he had written to her, and received an answer.

"Ah! says the traitor so?" cried Elizabeth. "Confront me with him, and if he will affirm as much to my face, I will own myself guilty."

"The Earl of Devonshire has likewise confessed, and has offered to resign all pretensions to your hand, and to go into exile, provided the Queen will spare his life," rejoined Gardiner.

"Courtenay faithless!" exclaimed the princess, all her haughtiness vanishing, and her head declining upon her bosom, "then it is time I went to the Tower. You may spare yourselves the trouble of questioning me further, my lords, for by my faith I will not answer you another word—no, not even if you employ the rack."

Upon this, the Council departed. Strict watch was kept over her during the night. Above a hundred of the guard were stationed within the palace-gardens, and a great fire was lighted in the hall, before which Sir Henry Bedingfeld and the Earl of Sussex, with a large band of armed men, remained till day-break. At nine o'clock, word was brought to the princess that the tide suited for her conveyance to the Tower. It was raining heavily, and Elizabeth refused to stir forth on the score of her indisposition. But Bedingfeld told her the Queen's commands were peremptory, and besought her not to compel him to use force. Seeing resistance was in vain, she consented with an ill grace, and as she passed through the garden to the water-side, she cast her eyes toward the windows of the palace, in the hope of seeing Mary, but was disappointed.

The rain continued during the whole of her passage, and the appearance of every thing on the river was as dismal and depressing as her own thoughts. But Elizabeth was not of a nature to be easily subdued. Ransacking all her latent energy, she bore up firmly against her distress. An accident had well nigh occurred as they shot London Bridge. She had delayed her departure so long that the fall was considerable, and the prow of the boat struck upon the ground with such force as almost to upset it, and it was some time before it righted. Elizabeth was wholly unmoved by their perilous situation, and only remarked that "She would that the torrent had sunk them." Terrible as the stern old fortress appeared to those who approached it under similar circumstances, to Elizabeth it assumed its most appalling aspect. Gloomy at all times, it looked gloomier than usual now, with the rain driving against it in heavy scuds, and the wind, whistling round its ramparts and fortifications, making the flag-staff and the vanes on the White Tower creak, and chilling the sentinels exposed to its fury to the bone. The storm agitated the river, and the waves more than once washed over the sides of the boat.

"You are not making for Traitor's Gate," cried Elizabeth, seeing that the skiff was steering in that direction; "it is not fit that the daughter of Henry the Eighth should land at those steps."

"Such are the Queen's commands," replied Bedingfeld, sorrowfully. "I dare not for my head disobey."

"I will leap overboard sooner," rejoined Elizabeth.

"I pray your highness to have patience," returned Bedingfeld, restraining her. "It would be unworthy of you—of your great father, to take so desperate a step."

Elizabeth compressed her lips and looked sternly at the old knight, who made a sign to the rowers to use their utmost despatch; and, in another moment, they shot beneath the gloomy gateway. The awful effect of passing under this dreadful arch has already been described, and Elizabeth, though she concealed her emotion, experienced its full horrors. The Water-gate revolved on its massive hinges, and the boat struck against the foot of the steps. Sussex and Bedingfeld, and the rest of the guard and her attendants, then landed, while Sir Thomas Brydges, the new lieutenant, with several warders, advanced to the top of the steps to receive her. But she would not move, but continued obstinately in the boat, saying, "I am no traitor, and do not choose to land here."

"You shall not choose, madam," replied Bedingfeld, authoritatively. "The Queen's orders must, and shall be obeyed. Disembark, I pray you, without more ado, or it will go hardly with you."

"This from you, Bedingfeld," rejoined Elizabeth, reproachfully, "and at such a time, too?"

"I have no alternative," replied the knight.

"Well then, I will not put you to further shame," replied the Princess rising.

"Will it please you to take my cloak as a protection against the rain?" said Bedingfeld, offering it to her. But she pushed it aside "with a good dash," as old Fox relates; and springing on the steps, cried in a loud voice, "Here lands as true a subject, being prisoner, as ever set foot on these stairs. And before thee, O God, I speak it, having no other friend but thee."

"Your highness is unjust," replied Bedingfeld, who stood bare-headed beside her; "you have many friends, and amongst them none more zealous than myself. And if I counsel you to place some restraint upon your conduct, it is because I am afraid it may be disadvantageously reported to the Queen."

"Say what you please of me, sirs," replied Elizabeth; "I will not be told how to act by you, or any one."

"At least move forward, madam," implored Bedingfeld; "you will be drenched to the skin if you tarry here longer, and will fearfully increase your fever."

"What matters it if I do?" replied Elizabeth, seating herself on the damp step, while the shower descended in torrents upon her. "I will move forward at my own pleasure—not at your bidding. And let us see whether you will dare use force towards me."

"Nay, madame, if you forget yourself, I will not forget what is due to your father's daughter," replied Bedingfeld, "you shall have ample time for reflection."

The deeply-commiserating and almost paternal tone in which this reproof was delivered touched the Princess sensibly; and glancing round, she was further moved by the mournful looks of her attendants, many of whom were deeply affected, and wept audibly. As soon as her better feelings conquered, she immediately yielded to them; and, presenting her hand to the old knight, said,

"You are right, and I am wrong, Bedingfeld. Take me to my dungeon."

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1841

NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES.

NO. III.

We resume to-day our articles upon the Navy, by continuing our exposure of other abuses. The cases, which we shall now instance, will farther establish what has been already asserted, and show with what impunity officers high in rank may violate the laws and regulations which have been made for its government. They will show how slight the protection the commanded has from the tyrannical and oppressive acts of the commander—in consequence of the corrupt and unjust manner in which complaints are investigated when preferred by the subordinate against his superior—and that dishonesty, in its broadest sense, is practised because shielded by rank and high command.

The Captain, a few of whose misdeeds (to use a mild term) we are about to bring before the bar of public opinion, cannot now, it is true, be accused of disgracing his uniform by indecent and reckless exposure in brothels, or by his amours with courtezans; nor can he, to our knowledge, be charged with having forfeited his pledged honor to the payment of money borrowed. No—with him such offences are highly criminal on account of their easy detection and probable consequent exposure. He has thus far succeeded in managing so to conduct himself as to be only strongly suspected. But with all his cunning and hypocritical pretensions to honesty, he has failed to conceal certain grave facts which occurred so recently on board the large ship he commands, as to be within the recollection of many officers.

The Captain had on board his ship, as one of the crew, a colored boy, who had been bound to him as an apprentice. This boy he was in the habit of punishing frequently and severely. A last act of cruelty was so unprovoked as to induce either the boy or some of the men on board, to appeal for redress in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, in which were stated the fact that for some slight offence, the Captain had inflicted the unlawful punishment of three dozen lashes on the bare back; that the wages allowed to him by the Government, as Captain's steward, were taken by the Captain, although he was made to receipt for the money on the books of the ship in the same manner as if the payments had been actually made to him.

This letter of complaint the Secretary enclosed to the immediate superior of the Captain, requiring him fully to investigate the matter; since the laws prohibit both the infliction of greater punishment, except by sentence of courts martial, than one dozen lashes, and the employment in public vessels of any person held either as an apprentice or as a slave. The Commodore in his turn passed the letter to the very officer against whom the complaint was made, requesting an explanation; and this was given by simply stating that the letter was pronounced a forgery by the supposed author. And yet this answer was received by the corrupt superior and imbecile Secretary as satisfactory; and thus the matter ended, and the offender against the laws of the land and of humanity triumphed! Now, is not all this truly farcical? When would offences be punished, if conviction depended upon the confessions of the accused?

Admitting that the boy did deny having written or authorized the complaint, are the charges thereby disproved or denied? This was not even alluded to by the Captain. But is it to be supposed that a person so utterly at another's mercy, would confess a knowledge of the letter when questioned by his base and despotic commander and master, knowing that if he did so, the most severe punishment must be the result? A decent regard for the preservation of the laws, and the protection of those entrusted to his command, should, we think, have induced the superior to have made some inquiries of the officers of the ship, and not have placed the investigation into the very hands most interested to disprove the charges.

The love of money is so strong in this naval hero as often to lead him into petty acts of swindling,—acts that cause one to blush in alluding to them. In this number we shall particularize one instance. A lad on board his ship was ordered to be discharged by the Secretary of the Navy, upon the settlement of his accounts. On reference to the books the balance against him was found to be five or six dollars. In addition to the payment of this amount, the father of the lad was required and made to refund three months' pay; and the reason offered by the Captain for this unjust exaction was, that this was the sum originally advanced to the lad. The fact that it had been cancelled by services rendered, was entirely overlooked. The amount, however, passed to the credit of the Government was no more than the actual balance of five or six dollars. The three months' pay which the Captain made a poor man disburse, yet remains in his pocket unaccounted for.

We shall now proceed to detail another item in the character of the officer under consideration. Soon after taking command of his ship, he directed the Purser to transfer to him the balance then in his hands belonging to the "Slush Fund." The amount of about fifty dollars was accordingly paid. Since that time the "slush" has been sold under the Captain's direction, and the entire proceeds received by him. A moderate estimate of the slush, sold since he has had the direction of it, can certainly not be less than $800. This money he holds without control or responsibility. No one will be at a loss to account for the motive in taking out of the hands of a disbursing and responsible officer the custody of a fund belonging to the public service, if not to the crew of the ship exclusively. The practice of the navy from its first establishment has, without exception, we believe, always placed under the charge of the purser of the ship all monies accruing from the sale of "slush." They were by him disbursed upon due authority, and he was held responsible for the just and honest discharge of his duty charge by the Captain of the ship.

But now to whom is the Captain to render an account, or by whom is he held responsible?

We are unwilling unjustly to impute improper motives to the conduct of any one; yet, since as all the circumstances connected with this business are necessary to enable our readers to judge rightly, we will further state that up to the time when he assumed the command of the ship, the men had invariably been allowed fresh beef four days in the week. By his order this old and well-established custom was changed, and on three days only is fresh beef given; on the other day, pork is substituted. For the information of that portion of our readers unacquainted with such matters, we will state that the slush on board ships is extracted from pork in process of boiling.

We shall not now stop to inquire into general misapplication in the Navy of the money which has accrued from a portion of the ration allowed by the Government to the crew of a ship, or whether the crew are not justly and fully entitled to the proceeds of the sale. We leave the subject, suggesting only the establishment of some regulation whereby an honest and just disposition may be made of the "slush fund" on board ships of war.

In connection with this source of emolument to this high-minded Captain, we would ask whether he has yet rendered an account to the proper agent of the empty beef, pork and other barrels, which, contrary to the regulations, he was in the habit of selling in such large numbers? Are the proceeds of these also, like the slush, appropriated and disposed of without accountability?

The practice which has improperly obtained among some of the Captains of rating their sons as Captain's Clerks, at the annual salary of $572, ration included, and making some of the ship's company perform the duties, has not been overlooked by the officer of whom we have been speaking. He has fully availed himself of it by giving his son the rate, while the youth has been quietly pursuing his studies at school, and an ordinary seaman has performed his duties on board the ship. In speaking of the Navy, a highly distinguished member of Congress very justly remarked that little good could be expected of it, so long as the command of our finest ships were given to such corrupt men.

We shall at an early day take occasion again to refer to some other equally honorable acts of the hero of this number, while he was on a foreign station. We shall detail how he was made to disgorge eight hundred dollars of which he wished to defraud the Government, and his subsequent equally dishonest practices whilst attached to a Navy Yard. We shall then bring forward, the acts of a tyrant, during his command of a petty schooner in the West Indies. These are so monstrous as to induce us to hesitate whether to place them before the public, lest they should be deemed too inhuman to credit. Yet there are officers who well remember the scenes enacted in that little vessel, and in whose ears still ring the cries for mercy of the lacerated wretches under his command. They will tell those who may ask that it was one continued scream of agony and suffering.

COMMEMORATIVE STATUES.—We often see in English journals that Sir Francis Chantry, or some other sculptor of note, has been engaged to model statues of great men. Lord Eldon has just ordered of Sir Francis two statues—one of his grandfather, Lord Eldon, and one of his grand uncle, Lord Stowell—and the University of Edinburgh a statue from the same hand, of James Watt, which will make the sixth erected to the memory of that truly great man in the country of his birth. Why is it that we seldom or never hear of any similar encouragement extended to the noble art of sculpture in our Republic? Congress did well by giving to Greenough the power to perpetuate his name in a colossal statue of the illustrious Washington; this was meritorious as a national act, and we sincerely hope to see it imitated by individuals and by societies of men. We wish also that our states and cities would adorn their capitols and halls with the effigies of their distinguished sons. Surely there are many nobly worthy of such commemoration.

We need not go beyond our own countrymen for artists sufficiently skilful to undertake the best works—young men not only of promise but of achievement. Greenough is well known, and from all that we hear of his magnum opus, whose safe arrival we trust that we shall soon announce, it will add largely to the measure of his renown. Powers and Clevenger—buckeyes from Ohio—are in Italy, winning golden things more substantial than "golden opinions from all sorts of people." We are glad to know that these artists have received present and prospective patronage sufficient to enable them to defy that ugly old beldame Res Augusta for years to come. Crawford is also in the "land of great bards and mighty men"—in Rome, at present. He has just completed a group that is said by judicious lovers of his art, to rival the beautiful antique. He is devoted to his elevating pursuit; toiling day and night with "a love that casteth out fear" of earping want. He is a Knickerbocker boy, born and brought up in New York.

In the midst of us there are also young men of genius, who have done quite enough already to show that any great tasks may safely be entrusted to them. Mr. C. B. Ives, a gentleman of whom we made favorable mention several days since, has, in the course of a few years' practice, acquired a mastery in the art, which elicits the most decided approbation from sound judges—from those who have walked the gallery of the Louvre and pondered in the Vatican. His workmanship exhibits the most elaborate finish—delicacy of touch combined with freedom and boldness. Mr. Brackett has also received just and liberal commendations, and is, no less than his compeer, worthy to call forth that encouragement for the art of sculpture which we heartily desire to see extended.

HER MAJESTY'S CONFIDENCE IN PRINCE ALBERT.—Her gracious Majesty of England, having been graciously pleased to bring into this breathing world a small infant Princess, her Majesty has given infinite delight to her loving subjects, who have been thrown into such a paroxysm of ecstasy in consequence, that the most serious apprehensions are entertained for them, though none whatever are entertained for her Majesty; her Majesty having signified her gracious pleasure to be bulletined "as well as could be expected." Had her Majesty given birth to a Prince, instead of a Princess, it is difficult to conjecture what her loving subjects would have done in the very tempest, and, as we may say, whirlwind of their joy. The probability is that female babies would not have been tolerated at all. Those that had them, would have changed them at nurse, by way of testifying their loyalty. As things are now, male infants are quite out of fashion; when they are born, they are concealed like Moses in the bulrushes.

By and by, matters will be different, as her gracious Majesty has already delicately insinuated to her Royal Consort. The following appears officially in the London Morning Post. Such an instance of "Royal Self-Possession," and, as we may add, Royal Determination and Perseverance, and Royal Confidence in the grand maxim of "better luck next time," cannot be furnished in the history of the civilized world.

ROYAL SELF-POSSESSION.—During the first interview that Prince Albert had with the Queen immediately after Her Majesty's accouchement, his Royal Highness, with great delicacy of feeling, expressed a fear lest the nation might experience some disappointment when it should become known that the Royal Infant was not a Prince. Her Majesty, notwithstanding the necessary exhaustion under which she must have labored, replied, with great naivete, "Never mind, Albert, the next shall be a boy!"

MR. AUDUBON'S WORK ON ORNITHOLOGY.—The tasteful reader will not fail to appreciate the beautiful engraving we have this week given from Mr. Audubon's magnificent work. It is executed with exquisite skill and finish on copper, and the picture is prepared so as to be printed on a Napier press, and is the finest specimen of copperplate printing in this manner. It is "worked"—to use an expression of the press room—admirably.

Owing to the quantity of matter, which had been prepared for the paper, we were obliged to content ourselves with giving only a small part of the description of the Wild Turkey. It is delightfully written, as are all the productions of this distinguished naturalist.

We learn that Mr. Audubon has a new edition of his work in the press in a less expensive form than the present. It ought to be displayed in the library of every American.

ECLIPSE OF THE MOON.—A total eclipse of the moon will take place on the 5th of February next, commencing in New-York at 9 minutes past 7 o'clock P. M. Total darkness begins at 6 minutes past 8; eclipse ends at 39 minutes past 10. This will be the 19th periodical return of an eclipse which occurs every nineteen years; it having first been observed on the 30th of June, 1498. Its next return will be in the year 1859, on the 17th of February, at which time the moon will set partially eclipsed. It will continue to return periodically until the year 2219, at which time it will cease and not again return till a period of 12,257 years shall have elapsed. The eclipse of the 5th of February will be visible to all parts of the United States, the Canadas, the greater part of Mexico, the whole of South America, Europe, and as far East as Bombay at which place the moon will go down partially eclipsed. The moon will set totally eclipsed at Arabia, Egypt, Moscow, and the countries adjacent to the Caspian Sea.

LOSS OF THE PACKET SHIP GARRICK. SIX DAYS LATER.

The ship Garrick, Capt. Palmer, which left Liverpool on the 13th ult. struck, on Wednesday the 6th inst. at five o'clock A. M. on the Jersey shore, about 20 miles South of Sandy Hook. They were in the act of wearing the ship when she struck in 16 feet water. The Garrick is a fine ship of 1,000 tons, and had on board a valuable cargo of dry goods worth about $450,000, a large portion of which, together with the ship which is valued at $70,000, is insured in New York. Most of the cargo has been saved, although in a damaged state. The passengers and crew were saved without injury, but the vessel will be a total loss.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

London, Saturday Evening, Dec. 12, 1840.

The greatest interest continues to be felt in Paris in the approaching funeral of Napoleon's remains. Preparations are making for rendering the ceremony one of the most imposing on record, either in ancient or modern history. It is expected that the interment will take place about a fortnight hence.

The Queen has now perfectly recovered from the effects of her late accouchement. She now attends to public pursuits as usual.

There is no longer any doubt, that if there is no apostasy from the Tory ranks, they will have a majority on all vital questions, in the ensuing session of Parliament, which is to meet for the despatch of business on the 26th of next month.

The war cry in France is now virtually over. The submission of Mehemet Ali, now formally made to the British Government through Commodore Napier, may be regarded as the re-establishment of peace.

The French Ministry appear to be acquiring a firmer hold on public opinion every day. M. Guizot stands particularly high in the estimation of Europe at this moment.

Mr. O'Connell has returned to Dublin from Derrynane for the purpose of recommencing the agitation of the repea question.

The small pox is committing fearful ravages in some parts of the provinces.

A new work in 3 vols. under the title of "The Playfair Papers: or Brother Jonathan," has just made its appearance. It is the republication in a new form, of a periodical which was brought out a few months ago in shilling numbers, and which was a dead failure. Only four or five numbers appeared, and of these 300 copies were not sold. The author has brought it out in the present form in the hope that with the title altered from "Brother Jonathan," which was the original one, to that of "The Playfair Papers," the public might be misled as to the identity of the book. It is a coarse caricature of American manners, and has not even the merit of being cleverly done. It will not excite the least interest in this country—nor, indeed, in any country.

Your correspondent has just been with Mr. Blackwood, the proprietor of Blackwood's Magazine, who is in London just now to make an arrangement for opening a branch of business here. "Ten Thousand a-Year" will be continued through six more numbers, though possibly not in every instance consecutive numbers. The story will be resumed in the number for the new year, and will be one of the best of the chapters which have appeared.

Mr. Ainsworth having completed his "Tower of London," is to commence a new work in January, in the Sunday Times, newspaper. This is a new mode of publication for popular authors; and it is generally thought that it must prove very injurious to Mr. Ainsworth's reputation. Captain Marryatt, following Mr. Ainsworth's example, is to commence a new tale called "The Preacher," in the Era newspaper, a very obscure publication, though conducted with respectable talent. The universal impression is, that the gallant captain will neither do himself nor the Era good by this new literary expedient.

A volume of poems, price 15 shillings, by the late Lady Flora Hastings, will appear towards the end of the present month. It is to be edited by her sister. I speak from private information of undoubted authenticity when I say, that no allusion whatever will be made in the volume to the melancholy circumstances which preceded Lady Flora's death. There is an impression here that new light will be thrown, by the volume, on the court story respecting her alleged pregnancy: all who expect scandal or gossip of any kind from it, will be grievously disappointed.

Macready appeared at the Haymarket Theatre on Monday last for the first time since the death of his child. On the following evening he sustained the principal part in Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer's new play—"Money," and acted well: the piece is only moderately successful.

LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The packet ship Oxford, Capt. Rathbone, arrived on Sunday from Liverpool, in the very short passage of twenty-one days, having sailed, on the 20th ultimo. The London dates received by her are to the 19th of last month.

The interment of the remains of NAPOLEON had been consummated at Paris, and no popular commotion accompanied the ceremony. Reports had been current in London, that the Sultan had refused to ratify the convention concluded between Mehemet Ali and Commodore Napier, giving to the Pasha, the hereditary sovereignty of Egypt.

Twenty-Sixth Congress.

SATURDAY, Jan. 9, 1840.

The SENATE did not sit to-day.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Jones of Va. reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill authorising the immediate issue of more Treasury Notes, to an amount not exceeding $5,000,000. It was sent to a Committee of the Whole.

MONDAY, Jan. 11, 1841.

In SENATE, Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, a new Senator from Tennessee, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. CLAY, of Ky., gave notice that he would call up his Anti-Sub-Treasury resolution as soon as the Senate was full.

A number of memorials in favor of a General Bankrupt Law were presented. Also, one from this city for the remission of the duties on goods destroyed by fire.

TUESDAY, Jan. 12, 1841.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Sergeant of Pa. reported from the Judiciary Committee without amendment the bill abolishing what remains of imprisonment for debt. Various difficulties and objections were started by several members, but the House overruled them all, voted down the amendment proposed, ordered and sustained the previous question, ordered the bill to a third reading, and passed it, without a division.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT.—The Cincinnati Republican of Monday says: "General Harrison is still at North Bend. He has been detained several days by the indisposition of Mrs. Harrison, but we are happy in being able to state that she is convalescent, and will probably be in the city to-day. We have not yet learned when he will start for the East, but we presume about the 15th or 20th of this month."

§3. In the case of Stokes and others, vs. Amos Kendall, on the 12th inst., at noon, the jury came into Court with a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $12,085 40, on the third count of the declaration. Exceptions were taken to the verdict, and the case will go to the Supreme Court.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.—The Legislature of North Carolina have adopted resolutions recommending their Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for the bill to pay the spoiliations by the French previous to 1800.

§3. Henry Elliott has petitioned the Legislature of Maryland for a divorce from the celebrated danseuse, Mad. Celeste, who is now in France.

TENNESSEE SENATOR.—We learn from the Globe that the Governor of Tennessee has appointed the Hon. A. O. P. Nicholson, of Maury county, to supply the vacancy in Congress occasioned by the death of Mr. Grady. Mr. Nicholson is a Van Buren man.

§3. The Circuit Court of Illinois has decided that aliens not naturalized, who have resided in that State six months next preceding an election, have a right to vote. The case has been carried up to the Supreme Court.

§3. The income of Hugh Percy, Duke of Northumberland, is one thousand pounds sterling—five thousand dollars a day. John Jacob Astor would probably pronounce him better off than a rich man, since he has been known to remark "a man with five hundred thousand dollars is as well off as a rich man."

THE PENSION LIST.—By the Report of the Secretary of War, it appears that the number of persons receiving pensions under the several acts of the years 1818, '28, '32, '36 and '38, is 40,105. The number of invalid pensioners is 4,289, of which 414 have been added since November, 1833—the increase owing the Secretary says, to the dangers and hardships to which the regular and militia troops have been exposed in the several campaigns in the Florida war.

The number of Revolutionary pensioners, under the act of March 18, 1818, which was originally upwards of 20,000, has decreased to 7,947.

The number of widows who have received pensions, under the act of July 7, 1838, granting them for five years, was 5,912; but it is now reduced by deaths, to 5,536, and during the current year all of those now on the rolls, under that act, will be dropped; as their pensions will expire, by law, on the 4th of March next.

The amount drawn from the Treasury, during the past year, to pay pensions, is $2,048,663 09, exclusive, however, of pensions paid from the Navy Pension Fund.—[Jour. of Com.]

BALTIMORE BANKS—THE RESUMPTION.—We learn that at a meeting of the Presidents of the several Banks in city of Baltimore, on Monday evening, the question of the resumption of specie payments came up—when a resolution was adopted by a decided vote, that it was inexpedient for the Banks of this city to resume, unless there was a simultaneous act of resumption on the part of the Banks of Virginia. This vote, we take it for granted, settles the question, that there will be no resumption south of Pennsylvania, at the present time.—[Baltimore American of Wednesday.]

SAVANNAH, Jan. 6.
IMPORTANT FROM FLORIDA.—We have melancholy news from Florida, and yet a prospect that most of the Indians will submit.

A correspondent writes us from Fort Holmes, E. F., that the "express has just arrived from the West, and says, that a wagon going from Micanopy to Wakakuta, escorted by ten men, was attacked by Indians, and Lieut. Sherwood, and Mrs. Lieut. Montgomery, Sergt. Carle and three privates killed."

FLORIDA.—The following is a letter from Judge Marvin to the editors of the Tallahassee Floridian, giving some additional particulars of the expedition of Col. Harney:

On board brig Waculla,

St. MARK'S, December 31st, 1840.

DEAR SIR: News had arrived at Key West before my leaving there, that Col. Harney, of the U. S. A. about the 15th instant, had a rencontre with the Indians in the interior of the everglades. With a force of about ninety men, he entered the everglades in canoes, guided by John, a negro who was captured by the Indians in 1835 from his master, Dr. Crews, and who escaped and came into the camp at Cape Florida, a few months since. The negro conducted the Colonel through the everglades to the Indian town, and he surrounded it and fired upon them, killing one or two Indians, and taking thirty-eight prisoners. In the assault, the chief of the band, Chai-ki-ka, escaped, but was pursued several miles by one of the dragoons, and overtaken and shot. Among the prisoners taken were ten warriors, nine of whom were hung; the life of the tenth being saved for a future guide. The rest of the prisoners were women and children, and were all spared and taken to the post at Cape Florida.

This band of Indians is known as the Spanish band, and the same who murdered Mr. Cooley's family, and several others at Cape Florida, and Captain Walton of the light ship, and Doctor Crews. They are the same Indians too, who surprised Col. Harney a year since, at Caloosahatche, under McComb's treaty of peace; and the same who recently burned and destroyed the settlements on Indian Key, killing men, women and children, and mutilating their bodies in a most barbarous manner. This band of Indians, with this same Chai-ki-ka at their head, has been the terror of the South for years, and has probably drank as much white blood as any in the Territory.

The Colonel re-captured thirteen or fourteen of Colt's rifles, taken from him at Caloosahatche by the Indians, and two thousand dollars worth of goods, carried off by the Indians from Indian Key.

This affair of Col. Harney's will do more to strike terror into the Indians, and to bring about a real peace, than any thing that has occurred for a long time. The everglade is no longer the refuge of the Indian. His own fastnesses are penetrated by the white man.

Col. Harney is about again to penetrate the everglades in pursuit of Sam Jones, he now having a guide to conduct him to his town. He is to be joined by several officers of the navy, and a company of marines, who are now upon the coast. Energy like this will soon end the war, and with less loss of life than temporizing measures.

§3 The Washington Globe states that the first intimation received at Micanopy of the disaster which befel Lieut. Sherwood and his escort, was the return of some of the horses of the unfortunate party. The garrison immediately sallied out, and within three miles of the fort found the bleeding corpse of Mrs. Montgomery (wife of Lieut. Montgomery), with a soldier, still breathing, lying by her, with just strength to say to her agonized husband, who threw himself on the ground by his wife's bleeding body, "Lieutenant, I fought for your wife as long as I could." Lieut. Sherwood was well mounted, and might have escaped, but he would not abandon his fair charge. This barbarous act is believed to have been committed by a band of Micasuckies.

§3 As many inquiries are made of us, and great curiosity seems to be felt concerning the time when we shall issue the next number of our LEVIATHAN NEW WORLD, we would state, that so numerous are the preparations necessary, and so extensive the preliminary arrangements, that several weeks will probably elapse before it can be published. In the meantime, we solicit orders from city and country, so that the exact extent of the edition requisite may be ascertained. In consequence of the demand for the first Leviathan having been far greater than our most sanguine expectations, we have been unable to supply one half the orders which have been received. There is this inducement for the sending in of early orders: those who are the first to order will be the first to receive their papers.

The New Quarto volume having just commenced—two numbers only having been issued—the present is the best time for those who prefer the paper in this shape to commence their subscriptions. The New World, during the present year, will contain more than its usual abundance of new and stirring articles; comprising romances, dramas, periodical papers selected from the best sources at home and abroad, as well as original articles by the most approved native authors.

As the Leviathan New World will be an EXTRA from the regular edition, it will be sold to subscribers and non-subscribers at $3 per hundred copies; ten copies for $1, or 12 1-2 cents single.

GREAT FRESHETS.

The great quantity of rain which fell during the last week and the sudden melting of the snow have caused an immense destruction of property by freshets in various parts of the country. The following particulars of the damage sustained from the flood on the Croton, in Westchester county, w copy from the Journal of Commerce, of last Friday :

From the Journal of Commerce of Friday.
We understand that letters were received in town last evening by the Water Commissioners, stating that about one half of the Croton Dam was carried away by the freshet, which has been unprecedented, and that the several mills below the dam have been also carried away, as has been the new bridge crossing the river above the dam, also erected by the Water Commissioners. We further understand that the three bridges below the dam, one of which is crossed by the New York and Albany post road, are destroyed.

Several dwelling houses, both below and above the dam have been carried away, and we regret to understand that three lives have been lost. The flood came so rapidly, and in the night, that persons escaped from their dwellings in their night-clothes, and got into trees for security.

The storm which caused this extraordinary rise in the Croton river, commenced on Tuesday evening, and continued without cessation from that time until Thursday night at 12 o'clock.

The ground at the commencement was covered with snow about 18 inches thick, which being all carried off with the rain, caused this unprecedented rise of water, higher, it is said, than it is remembered to have been by the oldest inhabitants.

The mason work of the dam remains uninjured ; but the earth embankment, with the heavy stone protection wall of twenty feet thickness at its base, is all carried away. The water entered the aqueduct discharging at a waste weir at Sing Sing, without damage to the aqueduct, but the loss at the dam and new bridge is a serious one to the city.

This work has been upwards of two years in its construction, and was all but completed last autumn.

A gentleman from New Haven informs us that the ice in the Connecticut and Housatonic rivers, for some distance from their mouths, is broken up. The snow has entirely disappeared.

From the Philadelphia Gazette.

The great quantity of rain that has fallen during the last few days, and consequent breaking up of the ice, has caused quite a freshet in the Schuylkill. The ice began to break up below on Wednesday, and commenced coming down yesterday at noon. At 10 o'clock last night, the wharves were overflowed, and the cellars of the warehouses both above and below the Permanent Bridge, filled. The water continued to rise till four o'clock this morning, when it was five or six feet above high tide. A considerable fall has since taken place.

Pottsville, Pa., Jan. 9.

GREAT FRESHET.—The great fall of rain on Wednesday and Thursday last, and the consequent melting of the snow on our mountains, which has almost entirely disappeared, has caused one of the greatest freshets known in this section of country since 1810, when the water was probably a few ins. higher than it was on Thursday night. The destruction of property has been considerable by the filling up of cellars, &c., in this Borough, which in some instances was so sudden that the merchants had not time to remove their goods. Our friends in Coal street had their communication with the rest of the town completely cut off by the water in Norwegian, which completely inundated nearly all the houses bordering on the stream. Part of the embankment of the Greenwood Canal has been swept away below the aqueduct, and the houses on the island were all completely surrounded with water. The families from some were carried out when the water was middle deep.

The Schuylkill bridge below this borough is so much injured that it is considered dangerous to pass over it.

The Railroads in this region are all more or less injured by the destruction of Bridges, undermining, &c. &c.

The town of Port Carbon was completely inundated—the water reached up almost as far as the Bank ; but two bridges are left standing.

Mr. John Pott's dam, at his iron works, on the West Branch, has been swept away, and his works considerably injured.

At Schuylkill Haven, the damage has also been very great. Several of the coal wharves have been washed away, and the balance filled up. Mr. Louis Dougherty, we learn, lost several rail road wagons. The coal has also disappeared from the wharves.

The Tumbling Run Dam narrowly escaped from being carried away—the water had made a passage inside the wing wall of the waste-way—fortunately it was discovered in time—otherwise the dam would have been swept away, and Mount Carbon would have suffered severely.

The destruction of boats has been very great, and the whole course of the streams in this neighborhood presented a frightful appearance yesterday. Fortunately no lives were lost as far as we can learn—but there have been some narrow escapes. If the damage to property is as great in proportion on the whole line of the Schuylkill, as it has been at this place, the loss will be immense.

From the Pennsylvanian.
ALLENTOWN, (Pa.) Jan. 2.

About one o'clock, last night, the new and beautiful bridge recently erected over the Lehigh at this place, though standing on piers some fifteen or twenty feet above the usual water mark, was swept down the stream. The store houses on the wharves were covered with water to the second story, and it is feared, as the flood subsides, that they will fall. One new brick storehouse belonging to the Lehigh Transportation Company, stands, as it were, in the middle of the river, and has been much damaged by the ice. It is impossible to estimate the loss along the Lehigh. Two bridges at least, above us, are injured, if not destroyed.

About midnight a family who lives in a house above the Company's dam, which was and is still in the middle of the torrent, were removed in boats, having attracted the attention of the spectators by firing several musket shots from an upper window. It was a bold undertaking, for the current was strong, and the surface of the water covered with timber and ice.

EASTON, Pa., Jan. 8, 1841.

To the Editors of the Pennsylvanian :

GENTLEMEN: This place has been visited with one of the most ruinous and disastrous freshets that has ever occurred in this region. The thaw has raised the water to a height never before known since the country was settled. The Delaware and Lehigh rose to about thirty-five feet above low water mark, and the destruction thereby occasioned is terrible indeed. The bridges over the Lehigh at this place, at Freemansburg, at Bethlehem, at Allentown, at Brerys and at Singfried have all been swept away. The splendid bridge on the Delaware at Rugselsville, eight miles below this place, built two years since, the piers of which were thirty feet above low water, has also been swept away. Dwelling houses, barns, stables, canal boats, store houses, &c., &c., have been boated off and destroyed, and some lives lost. Last night, Elam Lowrey, who keeps the grand lock at Coleman's dam, three miles above this place, together with his son were on the abutment of the dam at that place, when it gave way and they were precipitated into the river. The son is believed to be drowned. Mr. Lowrey got hold of a log and floated down to this place, when he was taken off by Mr. John Beam, an intrepid citizen of our borough, in a batteau, at the risk of his life. He deserves to be immortalized for the heroic act. No one except an eye-witness can realize the irresistible force and destructive character of the flood.

The canal basin is cut out. The canal itself overflowed for miles and it is feared that all the aqueducts and culverts for many miles down the river on the canal are gone. It would require prompt and immediate action to get the canal in navigable order by June or July.

From the Newark Daily Advertiser of Saturday evening.

Four of the six bridges over the Passaic river, were entirely swept away yesterday, viz: the bridge at Weazel, near Paterson, the Acquackonk and Belleville bridges, and the old Newark bridge, belonging to the Passaic and Hackensack Bridge Company, being the only communication with the Turpike or old Causeway to Jersey City. This bridge has been recently rebuilt at the expense of $10,000, and the whole edifice was carried away by the flood and ice, which came down the river and with fearful force about half past 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The railroad bridge, a few hundred yards further south, withstood the freshet firmly, and is we believe uninjured. The Paterson Railroad bridge, we are happy to learn, also stands firm, and these are now the only bridges left over the Passaic. The bridge at Belleville was a corporation, or toll bridge, and the others were county bridges, belonging to Bergen and Passaic counties.

From the Reading Gazette.

GREAT AND DESTRUCTIVE FRESHET.—We have been visited by another freshet more alarming and calamitous than any that has occurred within the recollection of our oldest inhabitants. We have had for several days past continued rains, which, together with the heavy snows before lying on the ground, swelled the course of the numerous mountain rills by which our river is fed. Our citizens residing on the banks, and near the course of the river, were early advised of their danger, and doubtless many perished by their preparations to avoid it.

On the morning of Thursday the river lay placid, coated by a thick bed of ice. To look over its smooth surface, and to wonder that no rise was yet perceptible, was the first thought of each one. It lay calm as wind and weather before a hurricane. In the afternoon, as if despising its narrow bed, it commenced rising; toward night it came increasing, sweeping and rushing in its mad career, and threatening to carry all before it. About two hours past midnight it was at its maximum height, from 15 to 20 feet above low water mark! Thus it remained until 7 o'clock.

Houses, boats, sheds, bridges, lumber, fragments of timber, &c. &c., were carried along in its course, and the destruction of property must be immense, and fall severely on many. The lower part of the town was completely inundated. Boats plied from house to house to rescue the inmates, who, although loth to leave their dwellings, were induced from considerations of personal safety to abandon their little all to the angry and impetuous spirit of the flood.

FRESHET.—The thaw which commenced on Wednesday last, after several days of the severest cold weather known for many years, has taken off most of the great body of snow which was upon the ground, and of consequence produced a sudden flood in our streams and rivers which has done considerable damage to property of various kinds. At Derby, the confluence of the Naugatuc and Housatonic, the water was higher than has been known before for many years, the rise being 18 feet. The bridges there withstood the shock, but several hundred dollars worth of ship timber, with quantities of wood and lumber, were carried off. In several of the adjacent towns more or less damage was done to dams, roads and bridges. In Hamden four small bridges were removed, and the roads were impeded by the flood.

A PERILOUS ADVENTURE.—The freshet has caused a number of serious accidents; but the most interesting one which we have heard of, occurred at Norristown. The circumstances are as follows:—A fine new canal boat drifted from some place above Norristown, and struck the shore just above the town. Seven men boarded her, with the intention of taking her to a place of greater safety, and therefore commenced pushing her off from the shore with poles; but no sooner was she free from the land, than the current swept her rapidly down the stream. A long rope which was on board was thrown out to some men on the shore, who caught it, and made it fast around the trunk of a tree; but it was parted in an instant, and the boat drifted swiftly down the stream towards the bridge, under which the water was running to within six inches of the floor. Two men who were near the bridge saw the boat coming down, and hearing the cries of the men, ran swiftly round to the bridge, and succeeded in removing several weather boards from the side before the boat reached it. The boat came down bow foremost, and struck with much violence against the bridge, directly opposite one of the openings which had been made, and heeled slowly round, giving time to the men to leap through the opening. A moment after they had got safely out, the boat sunk under the bridge, and came out on the other side completely broken in half. Had not the two persons last named removed the boards from the side of the bridge, there is no doubt that the whole seven men would have been killed.—[Phil. U. S. Gazette.

A NARROW ESCAPE.—Among the incidents of the late freshet in the Delaware, one is the narrow escape of Mr. George Fell, of Centreville, above New Hope. He was standing on the bridge at that place, looking at the turbulent waters, when crash went the bridge and he along with it, and dashing down the current on one of its timbers, he was carried under and past New Hope bridge, and was not extricated from his perilous situation until he reached Yardleyville a distance of 16 miles from where he started. A few minutes afterwards the New Hope bridge itself was cut in two, the Centreville bridge going clear through it, carrying away three arches and two abutments.

THOMAS CRANMER.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS CRANMER, by the Author of 'Three Experiments of Living,' 'Life and Times of Martin Luther,' &c. Boston: Hilliard, Gray & Co. 1 vol. 12mo. pp. 377.

We have read this volume through at a sitting. It has afforded us unqualified gratification. The task of the new historian was to throw a graceful drapery around certain familiar forms of an important era; and her success has been commensurate with the felicity of the idea. Her style is very alluring; it is sufficiently chaste to satisfy the most fastidious; though simple, it is never childish, and it often rises into a vigorous freedom of expression, rare in the writings of a female. Such works as this fall like invigorating ains, on the arid pathway of editorial toil, and we feel a sentiment of gratitude as they freshen and revive our minds, worn and weary even to exhaustion with the "never-ending, still beginning" labors of the pen.

Though hearing much of the "Three Experiments of Living," and somewhat of the "Life and Times of Martin Luther," we have been so fortunate as not to read either of those books—we say fortunate, because we now feel well assured of a lively pleasure in reserve. We are indebted for the "Life and Times of Thomas Cranmer," to the authoress, Mrs. George Lee, of Boston; we thank her for such kind consideration the more heartily, because, judging from the past, we never should have received a copy from her publishers. The booksellers of "the Literary Emporium" seem to cherish an unaccountable dislike to any broad dissemination of their publications; they prefer to confine them to Boston and its vicinity, or to their own shelves, there to moulder in dusty obscurity. New-York critics are seldom allowed to bask in the mental effulgence which is said to be poured all bountifully from the fountains of New England genius. It becomes us, however, in this place, to record the remarkable fact, that one of the editors of the Courier and Enquirer was favored with the last number of the North American Review—a piece of remarkable liberality which should secure to the publishers such commendation as we can give them, were we not, unluckily, ignorant of their names.

To return to the book before us—we have, while delightfully perusing its white and fairly-printed pages, noticed so many passages for extract, that we are quite at a loss to choose among them all. Let us take the first propagation of the Bible in England.

The Holy Scriptures were translated into our mother-tongue by Coverdale and Tyndal, and published under the auspices of Archbishop Cranmer.

"The Bible was distributed in every direction, and one was chained to the desk of each of the parochial churches. The zeal with which it was read and sought after was surprising. Assemblies of mechanics and laborers collected to listen. Youth and age discovered equal eagerness. Often the motley group were seen seated on the green sward around the lecturer; for not only Bibles were rare, but readers too. There might be seen the old man bending forward, with his grey locks, and his aged partner in her snowy kerchief, with decent cuff thrown back, lest a word should fall unheeded on the dull ear of age. In groups behind, sat youths and maidens, their little interests and mutual sympathies suspended, with lips unclosed and eager eyes fixed on the reader, who usually chanted forth the words of Scripture, and sometimes quickened their attention by involuntary stops at strange names, or unfamiliar words. Nor must childhood be left out of the group. Infants in their mothers' arms, and children too young to remain behind, the solitary tenants of the cottage—thoughtless little beings who listen for a few moments, and then sleep or play.

"Often, too, when the services of the Sabbath were over, which were prolonged till sunset, a group collected to hear the Bible read in the grave-yard, seating themselves on the mossy stones, or the new mounds covered with fresh springing grass. Desolate mourners were there, the widowed partner, the bereaved mother who had buried her last hope, and the orphan thrown on the wide world. Oh! what to them must have been the joy, as they listened! 'I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.' And is this book so changed, that we now read and hear it 'as a tale that is told'! Must we have novelty to stimulate us? or are its precepts and its promises so familiar to us, that they no longer come like "tidings of great joy"?

Various attempts were made to prejudice King Henry against his favorite Counsellor and the primate of England. As an issue to a conspiracy—which was set on foot by many noble Lords, and which they exultingly deemed to have been effective in the ruin of the great and good man, against whom till now many machinations had been vainly directed—we have a scene full of dramatic interest.

"It was eleven at night before the King determined in what manner to act. He then despatched Sir Anthony Denny to Lambeth with an order that Cranmer should instantly attend him at Westminster.

"He arrived late at night at Lambeth, and found the inhabitants of the palace buried in sleep. The habits of the Archbishop were uniform, and the hour of retirement early, both for himself and his household. Such an unusual summons must have filled him with surprise. He arose from his bed and repaired to the King, whom he found traversing the gallery in great apparent agitation.

"You have come," said his Majesty, "to hear serious charges against yourself, alleged by the Council. They demand that you shall be committed to the Tower, and I have acceded to their request."

"As it pleaseth your Majesty," said Cranmer; "I am in all respects willing to be committed to the Tower, only humbly entreating that I may be permitted to face my accusers, and defend myself against them."

"O Lord God!" said Henry, bursting forth with an impetuosity he was unable to restrain, "what simplicity is yours, to submit to an imprisonment that must end in your ruin! Do you not know, that, no sooner shall you be in the Tower, false knaves will instantly come forward to arraign you, who, if you were at liberty, would not dare to show their faces? No, no; not so, my Lord Canterbury. Go you to the Council to-morrow, and when you appear before them, demand to be confronted with your accusers. Should there be a moment's hesitation, produce this ring; the sight of it will instantly bring the matter before me."

With a mind harrassed by anxiety, and the consciousness of enemies ready to spring upon him, the Archbishop, after a sleepless night, at eight o'clock was in attendance upon the Council.

The men who had solicited his imprisonment, were sitting in divan discussing the articles of his impeachment. When told he was in waiting, there was a luxury in humiliating the Primate that added to the expected triumph. "Let him wait our leisure," was the universal sentiment.

The Archbishop found himself in the anti-room, surrounded by lackeys and serving-men, waiting the orders of their masters. It was a spectacle worth looking at for its novelty, and many a one stopped to gaze upon the Primate as he passed. There was one, however, that did not look upon him with sentiments of triumph or of pity, but with indignation. This was Doctor Butts, the King's physician, who was on his morning errand to his majesty. When he entered the royal apartment he said "I have seen so strange a sight this morning, that I think it worth mentioning to your Majesty."

"What is it?" inquired the King.

"The first man in England is become a serving man, and has been standing for an hour among his fellow-lackeys at the door of the Council-chamber."

"Ha! is it so?" exclaimed Henry; "the varlets! they shall hear of it before long."

"Still, however, Henry remained quiet, to the surprise of Dr. Butts.

"In the mean time, Cranmer waited till he was summoned to the Council-chamber. The complaint was made in rude terms. He listened with meekness, and required that his accusers might be called into his presence and confronted with him. The just request was made in vain. "No, my Lord," was the reply; "we have liberty to commit you immediately to the Tower; then, justify yourself yourself if you can."

Cranmer, finding his request unheeded, drew from his bosom a ring and handed it to them.

"It was the King's! The august assembly were thrown into the greatest agitation, while Lord Russell exclaimed; 'Said I not true, my Lords, that the King would never endure that my Lord of Canterbury should be impeached and disgraced for less than high treason?'

"The matter was now immediately before the King. 'I thought,' said Henry, 'that I had a discreet Council. But what am I to say now? Is my Lord of Canterbury a slave, that you should keep him at the door of your chamber like a serving-man? What would you say if an indignity like this were offered to any of you? I fully believe that the realm of England contains not a more faithful subject than I have ever found in my Lord of Canterbury, and he that pretends attachment to me, must show respect and honor to him.'

"It was in vain they apologized and explained. The wrath of Henry was not easily appeased. They assured the King, that they only wished the Archbishop committed to the Tower that he might come forth from his confinement with augmented reputation and glory.

"Is it even so?" said Henry, sarcastically. 'Think ye that I do not see the malice of your motives, that which sets you one against another? that I do not discern how the world geeth among ye? I counsel you, let this be avoided out of hand, and never again let my friends receive such usage as this at your hands.'

"With these words he left them. The scene that followed was too disgusting to describe—an exhibition of the low propensities of human nature. The men who had hoped to bring Cranmer to the scaffold, now crowded round him, congratulating him 'on having such convincing testimonies of his innocence, and besought him to harbor no enmity towards them.' The placable Archbishop accepted their apologies, and the King, who was well satisfied with his own exhibition of power, and the success of the little farce he had planned, desired the primate to invite them to dine at Lambeth palace."

When the life of Henry the Eighth was drawing to its close, his peculiar views became the bane of the innocent. He was more than ever revengeful and suspicious. It was reported that a certain nobleman aspired to the hand of the imperious Princess, Mary. There is a whole tragedy in the following spirited and affecting episode:

"At length his suspicions found a point on which to rest. The Earl of Surry, son of the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Treasurer of England, was a young man of great wit and learning; his manners were refined and graceful, his deportment noble and commanding. He had passed much of his time on the continent, and acquired a degree of gallantry in his deportment towards woman, that was scarcely understood in England. A lover of the fine arts, accomplished in the literature of the day, and adept in music, and performing himself with the grace of an amateur and the decision of an artist, he became the "glass of fashion" to the young. At every masque and tournament he was the hero. His lance and his pen were equally successful. His romantic gallantry flowed in madrigals and sonnets, and he stood forth one of the troubadours of the earlier ages. When Boulogne was taken by Henry, the young Earl, then scarcely at the age of manhood, was left Governor of the place. Led away by the impetuosity and bravery of his natural temperament, he ventured upon some rencounters with the French, which proved unsuccessful, and the King sent over Hertford to command in his place, ordering Surry to resign.

The young man did not take this affront meekly, and, when Hertford offered him his daughter in marriage, waved the proposal. He had already selected the lady of his love, and the manner of negotiating an alliance, even if his heart had been disengaged, was wholly opposed to his chivalrous feelings. He returned to the English court, and was even so imprudent as to utter his indignation aloud at what he conceived to be unjust treatment. When there, he laid aside the pomp of arms, and threw open his house to people of rank and distinguished foreigners. Among these were Italians, a nation hateful to the King, and constantly the object of his suspicions. He always believed them to be in concert with his ancient enemy, Cardinal Pole, and employed as spies. Another evil under which Surry labored, arose from his relationship to Catherine Howard, which operated as a secret cause of disgust to the King.

The Earl was wholly unapprized of these existing prejudices against him, and bore himself with a nobility of demeanor that was reported to the King by his enemies.—Henry was now confined to his room, irascible and overbearing; all the evil passions of nature forming his torment and punishment. The echoes which occasionally met his ear, of the elegance, accomplishments, and deportment of Surry, were operating like poison upon his mind, and he conceived, or pretended to entertain, the absurd suspicion that the Earl inspired to the hand of the Princess Mary, and meant to dispute the succession of Edward to the crown, and secure it to himself.

While these things were brewing in the King's mind, and adding to the torture of severe bodily disease, the unconscious Surry was preparing a splendid entertainment in honor of the Princess Mary. All the decorations of taste and art were collected, and it was more than suspected, that the professed object of the fete had signified her willingness that it should be given. Never had the rigid muscles of Mary's face more benignantly relaxed than on this occasion. Surry was not waiting in any of the attentions of a preux chevalier; he danced, he sang, and knelt to the Princess, but his eye perpetually wandered to one light and graceful form in the distant group. When their eyes met, it was observed by Pasquil, his Italian jester, that "his hand moved to his heart." This was the true object of his affection; and well she deserved it. With a natural love for all that was beautiful and cultivated, she had singled out Surry from her troop of admirers, and caught the inspiration of his genius. Never were two hearts more in unison, and a long life of similar pursuits, of elegant literature, and of domestic and conjugal faith, rose in perspective.

"The next morning, by order of the King, the Earl was arraigned for high treason. His trial took place in Guildhall, in London, before the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Mayor, and other commissioners. The chief accusation against him was assuming the arms of Edward the Confessor. He fully proved that these were justified by the sacration of the King's heralds.

"Mr. Richard Southwell was confronted with him, and charged him with having uttered disloyal words. Surry denied them, and desired to be admitted to fight him, according to martial law. This was not permitted. He defended himself with a keen wit and undaunted spirit, often confounding his adversaries. At length a witness was brought against him, who deposed, that, in reply to an observation of Surry's, he had said at the time 'My Lord, this is high treason.'"

"The Earl folded his arms, and looking at him with ineffable contempt, replied, 'I leave it to the jury to decide, whether the Earl of Surry would suffer this man to speak such words to him, without felling him to the earth.'"

"He uniformly pleaded not guilty, and his eye never for a moment lost its undaunted courage. The jury (a common inquest, not of Peers,) condemned him, judgement of death was given, and he was conveyed to the Tower. When he arrived there, he found that his father, the Duke of Norfolk, had been also committed on the charge of high treason.

"The evening preceding the execution of Surry, a young page was admitted to his cell by the keeper, on condition that the interview should last but fifteen minutes, and himself be present. It mattered not to the parties who was there; it was one long, one last embrace. The same spirit animated both; a spirit of undying constancy and truth. The last words they uttered when they parted were, 'For a moment of suffering on earth, an eternity of happiness in heaven.'"

"The next day, in the grey twilight of the morning, the elegant, the accomplished, the envied Earl of Surry, was beheaded on Tower-hill."

The story of the young King Edward, "the good, the gentle and the beautiful—the child of light and genius," who perished

"Like some frail exhalation, which the dawn Robes in its golden hues;"

and who, in contrast with his wicked father, illustrated the lines of Wordsworth:

"The good die first,
But they whose hearts are dry as summer's dust
Burn to the socket."

his story is throughout pathetically told. In contemplating it, we confess indeed

"Whom the Gods love die young"

Read this account of his character, when a mere child.

"The day on which Hertford was appointed Protector, Edward was informed of it in presence of the Council, and that it was done by unanimous agreement. He pulled off his cap, and bowing gracefully round, said, 'We heartily thank you my Lords, all; and hereafter, in all that ye shall have to do with us for any suit or causes, ye shall be heartily welcome.'"

"The dignity, yet sweetness of his deportment, in a boy not quite ten, astonished every one. He spoke and conducted himself with perfect self-possession, not that which arises from an over-weening sense of power, but from a mind fully conscious of the high office he was called to fill, and so absorbed in the sense of duty and responsibility as to forget himself. Yet there were times, when the light-hearted and innocent gaiety of a child animated his boyish sports, when tops and marbles, hoops and balls, succeeded his hours of serious study. Then was his clear, musical voice, heard in the shout and laugh, that make the welkin ring. Then his light, agile form was first in those exercises that required activity of purpose, rather than animal strength and vigor. In these last, he early gave indications of debility, and often, after having won the prize for feats of activity, he would seat himself, panting and exhausted, at the foot of a tree, throw off his cap, and, while his curls clustered round his damp forehead, and his face was pale (for, alas, there was none of the animated glow of health,) from exhaustion, he would take his Virgil from his pocket, and replenish his mind while his frame was recruiting its powers.

"Among his companions, royalty was forgotten. They were fellow associates and equals. Nor would he permit any privilege to be given to himself which they did not share. Yet there was that in his deportment which restrained rudeness or riot. If his companions forgot themselves, he silently withdrew to a distance, and they felt at once that the spirit of love and purity was gone. The deference they paid to him was voluntary; it was not given to the Prince, to the heir of Henry the Eighth, but to Edward, the royal and rightful inheritor of the virtues of Jane Seymour, on whom seemed to have descended her sweetness and refinement. With her early death, Edward had naturally connected those tender and melancholy associations, that in such cases sometimes occur to a peculiarly sensitive and feeling child. She had died in giving birth to him, and he had an indefinite sense of responsibility resting upon him, that, as far as was possible, he was to make her place good, and keep alive her virtues. All that she numbered of her poor, he made his; and his pocket-money was often expended in deeds of benevolence.

"The discrimination of his mind between acting and feeling was very remarkable; he early comprehended that good thoughts and resolutions were only valuable as they produced active results. On this account he was reserved as to his own emotions. They did not flow out spontaneously, as we usually see in childhood, and often in riper years. They were seeds that sprung up, and brought forth fruits. Had his disposition been less gentle and kind, this reserve might have been mistaken for pride or coolness. But his life was filled with good deeds, and no one could mistake any little peculiarities of manner. The questions which Cardan tells us he asked him in his fifteenth year, will give an idea of the philosophical turn of his mind. We are to remember that he was then a monarch, surrounded with regal splendor. How meekly he sat upon the throne, and how quietly he wore the crown, proves that he prized it lightly, when compared with the immortal one he sought to win."

After the execution of the famous protector Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, father of Dudley, the husband of the unhappy Lady Jane Grey, acquired a power over the young King's person, which separated him from the communion of his friends and harassed his tender spirit. The star of his sweet life was near its extinguishment.

"But a more invincible enemy than Northumberland was attacking the vital powers of Edward. Of this there were fearful indications in the almost supernatural brightness of his eye, the hectic of his cheek, and his short and rapid manner of breathing. Yet at times he seemed to cast off all debility, and his spirit, lightened of its load, gave deceptive promise of health. Sometimes the princely boy would spring from his couch, and gaze on his fair realm around him with a sanguine feeling, that he should yet live to govern it.

"And could there not be found one in all his wide domain to rescue its youthful monarch from an early grave? Where were the united claims of Lancaster and York? Where the nobles of the land? The Parliament, too, who found it so easy to sign a warrant of death, could they not sign one of life? Of all the flatterers, who had surrounded him, and who cried 'God save the King!' was there none to avert the blow? Seymour and Somerset had contended for his favor, and, ere the struggle was ended, had trod the dark valley of death. Northumberland was now bowing the knee, and successfully excluded from the royal presence all rivals. But there was one enemy more powerful, more vigilant than the Earl; one, whose icy hand was outstretched, and who laughed so scorn all human efforts. To him the bribes of countless wealth were nothing. Slowly and noiselessly he came, but not to stealthily as to deceive Edward. He saw his approach with an undaunted eye, for he knew that death could only open the portals to immortal life; and, beyond, he beheld 'flowery vales and dewy meads,' inviting his 'fainting steps.'"

More, many more passages, as acceptable to the appreciative reader, as the foregoing, might be presented; but surely those, which we have quoted, are enough to show that this is a book, from which a pure mind cannot fail to derive much profit and delight.

PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF LAFITTE.

BY JAMES REES.

[Concluded]

CHAP. VIII. . . . Some account of Bridges—Legends attached thereto—Appearance of the four Travellers spoken of by Bobby—The Attack—The Result.

All bridges—we make no exceptions—are more or less the resort of fairies, elves, witches, hobgoblins, sprites, spirits, &c. &c. They are better calculated for these phantom ladies and gentlemen to play their freaks in and about, than the more gloomy recesses of a forest, or the ruins of some old antiquated castle, where, in "by-gone days," some horrid deed was committed. On a moonlight night, when stars are struggling through the silver mist, and vainly trying to eclipse the queen of half the world, a rustic bridge bending its solid form over a rivulet or meandering stream, winding its way through a rich and fertile country, presents to the eye a scene more grand and picturesque, more poetic—or, at least, more romantic—than the high turreted castle, in the most superstitious country in the world; and when we ask why it is so? the answer is to be found in the thousand and one legends which are treasured up by the old, and narrated by the young. Beneath the arches of some lone, out of the way bridge, fairies, it is said, hold their nightly revels, witches and sprites their midnight orgies, and robbers select the bridge for their deeds of blood and plunder. Even the plain simply-constructed bridge (I do not mean the new one) over a little stream of water which empties itself into the Cumberland river, a short distance below Nashville, Tenn., is not exempt from this popular superstition.

Cumberland river, one of the largest in Kentucky, takes its rise from the Cumberland mountains, and interlocks with the head waters of Clinch and Kentucky rivers, and thence flowing through the State, westwardly, more than two hundred miles, it enters the State of Tennessee, and, after meandering one hundred and twenty miles, reaches Nashville nearly in latitude 35 N. From thence, flowing N. W. one hundred and twenty miles, it joins the Ohio, nearly opposite Dog Island, once the hiding place of the celebrated Meason. As I observed, the bridge is not, or rather was not, exempt from the wild legends of robbers, and ghosts, and of strange sights which were seen there at divers times. These stories, however, go further back than the present generation can well remember, or they can remember only such portions as were gleaned from the nursery, that school wherein superstition builds its power, so that the combined efforts of Common Sense and Religion cannot pull it down. It may be said that these relations of the wild and wonderful, originated from a morbid state of feeling, actuated by fear. It may be: but their frequent repetition established the belief in the minds of the people beyond the possibility of a doubt. Old Ben Wilson, well known to the old settlers of the "Far West," swears, to this day, that he saw numerous black and white dogs emerging from the eastern side of this bridge. Wild, and as he says, "anathematically" announced their departure, and hideous screams welcomed their return! He also swears—Ben will swear—that on one occasion he saw a beautiful young lady sitting on a large stone immediately in the centre of the bridge, who, at his approach, suddenly disappeared. The huge stone next morning was not to be seen! Horses, in passing over the sandy hill at a late hour of night, stopped suddenly in their career, and when the alarmed traveler looked down to ascertain the cause, a huge snake was discovered twining itself around the animal's feet, and holding him immovable. Many have remained standing in this position, with the monster hissing up his venom in their very faces, until day-break, when the snake unwound himself, and left the traveler to pursue his journey unmolested. Ben, the chronicler of these, the "wild and wonderful," further swears, that whole troops of headless men, women, and children, were frequently seen dancing in the green meadows, and, if molested, would seek shelter under the bridge! I myself remember a young man, who in after years lived near the lime-kilns in the upper country, and who having drank very freely at old Sam Walker's tavern, was, as he stated, tempted to join this unnatural band of dancers. He was never known to smile or drink a drop afterwards. His wife says to this day it was a spiritual blessing. . . . We might write a volume upon this subject, but here we stop for the present.

Over this bridge, on a beautiful evening in the month of August, four horsemen were seen to pass. On the opposite side they stopped for a moment to gaze upon the beauty of the scenery. It was truly a pleasing sight. The rays of the setting sun yet lingered on the water, and tinted with golden hues the mountain tops. The murmur of insects became louder as the day-wind went down with the sun. All nature looked as pure as the limpid stream that gurgled from a rock, and mingled its chrystal waters with those of the dark Cumberland.

"Look yonder, Smith," exclaimed one of the company, "is not that a fitting subject for the pencil of an artist?"

"Indeed it is, and one that I will not pass without taking a sketch." In an instant the artist, for such indeed he was, was at work.

"It lacks but a company of brigands to render it an Italian scene," observed a third.

"It is said," remarked the fourth, "that the wildest and most beautiful parts of Italy are the haunts of banditti; and yet it is not strange that we should associate with the Italian brigands deeds of heroism and romance? The robbers of all other countries have no interest for us, unless it be those of Germany, and they only exist in the many old legends which have been translated, as it were, for our special wonder."

"True," observed the painter—"novelists have done much for the Italian brigands, and one of our own writers has thrown around them a degree of interest which is only excelled by the beauty and elegance of his style of narration: I allude to Washington Irving—his, indeed, is a gifted pen. But look yonder! what can be more beautiful? That form lacks but the human form to render it second only to the Paræ—Ha! what do I see?"

"What do you see, Smith?" was the general exclamation.

"By heavens, gentlemen, I saw glaring at me through the underbrush a pair of as rascally-looking eyes as the most fastidious Lavater would wish to study from."

"It must be a panther: they abound hereabout."

"No, gentlemen—they were those of a boy that I saw."

"Nonsense."

"There, I see his head: it is like a bunch of carrots."

"It is a fox, Smith. Stand back—I'll fire."

"Hold, for heaven's sake! There, I see a man—we are among banditti!"

And so they were. In a moment the spot where the boy was first seen was covered with armed men.

"Silence, men—not a word—not a motion—leave this business to me. Stand close."

They obeyed, while their Captain walked leisurely down the hill. When he came within hearing distance, the eldest of the four travellers commanded him to stop. There was in the sound of his voice a something that carried awe along with it. To Lafitte it was not fearful, but it emanated from one his equal in courage and daring.

"Stop, I say, or by the Eternal! you die," and the pistol was on a dead level with the robber's breast.

Lafitte spoke—"With me, gentlemen, it is needless to contend: I am surrounded by men who know not what danger is, men of the most reckless daring—men, if you please, of crime. So yield, sirs, without hesitation."

"Trifler!" exclaimed he who had now assumed a degree of command over his companions, "do you think that I am to be intimidated by Lafitte—the successful pirate and robber? out of my path, or I'll crush you," and he dashed his horse toward the spot where Lafitte stood for the purpose of taking a route leading around the base of the mountain, and in a direction from the spot where stood the giant figures of the robbers. His three companions followed. Lafitte darted to the centre of the road, gave a shrill whistle and—the next moment lay bleeding on the ground. The unerring aim of the stranger took him, as the sailors say, between "wind and water." A dozen rifles blazed forth their fiery contents, but without effect, and the four travellers were seen in the far distance leaning over the necks of their horses, which were going at a rate that defied pursuit.

The band gathered around their fallen leader: he was wounded severely. "Stop the pursuit, Brown: had I known the man at first I would have acted differently."

"Who are they? to whom do you allude?"

"His name is—raise me up, gently, gently, boys—his name is—easy, boys, I am badly hurt—his aim is deadly—that man—the one I mean who fired at me, was GENERAL ANDREW JACKSON."

There was a dead pause—every eye fell to the ground, and Lafitte was carried on the shoulders of four of his men into an inner room of the cave.

CHAP. IX. . . . Sick bed—Love and treason—Hatching mischief—Bobby's usefulness—The last scene—The drop curtain to these passages.

Lafitte lay on a bed in a chamber of the cave, suffering almost the agonies of death. The wound was a severe one, and added to mental suffering, it rendered his situation truly distressing. Where was Rebecca, the Jewess? Did her presence cheer the sick man's spirits? Did her smile lull the pain, or her delicate fingers dress and solace his wounds? No! there was a mystery about her—a change had come over her reality of life; her actions appeared to Lafitte of the most extraordinary nature. She seldom visited him, and when she did, it was with a sullen air, and reluctant step. Still, was Lafitte kind to her; and for this kindness she became still more mysterious in her conduct toward him. The business of robbing went on as usual; a man by the name of Brown acted as Captain. Brown was a much younger man than Lafitte, tall and athletic; and in his youth had received a liberal education. Brown committed a forgery to show his knack in the free use of the pen—before he was one-and-twenty, killed his particular friend in a duel—before he was twenty-two, assassinated a man in Girod street, New Orleans, and performed numerous other acts which, if he had lived in any other country except this, would have raised him to a considerable eminence in the eyes of the law. Brown was a base villain: he had not a redeeming trait. Lafitte knew this, but such were the men to suit his purposes, while he was able to command them, but not when he lay on a sick bed. It is said that honor exists among thieves; so it does, but it is that kind of honor which lives only in the atmosphere of fear and dread; for, now that the chief was unable to govern, there was not a man but would have slit his windpipe for the sake of his gold, and the prospect his death would hold out of getting command.

Brown and Rebecca were seen together frequently; their conferences were long, and seemingly interesting; there were also, mysterious whisperings among the crew. All this did not escape the lynx eye of Lafitte; he looked upon Rebecca as one, to use the words of old Solomon, already "doomed." If he was apparently asleep to this evident infidelity on her part—or careless as regarded the subject upon which they seem to dwell in earnest and sometimes loud conversation—there was one who watched them with more interest and exercised a cunning in his vocation which would have done honor to the wildest politician of the age. This spy on the actions of Rebecca and her paramour was "Red-headed Bob."

Night had drawn its curtains close around the earth—the lamps of heaven had gone out one by one, and the great chandelier of creation had been quietly lowered down, its pale rays still lingering in the west. The wind swept over the hills, and murmured mournfully in the valleys. The waters of the Cumberland rolled away toward the Ohio, while the wolf howled through the forest, sole monarch of the American woods. Jonas lay thinking—such nights as these were calculated to harass his wounds and render him fitfully unhappy.

"Who's there? Close the door quick, Bob—it is you is it?"

"Yes sir,"—and Bob carefully secured the door. "Sir, does not this secret door lead through the rock to the top of the mountain?"

"It does, why do you ask?"

"Is the passage known to any of the men—is it known to Rebecca?"

"No—not even to her—and how you became acquainted with it, is to be explained."

"That will I—but not now—you are in danger, sir."

"I know it."

"Know it—and lay here so calm and contented?"

"I have warm friends in the band."

"No sir—no one but him who stands before you."

"Ha! say you so? Place that iron bar over the door hinges—that way, now keep me up—there, gently boy—where are my pistols—fix a pair—that's right—boy, your fortune is made, whether I die or live. Hand me pen, ink and paper—see, I sign these checks—if I fall, fill them up to the amount I have in bank—it is yours—if I live, we will enjoy it together. So! there is nothing like business."

"But, sir—why think of such things now?"

"Business, boy, before pleasure—I am glad the treachery of Brown is made manifest—equally so, that my men are ungrateful. Now tell me how you found it out: hand me that flint—there—now the powder horn. See that your pistols are in order—if they come, boy, we will be prepared. Now proceed—tell me all about it, eh, go on."

It was evident that the mind of Lafitte was wandering. So thought Bob, who, during the time Jonas was talking and fixing his pistols—was gazing upon him with lack lustre eyes, scarcely knowing what to say or do. Being called upon, however, to account for his knowledge—he spoke as follows:

"I need not tell you, Captain, how Miss Rebecca and Brown have been kissing each other all about the cave, 'fore the men and behind their backs—I need not tell you this, nor need I tell you much more of what I see'd. But this kissing I considers as nothing, for it is an innocent amusement—but when it smacks of treason and murder—"

"Murder—murder, Bob—eh?"

"Yes, sir, murder. I overheard Brown say to the men at table, that your lungs were all shot away—that you would never rise from off this 'ere bed. But you are risin' ain't you? And then he said as how you must be stabbed to the heart to put you out of pain, and make him Captain."

"The h—ll, I must!"

"And who do you suppose was to do it?"

"Brown himself?"

"No!"

"Smith?"

"No!"

"Jenkins?"

"No—none on 'em—why, Miss Rebecca!"

"It cannot be!"

"True."

"Did she consent?"

"Not then, because as how she was not there; but I followed Brown out—he sought her—they held a long conversation. I could not hear it all; but this I heard—'A cup of poison, administered by your hand.'"

"Umph!—Bob, I wish you to mix among the men; give them to understand that I cannot live;—to-morrow we will quit this place and mode of life for ever. I will seek a city, and try to live honestly, if I can. I would leave my men as they are—willing to serve under another, and that other, Brown. I will not see one of them, no not one; new leave me—but go out of the secret door, and be cautious. The horses you can have ready by early dawn."

"And Rebecca?"

"Can go to the devil."

Before the sun was up on the morning after the above conversation, Lafitte, the Pirate of the Gulf, the terror of the west, with his friend, red-headed Bob, were far away from the Robber's Cave.

In a lonely mansion, (bearing evidences of wealth about it), situated on a little rising ground, a few minutes walk from Baton Rouge, Louisiana, lay the body of a man, resembling more the picture of death, than the stern reality of expiring life. His eyes were fixed, and his once stern features relaxed, although bearing strong evidence of much mental and physical suffering. The time was December 19, 1819.

"I say, Bob, it is all up with me now."

"I am afraid so, sir. I cannot flatter you as I have for the last ten days."

"So Brown, you say, was hanged in New Orleans last week?"

"Yes, sir, as I told you—for the murder of Rebecca."

"Hush, Bob, do not mention her name; it is associated with many a dark deed committed on the high seas. Bob, listen! I know her history; know how and when old Solomon became her guardian; it is a long story; let it pass. She is gone, where—if preachers tell truth—I too must render up a fearful account. Talking of accounts, has the lawyer finished the papers?"

"All finished and recorded."

"Then, Bob, you are a wealthy man."

"Thanks to your kindness, and our industry, I am."

"Ha! ha! Bob—I cannot help laughing when I think of our pardon. We fought though, fought like men, did n't we? We are honest now in the eyes of the law. Government has pardoned us. Ha! ha! But, Bob, do you know that for years after the battle of New Orleans, I felt as if I would much rather have been at the head of a few bold spirits, and sailing under the bloody flag on the high sea. It was my element, Bob, and damn me, if I don't think I ought to be buried there. Ha! what a pang that was! Bob, I am dying. Death is doing its work here—here, Bob, hand me that glass. I cannot drink; my throat is choked up—there's another broadside from Death's battery. My eyes grow weak—Bob, your hand, I'm cold—chilly; shut that window. Hark! I hear the cry of Pirates!—up with the black flag! Ha! they prepare. No quarter, men, let no one escape to tell the tale! Clear the deck! hoist the Death's head! no quarter! Be in at the death. Ha! ha!—Here the wretched man fell back, completely exhausted; the man he called Bob raised him up—then laid him gently down."

"He is dead," were the words he uttered; and red-haired Bob gazed for the last time on the features of LAFITTE, THE PIRATE OF THE GULF.

TO MY MUSE.

Come gentle muse! thou has been absent long,
A truant from my humble home and me;
To woo thee I have left life's moving throng,
And give myself to solitude and thee.
The notes lie mute and trembling on the strings,
Nor will be won from thy restrictive charm;
Oh! hover o'er them with thy silver wings,
And into life the tuneful embryo warm.

Be still my heart—my struggling breath, Oh, hush—
My prayer is heard; sweet daughter of the skies,
I feel thy presence through thy being guah,
Brimming my soul with blissful extatics!
Broken the spell! from the unfettered mind,
Th' imprisoned melody flows swift along,
And it and honeyed harmony combined
Are fond yoke-followers in my votive song.

Lockhart's Spanish Ballads.

COUNT ALARCOS AND THE INFANTA SOLISA.

Mr. Bouterweck has analyzed this ballad, and commented upon it at some length, in his History of Spanish Literature. See Book I. Section I.

He bestows particular praise upon a passage, which the reader will find attempted in the fourth line of stanza xxii. of the following version—

"Dedes me aya este hijo amamare por despedida."

"What modern poet," says he, "would have dared to imagine that trait, at once so natural and so touching?"

Mr. Bouterweck seems to be of opinion that the story of the ballad had been taken from some prose romance of chivalry; but I have not been able to find any trace of it.

I.
Alone, as was her wont, she sat—within her bower alone—
Alone, and very desolate, Solisa made her moan,
Lamenting for her flower of life, that it should pass away,
And she be never woo'd to wife nor see a bridal day.

II.
Thus said the sad Infanta: "I will not hide my grief;
I'll tell my father of my wrong, and he will yield relief."
The King, when he beheld her near, "Alas! my child," said he, [to me.]
"What means this melancholy cheer? Reveal thy grief."

III.
"Good King," she said, "my mother was buried long ago;
She left me to thy keeping; none else my griefs shall know.
I fain would have a husband; 't is time that I should wed.
Forgive the words I utter; with mickle shame they're said."

IV.
"T was thus the King made answer: "This fault is none of mine;
You to the Prince of Hungary your ear would not incline;
Yet round us here where lives your peer? Nay, name him if you can—

Except the Count Alarcos, and he's a married man."

"Ask the Count Alarcos if of yore he did not plight
To be my husband evermore, and love me day and night?
If he has bound him in new vows, old oaths he cannot break.
Alas! I've lost a loyal spouse for a false lover's sake."

VI.
The good King sat confounded in silence for some space.
At length he made this answer, with very troubled face:
"It was not thus your mother gave counsel you should do;
You've done much wrong, my daughter; we're shamed,
both I and you."

VII.
"If it be true that you have said, our honor's lost and gone;
And while the Countess is in life, remedied for us is none.
Though justice were upon our side, ill-talkers would not spare. [ceased my care.]
Speak, daughter, for your mother's dead whose counsel

VIII.

"How can I give you counsel? but little wit have I;
But certes, Count Alarcos may make his Countess die:
Let it be noised that sickness cut short her tender life,
And then let Count Alarcos come and ask me for his wife.
What pass'd between us long ago, of that be nothing said
Thus none shall our dishonor know—in honor I shall wed."

IX.

The Count was standing with his friends; thus in the midst
he spake: [man's sake!]
"What fools we be! what pains men dree for a fair wo-
I loved a fair one long ago: though I'm a married man, Sad memory I can ne'er forego, how life and love began."

X.

While yet the Count was speaking, the good King came full near;
He made his salutation with very courteous cheer.
"Come hither, Count Alarcos, and dine with me to-day,
For I have something secret I in your ear must say."

XI.

The King came from the chapel, when he had heard the mass;
With him the Count Alarcos did to his chamber pass.
Full nobly were they served there, by pages many a one.
When all were gone and they alone, 't was thus the King began:

XII.

"What news be these, Alarcos, that you your word did plight,
To be a husband to my child, and love her day and night?
If more between you there did pass, yourself may know the truth;
But shamed is my grey head, alas! and scorn'd Solisa's youth."

XIII.

"I have a heavy word to speak: a lady fair doth lie Within my daughter's rightful place, and certes! she must die.

Let it be noised that sickness cut short her tender life,
Then come and woo my daughter, and she shall be your wife.

What pass'd between you long ago, of that be nothing said:
Thus, none shall my dishonor know; in honor you shall wed."

XIV.

Thus spake the Count Alarcos: "The truth I'll not deny;
I to the Infanta gave my troth, and broke it shamefully;
I fear'd my King would ne'er consent to give me his fair daughter; [ter.]
But, oh! spare her that's innocent; avoid that sinful laugh-

Else thou on shameful block must bend—thereof is no re-

XVII.

In sorrow he departed; dejectedly he rode
The weary journey from that place unto his own abode.
He grieved for his fair Countess—dear as his life was she—
Sore grieved he for that lady, and for his children three.

XVIII.

The one was yet an infant upon its mother's breast,
For though it had three nurses, it liked her milk the best;
The others were young children that had but little wit,
Hanging about their mother's knee while nursing she did sit.

XIX.

"Alas!" he said, when he had come within a little space,
"How shall I brook the cheerful look of my kind lady's face?
To see her coming forth in glee to meet me in my hall,
When she so soon a corpse must be, and I the cause of all!"

XX.

Just then he saw her at the door with all her babes appear—
(The little page had run before to tell his lord was near).
"Now welcome home, my lord, my life!—Alas! you droop your head: [so red?]
Tell, Count Alarcos, tell your wife what makes your eyes

"I'll tell you all, I'll tell you all—it is not yet the hour—
We'll sup together in the hall; I'll tell you in your bower."
The lady brought forth what she had, and down beside him
sat;

He sat beside her, pale and sad, but neither drank nor ate

The children to his side were led (he loved to have them so);
Then on the board he laid his head, and out his tears did flow. [cos said:]

"I fain would sleep, I fain would sleep," the Count Alar-Alas! be sure, that sleep was none that night within their bed.

XXIII.

They came together to the bower where they were used to rest,
None with them but the little babe that was upon the breast.
The Count had barr'd the chamber doors—they ne'er were barr'd till then:

"Unhappy lady," he began, "and I most lost of men!"

XXIV.

"Now, speak not so, my noble lord, my husband and my life,
Unhappy never can she be that is Alarcos's wife."
"Alas! unhappy lady, 't is but little that you know,
For in that very word you've said is gather'd all your wo-

"Long since I loved a lady; long since I oaths did plight
To be that lady's husband, to love her day and night.
Her father is our lord the King: to him the thing is known;
And now, that I the news should bring! she claims me for her own."

XXVI.
"Alas! my love, alas! my life, the right is on their side: Ere I had seen your face, she was betrothed my bride; But—oh! that I should speak the word—since in her place you lie, It is the bidding of our lord that this night you must die."

XXVII.
"Are these the wages of my love, so lowly and so leal? Oh! kill me not, thou noble Count, when at thy foot I kneel! But send me to my father's house, where once I dwelt in glee; [three.] There will I live a lone chaste life, and rear my children."

XXVIII.
"It may not be—mine oath is strong—ere dawn of day you die!"

"Oh! well 't is seen how all alone upon the earth am I: My father is an old frail man; my mother's in her grave; And dead is stout Don Garcia—Alas! my brother brave!"

XXIX.
"T was at this coward King's command they slew my brother dear, And now I'm helpless in the land. It is not death I fear, But loth, loth am I to depart and leave my children so. Now let me lay them to my heart, and kiss them ere I go."

XXX.
"Kiss him that lies upon thy breast: the rest thou may'st not see."

"I fain would say an Ave."—"Then say it speedily." She knelt her down upon her knee: "Oh, Lord! behold my case: [grace.] Judge not my deeds, but look on me in pity and great"

XXXI.
When she had made her orison, up from her knees she rose: "Be kind, Alarcos, to our babes, and pray for my repose— And now give me my boy once more upon my breast to hold, That he may drink one farewell drink before my breast be cold."

XXX.
"Why would you waken the poor child? you see he is asleep. [peep.]— Prepare, dear wife; there is no time; the dawn begins to 'Now hear me, Count Alarcos! I give thee pardon free; pardon thee for the love's sake wherewith I've loved thee."

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

"Gentlemen, I will now concede to him every inch of the case which he has been endeavoring to make out; that he has completely established his pedigree. Mind, gentlemen, I concede this only for the purpose of the case which I am about to lay before you." He then mentioned the conveyance by Harry Dreddlington of all his interests—"You forget that he died in his father's lifetime, Mr. Attorney-General," interposed Mr. Subtle, with a placid smile, and the air of a man who is suddenly relieved from a vast pressure of anxiety.

"Not a bit of it, gentlemen, not a bit of it—'t is a part of my case. My learned friend is quite right; Harry Dreddlington did die in his father's lifetime:—but—" Here Mr. Subtle gazed at the Attorney-General with unaffected curiosity; and, when the latter came to mention "the Deed of Confirmation by the father of Harry Dreddlington," an acute observer might have observed a slight change of color in Mr. Subtle. Mr. Quicksilver went on writing—for he was entirely out of his depth, and therefore occupied himself with thinking over an article he was writing for some political review. Mr. Lynx looked at the Attorney-General as if he expected every instant to receive a musket-ball in his breast.

"What! 'confirm' a nullity, Mr. Attorney General?" interrupted Mr. Subtle, laying down his pen with a smile of derision; but a moment or two afterwards, "Mr. Mortmain," said he in a hasty whisper, "what do you think of this? Tell me—in four words"—Mortmain, his eye glued to the face of the Attorney-General the while, muttered hastily something about—operating as a new grant—as a new conveyance.

"Pshaw! I mean what's the answer to it?" muttered Mr. Subtle, impatiently; but his countenance preserved its expression of smiling nonchalance.

"You'll oblige me, Mr. Mortmain," he by-and-by whispered, in a quiet but peremptory tone, "by giving your utmost attention to the question as to the effect of this deed—so that I may shape my objection to it properly when it is tendered in evidence. If it really have the legal effect attributed to it, and which I suspect is the case, we may as well shut up our briefs. I thought there must be something or other in the background."

Gammien saw the real state of Mr. Subtle's mind, and his cheek turned pale, but he preserved a smile on his countenance, as he sat with his arms folded. Quirk eyed him with undisguised agitation, scarce daring to look up at Mr. Subtle. Titmouse, seeing a little dismay in his camp, turned very white and cold, and sat still, scarce daring to breathe. Snap looked like a terrier going to have his teeth pulled out. At length the Attorney-General, after stating that, in addition to the case which he had intimated, as resting mainly on the deed of confirmation, he should proceed to prove the pedigree of Mr. Aubrey, sat down, having spoken about two hours and a half, expressing his conviction that when the defendant's evidence should have been closed, the jury, under his Lordship's direction, would return a verdict for the defendant, and without leaving the jury-box, where, by their long and patient attention, they had so honorably acquitted themselves of the important duty imposed upon them by the constitution.

"James Parkinson?" exclaimed Mr. Sterling, quietly but distinctly, as the Attorney-General sat down. "Do you produce," inquired Mr. Sterling, as soon as the witness has been sworn, "a conveyance, specifying that by Harry Dreddlington to Moses Aaron," &c. It was proved and put in, without much opposition. So also was another—the assignment from Moses Aaron to Geoffrey Dreddlington.

"Do you also produce a deed between Harry Dreddlington the elder and Geoffrey Dreddlington?" and he mentioned the date and names of all the parties. Mr. Parkinson handed in the important document.

"Stay, stay; where did you get that deed, Mr. Parkinson?" inquired Mr. Subtle.

"From my office at Griston, where I keep many of Mr. Aubrey's title deeds."

"When did you bring it hither?"

"About ten o'clock last night, for the purpose of this trial."

"How long has it been at your office?"

"Ever since I fetched it, a year or two ago, with other deeds, from the muniment-room of Yatton Hall."

"How long have you been solicitor to Mr. Aubrey?"

"For this ten years; and my father was solicitor to his father for twenty-five years."

"Will you swear that this deed was at your office before the proceedings in this action were brought to your notice?"

"I have not the slightest doubt in the world. It never attracted any more notice from me than any other of Mr. Aubrey's deeds, till my attention was drawn to it in consequence of these proceedings."

"Has any one access to Mr. Aubrey's deeds at your office but yourself?"

"None that I know of; I keep all the deeds of my clients that are at my office in their respective boxes, and allow no one access to them, except under my immediate notice and in my presence."

Then Mr. Subtle sat down.

"My Lord, we now propose to put in this deed," said the Attorney-General, unfolding it.

"Allow me to look at it, Mr. Attorney," said Mr. Subtle. It was handed to him; and his juniors and Mr. Mortmain, rising, were engaged most anxiously in scrutinizing it for some minutes. Mortmain having looked at the stamp, sat down, and opening his bag, hastily drew out an old well worn volume which contained all the stamp acts that had ever been passed from the time of William the Third, when, I believe, the first of those blessings was conferred upon this country. First he looked at the deed—then at his book—then at the deed again; and at length might be seen, with earnest gestures, putting Mr. Subtle in possession of his opinion on the subject. "My Lord," said Subtle, at length, "I object to this instrument being received in evidence, on account of the insufficiency of the stamp." He then mentioned the character of the stamp affixed to the deed, and read the act which was in force at the time that the deed bore date; and, after a few additional observations, sat down, and was followed by Mr. Quicksilver and Mr. Lynx. Then arose the Attorney-General, having in the meantime carefully looked at the Act of Parliament, and submitted to his lordship that the stamp was sufficient; being followed by his juniors. Mr. Subtle replied at some length.

"I entertain some difficulty on the point," said his lordship, "and will consult with my brother Grayley." Taking with him the deed, and Mr. Mortmain's Stamp Acts, his lordship left the court, and was absent a quarter of an hour; half an hour—three-quarters of an hour; and at length returned.

"I have consulted," said he, as soon as he had taken his seat, amidst the profoundest silence, "my brother Grayley, and we have very fully considered the point. My brother happens, fortunately, to have by him a manuscript note of a case in which he was counsel, about eighteen years ago, and in which the exact point arose which exists in the present case." He then read out of a thick manuscript book, which he had brought with him from Mr. Justice Grayley, the particulars of the case alluded to, and which were certainly precisely similar to those then before him. In the case referred to, the stamp had been sufficient; and so he and his brother, Grayley, were of opinion was the stamp in the deed then before him. The cloud which had settled upon the countenances of the Attorney-General and his party, here flitted over to those of his opponents. "Your lordship will perhaps take a note of the objection," said Mr. Subtle, somewhat chagrined. The judge did so.

"Now, then, we propose to put in and read this deed," said the Attorney-General, with a smile, holding out his hand towards Mr. Lynx, who was spelling over it very eagerly—"I presume my learned friend will require only the operative parts"—here Lynx, with some excitement, called his leader's attention to something which had occurred to him in the deed:—up got Quicksilver and Mortmain; and presently—

"Not quite so fast, Mr. Attorney, if you please," said Mr. Subtle, with a little elation of manner—"I have another, and I apprehend a clearly fatal objection to the admissibility of this deed, till my learned friend shall have accounted for an erasure!"

"Erasure!" echoed the Attorney-General, with much surprise—"Allow me to see the deed;" and he took it with an incredulous smile, which, however, disappeared as he looked more and more closely at the instrument; Mr. Sterling and Mr. Crystal also looking extremely serious.

"I've hit them now," said Mr. Subtle, to those behind him, as he leaned back, and looked with no little triumph at his opponents. From what apparently inadequate and trifling causes often flow great results! The plain fact of the case was merely this. The attorney's clerk, in copying out the deed, which was one of considerable length, had written four or five words by mistake; and fearing to exasperate his master, by rendering necessary a new deed and stamp, and occasioning trouble and delay, neatly scratched out the erroneous words, and over the erasure wrote the correct ones. As he was the party who was entrusted with seeing to and witnessing the execution of the instrument, he of course took no notice of the alteration, and—see the result! The ownership of an estate of ten thousand a-year about to turn upon the effect of this erasure!

"Hand me up the deed," said the Judge; and inspected it minutely for a minute or two.

"Has any one a magnifying-glass in court?" inquired the Attorney-General, with a look of increasing anxiety. No one happened to have one.

"Is it necessary, Mr. Attorney?" said Lord Widdrington, handing down the instrument to him with an ominous look.

"Well—you object, of course, Mr. Subtle—as I understand you—that this deed is void, on account of an erasure in a material part of it?" inquired Lord Widdrington.

"That is my objection, my lord," said Mr. Subtle, sitting down.

"Now, Mr. Attorney," continued the Judge, turning to the Attorney-General, prepared to take a note of any observations he might offer. The spectators—the whole court—were aware that the great crisis of the case had arrived; and there was a sickening silence. The Attorney-General, with perfect calmness and self-possession, immediately addressed the court in answer to the objection. That there was an erasure, which, owing to the hurry with which the instrument had been looked at, had been overlooked, was indisputable; of course the Attorney-General's argument was, that it was an erasure in a part not material; but it was easy to see that he spoke with the air of a man who argues contra spem. What he said, however, was pertinent and forcible; the same might be said of Mr. Sterling and Mr. Crystal; but they were all plainly gravelled. Mr. Subtle replied with cruel cogency: Mr. Quicksilver seized the opportunity—not choosing to see that the Judge was with them—to make a most dangerous but showy speech; Mr. Subtle sitting beside him in the utmost distress, looking as if he could have withered him with a word. In consequence of some very unguarded admissions of Quicksilver, down came upon him Lord Widdrington; and Mr. Subtle—the only time during the whole cause in which he lost his self-command—uttered a half-stifled curse at the folly of Quicksilver, that could be heard by half the bar, perhaps even by the Judge, who greatly relished the exposure he was making of Quicksilver's indiscretion. At length he sat down, with a somewhat foolish air, Mr. Subtle turning his back full upon him before the whole court; but when Lynx rose, and, in a business-like way, with only a word or two, put the point again fully before Lord Widdrington, the scowl gradually disappeared from the brow of Mr. Subtle.

"Well," said Lord Widdrington, when Mr. Lynx had done, "I own I feel no doubt at all upon the matter; but as it is certainly of the greatest possible importance, I will just see how it strikes my brother Grayley." With this he took the deed in his hand, and quitted the court. He touched Mr. Aubrey, in passing to his private room, holding the deed before him. After an absence of about ten minutes, Lord Widdrington returned.

"Silence! silence there!" bawled the crier; and the bustle had soon subsided into profound silence.

"I entertain no doubt, nor does my brother Grayley," said Lord Widdrington, "that I ought not to receive this deed in evidence, without accounting for an erasure occurring in a mainly essential part of it. Unless, therefore, you are prepared, Mr. Attorney, with any evidence as to this point, I shall not receive the deed."

There was a faint buzz all over the court—a buzz of excitement, anxiety, and disappointment. The Attorney-General consulted for a moment or two with his friends.

"Undoubtedly, my Lord, we are not prepared with any evidence to explain an appearance which has taken us entirely by surprise. After this length of time, my Lord, of course—"

"Certainly—it is a great misfortune for the parties—a great misfortune. Of course you tender the deed in evidence?" he continued, taking a note.

"We do, my Lord, certainly."

You should have seen the faces of Messrs. Quirk, Gammien and Snap, as they looked at Mr. Parkinson, with an agitated air, returning the rejected deed to the bag from which it had been lately taken with so confident and triumphant an air!—The remainder of the case, which had been opened by the Attorney-General on behalf of Mr. Aubrey, was then proceeded with; but in spite of all their assumed calmness, the disappointment and distress of his counsel were perceptible to all. They were now dejected—they felt that the cause was lost, unless some extraordinary good fortune should yet befall them. They were not long in establishing the descent of Mr. Aubrey from Geoffrey Dreddlington. It was necessary to do so; for grievously as they had been disappointed in failing to establish the title paramount, founded upon the deed of confirmation of Mr. Aubrey, it was yet an important question for the jury, whether they believed the evidence adduced by the plaintiff to show title in himself.

"That, my Lord, is the defendant's case," said the Attorney-General, as his last witness left the box; and Mr. Subtle then rose to reply. He felt how unpopular was his cause; that almost every countenance around him bore a hostile expression. Privately, he loathed his case when he saw the sort of person for whom he was struggling. All his sympathies—for he was a very proud, haughty man—were on behalf of Mr. Aubrey, whom by name and reputation he well knew; with whom he had often sate in the House of Commons. Now, conspicuous before him, sate his little monkey-client, Titmouse—a ridiculous object; and calculated, if there were any scope for the influence of prejudice, to ruin his own cause by the exhibition of himself before the jury. That was the vulgar idiot who was to turn the admirable Aubreys out of Yatton, and send them beggared into the world!—But Mr. Subtle was a high-minded English advocate; and if he had seen Miss Aubrey in all her loveliness, and knew how all depended upon his exertions, he could hardly have exerted himself more successfully than he did on the present occasion. And such, at length, was the effect which that exquisitely skilful advocate produced, in his address to the jury, that he began to bring about a change in the feelings of most around him; even the eye of scornful beauty began to direct fewer glances of indignation and disgust upon Titmouse, as Mr. Subtle's irresistible rhetoric drew upon their sympathies in his behalf. "My learned friend, the Attorney-General, gentlemen, dropped one or two expressions of a somewhat disparaging tendency, in alluding to my client, Mr. Titmouse; and shadowed forth a disadvantageous contrast between the obscure and ignorant plaintiff, and the gifted defendant. Good God, gentlemen! and is my humble client's misfortune to become his fault? If he be obscure and ignorant, unacquainted with the usages of society, deprived of the blessings of a superior education—if he have contracted vulgarity, whose fault is it? Who has occasioned it? Who plunged him and his parents before him into an unjust poverty and obscurity, from which Providence is about this day to rescue him, and put him in possession of his own? Gentlemen, if topics like these must be introduced into this case, I ask you who is accountable for the present condition of my unfortunate client? Is he, or are those who have been, perhaps unconsciously, but still unjustly, so long revelling in the wealth that is his? Gentlemen, in the name of every thing that is manly and generous, I challenge your sympathy, your commiseration for my client."

Here, Titmouse, who had been staring up open-mouthed for some time at his eloquent advocate, and could be kept quiet no longer by the most vehement efforts of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, rose up, in an excited manner, exclaiming, "Bravo! bravo! bravo! sir! 'Pon my life, capital! It's quite true—bravo! sir!" His astounded advocate paused at this unprecedented interruption. "Take the puppy out of court, sir, or I will not utter one word more," said he, in a fierce whisper to Mr. Gammon.

"Who is that? Leave the court, sir! Your conduct is most indecent, sir! I have a great mind to commit you, sir!" said Lord Widdrington, directing an awful look down to the offender, who had turned of a ghastly white.

"Have mercy upon me, my Lord! I'll never do it again," he groaned, clasping his hands, and verily believing that Lord Widdrington was going to take the estate away from him.

Snap at length succeeded in getting him out of court, and after the excitement occasioned by this irregular interruption had subsided, Mr. Subtle resumed:

"Gentlemen," said he, in a low tone, "I perceive that you are moved by this little incident; and it is characteristic of your superior feelings. Inferior persons, destitute of sensibility or refinement, might have smiled at eccentricities which occasion your only feelings of greater commiseration. I protest, gentlemen"—his voice trembled for a moment, but he soon resumed his self-possession; and, after a long and admirable address, sat down confident of the verdict.

"If we lose the verdict, sir," said he, bending down, and whispering into the ear of Gammon, "we may thank that execrable little puppy for it." Gammon changed color, but made no reply.

Lord Widdrington then commenced summing up the case to the jury, with his usual care and perspicacity. Nothing could be more beautiful than the ease with which he extricated the facts of the case from the meshes in which they had been involved by Mr. Subtle and the Attorney-General. As soon as he had explained to them the general principles of law applicable to the case, he placed before them the facts proved by the plaintiff, and the answer of the defendant: every one in court trembling for the result, if the jury took the same view which they felt themselves compelled to take. He suggested that they should retire to consider the case, taking with them the pedigrees which had been handed in to them; and added that, if they should require his assistance, he should remain in his private room for an hour or two. Both judge and jury then retired, it being about eight o'clock. Candles were lit in the court, which continued crowded to suffocation. Few doubted which way the verdict would go. Fatigued as must have been most of the spectators with a two days' confinement and excitement—ladies as well as gentlemen—scarce a person thought of quitting till the verdict had been pronounced. After an hour and a half's absence, a cry was heard—"Clear the way for the jury;" and one or two officers, with their wands, obeyed the directions. As the jury were re-entering their box, struggling with a little difficulty through the crowd, Lord Widdrington resumed his seat upon the bench.

"Gentlemen of the jury, have the goodness," said the associate, "to answer to your names. Sir Godolphin Fitzherbert;" and, while their names were thus called over, all the counsel took their pens, and turning over their briefs with an air of anxiety, prepared to endorse on them the verdict. As soon as all the jurymen had answered, a profound silence ensued.

"Gentlemen of the jury," inquired the associate, "are you agreed upon your verdict? Do you find verdict for the plaintiff, or for the defendant?"

"For the plaintiff," replied the foreman; on which the officer, amidst a kind of blank dismayed silence, making at the same time some hieroglyphics upon the record, muttered—"Verdict for plaintiff. Damages one shilling. Costs, forty shillings;" while another functionary bawled out, amidst the increasing buzz in the court: "Have the goodness to wait, gentlemen of the jury. You will be paid immediately." Whereupon, to the disgust and indignation of the unlearned spectators, and the astonishment of some of the gentlemen of the jury themselves—many of the very first men in the county—Snap jumped up on the form, pulled out his purse with an air of exultation, and proceeded to remunerate Sir Godolphin Fitzherbert and the rest of his companions with the sum of one guinea. Proclamation was then made, and the court adjourned.

"The Attorney-General did his work very fairly, I thought—eh, Lynx?" said Mr. Subtle, as, arm-in-arm with Mr. Lynx, he quitted the castle-gates, each of them on his way to their respective lodgings, to prepare for their next day's work.

"Yes—he's a keen enough hand, to be sure: he's given us all work enough; and, I must say, it's been a capital set-to between you. I'm very glad you got the verdict!"

"It would n't have done to be beaten on my own dunghill, as it were—eh? By the way, Lynx, that was a good hit of yours about the erasure—I ought, really, if it had occurred to me at the time, to have given you the credit of it—it was entirely yours, Lynx, I must say."

"Oh, no," replied Lynx, modestly. He knew that Mr. Subtle would be Attorney-General one day; and would then require the services of a certain grim functionary—to wit, a devil—"It was a mere accident my lighting on it; the merit was, the use you made of it!"

"To think of ten thousand a-year turning on that same trumpery erasure."

"But are you sure of your verdict on that ground, Mr. Subtle? Do you think Widdrington was right in rejecting that deed?"

"Right? To be sure he was! But I own I got rather uneasy at the way the Attorney-General put it—that the estate had once been vested, and could not be subsequently de-vested by an alteration or blemish in the instrument evidencing the passing of the estate—eh? That was a good point, Lynx."

"Aye, but as Lord Widdrington put it—that could be only where the defect was proved to exist after a complete and valid deed had been once established."

"True—true; that's the answer, Lynx: here you see, he dees is disgraced in the first instance; no proof, in fact, that it ever ~~was~~ a deed—therefore, mere waste paper."

"To be sure, possession has gone along with it? What then!—that is to say, the man who has altered it, to benefit himself and his heirs, keeps it snugly in his own chest—and then that is of itself sufficient to—"

"Yes—and again, you know, is n't it the general rule that the party producing an instrument must account for the appearance of erasure or alteration to encounter the presumption of fraud? it seems good sense enough."

"By the way, did you ever see any thing like Quicksilver in that matter? I knew he'd bring Widdrington down on him—I sate frying, I assure you! To hear one's cases spoiled—but—well! it's all over now, however! It's really been a very interesting cause."

"Very. Some capital points—that of Mortmain's on the stamp-act—"

"Pish, Lynx! there's nothing in it! I meant the cause itself has been an interesting one—uncommonly."

Mr. Subtle suddenly paused, and stood still. "God bless my soul, Lynx, I've made a blunder!"

"Eh!"

"Yes—by Jove, a blunder! Never did such a thing since I've led a cause before."

"A blunder? Impossible!—What is it?" inquired Lynx, briskly, picking up his ears.

"It will be at least thirty or forty pounds out of our client's pocket. I forgot to ask Widdrington for the certificate for the cost of the special jury. I protest I never did such a thing before—I'm quite annoyed—I hate to overlook any thing."

"Oh! is that all?" inquired Lynx, much relieved—"then it's all right! While you were speaking to Mr. Gammon, immediately after the verdict had been given, I turned towards Quicksilver to get him to ask for a certificate—but he had seen a man with the 'New Times' containing the division on the Catholic claims, and had set off after him—so I took the liberty, as you seemed very earnestly talking to Mr. Gammon, to name it to the judge—and it's all right."

"Capital! Then there is n't a point missed? And in a good two days' fight that's something."

"D'ye think we shall keep the verdict, and get its fruits, Mr. Subtle?"

"We shall keep the verdict, I've no doubt; there's nothing in Widdrington's notes that we need be afraid of—but of course they'll put us to bring another ejectment, perhaps several."

"Yes—certainly—there must be a good deal of fighting before such a property as Yatton changes hands," replied Lynx, with a complacent air: for he saw a few pleasant pickings in store for him. "By the way," he continued, "our client's a sweet specimen of humanity, is n't he?"

"Fudge! odious little reptile! And did you ever in all your life witness such a scene as when he interrupted me in the way he did?"

"Ha, ha! Never! But, upon my honor, what an exquisite turn you gave the thing—it was worth more than called it forth—it was admirable."

"Pooh—Lynx!" said Mr. Subtle, with a gratified air; "knack—mere knack—nothing more. My voice trembled—eh?—at least so I intended."

"Upon my soul, Mr. Subtle, I almost thought you were for the moment overcome, and going to shed tears."

"Ah, ha, ha!—Delightful! I was convulsed with inward laughter! ~~shed tears~~!! Did the Bar take it, Lynx?" inquired Mr. Subtle; for though he hated display, he loved appreciation, and by competent persons. "By the way, Lynx, the way in which you've got up the whole case does you vast credit—that opinion of yours on the evidence was—upon my word—the most masterly"—here he suddenly ceased and squeezed his companion's arm, motioning him thereby to silence. They had come up with two gentlemen, walking slowly, and conversing in a low tone, but with much earnestness of manner. They were, in fact, Mr. Aubrey and Lord De la Zouch. Mr. Subtle and Mr. Lynx crossed over to the other side of the narrow street, and quickened their pace, so as soon to be out of sight and hearing of the persons they seemed desirous of avoiding. Mr. Subtle was, indeed, unable to bear the sight of the man whom his strenuous and splendid exertions during the last two days had tended to strip of his all—to thrust from the bright domain of wealth, prosperity, distinction, into—as it were—outer darkness—the outer darkness of poverty—of destitution.

"It's a bore for Mr. Aubrey, is n't it?" quoth the matter-of-fact Lynx.

"It's quite frightful!"—replied Mr. Subtle, in a tone of voice and with a manner which showed how deeply he felt what he uttered. "And it's not only what he will lose, but what he will be liable to—the meane profits—sixty thousand pounds."

"Oh!—you think, then, that we can't go beyond the statute of limitation?—Eh?—is that so clear?" Mr. Subtle looked sharply at Lynx, with an expression it would be difficult to describe. "Well," continued the impenetrable Lynx—"at all events I'll look into it." He felt about as much sentiment in the matter as a pig eating acorns would feel interest in the antiquity of the oak from which they fell, and under whose venerable shade he was munching and stuffing himself.

"By the way, Lynx—a'n't you with me in Higson and Mellington?"

"Yes—and it stands first for to-morrow morning."

"What's it about? I've not opened my papers, and—why, we've a consultation fixed for ten to-night."

"It's libel against a newspaper editor—the POMPHREY COCKATRICE; and our client's a clergyman."

"What about?"

"Tithes—grasping, cruelty, and so forth!"

"Justification?"

"No—not guilty only."

"Who leads for the defendant?"

"Mr. Quicksilver."

"Oh!—we can dispense with the consultation then. I shall send my clerk to fix to-morrow morning, at court—five minutes before the sitting of the court. I'm rather tired to-night." With this the great leader shook hands with his modest, learned, laborious junior—and entered his lodgings.

As soon as Titmouse had been ejected from the court, in the summary way which the reader will remember, merely on account of his having, with slight indecorum, yielded to the mighty impulse of his agitated feelings, he began to cry bitterly, wringing his hands, and asking every one about him if they thought he could get in again, because it was his case that was going on. His eyes were red and swollen with weeping: and his little breast throbbed violently as he walked to and fro from one door of the court to the other. "Oh, gents, will you get me in again?" said he, in passionate tones, approaching two gentlemen, who, with a very anxious and oppressed air, were standing together at the outside of one of the doors—in fact, Lord De la Zouch and Mr. Aubrey; and they quickly recognized in Titmouse the gentleman whose claims were being at that instant mooted within the court. "Will you get me in? You seem such respectable gents. 'Pon my soul I'm going mad! It's my case that's going on! I'm Mr. Titmouse."

"We have no power, sir, to get you in," replied Lord De la Zouch, haughtily: so coldly and sternly as to cause Titmouse involuntarily to shrink from him.

"The court is crowded to the very door, sir—and we really have no more right to be present at court, or to get others into court, than you have," said Mr. Aubrey, with mildness and dignity.

"Thank you, sir! Thank you!" quoth Titmouse, moving with an apprehensive air away from Lord De la Zouch, towards Mr. Aubrey. "Know quite well who you are, sir! 'Pon my solemn soul, sir, sorry to do all this; but law's law, and right's right, all the world over."

"I desire you to leave us, sir," said Lord De la Zouch, with irrepressible sternness; "you are very intrusive. How can we catch a syllable of what is going on while you are chattering in this way?" Titmouse saw that Mr. Aubrey looked towards him with a very different expression from that exhibited by his forbidding companion, and would perhaps have stood his ground, but for a glimpse he caught of a huge, powdered, broad-shouldered footman, in a splendid livery, one of Lord De la Zouch's servants, who, with a great thick cane in his hand, was standing at a little distance behind, in attendance on the carriage, which was standing in the castle-yard. This man's face looked so ready for mischief, that Titmouse slowly walked off. There was a good many standers-by, who seemed all to look with dislike and distrust at Titmouse. He made many ineffectual attempts to persuade the doorkeeper, who had assisted in his extrusion, to re-admit him; but the incorruptible janitor was proof against a sixpence—even against a shilling: and at length Titmouse gave himself up to despair, and thought himself the most miserable man in the whole world—as very probably, indeed, he was: for consider what a horrid interval of suspense he had to endure, from the closing of Mr. Subtle's speech till the delivery of the verdict. But at length, through this portentous and apparently impenetrable cloud, burst the rich sunlight of success.

"Mr. Titmouse!—Mr. Titmouse!—Mr. Tit!"

"Here! Here I am! Here!"—exclaimed the little fellow, jumping off the window-seat on which he had been sitting for the last hour in the dark, half-stupified with grief and exhaustion. The voice that called him was a blessed voice—a familiar voice—the voice of Mr. Gammon; who, as soon as the jury began to come back, on some pretence or other had quitted his seat between Quirk and Snap, in order, if the verdict should be for the plaintiff, to be the very first to communicate it to him. In a moment or two Mr. Gammon had grasped both Mr. Titmouse's hands. "My dear, dear Mr. Titmouse, I congratulate you! You are victorious! God grant you long life to enjoy your good fortune! God bless you, Titmouse!" He wrung Titmouse's hands—and his voice trembled with the intensity of his emotions. Mr. Titmouse had gone very white, and for a while spoke not, but stood staring at Mr. Gammon, as if he was hardly aware of the import of his communication.

"No—but—is it so? Honor bright!" at length he stammered.

"It is, indeed! My long labors are at length crowned with success! Hurrah, hurrah, Mr. Titmouse!"

"I've really won? It a'n't a joke or a dream?" inquired Titmouse with quickly increasing excitement, and a joyous expression bursting over his features, which became suddenly flushed.

"A joke?—the best you'll ever have. A dream?—that will last your life. Thank God, Mr. Titmouse, the battle's ours; we've defeated all their villany!"

"Tol de rol! Tol de rol! Tol de lol, lol, rido! Ah," he added, in a loud, truculent tone, as Lord De la Zouch and Mr. Aubrey slowly passed him—"done for you now—'pon my life!—turned the tables!—that for you!" said he, snapping his fingers; but I need hardly say that he did so with perfect impunity as far as those two gentlemen were concerned, who were so absorbed with the grievous event which had just happened, as scarcely to be aware of their being addressed at all.

"Aubrey, it's against you—all is lost; the verdict is for the plaintiff!" said Lord De la Zouch, in a hurried, agitated whisper, as he grasped the hand of Mr. Aubrey, whom he had quitted for an instant to hear the verdict pronounced. Mr. Aubrey for some moments spoke not.

"God's will be done!" at length said he, in a low tone, and in rather a faint murmur. More than a dozen gentlemen, who came crowding out, grasped his hand with great energy and vehemence.

"God bless you, Aubrey! God bless you!" said several voices, their speakers wringing his hand with great vehemence as they spoke.

"Let us go," said Lord De la Zouch, putting Mr. Aubrey's arm in his own, and leading him away from a scene of distressing excitement, too powerful for his exhausted feelings.

"I am nothing of a fatalist," said Mr. Aubrey, after a pause of some minutes, during which they had quitted the castle gates, and his feelings had recovered from the shock which they had just before suffered—"I am nothing of a fatalist, but I ought not to feel the least surprise at this issue, for I have long had a settled conviction that such would be the issue. For some time before I had the least intimation of the commencement of these proceedings, I was oppressed by a sense of impending calamity."

"Well, that may be so; but it does not follow that the mischief is finally done."

"I am certain of it! But, dear Lord De la Zouch, how much I owe to your kindness and sympathy!" said Mr. Aubrey, with a slight tremor in his voice.

"We are at this moment, Aubrey, firmer friends than we ever were before. So help me Heaven! I would not lose your friendship for the world; I feel it a greater honor than I am worthy of—I do, indeed," said Lord De la Zouch, with great emotion.

"There's a great gulf between us, though, Lord De la Zouch, as far as worldly circumstances are concerned—you a peer of the realm, I a beggar."

"Forgive me, Aubrey, but it is idle to talk that way; I am hurt beyond measure at your supposing it possible that under any circumstances."

"Believe me, I feel the full value of your friendship—more valuable at this moment than ever."

"That a serious calamity has fallen upon us is certain—which of us, indeed, is safe from such a calamity? But who would bear it with the calm fortitude which you have already evinced, my dear Aubrey?"

"You speak very kindly, Lord De la Zouch; I trust I shall play the man, now that the time for playing a man's part has come," said Mr. Aubrey, with an air of mingled melancholy and resolution. "I feel an inexpressible consolation in the reflection that I cannot charge myself with any thing unconscientious. If I have done wrong in depriving another for so long a period of what was his, it was surely in ignorance; and, as for the future, I put my trust in God. I feel as if I could submit to the will of Heaven with cheerfulness."

"Do not speak so despondingly, Aubrey!"

"Despondingly?" echoed Mr. Aubrey, with momentary animation—"despondingly? My dear friend, I feel as if I were indeed entering a scene black as midnight—but what is it to the valley of the shadow of death, dear Lord De la Zouch, which is before all of us? I assure you I feel no vainglorious confidence; yet I seem to be leaning on the arm of an unseen but all-powerful supporter."

"You are a hero, my dear Aubrey!" exclaimed Lord De la Zouch, with sudden fervor.

"And that support will embrace those dearer to me than life—dearer—far—far!" He ceased.

"My God, Aubrey!—Aubrey! what's the matter?" hastily exclaimed Lord De la Zouch, feeling Mr. Aubrey leaning heavily against him. He grasped Mr. Aubrey firmly—for his head suddenly drooped; and, but for his companion's support, he must have fallen to the ground. His delicate frame was worn out with the late excitement, and the intense anxiety and exhaustion he had undergone; having scarce tasted food for the last two days. The sudden recurrence of his thoughts to the objects of his fond and ineffable love, had completely overpowered his exhausted nature. Mark—it was only his physical nature that for a moment gave way. It was quite unworthy of the noble soul which animated it. Of such a one it may be said—the sword is too keen for its scabbard. His sensibilities were exquisite; perhaps morbidly so. A soul like his, placed in a body which, as I long ago explained, was constitutionally feeble, might, from the intimate and inscrutable connection and sympathy between mind and body, for a moment appear to be of an inferior temper: whereas the momentary shock and vibration occasioned by external accident over that soul, quickly re-exhibited its native nobleness and strength.

Mr. Aubrey, who sunk into Lord De la Zouch's arms in the way I have described, just as they were passing a small shop whose owner stood at the door, was quickly taken into it; and within a few minutes, and with the aid of a glass of water, revived in time to take advantage of Lord De la Zouch's carriage, which was passing on its way from the castle to his hotel. There was only Lady De la Zouch within it, and she welcomed Mr. Aubrey with the most affectionate sympathy; insisting upon their driving him to his lodgings, in order that they might, by their presence, comfort and appease Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey. Mr. Aubrey, however, most earnestly dissuaded them, saying; he would rather that, on so painful an occasion, they should be alone; and after taking a glass of wine and water, which greatly revived him, he quitted the hotel, alone and on foot, and made for his lodgings. The streets were occupied by passengers, some returning from the castle after the great trial of the day; others standing here and there, in little knots, conversing as he passed them; and he felt conscious that the subject of their thoughts and conversation, was himself and his fallen fortunes. Several deep-drawn sighs escaped him, as he walked on, the herald of such dismal tidings, to those whom he loved; and he felt but for that which supported him from within, as it were, a fallen angel so far as concerned this world's honors and greatness. The splendors of human pomp and prosperity seemed rapidly vanishing in the distance. In the temporary depression of his spirits, he experienced feelings somewhat akin to those of the heart-sickened exile, whose fond eyes are riveted upon the mosques and minarets of his native city, bathed in the soft sunlight of evening, where are the cherished objects of all his tenderest thoughts and feelings; while his vessel is rapidly bearing him from it, amid the rising wind, the increasing and ominous swell of the waters, the thickening gloom of night—whither? The Minster clock struck ten as he passed one of the corners of the vast, majestic structure, grey-glistening in the faint moonlight. The chimes echoed in his ear, and smote his subdued soul with a sense of peculiar solemnity and awe; they forced upon him a reflection upon the transient littleness of earthly things. Then he thought of those dear beings who were awaiting his return, and a gush of grief and tenderness overflowed his heart, as he quickened his steps, with an inward and fervent prayer that Heaven would support them under the misfortune which had befallen them. As he neared the retired row of houses where his lodgings were situated, he imagined that he saw some one near the door of his lodgings, as if on the look out for his approach; and who, as he drew nearer, at length entered his lodgings. This was a person whom Mr. Aubrey did not at all suspect—it was his worthy friend Dr. Tatham; who, unable to quit Yatton in time to hear the trial, had early that morning mounted his horse, and, after a long and hard ride, reached York soon after Mr. Aubrey had set off for the castle. Though many of the country people then in York were aware that Mrs. and Miss Aubrey were also there, a delicate consideration for their exquisitely distressing situation restrained them from intruding upon their privacy, which had been evidently sought for by the species of lodgings which Mr. Aubrey had engaged. On the second day, the excellent Dr. Tatham had been their welcome and instructive guest, scarce ever leaving them; Mr. Aubrey's groom bringing word, from time to time, from his master, how the trial went on. Late in the evening, urged by Kate, the Doctor had gone off to the castle, to wait till he could bring intelligence of the final result of the trial. He had not been observed by Mr. Aubrey amidst the number of people who were about; and had at length fulfilled his mission, and been beforehand with Mr. Aubrey in communicating the unfortunate issue of the struggle. The instant that Mr. Aubrey had set his foot within the door, he was locked in the impassioned embrace of his wife and sister. None of them spoke for some moments.

"Dearest Charles!—we've heard it all—we know it all!" at length they exclaimed in a breath. "Thank God, it is over at last—and we know the worst! Are you well, dear Charles?" inquired Mrs. Aubrey, with fond anxiety.

"Thank God, my Agnes, I am well!" said Mr. Aubrey, much excited—"and thank God that the dreadful suspense is at an end; and for the fortitude, my sweet loves, with which you bear the result. And how are you, my excellent friend?" continued he, addressing Dr. Tatham, and grasping his hands; "my venerable and pious friend—how it refreshes my heart to see you! as one of the chosen ministers of that God whose creatures we are, and whose dispensations we receive with reverent submission!"

"God Almighty bless you all, my dear friends!" replied Dr. Tatham, powerfully affected. "Believe that all this is from Him! He has wise ends in view, though we see not nor comprehend them! 'Faint not when ye are rebuked of Him!' If ye faint in the day of adversity, your strength is small! But I rejoice to see your resignation." Aubrey, his wife, and sister, were for a while overcome with their emotions.

"I assure you all," said Aubrey, "I feel as if a very mountain had been lifted off my heart! How blest am I in my wife and sister!" A heavenly smile irradiated his pale features—and he clasped his wife and then his sister in his arms. They wept as they tenderly returned his embrace.

"Heaven," said he, "that gave us all, has taken all: why should we murmur? He will enable us, if we pray for His assistance, to bear with equanimity our present adversity, as well as our past prosperity! Come, Agnes! Kate! play the women!"

Dr. Tatham sat silent by; but the tears ran down his cheeks. At length Mr. Aubrey gave them a general account of what had occurred at the trial—and which, I need hardly say, was listened to in breathless silence.

"Who is that letter from, love, lying on the table?" inquired Mr. Aubrey, during a pause in the conversation.

"It's only from Johnson, to say the children are quite well," replied Mrs. Aubrey. The ruined parents, as if by a common impulse, looked unutterable things at each other. Then the mother turned deadly pale; and her husband tenderly kissed her cold cheek; while Kate could scarcely restrain her feelings. The excitement of each was beginning to give way before sheer bodily and mental exhaustion; and Dr. Tatham, observing it, rose to take his departure. It was arranged that the carriage should be at the door by eight o'clock in the morning, to convey them back to Yatton—and that Dr. Tatham should breakfast with, and then accompany them on horseback. He then took his departure for the night, with a very full heart; and those whom he left soon afterwards retired for the night; and having first invoked the mercy and pity of Heaven, sunk into slumber and brief forgetfulness of the perilous position in which they had been placed by the event of the day.

Somewhat different was the mode in which the night was spent by the victorious party. Gammon, as has been seen, was the first to congratulate Titmouse on his splendid success. The next was old Quirk—who, with a sort of conviction that he should find Gammon beforehand with him—bustled out of court, leaving Snap to pay the jury, settle the court-fees, collect the papers, and so forth. Both Quirk and Snap (as soon as he was at liberty) exhibited a courtesy towards Titmouse which had a strong dash of reverence in it, such as was due to the possessor of ten thousand a-year; but Gammon exhibited the tranquil matter-of-fact confidence of a man who had determined to be, and indeed knew that he was, the entire master of Titmouse.

"I wish you'd call a coach, or something of that sort, gents.—I'm devilish tired—I am, 'pon my soul!" said Mr. Titmouse, yawning, as he stood on the steps between Quirk and Gammon, waiting for Snap's arrival. He was, in fact, almost mad—bursting with excitement; and could not stand still for a moment. Now he whistled aloud, loudly and boldly; then he hummed a bar or two of some low comic song; and ever and anon drew on and off his damp gloves with an air of petulant impetuosity. Then he ran his hand through his hair with careless grace; and then, with arms folded on his breast for a moment, looked eagerly, but with a would-be-languid air, at two or three coroneted coaches, which one by one, with their depressed and disappointed inmates, rolled off. At length Lord Widdrington, amidst a sharp impetuous cry of "Make way for the judge, there! make way for his lordship!" appeared, with a worn-out air; and passing close by Titmouse, was honored by him with a very fine bow indeed—not being, however, in the least aware of the fact—as he passed on to his carriage. The steps were drawn up; the door closed; and amidst a sharp blast of trumpets, the carriage drove slowly off, preceded and followed by the usual attendants. All this pomp and ceremony made a very deep impression upon the mind of Titmouse. "Ah," thought he, with a sudden sigh of mingled excitement and exhaustion—"who knows but I may be a judge some day! It's a devilish pleasant thing, I'm sure! What a fuss he must make wherever he goes! 'Pon my life, quite delightful!" As there was no coach to be had, Mr. Titmouse was forced to walk home, arm-in-arm with Mr. Quirk and Mr. Gammon, and followed, at a little distance, by a knot of persons, acquainted with his name and person, and feeling towards him a strange mixture of emotions—dislike, wonder, contempt, admiration. Goodness gracious! that strange little gentleman was now worth, it was said, ten thousand a-year; and was squire of Yatton!! Old Quirk shook Titmouse's hand with irrepressible enthusiasm, at least a dozen times on their way to the inn; while Gammon now and then squeezed his arm, and spoke, in an earnest tone, of the difficulties yet to be overcome. On reaching the inn, the landlady, who was standing at the door, and had evidently been on the look-out for her suddenly distinguished guest, received him with several most profound surmises, and most eager and respectful inquiries about his health, as he had had no luncheon—and asking what he would be pleased to have for his supper. She added, moreover, that fearing his former bed room might not have been to his mind, she had changed it, and he would that night sleep in the very best she had.

"We must make a night on 't, eh?" quoth Mr. Quirk, with an excited air. His partners assented to it, as did Mr. Titmouse; and cold beef, sausages, fowl, ham, beef-steaks, and mutton chops, were ordered to be in readiness in half-an-hour's time. Soon afterwards Mr. Titmouse followed the chamber maid to his new bedroom.

"This is the room we always give to quality folks—when we get them," said she, as she laid his candle on the drawers, and looked with a little triumph round the room.

"Ah—yes!—'pon my soul—quite right—always do your best for quality!—Lovely gal—eh?" Here he chuckled her under the chin, and seemed disposed to imprint a kiss upon her cheek; but, with a "Lord, air—that's not the way quality folks behave!" she modestly withdrew. Titmouse, left alone, first threw himself on the bed; then started off, and walked about; then sat down; then danced about; then took off his coat; then threw himself on the bed again; hummed, whistled, jumped up again—in a sort of wild ecstasy, or delirium. In short, it is plain that he was not master of himself. In fact, his little mind was as agitated by the day's event, as a small green puddle by the road-side for a while would be on a stone being suddenly flung into it by a child. When Messrs. Quirk and Snap were, after their sort, as excited as even Mr. Titmouse was, Gammon, retiring to his bed room, and ordering thither, pens, ink, and paper, sat down and wrote the following letter:

"YORK, 5th April, 18—
"My dear sir,—The very first leisure moment I have, I devote to informing you, as one of the most intimate friends of our highly-respected client, Mr. Titmouse, of the brilliant event which has just occurred. After a most severe and protracted struggle of two days, (the Attorney-General having come down special on the other side,) the jury, many of them the chief gentlemen of the county, have within this last hour returned a verdict in favor of our common friend, Mr. Titmouse—thereby declaring him entitled to the whole of the estates at Yatton, (ten thousand a-year rent-roll, at least,) and, by consequence, to an immense accumulation of bygone rents, which must be made up to him by his predecessor, who, with all his powerful party, and in spite of the unscrupulous means resorted to to defeat the ends of justice, is dismayed beyond expression at the result of this grand struggle—unprecedented in the annals of modern litigation. The result has given lively satisfaction in these parts—it is plain that our friend, Mr. Titmouse, will very soon become a great lion in society.

"To you, my dear sir, as an early and valued friend of our interesting client, I sit down to communicate the earliest intelligence of this most important event: and I trust that you will, with our respectful compliments, communicate this happy event to your amiable family—who, I am persuaded, must ever feel a very warm interest in our client's welfare. He is now, naturally enough, much excited with his extraordinary good fortune, to which we are only too proud and happy to have contributed by our humble, but strenuous and long-continued exertions. He begs me to express his most cordial feelings towards you, and to say that, on his return to town, Satin Lodge will be one of the very first places at which he will call. In the mean time, I beg you will believe me, my dear sir, with the best compliments of myself and partners, yours most sincerely,
"Thomas Tag-rag, Esq. &c. &c. &c. ONLY GAMMON."

"That, I think, will about do!"—quoth Gammon to himself, with a thoughtful air, as, having made an exact copy of the above letter, he sealed it up and directed it. He then came down stairs to supper, having first sent the letter off to the post-office. What a merry meal was that same supper! Mr. Titmouse, Mr. Quirk, and Mr. Snap, eat almost to bursting; Gammon was more abstinent—but took a far greater quantity than usual of the bouncing bottled porter, the hard port, and fiery sherry, which his companions drank as if they had been but water. Then came in the spirits—with hot water and cold; and to these all present did ample justice; in fact it was very hard for any one to resist the other's entreaties: Mr. Gammon, in due time, felt himself going—but seemed as if, on such an occasion, he had no help for it. Every one of the partners, at different stages of the evening, made a speech to Titmouse, and proposed his health; who, of course, replied to each. Presently old Quirk sang a comic song, in a very dismal key; and then he and Snap joined in one called "Handcuff v. Hatter," at which Gammon laughed heartily, and listened with that degree of pleased attention, which showed that he had resolved, for once at least, to abandon himself to the enjoyment of the passing hour. Then Titmouse began to speak of what he should do, as soon as he had "touched the shiners"—his companions entering into all his little schemes with a sort of affectionate enthusiasm. At length old Mr. Quirk, after by turns laughing, crying, singing, and talking, leaned back in his chair, with his half-emptied tumbler of brandy and water in his hand, and fell fast asleep. Gammon also, in spite of all he could do, began—the dence take it!—to feel and exhibit the effects of a hasty and hearty meal and his very unusual potations, especially after such long abstinence and intense anxiety as he had experienced during the previous two days. He had intended to have seen them all under the table; but he began gradually to feel a want of control over himself, his thoughts, and feelings, which a little disquieted him, as he now and then caught glimpses of the extent to which it was proceeding. "In vino veritas," properly translated, means—that when a man is fairly under the influence of liquor, you see a strong manifestation of his real character. The vain man is vainer; the voluble, more voluble; the morose, more morose; the detractor, more detracting; the sycophant, more sycophantic, and so forth. Now Gammon was a cold, cautious, long-headed schemer; and as the fumes of liquor mounted up into his head, they only increased the action and intensity of those qualities for which, when sober, he was so pre-eminently distinguished, only that there was a half-conscious want of coherency and subordination. The impulse and the habit were present; but there seemed a strange disturbing force: in short—what is the use of disguising matters?—Gammon was getting very drunk; and he felt very sorry for it, but it was too late. In due time the dismal effort not to appear drunk, ceased!—a great relief! Silent and more silent he became; more and more observant of the motions of Snap and Titmouse; more and more complicated and profound in his schemes and purposes; and at length he felt as if, by some incomprehensible means, he were taking himself in—investing himself: at which point, after a vain attempt to understand his exact position with reverence to himself, he slowly, but rather unsteadily, rose from his chair; looked with an unsettled eye at Titmouse for nearly a minute; a queer smile now and then flitted across his features; and he presently rung the bell. Boots having obeyed the summons, Gammon, with a very turbid brain, followed him to the door, with a most desperate effort to walk thither steadily—but in vain. Having reached his room, he sat down with a sort of suspicion that he had said or done something to commit himself. Vain was the attempt to wind up his watch; and at length he gave it up, with a faint curse. With only one stocking off, after four or five times trying to blow out his candle in vain, he succeeded, and got into bed; his head, however, occupying the place in the bed assigned to his feet. He lay asleep for about half-an-hour—and then experienced certain insupportable sensations. He was indeed very miserable; and lost all thoughts of what would become of Titmouse—of Quirk and Snap—in his own indisposition.

"I say, Snap," quoth Titmouse, with a grin, and putting his finger to his nose, as soon as Gammon had quitted the room in the manner above described—"Mr. Quirk an't much company for us, just now—eh?—Shall we go out and have some fun?"

"Walk will do us good—yes. Go where you like, Titmouse," replied Snap, who, though young, was a thoroughly seasoned vessel, and could hold a great deal of drink without seeming, or really being much the worse for it. As for Titmouse, happily for him! (seeing that he was so soon to have the command of unlimited means, unless indeed the envious fates should in the mean time interpose to dash the brimful cup from his eager lips,) he was becoming more and more accustomed to the effects of drink; which had, up to the moment I am speaking of, no other effect than to elevate his spirits up to the pitch of indefinite daring and enterprise. "Pon my life, Snap, couldn't we stand another tumbler—eh? Warm us for the night air?" "What shall it be?" quoth Snap, ringing the bell—"whiskey?"

"Devil knows, and devil cares!" replied Mr. Titmouse, recklessly; and presently there stood before the friends two smoking tumblers of what they had ordered. Immediately after disposing of them, the two gentlemen, quite up to the mark, as they expressed it—each with a cigar in his mouth, sailed forth in quest of adventures. Titmouse felt that he had now become a gentleman; and his taste and feelings prompted him to pursue, as early as possible, a gentlemanly line of conduct—particularly in his amusements. It was now past twelve; and the narrow old-fashioned streets of York, silent and deserted, formed a strong contrast to the streets of London at the same hour, and seemed scarcely to admit of much sport. But sport our friends were determined to have; and the night air aiding the effect of their miscellaneous potations, they soon became somewhat excited and violent. Yet it seemed difficult to get up a rote—for no one was visible in any direction. Snap suddenly shouted "Fire!" at the top of his voice, and Titmouse joined him; when having heard half a dozen windows hastily thrown up by the dismayed inhabitants, whom the alarming sounds had aroused from sleep, they scampered off at their top speed.

In another part of the town, they yelled, and whistled, and crowed like cocks, and mewed like cats—the last two being accomplishments in which Titmouse was very eminent—and again took to their heels. Then they contrived to twist a few knockers off doors, pull bells, and break a few windows; and, while exercising their skill in this last branch of the night's amusement, Titmouse, in the very act of aiming a stone which took effect in the middle of a bed-room window, was surprised by an old watchman waddling round the corner. He was a feeble, asthmatic old man; so Snap knocked him down at once, and Titmouse blew out the candle in his lantern, which he then jumped upon and smashed to pieces, and knocked his hat over his eyes. Snap, on some strange unaccountable impulse, wrested the rattle out of the poor creature's hand, and sprang it loudly. This brought several other old watchmen from different quarters; and aged numbers prevailing against youthful spirit—the two gentlemen, after a considerable scuffle, were overpowered and conveyed to the cage. Snap having muttered something about demanding to look at the warrant, and then about a malicious arrest and false imprisonment, sunk on a form, and then down upon the floor, and fell fast asleep. Titmouse, for a while, showed a very resolute front, and swore a great many oaths, that he would fight the Boots at the inn for five shillings, if he dared show himself; but all of a sudden, his spirit collapsed, as it were, and he sunk on the floor, and was grievously indisposed for some hours. About nine o'clock, the contents of the cage, viz., Snap, Titmouse, two farmers' boys who had been caught stealing cakes, an old beggar, and a young pick-pocket, were conveyed before the Lord Mayor, to answer for their several misdeeds. Snap was woefully crestfallen. He had sent for the landlord of the inn where they had put up, to come, on their behalf, to the Mansion-house; but he told Quirk of the message he had received. Mr. Quirk, finding that Gammon could not leave his room through severe indisposition—the very first time that Mr. Quirk had ever seen or heard of his being so overtaken—set off in a very mortified and angry mood, in quest of his hopeful client and junior partner. They were in a truly dismal pickle. Titmouse pale as death, his clothes disordered, and one of his shirt-collars torn off; Snap sat beside him with a sheepish air, looking as if he could hardly keep his eyes open. At him Mr. Quirk looked with keen indignation, but spoke not to him nor for him; for Titmouse, however, he expressed great commiseration, and entreated his Lordship to overlook the little misconduct of which he (Titmouse) in a moment of extreme excitement, had been guilty, on condition of his making amends for the injury, both to person and property, of which he had been guilty. By this time his Lordship had become aware of the names and circumstances of the two delinquents; and after lecturing them very severely, he fined them five shillings a-piece for being drunk, and permitted them to be discharged, on their promising never to offend in the like way again, and paying three pounds by way of compensation to the watchman, and one or two persons whose knockers they were proved to have wrenched off, and windows to have broken. His Lordship had delayed the case of Messrs. Snap and Titmouse to the last; chiefly because, as soon as he had found out who Mr. Titmouse was, it occurred to him that he would make a sort of little star at the great ball to be given by the Lady Mayress that evening. As soon, therefore, as the charge had been disposed of, his Lordship desired Mr. Titmouse to follow him for a moment to his private room. There, having shut the door, he gently chided Mr. Titmouse for the indiscretion of which he had been guilty, and of which it was not to have been expected that a gentleman of his consequence in the county would be guilty. His Lordship begged him to consider the station which he was now called to occupy; and, in alluding to the signal event of the preceding day, warmly congratulated him upon it; and, by the way, his Lordship trusted that Mr. Titmouse would, in the evening, favor the Lady Mayress and himself with his company at the ball, where they would be very proud of the opportunity of introducing him to some of the gentry of the county, among whom his future lot in life was likely to be cast. Mr. Titmouse listened to all this as if he were in a dream. His brain (the little of it that he had,) was yet in a most unsettled state; as also was his stomach. When he heard the words "Lady Mayress," "ball," "mansion-house," "gentry of the county," and so forth, a dim vision of splendor flashed before his eyes; and with a desperate effort, he assured the Lord Mayor that he should be very uncommon proud to accept the invitation, if he were well enough—but just then he was uncommon ill.

His Lordship pressed him to take a glass of water, to revive him and settle his stomach; but Mr. Titmouse declined it, and soon afterwards quitted the room; and, leaning on the arm of Mr. Quirk, set off homeward—Snap walking beside him in silence, with a very quaint disconcerted air—not being taken the least notice of by Mr. Quirk. As they passed along, they encountered several of the barristers on their way to court, and others, who recognised Titmouse; and with a smile, evidently formed a pretty accurate guess as to the manner in which the triumph of the preceding day had been celebrated. Mr. Quirk, finding that Mr. Gammon was far too much indisposed to think of quitting York, at all events till a late hour in the evening, and, indeed, that Titmouse was similarly situated—with a very bad grace consented to them stopping behind, and himself, with Snap—the former inside, the latter outside—having settled with most of the witnesses, leaving the remainder, with their own expenses at the inn, to be settled by Mr. Gammon—set off for town by the two o'clock coach. It was, indeed, high time for them to return; for the distressed inmates of Newgate were getting wild on account of the protracted absence of their kind and confidential advisers. When they left, both Gammon and Titmouse were in bed. The former, however, began to revive, shortly after the coach which conveyed away his respected co-partners, and the guard's horn had ceased to be heard; and about an hour afterwards he descended from his room, a great deal the better for the duties of the toilette, and a bottle of soda-water with a little brandy in it. A cup of strong tea, and a slice or two of dry toast, set him entirely to rights—and then Gammon—the calm, serene, astute Gammon—was "himself again." Had he said any thing indiscreet, or in any way committed himself, over night?—thought he, as he sat alone, with folded arms, trying to recollect what had taken place. He hoped not—but had no means of ascertaining. Then he entered upon a long and anxious consideration of the position of affairs, since the great event of the preceding evening. The only definite object which he had had in view, personally, in entering into the affair, was the obtaining that ascendancy over Titmouse, in the event of his becoming possessed of the magnificent fortune they were in quest of for him, which might enable him, in one way or another, to elevate his own position in society, and secure for himself permanent and solid advantages. In the progress of the affair, however, new views presented themselves to his mind.

Toward the close of the afternoon, Titmouse recovered sufficiently to make his appearance down stairs. Soon afterward, Gammon proposed a walk, as the day was fine, and the brisk fresh country air would be efficacious in restoring Titmouse to his wonted health and spirits. His suggestion was adopted; and soon afterward might have been seen, Gammon, supporting on his arm his languid and interesting client, Mr. Titmouse, making his way to the river; along whose quiet and pleasing banks they walked for nearly a couple of hours, in close conversation; during which, Gammon, by repeated and various efforts, succeeding in producing an impression on Titmouse's mind, that the good fortune which seemed now within his reach, had been secured for him by the enterprise, skill, and caution of one, Mr. Gammon only; who would, moreover, continue to devote himself to Mr. Titmouse's interests, and protect him from the designs of those who would endeavor to take advantage of him. Mr. Gammon also dropped one or two vague hints that his—Titmouse's—continuance in the enjoyment of the Yatton property would always depend upon the will and power of him, the aforesaid Gammon; in whose hands were most unsuspected, but potent weapons. And indeed, it is not at all impossible that such may prove to be really the case.

What a difference is there between man and man, in temper, and disposition, and intellect! Compare together the two individuals now walking slowly, arm-in arm, beside the sweet Ouse; and supposing one to have designs upon the other—disposed to enslave and over-reach him—what chance has the shorter gentleman? Compare even their countenances—what a difference!

Gammon heard with uneasiness of Titmouse's intention to go to the Lady Mayress's ball that evening; and, for many reasons, resolved that he should not. In vain, however, did Gammon try to persuade him that he was asked only to be turned into ridicule, for that almost every body there would be in the interest of the Aibreys, and bitterly opposed to him, Mr. Titmouse; in spite of these and all other representations, Titmouse expressed his determination to go to the ball; on which Gammon, with a good-natured smile, exclaimed, "Well, well!" and withdrew his opposition. Shortly after their return from their walk, they sat down to dinner; and Gammon, with a cheerful air, ordered a bottle of champagne, of which he drank about a glass and a half, and Titmouse the remainder. That put him into a humor to take more wine, without much pressing; and he swallowed, in rapid succession, a glass of ale, and seven or eight glasses of port and sherry. By this time he had forgotten all about the ball, and clamored for brandy and water. Gammon, however, saw that his end was answered. Poor Titmouse was becoming rapidly more and more helpless; and within half an hour's time, was assisted to his bed-room in a very sad state. Thus Gammon had the satisfaction of seeing his benevolent design accomplished, although it pained him to think of the temporary inconvenience occasioned to the unconscious sufferer; who had, however, escaped the devices of those who wished publicly to expose his inexperience; and as for the means which Gammon had resorted to in order to effect his purpose—why, he may be supposed to have a remoter object in view, early to disgust him with intemperance.

Alas! how disappointed were the Mayor and Mayress, that their queer little lion did not make his appearance in the gay and brilliant scene! How many had they told that he was coming! The three daughters were almost bursting with vexation and astonishment. They had been disposed to entertain a warmer feeling than that of mere curiosity towards the new owner of an estate worth ten thousand a-year—had drawn lots which of them was first to dance with him; and had told all their friends on which of them the lot had fallen! Then, again, many of the county people inquired, from time to time, of the chagrined little mayor and mayress, when Mr. "Tickmouse," "Mr. Tiptmouse," "Mr. Tipplebottle," or "whatever his name might be," was coming; full of real curiosity, much tintured, however, with disgust and contempt, to see the interesting stranger, who had suddenly acquired so commanding a station in the county, possess so strong a claim to their sympathy and respect.

Then, again, there was a very great lion there, exhibiting for a short time only, who also wished to see the little lion, and expressed keen regrets that it was not there according to appointment. The great lion was Mr. Quicksilver, who had stepped in for about half an hour, merely to show himself; and when he heard of the expected arrival of his little client, it occurred to Mr. Quicksilver, who could see several inches beyond by no means a short nose, that Mr. Titmouse had gained a verdict which would very soon make him patron of the borough of Yatton—that he probably would not think of sitting for the borough himself, and that a little public civility bestowed upon Mr. Titmouse by the great Mr. Quicksilver, one of the counsel to whose splendid exertions he was indebted for his all, might be, as it were, bread thrown upon the waters, to be found after many days. It was true that Mr. Quicksilver, in a bitter stream of eloquent invective, had repeatedly denounced the system of close and rotten boroughs; but his heart, all the while, secretly rebelled; and he knew that a snug borough was a thing on every account not to be sneezed at. He sat for one himself, though he had also contested several counties; but that was expensive and harassing work; and the borough for which he at present sat, he had paid far too high a price for. He had no objection to the existence of close boroughs; but only to so many of them being in the hands of the opposite party; and the legislature has since recognized the distinction, and acted upon it. Here, however, was the case of a borough which was going to change hands, and pass from Tory to Whig; and could Mr. Quicksilver fail to watch it with interest. Was, he, therefore, to neglect this opportunity of slipping in for Yatton—and the straw moving, too, in term—a general election looked for? So Mr. Quicksilver really regretted the absence of his little friend and client, Mr. Titmouse.

Thus, and by such persons, and on such grounds, was lamented the absence of Mr. Titmouse from the hall of the Lady Mayress of York; none, however, knowing the cause which kept him from so select and distinguished an assembly. As soon as Mr. Gammon had seen him properly attended to, and expressed an anxious sympathy for him, he set out for a walk—a quiet solitary walk round the ancient walls of York. If on a fine night you look up into the sky, and see it gleaming with innumerable stars, and then fix your eye intently, without winking, upon some one star; however vivid and brilliant may be those in its immediate vicinity, they will disappear utterly, and that on which your eye is fixed will seem alone in its glory—sole star in the firmament. Something of this kind happened with Mr. Gammon when on the walls of York—now slowly, then rapidly walking, now standing, then sitting; all the objects which generally occupied his thoughts faded away, before one on which his mind's eye was then fixed with unwavering intensity—the visage of Miss Aubrey. The golden fruit that was on the eve of dropping into the hands of the firm—ten thousand pounds—the indefinite and varied advantages to himself, personally, to which their recent successes might be turned, all vanished. What would he not undergo, what would he not sacrifice, to secure the favor of Miss Aubrey? Beautiful being—all innocence, elegance, refinement; to possess her would elevate him in the scale of being; it would purify his feelings, it would ennoble his nature. What was too arduous or desperate to be undertaken to secure a prize so glorious as this? He fell into a long reverie, till, roused by a chill gust of night air, he rose from his seat upon one of the niches in the walls—how lonely, how solitary he felt! He walked on rapidly, at a pace that suited the heated and rapid current of thoughts that passed through his mind.

"No, I have not a chance—not a chance!" at length he thought to himself—"That girl will be prouder in her poverty, than ever she would have been in her wealth and splendor. Who am I? a partner in the firm of Quirk, Gammon and Snap; a firm in bad odor with the profession; looking for practice from polluted sources, with a host of miscreants for clients—laugh! laugh! I feel contaminated and degraded! My name even is against me; it is growing into a by-word! We must push our advantage—they must be driven from Yatton—he, she—all of them; yes, all." He paused for a long time, and a sort of pang passed through his mind. "They are to make way for Titmouse!—for Titmouse!! And he, too, loves her—bah!" He involuntarily uttered this sound fiercely and aloud. "But stay—he really is in love with Miss Aubrey—that I know;—ah! I can turn it to good purpose; it will give me, by the way, a hold upon the little fool; I will make him believe that through my means he may obtain Miss Aubrey! Misery may make her accessible; I can easily bring myself in contact with them, in their distress; for there are the same profits—the same profits. My God! how glorious, but how dreadful an engine are they. They will help to batter down the high wall of pride that surrounds them and her; but it will require infinite care and tact in the use of such an engine! I will be all delicacy—gentleness—generosity; I will appear friendly to her and her brother; and if needs must be, why, he must be crushed. There is no help for it. He looks decidedly a man of intellect. I wonder how he bears it, how they all bear it, how she bears it! Beggarly beauty—there's something touching in the very sound! How little they think of the power that is at this moment in my hands!" Here a long interval elapsed, during which his thoughts had wandered towards more practical matters. "If they don't get a rule nisi, next term, we shall be in a position to ask them what course they intend to pursue: Gad, they may, if so disposed, hold out for—how very cold it is!" He buttoned his coat—"and, what have I been thinking of? Really I have been dreaming; or am I as great a fool as Littlebat?" Within a few minutes' time he had quitted the walls, and descended through one of the turreted gateways into the town.

When, about seven o'clock on the morning after the delivery of the verdict, which, if sustained, consigned the Aubreys to beggary, they met to partake of a slight and hasty breakfast before setting off for Yatton; the countenances of each bore the traces of great suffering, and also of the efforts made to conceal it. They saluted each other with fervent affection, each attempting a smile—but a smile how wan and forced! "The moment has arrived, dear Agnes and Kate," said her brother, with a fond air, but a firm voice, as his sister was preparing tea in silence, fearful of looking at either her brother or sister-in-law; "the moment has arrived that is to try what stuff we are made of. If we have any strength, this is the time to show it!"

"I'm sure I thought of you both almost all night long!" replied Miss Aubrey, tremulously. "You have a lion's heart, dear Charles; and yet you are so gentle with us!"

"I should be a poor creature indeed, Kate, to give way just when I ought to play the man. Come, dear Kate, I will remind you of a noble passage from our glorious Shakespeare. It braces one's nerves to hear it!" Then, with a fine impressive delivery, and kindling with excitement as he went on, Aubrey began—

"In the reproof of chance
Lies the true proof of men. The sea being smooth,
How many shallow bauble boats dare sail
Upon her patient breast, making their way
With those of nobler bulk?
But let the ruffian Boreas once enrage
The gentle Thetis, and anon, behold
The strong-ribbed bark through liquid mountains cut,
Bounding between the two moist elements
Like Perseus' horse; where 's then the saucy boat,
Whose weak uneven sides but even now
Co-rival'd greatness? Either to harbor fled,
Or made a toast for Neptune!—Even so,
Doth valor show, and valer's worth divide,
In storms of fortune."*

"It was kindly meant of Aubrey: he thought to divert the excited feelings of his wife and sister, and occupy their imagination with the vivid imagery and noble sentiment of the poet. While he repeated the above lines, his sister's eye had been fixed upon him with a radiant expression of resolution, her heart responding to what she heard. She could not, however, speak when he had ceased. For herself she cared not; but when she looked at her brother, and thought of him, his wife, his children, her fortitude yielded before the moving array, and she burst into tears.

"Come, Kate! my own sweet, good Kate!" said he, cheerfully, laying his hand upon hers, "we must keep constant guard against our feelings. They will be ever arraying before our eyes the past—the dear, delightful past—happy and beautiful in mournful contrast with the present, and stirring up every moment a thousand secret and tender associations, calculated to shake our constancy. When—ever our eyes do turn to the past, let it be with humble gratitude to God for having allowed us all, in this changing world, so long an interval of happiness; such, indeed, as falls to the lot of few. What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?"

"My own Charles!" exclaimed Mrs. Aubrey, rising and throwing her arms round her husband, whose countenance was calm and serene, as was the tone of the sentiments he expressed solemn and elevated. Miss Aubrey was overcome with her stronger feelings, and buried her face in her handkerchief. Shortly afterwards the carriage drew up, and also Dr. Tatham, on horseback.

"Good morning! good morning, my friends," cried he, cheerfully, as he entered, holding forth both his hands; "you can't think how fresh and pleasant the air is! The country for me, at all times of the year! I hate towns! Did you sleep well? I slept like a top all night long;—no I didn't, either, by the way. Come, come, ladies! On with your bonnets and shawls!" Thus rattled on worthy little Dr. Tatham, in order to prevent any thing being said which might disturb those whom he came to see, or cause his own highly-charged feelings to give way. The sight of Mrs. and Miss Aubrey, however, who greeted him in silence as they hastily drew on their bonnets and shawls, overcame his ill-assumed cheerfulness; and before he could bumble back, as he presently did, to the street door, his eyes were obstructed with tears, and he wrung the hand of Mr. Aubrey, who stood beside him, with convulsive energy. They soon set off, and at a rapid pace, Dr. Tatham riding along beside the carriage. Yatton was about twelve miles off. For the first few miles they preserved a tolerable show of cheerfulness; but as they perceived themselves nearing Yatton, it became plainly more and more of an effort for any of them to speak. Dr. Tatham, also, talked to them seldom through the windows; at one time he dropped considerably behind; at another, he rode as much ahead.

"Oh, Charles, don't you dread to see Yatton?" said Miss Aubrey suddenly, as they turned a familiar corner of the road. Neither of them replied to her.

"When you come to the village," said Mr. Aubrey, presently, to the postillion, "drive through it, right up to the hall, as quickly as you can."

He was obeyed. As they passed through the village, with their windows up, none of them seemed disposed to look through, but leaned back, in silence, in their seats.

"God bless you; God bless you; I shall call in the evening!" exclaimed Dr. Tatham; as, having reached the vicarage, he hastily waved his hand, and turned off. Soon they had passed the park gates: when had they entered it before with such heavy hearts—with eyes so dreading to encounter every familiar object that met them? Alas! the spacious park was no longer theirs; not a tree, not a shrub, not a flower, not an inch of ground; the trees all putting forth the fresh green leaves—nothing was theirs; the fine old turreted gateway, an object, always, hitherto, of peculiar pride and attachment, their hearts seemed to tremble as they rattled under it.

"Courage, my sweet loves! Courage! courage!" exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, grasping each of their hands, and then they burst into tears. Mr. Aubrey felt his own fortitude grievously shaken as he entered the old hall, no longer his home, and reflected that he had been hitherto the wrongful occupant of it; that he must forthwith proceed to "set his house in order," and prepare for a reckoning with him whom the law had declared to be the true owner of Yatton.

The former result of the trial at York, was, as has been already intimated, to declare Mr. Titmouse entitled to recover possession of only that insignificant portion of the estates held by Jacob Jolter, and that, too, only in the event of the first four days of the ensuing term elapsing without any successful attempt being made to impeach, before the court, the propriety of the verdict of the jury. It is a principle of our English law, that the verdict of a jury is, in general, irreversible and conclusive; but, inasmuch as that verdict may have been improperly obtained—as, for instance, either through the misdirection of the judge, or his erroneous admission or rejection of evidence; or may have no force in point of law, by reason of the pleadings of the party for whom it has been given, being insufficient to warrant the court to award its final judgement upon, and according to, such verdict, or by reason of the discovery of fresh evidence, subsequently to the trial; therefore, the law hath given the party who failed at the trial, till the end of the first four days of the term next ensuing, to show the court why the verdict obtained by his opponent ought to go for nothing, and matters remain as they were before the trial, or a new trial be had. So anxious is our law to afford the utmost scope and opportunity for ascertaining what ought to be its decision, which, when obtained, is, as hath been said, solemnly and permanently conclusive upon the subject; such the effectual and practical corrective of any error or miscarriage, in the working of that noble engine, trial by jury. Thus, then, it appears, that the hands of Mr. Titmouse and his advisers were at all events stayed till the first four days of the Easter term should have elapsed. During the considerable interval thus afforded to the advisers of Mr. Aubrey, his case, as it appeared upon the notes of his counsel, on their briefs, with the indirect assistance and corroboration derived from the shorthand writer's notes, underwent repeated and most anxious examination in all its parts and bearings, by all his legal advisers. It need hardly be said, that every point in the case favorable to their client had been distinctly and fully raised by the Attorney General, assisted by his very able juniors, Mr. Stirling and Mr. Crystal; and so was it with the counsel of Mr. Titmouse, as, indeed, the result showed. On subsequent examination, none of them could discover any false step, or any advantage that had been overlooked, or taken inefficiently. Independently of various astute objections taken by the Attorney General to the reception of several important portions of the plaintiff's evidence, the leading points relied on in favor of Mr. Aubrey were—the impropriety of Lord Widdrington's rejection of the deed of confirmation on account of the erasure in it; the effect of that deed, assuming the erasure not to have warranted its rejection; and several questions arising out of the doctrine of adverse possession, by which alone, it had been contended at the trial, that the claim of the descendants of Stephen Dreddington had been peremptorily and finally barred. Two very long consultations had been held at the Attorney-

General's chambers, attended by Mr. Stirling, Mr. Crystal, Mr. Mansfield, the three partners in the firm of Runnington and Company, Mr. Parkinson, and Mr. Aubrey—who had come up to town for the purpose alone. Greatly to the surprise of all of them, he stated most distinctly and emphatically, that he insisted on no ground of objection being taken against his opponent, except such as was strictly just, equitable, honorable, and conscientious. Rather than defeat him on mere technicalities—rather than avail himself of mere positive rules of law, while the right, as between man and man, was substantially in favor of his opponent—Mr. Aubrey declared, however absurd or Quixotic he might be thought, that he would—if he had them—lose fifty Yattons. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum. "You mean to say, Aubrey," interrupted the Attorney-General mildly, after listening for some time to his friend and client with evident interest and admiration of his pure and high-minded character—"that it would be unconscientious of you to avail yourself of a fixed and beneficial rule of law, established upon considerations of general equity and utility—such, for instance, as that of adverse possession in order to retain possession, while"—

"Pray, Mr. Attorney General, if I had lent you five hundred pounds seven or eight years ago, would you set up the statute of limitations against me when I asked for repayment?"

"Excuse me, Aubrey," replied the Attorney-General, with a faint blush upon his handsome and dignified features; "but how idle all this is! One would imagine that we were sitting in a school of casuistry! What are we met for, in the name of common sense? For what, but to prevent the rightful owner of property from being deprived of it by a trumpety accidental erasure in one of his title-deeds, which time has deprived him of the means of accounting for?" He then, in a very kind way, but with a dash of peremptoriness, requested that the case might be left in their hands, and that they might be given credit for resorting to nothing that was inconsistent with the nicest and most fastidious sense of honor. This observation put an end to an unprecedented interference; but if Mr. Aubrey supposed that it had any effect upon the Attorney General, he was mistaken; for of course that learned and eminent person secretly resolved to avail himself of every conceivable means, great and small, available for overturning the verdict, and securing the Aubreys in the possession of Yatton. He at the same time earnestly endeavored to moderate the expectations of his client, declaring that he was by no means sanguine as to the issue; that Lord Widdrington's rulings at Nisi Prius were very formidable things; in fact, rarely assailable; and then, again, the senior puisne judge of the court—Mr. Justice Grayley—had been consulted by Lord Widdrington at the trial, and concurred with him in his principal ruling, now sought to be moved against. At the close of the second consultation, on the night of the first day in Easter term, (the Attorney-General intending to move on the ensuing morning,) after having finally gone over the case in all its bearings, and agreed upon the exact grounds of moving—the Attorney-General called back Mr. Runnington for a moment, as he was walking away with Mr. Aubrey, and whispered to him, that it would be very proper to assume at once that the motion failed; and consider the best mode of negotiating concerning the surrender of the bulk of the property, and the payment of the mesne profits.

"Oh, Mr. Aubrey has quite made up his mind to the worst, Mr. Attorney-General."

"Ah, well!" replied the Attorney-General with a sigh; and about five minutes after Mr. Runnington's departure, the Attorney-General stepped into his carriage, which had been standing for the last hour opposite his chambers. He drove down to the House of Commons, where he almost immediately after delivered a long and luminous speech on one of the most important and intricate questions that had been discussed during the session. The first four days of term are an awkward interval equally to incompetent counsel and incompetent judges—when such there are. The slips of both then come to light; both have to encounter the keen and vigilant scrutiny of a learned, acute, and independent body—the English bar. If a judge should happen to be in any degree unequal to the exigencies of his important station—incompetent for the due discharge of his difficult functions at Nisi Prius—what a store of anxiety and mortification accumulates at every circuit town against the ensuing term; where his misrulings are distinctly and boldly brought under the notice of the full court and the assembled bar! What must be his feelings, as he becomes aware that all interested in the matter look out for a plentiful crop of new trials from the circuit which he has selected to favor with his presence. Great causes lost, verdicts set aside, and new trials ordered, at an enormous, often a ruinous expense, entirely on account of his inability to seize the true points and bearings of a case, and present them properly to a jury, to apply accurately the principles of evidence! How exquisitely painful to suspect that as soon as his name is announced, the anxious attorneys withdraw records and postpone the trials of their chief causes, in all directions, trying no more than they can possibly help, in the hope that a more competent judge will take the circuit after; to become, every now and then, aware that counsel boldly speculate at the trial upon his inexperience and ignorance by impudent experiments, in flagrant violation of elementary principles. And then for incompetent counsel; is not his a similar position? Set to lead a cause, before a host of keen rivals, watching his every step with bitter scrutiny—feeling himself entirely at sea; bewildered among details; forgetting his points; losing his presence of mind; with no fixed principles of law to guide him; laid prostrate by a sudden objection, of which, when too late, and the mischief is done and irretrievable, he sees, or has explained to him the fallacy, and absurdity, and even audacity; discovering from indignant juniors, on setting down, that he has gone to the jury on quite the wrong tack, and in effect thrown the cause away; and although he creeps into court on the first four days of term, to endeavor to retrieve the false step he took at the trial; but in vain, and he dare not look his attorney in the face, as he is refused his rule. These and similar thoughts may, perhaps, on such occasions, be passing through the mind of a smirking sarcastic cynic, disappointed in his search for business, distanced in the race for promotion, as he sees the bench occupied with graceful dignity by men of acknowledged fitness, chosen from among the ower of the bar,—those most qualified by experience, learning, intellect, and moral character. I would say to an inquirer, go now into any one of the superior courts of your country—to any court of Nisi Prius in the kingdom; and if you are able to observe and appreciate what you see, you will acknowledge that in no single instance has the precious trust of administering justice been committed to unworthy and incompetent hands, whatever may have occasionally been the case in a former day. And in like manner may we rebuke our cynic, in respect of his disparaging estimate of the leading bar.

The spectacle presented by the court in banc, to a thoughtful observer, is interesting and imposing. Here, for instance, was the Court of King's Bench, presided over by Lord Widdrington, with three puisne judges—all men of powerful understanding, of great experience, and of deep and extensive legal knowledge. Observe the dignified calmness and patience with which counsel are listened to; verbose even and tiresome as occasionally they are; the judges not deranging their thoughts, or the order in which the argument has been, with much anxiety and care, prepared for them beforehand—by incessant suggestions of crude and hasty impressions—but suspending their judgment till fully possessed of the case brought before them by one whom his client has thought fit to intrust with the conduct of the case. They never interfere but in extreme cases, when the time of the court is being plainly wasted by loose irrelevant matter. Their demeanor is characterized by grave courtesy and forbearance; and any occasional interference is received by the bar with profound respect and anxious attention. Never is to be seen in any of our courts the startling spectacle of personal collision between judge and counsel—each endeavoring to rival the other in the exhibition of acuteness and ingenuity. On the contrary, a thoughtful observer of what goes on in any of our courts, will believe that our judges have considered the truth of that saying of Seneca—Nisi sapientia odiosius acuminis sumus; and modelled themselves after the great portraiture of the judicial office drawn by the most illustrious of philosophers.

Patience and gravity of bearing are an essential part of justice; and an over-speaking judge is no well-tuned cymbal. Judges ought to be more learned than witty; more reverend than plausible; and more advised than confident. It is no grace to a judge first to find that which he might have heard in due time from the bar; or to show quickness of conceit, in cutting off evidence, or counsel, too short, or to prevent information by questions, though pertinent. Our English judges are indeed worthy of the affection and reverence with which, both in public and private, they are regarded; and if any one will consider their severe and almost uninterrupted labors—the toil and weight of responsibility they bear, equalled by that of no other public functionaries—he will doubly appreciate the courtesy and forbearance which are exhibited by them, and forget any transient glimpses of asperity or impatience on the part of men exhausted frequently by both bodily and mental labor. But I forgot that I had brought the reader into the Court of King's Bench, where he has been standing all this while, watching Lord Widdrington “go through the bar,” as it is termed; namely, calling on all the counsel present, in the order of their seniority, or position, to make any little motion, or source, before proceeding with the principal business of the day. One learned gentleman moved, for instance, to discharge a fraudulent debtor out of custody, so that he might start off for the continent and avoid a debt of £3000, because, in the copy of the writ, the word was “sheriff,” and in the writ itself, “sheriffs;” and in this motion he succeeded, greatly to the astonishment of Mr. Aubrey.

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH,

Book the Second.... Mary the Queen.

XXXIII.... How Nightgall was bribed by De Noailles to assassinate Simon Renard; and how Jane's death-warrant was signed.

The Tower was now thronged with illustrious prisoners. All the principal personages concerned in the late rebellion, with the exception of Sir Peter Carew, who had escaped to France, were confined within its walls; and the Queen and the council were unremittingly employed in their examinations. The Duke of Suffolk had written and subscribed his confession, throwing himself upon the royal mercy; Lord Guilford Dudley, who was slowly recovering from his wound, refused to answer any interrogatories; while Sir Thomas Wyatt, whose constancy was shaken by the severity of the torture to which he was exposed, admitted his treasonable correspondence with Elizabeth and Courtenay, and charged De Noailles with being the originator of the plot. The latter was likewise a prisoner. But as it was not the policy of England, at that period, to engage in a war with France, he was merely placed under personal restraint until an answer could be received from Henry the Second, to whom letters had been sent by Mary.

Well instructed as to the purport of these despatches, and confident of his sovereign's protection, De Noailles felt little uneasiness as to his situation, and did not even despair of righting himself by some master-stroke. His grand object was to remove Renard; and as he could not now accomplish this by fair means, he determined to have recourse to foul; and to procure his assassination. Confined, with certain of his suite, within the Flint Tower, he was allowed, at stated times, to take exercise on the Green, and in other parts of the fortress, care being taken to prevent him from holding communication with the other prisoners, or, indeed, with any one except his attendants. De Noailles, however, had a ready and unsuspected instrument at hand. This was his jailor, Lawrence Nightgall, with whom he had frequent opportunities of conversing, and whom he had already sounded on the subject. Thus, while every dungeon in the fortress was filled with the victims of his disastrous intrigues; while its subterranean chambers echoed with the groans of the tortured; while some expired upon the rack, others were secretly executed, and the public scaffold was prepared for sufferers of the highest rank; while the axe and the block were destined to frequent and fearful employment, and the ensanguined ground thirsted for the best and purest blood in England; while such was the number of captives that all the prisons in London were insufficient to contain them, and they were bestowed within the churches; while twenty pairs of gallows were erected in the public places of the city, and the offenders with whom they were loaded left to rot upon them as a terrible example to the disaffected; while universal dread and lamentation prevailed,—the known author of all this calamity remained, from prudential reasons, unpunished, and pursued his dark and dangerous machinations as before.

One night, when he was alone, Nightgall entered his chamber, and, closing the door, observed, with a mysterious look,—“Your excellency has thrown out certain dark hints to me of late. You can speak safely now, and I pray you do so plainly. What do you desire me to do?”

De Noailles looked scrutinizingly at him, as if he feared some treachery. But at length, appearing satisfied, he said abruptly, “I desire Renard's assassination. His destruction is of the utmost importance to my king.”

“It is a great crime,” observed Nightgall, musingly.

“The reward will be proportionate,” rejoined De Noailles.

“What does your excellency offer?” asked Nightgall.

“A thousand angels of gold,” replied the ambassador, “and a post at the court of France if you will fly thither when the deed is done.”

“By my troth, a tempting offer,” rejoined Nightgall. “But I am under obligations to M. Simon Renard. He appointed me to my present place. It would appear ungrateful to kill him.”

“Pshaw!” exclaimed De Noailles, contemptuously. “You are not the man to let such idle scruples stand in the way of your fortune. Renard only promoted you because you were useful to him. And he would sacrifice you as readily, if it suited his purpose. He will serve you better dead than living.”

“It is a bargain,” replied Nightgall. “I have the keys of the subterranean passages, and can easily get out of the Tower when I have despatched him. Your excellency can fly with me if you think proper.”

“On no account,” rejoined De Noailles. “I must not appear in the matter. Come to me when the deed is done, and I will furnish you with means for your flight, and with a letter to the king of France, which shall ensure you your reward when you reach Paris. But it must be done quickly.”

“It shall be done to-morrow night,” replied Nightgall. “Fortunately, M. Renard has chosen for his lodgings the chamber in the Bloody Tower in which the two princes were murdered.”

“A fitting spot for his own slaughter,” remarked De Noailles, dryly.

“It is so, in more ways than one,” replied Nightgall; “for I can approach him unawares by a secret passage, through which, when all is over, escape will be easy.”

“Good!” exclaimed De Noailles, rubbing his hands gleefully. “I should like to be with you at the time. Mordieu! how I hate that man. He has thwarted all my schemes. But I shall now have my revenge. Take this ring and this purse in earnest of what is to follow, and mind you strike home.”

“Fear nothing,” replied Nightgall, smiling grimly, and playing with his dagger; “the blow shall not need to be repeated. Your excellency's plan chimes well with a project of my own. There is a maiden whom I have long sought, but vainly, to make my bride. I will carry her off with me to France.”

“She will impede your flight,” observed De Noailles, hastily. “On all difficult occasions, women are sadly in the way.”

“I cannot leave her,” rejoined Nightgall.

“Take her, then, in the devil's name,” rejoined De Noailles, peevishly; “and if she brings you to the gallows, do not forget my warning.”

“My next visit shall be to tell you your enemy is no more,” returned Nightgall. “Before midnight to-morrow, you may expect me.” And he quitted the chamber.

While his destruction was planned in the manner above-related, Simon Renard was employing all his art to crush by one fell stroke all the heads of the Protestant party. But he met with opposition from quarters where he did not anticipate it. Though the queen was convinced of Elizabeth's participation in the plot, as well from Wyatt's confession, who owned that he had written to her during his march to London, offering to proclaim her queen, and had received favorable answers from her,—as from the declaration of a son of Lord Russell, to the effect, that he had delivered the despatches into her own hand, and brought back her replies;—notwithstanding this, Mary refused to pass sentence upon her, and affected to believe her innocent. Neither would she deal harshly with Courtenay, though equally satisfied of his guilt; and Renard, unable to penetrate her motives, began to apprehend that she still nourished a secret attachment to him. The truth was, the princess and her lover had a secret friend in Gardiner, who counteracted the sanguinary designs of the ambassador. Baffled in this manner, Renard determined to lose no time with the others. Already, by his agency, the Duke of Suffolk, Lord Thomas Grey, and Wyatt, were condemned—Dudley and Jane alone were wanting to the list.

Touched by a strong feeling of compassion for their youth, and yet more by the devotion Jane had exhibited to her husband, Mary hesitated to sign their death-warrant. She listened to all Renard's arguments with attention, but they failed to move her. She could not bring herself to put a period to the existence of one whom she knew to be so pure, so lovely, so loving, so blameless, as Jane. But Renard was determined to carry his point.

“I will destroy them all,” he said; “but I will begin with Dudley and Jane, and end with Courtenay and Elizabeth.”

During the examination of the conspirators, the queen, though she had moved her court to Whitehall, passed much of her time at the Tower, occupied in reading the depositions of the prisoners, or in framing interrogatories to put to them. She also wrote frequent despatches to the emperor, whose counsel she asked in her present difficulties; and while thus occupied, she was often closeted for hours with Renard.

Whether by accident, or that the gloomy legend connected with it, harmonising with his own sombre thoughts, gave it an interest in his eyes, Renard had selected for his present lodging in the Tower, as intimated by Nightgall, the chamber in which the two youthful princes were destroyed. It might be that its contiguity to the Hall Tower, where Mary now for the most part held her conferences with her council, and with which it was connected by a secret passage, occasioned this selection—or he might have been influenced by other motives—suffice it to say he there took up his abode; and was frequently visited within it by Mary.

Occupying the upper story of the Bloody Tower, this mysterious chamber looks on the north upon the ascent leading to the Green, and on the south upon Saint Thomas's Tower. It is now divided into two rooms, by a screen—that to the south being occupied as a bed-chamber; and tradition asserts, that in this part of the room the “piece of ruthless butchery,” which stamps it with such fearful interest, was perpetrated. On the same side, between the outer wall and the chamber, runs a narrow passage communicating on the west with the ballium wall, and thence with the lieutenant's lodgings, by which the murderers are said to have approached; and in the inner part is a window, through which they gazed upon their sleeping victims. On the east, the passage communicates with a circular staircase, descending to a small vaulted chamber at the right of the gateway, where the bodies were interred. In later times, this mysterious room has been used as a prison-lodging. It was occupied by Lord Ferrers during his confinement in the Tower, and more recently by the conspirators Watson and Thistlewood.

On the evening appointed by Nightgall for the assassination of Renard, the proposed victim and the queen were alone within this chamber. The former had renewed all his arguments, and with greater force than ever, and seeing he had produced the desired impression, he placed before her the warrant for the execution of Jane and her husband.

“Your majesty will never wear your crown easily till you sign that paper,” he said.

“I shall never wear it easily afterwards,” sighed Mary. “Do you not remember Jane's words? She told me, I should be fortunate in my union, and my race should continue upon the throne, if I spared her husband. They seem to me prophetic. If I sign this warrant, I may destroy my own happiness.”

“Your highness will be not turned from your purpose by such idle fears,” rejoined Renard, in as sarcastic a tone as he dared assume. “Not only your throne may be endangered, if you suffer them to live, but the Catholic religion.”

“True,” replied Mary, “I will no longer hesitate.”

And she attached her signature to the warrant.

Renard watched her with a look of such fiendish exultation, that an unseen person who gazed at the moment into the room, seeing a tall dark figure, dilated by the gloom, for it was deepening twilight, and a countenance from which everything human was banished, thought he beheld a demon, and fascinated by terror, could not withdraw his eyes. At the same moment, too, the queen's favourite dog, which was couched at her feet, and for a short time previously had been uttering a low growl, now broke into a fierce bark, and sprang towards the passage-window. Mary turned to ascertain the cause of the animal's disquietude, and perceived that if had stiffened in every joint, while its barking changed to a dismal howl. Not without misgiving, she glanced towards the window—and there, at the very place whence she had often heard that the murderers had gazed upon the slumbering innocents before the bloody deed was done—there, between those bars, she beheld a hideous black mask, through the holes of which glared a pair of flashing orbs.

Repressing a cry of alarm, she called Renard's attention to the object, when she was equally startled by his appearance. He seemed transfixed with horror, with his right hand extended toward the mysterious object, and clenched, while the left grasped his sword. Suddenly, he regained his consciousness, and drawing his rapier, dashed to the door,—but ere he could open it, the mask had disappeared. He hurried along the passage in the direction of the lieutenant's lodgings, when he encountered some one who appeared to be advancing towards him. Seizing this person by the throat and presenting his sword to breast, he found from the voice that it was Nightgall.

NIGHT AND MORNING.

CHAPTER IV.

“For a man is helpless and vain, of a condition so exposed to calamity that a raisin is able to kill him: any trooper out of the Egyptian army—a fly can do it, when it goes on God's errand.”—JEREMY TAYLOR: On the Deceitfulness of the Heart.

The two brothers sat at their wine after dinner. Robert sipped claret, the sturdy Philip quaffed his more generous port. Catharine and the boys might be seen at a little distance, and by the light of a soft August moon, among the shrubs and bosquets of the lawn.

Philip Beaufort was about five-and-forty, tall, robust, nay, of great strength of frame and limb, with a countenance extremely winning, not only from the comeliness of its features, but its frankness, manliness, and good-nature. His was the bronzed, rich complexion, the inclination towards embonpoint, the athletic girth of chest, which denote redundant health, and mirthful temper, and sanguine blood. Robert, who had lived the life of cities, was a year younger than his brother; nearly as tall, but pale, meager, stooping, and with a careworn, anxious, hungry look, which made the smile that hung upon his lips seem hollow and artificial. His dress, though plain, was neat and studied; his manner, bland and plausible; his voice, sweet and low; there was that about him which, if it did not win liking, tended to excite respect: a certain decorum, a nameless propriety of appearance and bearing, that approached formality: his very movement, slow and measured, was that of one who paced in the circle that fences round the habits and usages of the world.

“Yes,” said Philip, “I had always decided to take this step whenever my poor uncle's death should allow me to do so. You have seen Catharine, but you do not know half her good qualities: she would grace any station: and besides, she nursed me so carefully last year, when I broke my collar bone in that cursed steeple-chase. Egad, I am getting too heavy and growing too old for such schoolboy pranks."

"I have no doubt of Mrs. Morton's excellence, and I honor your motives; still, when you talk of her gracing any station, you must not forget, my dear brother, that she will be no more received as Mrs. Beaufort than she is now as Mrs. Morton."

"But I tell you, Robert, that I am really married to her already; that she would never have left her home but on that condition; that we were married the very day we met after her flight."

Robert's thin lips broke into a slight sneer of incredulity. "My dear brother, you do right to say this: any man in your situation would. But I knew that my uncle took every pains to ascertain if the report of a private marriage were true."

"And you helped him in the search. Eh, Bob?"

Bob slightly blushed. Philip went on:

"Ha, ha, to be sure you did; you knew that such a discovery would have done for me in the old gentleman's good opinion. But I blinded you both, ha, ha! The fact is, that we were married with the greatest privacy; that even now, I own, it would be difficult for Catharine herself to establish the fact unless I wished it. I am ashamed to think that I have never even told her where I keep the main proof of the marriage. I induced one witness to leave the country, the other must be long since dead: my poor friend, too, who officiated, is no more. Even the register, Bob, the register itself has been destroyed; and yet, notwithstanding, I will prove the ceremony, and clear up poor Catharine's fame; for I have the attested copy of the register safe and sound. Catharine not married! Why, look at her, man!"

Mr. Robert Beaufort glanced at the window for a moment, but his countenance was still that of one unconvinced.

"Well, brother," said he, dipping his fingers in the water glass, "it is not for me to contradict you. It is a very curious tale—parson dead—witnesses missing. But still, as I said before, if you are resolved on a public marriage, you are wise to insist that there has been a previous private one. Yet, believe me, Philip," continued Robert, with solemn earnestness, "the world—"

"D—the world! What do I care for the world? We do not want to go to routs and balls, and give dinners to fine people. I shall live much the same as I have always done; only I shall now keep the hounds—they are very indifferently kept at present—and have a yacht, and engage the best masters for the boys. Phil wants to go to Eton; but I know what Eton is. Poor fellow! his feelings might be hurt there, if others are as skeptical as yourself. I suppose my old friends will not be less civil now I have £20,000 a year. And as for the society of women, between you and me, I do not care a rush for any woman but Catharine: poor Kitty!"

"Well, you are the best judge of your own affairs: you do not misinterpret my motives?"

"My dear Bob, no. I am quite sensible how kind it is in you—a man of your starch habits and strict views—coming here to pay a mark of respect to Kate—(Mr. Robert turned uneasily in his chair)—even before you knew of the private marriage; and I am sure I do not blame you for never having done it before. You did quite right to try your chance with my uncle."

Mr. Robert turned in his chair again, still more uneasily, and cleared his voice as if to speak. But Philip tossed off his wine, and proceeded without heeding his brother:

"And though the poor old man does not seem to have liked you the better for consulting his scruples, yet we must make up for the partiality of his will. Let me see—what, with your wife's fortune you muster £2,000 a year."

"Only £1500, Philip, and Arthur's education is growing expensive. Next year he goes to college. He is certainly very clever, and I have great hopes—"

"That he will do honor to us all—so have I. He is a noble young fellow; and I think my Philip may find a great deal to learn from him. Phil is a sad, idle dog, but with a devil of a spirit, and sharp as a needle. I wish you could see him ride. Well, to return to Arthur. Do not trouble yourself about his education: that shall be my care. He shall go to Christ Church—a gentleman-commoner, of course—and when he's of age we'll get him into Parliament. Now for yourself, Bob. I shall sell the town-house in Berkeley Square, and whatever it brings you shall have. I'll add £1500 a year to your £1500—so that's said and done. Pahaw! brothers should be brothers. Let's come out and play with the boys!"

The two Beauforts stepped through the open casement into the lawn.

"You look pale, Bob—all you London fellows do. As for me, I feel as strong as a horse; much better than when I was one of your gay dogs, straying loose about the town! 'Gad! I have never had a moment's ill health, except a fall now and then: I feel as if I should live for ever, and that's the reason why I could never make a will.'"

"Have you never, then, made your will?"

"Never as yet. Faith, till now, I had little enough to leave. But now that all this great Beaufort property is at my own disposal, I must think of Kate's jointure. By Jove! now I speak of it, I will ride to **** to-morrow, and consult the lawyer there both about the will and the marriage. You will stay for the wedding?"

"Why, I must go into shire to-morrow evening, to place Arthur with his tutor. But I'll return for the wedding, if you particularly wish it: only Mrs. Beaufort is a woman of very strict—"

"I do particularly wish it," interrupted Philip, gravely; "for I desire, for Catharine's sake, that you, my sole surviving relation, may not seem to withhold your countenance from an act of justice to her. And as for your wife, I fancy £1500 a year would reconcile her to my marrying out of the Penitentiary."

Mr. Robert bowed his head, coughed huskily, and said, "I appreciate your generous affection, Philip."

The next morning, while the elder parties were still over the breakfast table, the young people were in the grounds: it was a lovely day, one of the last of the luxuriant August; and Arthur, as he looked round, thought he had never seen a more beautiful place. It was, indeed, just the spot to captivate a youthful and susceptible fancy. The village of Fernside, though in one of the counties adjoining Middlesex, and as near to London as the owner's passionate pursuits of the field would permit, was yet as rural and sequestered as if a hundred miles distant from the smoke of the huge city. Though the dwelling was called a cottage, Philip had enlarged the original modest building into a villa of some pretensions. On either side a graceful and well-proportioned portico stretched verandahs, covered with roses and clematis; to the right extended a range of costly conservatories, terminating in vistas of trellis-work, which formed those elegant allies called roseries, and served to screen the more useful gardens from view. The lawn, smooth and even, was studded with American plants and shrubs in flower, and bounded on one side by a small lake, on the opposite bank of which limes and cedars threw their shadows over the clear waves. On the other side, a light fence separated the grounds from a large paddock, in which three or four hunters grazed in indolent enjoyment. It was one of those cottages which bespeak the ease and luxury not often found in more ostentatious mansions: an abode which the visitor of sixteen contemplates with vague notions of poetry and love—which at forty he might think dull and expensive—which at sixty he would pronounce to be damp in winter, and full of earwigs in the summer. Master Philip was leaning on his favorite gun; Master Sidney was chasing a peacock butterfly; Arthur was silently gazing on the shining lake and the still foliage that drooped over its surface. In the countenance of this young man there was something that excited a certain interest. He was less handsome than Philip, but the expression of his face was more prepossessing. There was something of pride in the forehead; but of good-nature, not unmixed with irresolution and weakness, in the curves of the mouth. He was more delicate of frame than Philip; and the color of his complexion was not that of a robust constitution. His movements were graceful and self-possessed, and he had his father's sweetness of voice.

"This is really beautiful! I envy you, cousin Philip."

"Has not your father got a country-house?"

"No: we live either in London or at some hot, crowded, watering-place."

"Yes; this is very nice during the shooting and hunting season. But my old nurse says we shall have a much finer place now. I liked this very well till I saw Lord Belville's place. But it is very unpleasant not to have the finest house in the county: aut Caesar aut nihil—that's my motto. Ah! do you see that swallow? I'll bet you a guinea I hit it."

"No, poor thing! don't hurt it." But, ere the remonstrance was uttered, the bird lay quivering on the ground. "It is just September, and one must keep one's hand in," said Philip, as he reloaded his gun.

To Arthur this action seemed a wanton cruelty; it was rather the wanton recklessness which belongs to a wild boy accustomed to gratify the impulse of the moment; the recklessness which is not cruelty in the boy, but which prosperity may pamper into cruelty in the man. And scarce had he reloaded his gun before the neigh of a young colt came from the neighboring paddock, and Philip bounded to the fence. "He calls me, poor fellow; you shall see him feed from my hand. Run in for a piece of bread—a large piece, Sidney." The boy and the animal seemed to understand each other. "I see you don't like horses," he said to Arthur. "As for me, I love dogs, horses—every dumb creature."

"Except swallows!" said Arthur, with a half smile, and a little surprised at the inconsistency of the boast.

"Oh! that is sport—all fair: it is not to hurt the swallow—it is to obtain skill," said Philip, coloring; and then, as if not quite easy with his own definition, he turned away abruptly.

"This is dull work: suppose we fish. By Jove! (he had caught his father's expletive,) that blockhead has put the tent on the wrong side of the lake, after all. Holla, you, sir!" and the unhappy gardener looked up from his flower-bed; "what ails you? I have a great mind to tell my father of you: you grow stupider every day. I told you to put the tent under the lime-trees."

"We could not manage it, sir; the boughs were in the way."

"And why did not you cut the boughs, blockhead?"

"I did not dare do so, sir, without master's orders," said the man, doggedly.

"My orders are sufficient, I should think: so none of your impertinence," cried Philip, with a raised color; and lifting his hand, in which he held his ramrod, he shook it menacingly over the gardener's head; "I've a great mind to—"

"What's the matter, Philip?" cried the good-humored voice of his father: "fy!"

"This fellow does not mind what I say, sir."

"I did not like to cut the boughs of the lime-trees without your orders, sir," said the gardener.

"No, it would be a pity to cut them. You should consult me there, Master Philip;" and the father shook him by the collar with a good-natured and affectionate, but rough sort of caress.

"Be quiet, father!" said the boy, petulantly and proudly; "or," he added, in a lower voice, but one which showed emotion, "my cousin may think you mean less kindly than you always do, sir."

The mother was behind, and she sighed audibly, "Ah! dearest, I fear you will spoil him."

"Is he not your son—and do we not owe him the more respect for having hitherto allowed others to—"

He stopped, and the mother could say no more. And thus it was that this boy of powerful character and strong passions had, from motives the most amiable, been pampered from the darling into the despot.

"And now, Kate, I will, as I told you last night, ride over to—, and fix the earliest day for our marriage. I will ask the lawyer to dine here, to talk about the proper steps for proving the private one."

"Will that be difficult?" asked Catharine, with natural anxiety.

"No; for, if you remember, I had the precaution to get an examined copy of the register; otherwise, I own to you, I should have been alarmed. I don't know what has become of Smith. I heard some time since from his father that he had left the colony; and (I never told you before—it would have made you uneasy) once, a few years ago, when my uncle again got it into his head that we might be married, I was afraid poor Caleb's successor might, by chance, betray us. So I went over to A— myself, being near it when I was staying with Lord C—, in order to see how far it might be necessary to secure the parson; and, only think! I found an accident had happened to the register: so, as the clergyman could know nothing, I kept my own council. How lucky I have the copy! No doubt the lawyer will set all to rights; and, while I am making settlements, I may as well make my will. I have plenty for both boys, but the dark one must be the heir. Does he not look born to be an eldest son?"

"Ah, Philip!"

"Pshaw! one don't die the sooner for making a will. Have I the air of a man in a consumption?" and the sturdy sportsman glanced complacently at the strength and symmetry of his manly limbs. "Come, Phil, let's go to the stables. Now, Robert, I will show you what is better worth seeing than those miserable flower-beds." So saying, Mr. Beaufort led the way to the courtyard at the back of the cottage. Catharine and Sidney remained on the lawn, the rest followed the host. The groom, of whom Beaufort was the idol, hastened to show how well the horses had thriven in his absence.

"Do see how Brown Bess has come on, sir; but, to be sure, Master Philip keeps her in exercise. Ah, sir, he will be as good a rider as your honor one of these days."

"He ought to be, Tom, for I think he'll never have my weight to carry. Well, saddle Brown Bess for Mr. Philip. What horse shall I take? Ah! here's my old friend Puppet!"

"I don't know what's come to Puppet, sir: he's off his feed and turned sulky. I tried him over the bar yesterday, but he was quite restiff like."

"The devil he was! So, so, old boy, you shall go over the six-barred gate to-day, or we'll know why." And Mr. Beaufort patted the sleek neck of his favorite hunter. "Put the saddle on him, Tom."

"Yes, your honor. I sometimes think he is hurt in the loins somehow; he don't take to his leaps kindly, and he always tries to bite when we brides him. Be quiet, sir!"

"Only his airs," said Philip. "I did not know this, or I would have taken him over the gate. Why did not you tell me, Tom?"

"Lord love you, sir! because you have such a spurrel; and if anything had come to you—"

"Quite right; you are not weight enough for Puppet, my boy; and he never did like any one to back him but myself. What say you, brother; will you ride with us?"

"No, I must go to—to-day with Arthur. I have engaged the posthorses at two o'clock; but I shall be with you to-morrow or the day after. You see his tutor expects him; and as he is backward in his mathematics, he has no time to lose."

"Well, then, good-by, nephew!" and Beaufort slipped a pocket-book into the boy's hand. "Tush! whenever you want money, don't trouble your father—write to me; we shall be always glad to see you; and you must teach Philip to like his book a little better—eh, Phil?"

"No, father, I shall be rich enough to do without books," said Philip, rather coarsely; but then, observing the heightened color of his cousin, he went up to him, and with a generous impulse said, "Arthur, you admired this gun; pray accept it. Nay, do not be shy; I can have as many as I like for the asking: you're not so well off, you know."

The intention was kind, but the manner was so patronizing that Arthur felt offended. He put back the gun, and said dryly, "I shall have no occasion for a gun, thank you."

If Arthur was offended by the offer, Philip was much more offended by the refusal. "As you like; I hate pride," said he; and he gave the gun to the groom as he vaulted into his saddle with the lightness of a young Mercury. "Come, father!"

Mr. Beaufort had now mounted his favorite hunter: a large, powerful horse, well known for its prowess in the field.

The rider trotted him once or twice through the spacious yard.

"Nonsense, Tom: no more hurt in the loins than I am. Open that gate; we will go across the paddock, and take the gate yonder—the old six-bar—eh, Phil?"

"Capital! to be sure!"

The gate was opened; the grooms stood watchful to see the leap; and a kindred curiosity arrested Robert Beaufort and his son.

How well they looked, those two horsemen: the ease, lightness, spirit of the one, with the fine-limbed and fiery steed that literally "bounded beneath him as a barb," seemingly as gay, as ardent, and as haughty as the boy-rider. And the manly and almost Herculean form of the elder Beaufort, which, from the buoyancy of its movements, and the supple grace that belongs to the perfect mastery of any athletic art, possessed an elegance and dignity, especially on horseback, which rarely accompanies proportions equally sturdy and robust. There was, indeed, something knightly and chivalrous in the bearing of the elder Beaufort; in his handsome aquiline features, the erectness of his mien, the very wave of his hand as he spurred from the yard.

"What a fine-looking fellow my uncle is!" said Arthur, with involuntary admiration.

"Ay, an excellent life—amazingly strong!" returned the pale father, with a slight sigh.

"Philip," said Mr. Beaufort, as they cantered across the paddock, "I think the gate is too much for you. I will just take Puppet over, and then we will open it for you."

"Pooh, my dear father! you do not know how I'm improved!" And slackening the rein, and touching the side of his horse, the young rider darted forward and cleared the gate, which was of no common height, with an ease that extorted a loud bravo from the proud father.

"Now, Puppet," said Mr. Beaufort, spurring his own horse. The animal cantered towards the gate, and then suddenly turned round with an impatient and angry moan. "For shame, Puppet! for shame, old boy!" said the sportsman, wheeling him again to the barrier. The horse shook his head as if in remonstrance; but the spur, vigorously applied, showed him that his master would not listen to his mute reasonings. He bounded forward—made at the gate—struck his hoofs against the top bar—fell forward, and threw his rider head foremost on the road beyond. The horse rose instantly—not so the master. The sea dismounted, alarmed and terrified. His father was speechless! and blood gushed from the mouth and nostrils as the head drooped heavily on the boy's breast. The by-standers had witnessed the fall—they crowded to the spot—they took the fallen man from the weak arms of the son—the head groom examined him with the eye of one who had picked up science from his experience in such casualties.

"Speak, brother! where are you hurt?" exclaimed Robert Beaufort.

"He will never speak more," said the groom, bursting into tears. "His neck is broken!"

"Send for the nearest surgeon," cried Mr. Robert.

"Good God! boy! do n't meant that devilish horse!" But Arthur had already leaped on the unhappy steed which had been the cause of this appalling affliction. "Which way?"

"Straight on to ***** only two miles; every one knows Mr. Powis's house. God bless you!" said the groom.

Arthur vanished.

"Lift him carefully, and take him to the house," said Mr. Robert. "My poor brother! my dear brother!"

He was interrupted by a cry—a single, shrill, heart-breaking cry—and Philip fell senseless to the ground.

No one heeded him at that hour: no one heeded the fatherless BASTARD. "Gently, gently," said Mr. Robert, as he followed the servants and their load. And he then muttered to himself, and his pallid cheek grew bright, and his breath came short: "He has made no will! he never made a will!"

THE RECEIVERS OF THE DOCTRINES OF THE NEW JERUSALEM CHURCH,

As Revealed in the Writings of

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG,

TO

CHRISTIANS OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

BRETHREN: That some spiritual event is considered as near at hand by vast bodies of Christians throughout the world, is manifest. Within the last few years numerous volumes have been written to prove that the second coming of the Lord, or the Millennium, is not very distant, and some, from interpretations which they have given to the prophecies of Scripture, have even gone so far as to fix the period at a very early day. Some of the circumstances which have given rise to this wide-spread impression, are a more than ordinary spirit of inquiry into religious doctrines, which characterizes all sects of the church; an endeavour, hitherto unknown, to disseminate the truths of the gospel among the heathen nations, by missionaries, and by printing in their various languages the "glad tidings of great joy;" the prevalence of a less warlike spirit among some of the nations of Christendom, and a general disposition to reform civilized mankind by Sunday and infant-schools, by Bible and temperance societies, and by a great variety of institutions designed to advance religion, morals, and social happiness. That these "signs of the times" should be considered as the forerunners of some mighty event, is very natural; and when we behold the wonderful discoveries of science and philosophy, which, by means of steam, have brought nations and families nearer to each other, and by various improvements in the arts, have greatly augmented the powers of human production for the supply of physical wants, we are led to conclude that preparations are making for placing man in a more elevated position in the scale of being, than he has heretofore occupied; and especially as these improvements are accompanied by the means of introducing a more general education through public schools, and a cheaper acquisition of knowledge through the press.

But, notwithstanding all these displays of the Divine Agency, most of which have made their first appearance within the last fifty years, Christians are by no means agreed as to the precise time at which the anticipated event will take place, or, as to the particular circumstances with which it will be accompanied. With most of them there exists a mere belief in some undefined, incomprehensible event, the period of which human reason cannot ascertain, for, "of that day and hour knoweth no man," and which, in the opinion of some, an immediate revelation alone is competent to settle. But is an immediate revelation on this subject essential to that end? This is a question which deeply concerns the whole Christian church. Of the possibility of such a revelation no believer in the Scriptures can entertain a doubt; and as we have authority for the assertion, that "where there is no vision the people perish," we should be careful not to be too ready to reject its probability. Of those who believe, not only in the possibility of an immediate revelation, but in the absolute need of one in the present divided state of the church, are to be classed the Receivers of the Writings of Emanuel Swedenborg; and as a committee of that body, appointed by the Middle Convention of the New Jerusalem Church in the United States, to put forth this address, we do here most solemnly affirm, as we shall have to answer at a future day, our entire and deliberate conviction, that in the writings of that commissioned servant of the Lord, is to be found such a revelation.

In making this public avowal, and in giving our reasons for this conscientious belief, we are aware that we shall incur the imputation of superstition or fanaticism; but considering it a duty to make known to others what we have so much reason to know to be true, we cannot shrink from its performance. It has been the fate of other far more enlightened and more worthy than ourselves to be scoffed at, derided, and even put to death, for promulgating the truth. But whilst we remember that the early Christians, who, amidst odium and persecution, proclaimed the first advent of the Lord, succeeded in gaining to their side many who at first believed that too much learning had made them mad, or, that too little disqualified them from instructing others, we do not despair of some success in our announcement of His second advent, not in the flesh, but in the power and glory of His Holy Word through His revelation of its spiritual sense.

Many of you, to whom this appeal is addressed, have no doubt heard of the name of SWEDENBORG, and most of you have probably believed that he was a deluded mystic, or a madman. The same thing once happened to most of us who now acknowledge the authenticity of his writings. We were all like yourselves, brought up and educated in one or other of the various sects of the Christian church, and until we looked into the writings of that gifted man, had no other opinion of him than that which is above expressed. To us as Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Quakers, Catholics, &c., the idea that man like ourselves could, at this day, have had his spiritual eyes opened, and could have been permitted to behold the things of the invisible world, as St. John, Ezekiel, and the other early prophets were, appeared to us so irreconcilable with all our preconceived opinions of divine arrangement, that we rejected it as not to be for a moment entertained. Like others of old, we very naturally inquired, "Have any of the rulers believed on him?" and, receiving a negative reply to this question, and finding, besides, that "not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble," had received his testimony, we thought ourselves not called upon to examine his claims to a hearing. Curiosity, however, with some, the recommendation of pious friends with others, and a desire to become acquainted with supposed heresies, for the purpose of exposing and refuting them with others again, induced us to inquire who was Swedenborg, whose name had been associated with Joan of Arc, Jemima Wilkinson, Joanna Southcote, and various other fanatics that flourished for a season; what was his character; what were his attainments, and his title to credibility; and what were the doctrines which he taught? In the prosecution of these inquiries, we found satisfactory solutions, as we are persuaded thousands of others would do, if they could divest their minds of the idea that intercourse between the natural and spiritual worlds is at this day impossible. What these solutions were, it would not be possible in an address of this sort to state in detail, and we shall therefore content ourselves with the following brief summary.

Emanuel Swedenborg was the son of Jasper Swedenborg, Bishop of Skara in Sweden, and at one time superintendent of the Swedish churches in Pennsylvania. He was born on the 29th of January, 1688, at Stockholm, and was ennobled at the age of thirty-one, under the name of Swedenborg, on account of important services he had rendered the state as a civil engineer, and as assessor of the Royal College of Mines, to which office he had been appointed by the celebrated Charles the Twelfth. As a philosopher and a man of science, his talents were of the highest order, as is conclusively established by a number of works written by him on mineralogy, and on various other philosophical subjects, some of which are to be found in the Philadelphia Library, and perhaps in other libraries of the United States. He was perfect master of the Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages, and had a reputation for general learning inferior to that of very few men of the age. His character was remarkable for its simplicity and modesty, and he was a man of the most exemplary morals and piety. The Rev. Dr. T. Hartley, a pious and learned divine of the Church of England, who knew him personally and intimately, spoke of him thus in a letter to a friend:—"Our author ever kept the holy Scriptures in his view; they were his light and guide, his shield and buckler on all occasions;" and if additional testimony were wanted, we have it the uniform tenor of his writings, the evidence of numerous friends, whose declarations are upon record, and in the following brief compendium of rules which he established for the government of his life.

- I. To read often, and to meditate well on the Word of God.
- II. To be always resigned and content under the dispensations of Providence.
- III. Always to observe a propriety of behaviour, and to preserve the conscience clear and void of offence.
- IV. To obey that which is ordained; to be faithful in the discharge of the duties of our employment, and to do every thing in our power to render ourselves as universally useful as possible.

Thus prepared for the important duties he was raised up to perform, like Moses, who, preparatory to his mission to Pharaoh, was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," was Swedenborg, in the year 1743, at the age of fifty-five, called to assume the office of a seer, and to communicate to mankind matters which the degenerate and infidel condition of the world rendered essential to be known, for the salvation of the human race. What he saw, what he was commanded to reveal, and what he has written, is contained in a series of near thirty octavo volumes, all written in Latin, and not, therefore, designed to captivate the ignorant or credulous: for who would publish, with such an object, books which could be read by none but the learned, who are least likely to be attracted by theological investigations, and especially by such as are supposed to be involved in the marvellous: or by the clergy, who are too much attached to their respective creeds to be induced to listen to one whose views differ so essentially from their own? Nor was Swedenborg a preacher or seeker of proselytes; and in this particular he differed from all who appeared before him, or have since appeared, and have been known to the world as fanatics or visionaries; and thus he has proved himself as not belonging to that class of propagandists. His works were printed chiefly at London and Amsterdam, at his own private expense, during a series of twenty-eight years, without the slightest expectation of personal profit from their sale; for, had a profit resulted, we are assured, upon cotemporary authority, that it was his design to have presented it to a British society, established for propagating the gospel. Of his theological writings, all have been translated into English, many into Swedish and German, and some into French, and all by the gratuitous labor of scholars who have been actuated by the sole desire to disseminate what they believed to be truth. He died at London on the 29th of March, 1772, at the advanced age of eighty-four years, without ever having been married.

And now we will ask the candid Christian reader who believes in the possibility of revelation in these latter days, and who is of opinion that an authoritative exposition would be beneficial, of those parts of Scripture, the various interpretations of which have caused the Church of the Lord to be split into fragments, whether he can imagine a man better fitted to perform such a duty, than such a one as we have described? If he cannot, let us beseech him to go one step further, and bring himself to believe that, possibly, Swedenborg may have been commissioned to write what he has written, and that, possibly, a refusal to examine his claims to credibility, may be a voluntary closing of the mind to the reception of truth, and a rejection of knowledge which may lead to salvation. Let not the cry, "he has a devil and is mad," deter him from looking at his writings in a spirit of soberness, the only spirit in which serious subjects ought to be approached. Let him recollect that the Christian church was established in the age of the apostles, not by those who rejected their testimony without an examination, but by those who were willing to hear them. Let him recollect that there is such an internal evidence in religious truth, as that a man may "know of the doctrine whether it be of God," and let him ponder well upon the question, why should men, who never condemn, without a perusal, works which profess to point out the road to temporal riches and happiness, condemn, without a perusal, works which profess to point out the road to eternal riches and happiness? We are aware of the prejudices that many must overcome before they can be induced to comply with this invitation.

Silly stories have been, time after time, within the last forty years, circulated in this community, respecting the followers of Swedenborg, some of whom have been confidently represented to set plates at their tables for their deceased relatives; to pay for seats in stage coaches for invisible travelling companions, and to have been seen in the streets confessedly taking off their hats to Moses, or some of the prophets. A denial at this enlightened day of such stories, which have had their origin in the levity or falsity of those who fabricated them, and in the credulity of those who have been induced to believe their fables, may appear as an uncalled-for measure; and so we should have considered it, had not the fact come to our knowledge, that very recently, in a company in Philadelphia, composed in part of clergymen, one of them related, to all appearances as if he truly believed it, that a minister of the church in question, who had first received orders in the Episcopal church in that city, had been known to take off his hat to Moses in the street and to secure a seat at a table on board of a steamboat, for a fellow-traveller whom nobody could see. Be it then known, and we pledge our characters for the truth of what we now assert, that not only are all these stories utterly untrue, but that no receiver of Swedenborg's writings in this or any other country, as we are firmly persuaded, has ever been guilty of the folly described, as to any of these particulars, inasmuch as the supposition is impossible and absurd, on the principles of the New Jerusalem church, which maintain that space and locality are not predicable of spiritual beings.

With these remarks, designed with the sole object of enabling others to enjoy the light which we ourselves possess, we shall conclude this short and humble appeal with a declaration of a few of the leading doctrines upon which the New Church is founded, from which it will be seen, that great injustice has been done us by those, who without inquiring into our faith, have ascribed to us tenets which are the very opposites of what we believe.

They are as follows:

1. God is One both in essence and in person, in whom, nevertheless, is a Divine Trinity, consisting of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, like soul, body, and operation in man; and that the Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, is that God.
- Hence, when the Lord said to Philip, "I and my Father are one;" "he that seeth me seeth the Father;" and when St. John said, "the Word was God," and "the Word was made flesh and among us;" and when St. Paul said, "in Jesus Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily and in him ye are complete," and when the Lord said to St. John in the Revelations, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty," "I am the first and the last: I am he that liveth and was dead"—they all spoke in accordance with this doctrine.
2. That the word of the Lord, or sacred Scripture, was written by Divine inspiration; that it contains three distinct senses, celestial, spiritual, and natural, which are united by correspondence, and that in each sense it is Divine truth, accommodated respectively to angels, spirits, and men.
3. That all evils, whether of affection, of thought, or of life, ought to be shunned as sins against God, because they proceed from the devil, that is, from hell, and destroy in man the capacity of enjoying the happiness of heaven. But that, on the other hand, good affections, good thoughts, and good actions, ought to be cherished and performed, because they are of God and from God: and that every act of love and charity, of justice and equity, both towards society in general, and towards individuals in particular, ought to be done by man as of himself; nevertheless, under the acknowledgement and belief that they are really and truly from the Lord, operating in him and by him.
4. That every event or occurrence in human life, whether of prosperity or of adversity, is under the immediate superintendence and direction of the Divine Providence; and that nothing does or can befall man, either in his collective or individual capacity, but what, even the most minute, as well as in the most important circumstances attending it, is made to contribute, in a way known only to Infinite Wisdom, to his final benefit and advantage.
5. That man has free will in spiritual things, and that, consequently, if he be not saved, it is his own fault.

Fifty-five years have passed away since the writings of Swedenborg were first introduced into the United States; and twenty-five years have this day elapsed since notice was given, through the public papers, that an organized society for disseminating those writings had just been established at Philadelphia. The number of known receivers at that period, throughout the United States, did not exceed a hundred. Their number is probably now about four thousand, showing a gradual increase, but not such a one as might have been expected had the doctrines taught, and the principles developed, been adapted to captivate the attention of the simple, the superstitious, or the illiterate. Three magazines for the dissemination of the truths of the Church, are now published in this country, viz: "The New Jerusalem Magazine," at Boston; "The Precursor," at Cincinnati, and "The New Churchman," at Philadelphia, and in each of those cities are to be found depositories for the sale of the writings of the Church. Twenty-five years ago there was but one clergyman of the Church in the United States. There are now about thirty-eight ordained and licensed ministers, of whom twelve are graduates of New England universities, and there are societies who hold meetings for public worship in the three cities that have been named, as well as in New York, Baltimore, and Washington, and in several of the towns of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and the Western States, the members of which would gladly assist sincere seekers of the truth, in obtaining the books recommended to their perusal.

"The Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."

FORMS OF THE PAST.

BY PARK BENJAMIN.

Sometimes, to cheer me, as I pass
This vale of life adown,
In various forms o'er Fancy's glass
Flit shapes of old renown,—
Shapes that, in history or romance,
Thronged round the author's brain—
The haughty chivalry of France,
The high grandees of Spain.

I love upon the magic scene
In dreamy mood to gaze—
For lo! before me lies the scene
That most I wish to raise.
I see, if such my bold desire,
Grey Kings by ages hid,—
Whose tomb, 'till Nature's final fire,
The mighty pyramid!

I see the monarch of the East
With nations at his call,—
I am, Belshazzar, at thy feast,
And view the lurid wall.
Darkness fell on the blazing light,
And from its shroud there came,
An armless, bloodless hand to write
Strange syllables of flame.

Uriah's wife—oh, fair, too fair!
Pale, statue-like she stands
Veiled only by her golden hair,
And by her marble hands.
Wild with the vision, Israel's king
Forgets his holy lyre,
Or from its chords his fingers ring
But sparks of passion's fire.

And, if I will, to classic land,
The land of gods and men,
I turn, and with advent'rous hand
Bring heroes to my ken;
Achilles sitting by the shore—
As solemn watch he keeps
And listens to the billows' roar—
In lonely sadness weeps.

Urge on thy cohorts, Cæsar, urge!
The day and Rome are thine:
Beat backward, as the rock the surge,
The old Helvetian line.
Triumph has built her trophied arch:
The laurel's on thy brow,—
And monarchs by thy chariot march,—
Jove! who has empire now!

If prone, to later days I turn,
The days of England's story;
And in my sight in splendor burn
The deeds and times of glory.
Come, Richard of the Lion Heart;
Come, warriors sheathed in mail;
Come, Barons bold, for freedom's part,
The tyrant to assail!

Come lords and lovely ladies bright,
It is the tourney's sound:
The silken pennons wave in light,
The lists are ranged around.
Strike, minstrel, strike thy harp, to swell
The praise that none gainsay,
And in fit-falling measure tell,
Who bore the prize away.

Last in the glass that Fancy lends,
My native land I see;
Lo! lost in thought the hero bends,
"T is done! we must be free!"

He grasps the simple scroll that gives Him power to lead them on:
Oh, in that face what wisdom lives—
The patriot, WASHINGTON!

Here let me drop the veil, nor try
With lesser lights to mar,
On glory's clear and lustrous sky,
That one superior star!
All heroes of the past above,—
His name, on history's page,
Shines out, most worthy of the love,
And worship of our age.

THE BURNING OF THE FORESTS.*

BY JOHN JAMES AUDUBON.

With what pleasure have I seated myself by the blazing fire of some lonely cabin, when, faint with fatigue, and chilled with the piercing blast, I had forced my way to it through the drifted snow that covered the face of the country as with a mantle! The affectionate mother is hushing her babe to repose, while a group of sturdy children surround their father, who has just returned from the chase, and deposited on the rough flooring of his hut the varied game which he has procured. The great back log, that with some difficulty has been rolled into the ample chimney, urged, as it were, by lighted pieces of pine, sends forth a blaze of light over the happy family. The dogs of the hunter are already licking away the trickling waters of the thawing icicles that sparkle over their shaggy coats, and the comfort-loving cat is busy in passing her furry paws over each ear, or with her rough tongue smoothing her glossy coat.

How delightful to me has it been, when kindly received and hospitably treated under such a roof, by persons whose means were as scanty as their generosity was great, I have entered into conversation with them respecting subjects of interest to me, and received gratifying information. When the humble but plentiful repast was ended, the mother would take from her shelf the book of books, and mildly request the attention of her family while the father read aloud a chapter. Then to Heaven would ascend their humble prayers, and a good-night would be bidden to all friends far and near. How comfortably have I laid my wearied frame on the buffalo hide, and covered me with the furry skin of some huge bear! How pleasing have been my dreams of home and happiness, as I there lay secure from danger, and sheltered from the inclemency of the weather.

I recollect that once while in the State of Maine, I passed such a night as I have described. Next morning the face of nature was obscured by the heavy rains that fell in torrents, and my generous host begged me to remain in such pressing terms, that I was well content to accept his offer. Breakfast over, the business of the day commenced: the spinning wheels went round, and the boys employed themselves, one in searching for knowledge, another in attempting to solve some ticklish arithmetical problem. In a corner lay the dogs dreaming of plunder, while close to the ashes stood grimalkin seriously purring in concert with the wheels. The hunter and I seated ourselves, each on a stool, while the matron looked after her domestic arrangements.

"Puss," quoth the dame, "get away; you told me last night of this day's rain, and I fear you may now give us worse news with trickily paws." Puss accordingly went off, leaped on a bed, and rolling herself in a ball, composed herself for a comfortable nap. I asked the husband what his wife meant by what she had just said. "The good woman," said he, "has some curious notions at times, and she believes, I think, in the ways of animals of all kinds. Now, her talk to the cat refers to the fires of the woods around us, and although they have happened long ago, she fears them quite as much as ever, and indeed she and I, and all of us, have good reason to dread them, as they have brought us many calamities." Having read of the great fires to which my host alluded, and frequently observed with sorrow the mournful state of the forests, I felt anxious to know something of the causes by which these direful effects had been produced. I therefore requested him to give me an account of the events resulting from those fires which he had witnessed. Willingly he at once went on nearly as follows:

"About twenty-five years ago, the larch or hackmatack trees were nearly all killed by insects. This took place in what hereabouts is called the 'black soft growth' land, that is the spruce, pine, and all other firs. The destruction of the trees was effected by the insects cutting the leaves, and you must know, that although other trees are not killed by the loss of their leaves, the evergreens always are. Some few years after this destruction of the larch, the same insects attacked the spruces, pines, and other firs, in such a manner, that before half a dozen years were over, they began to fall, and, tumbling in all directions, they covered the whole country with matted masses. You may suppose that, when partially dried or seasoned, they would prove capital fuel, as well as supplies for the devouring flames which accidentally, or perhaps by intention, afterwards raged over the country, and continued burning at intervals for years, in many places stopping all communication by the roads, the resinous nature of the firs being of course best fitted to ensure and keep up the burning of the deep beds of dry leaves or of the other trees." Here I begged him to give me some idea of the form of the insects which had caused such havoc.

"The insects," said he, "were, in the caterpillar form, about three quarters of an inch in length, and as green as the leaves of the trees they fed on, when they committed their ravages. I must tell you also, that in most of the places over which the fire passed, a new growth of wood has already sprung up, of what we lumberers call hard wood, which consists of all other sorts but pine or fir; and I have always remarked that wherever the first natural growth of a forest is destroyed, either by the axe, the hurricane, or the fire, there springs up spontaneously another of quite a different kind." I again stopped my host to inquire if he knew the method or nature of the first kindling of the fires.

"Why, sir," said he, "there are different opinions about this. Many believe that the Indians did it, either to be better able to kill the game, or to punish their enemies the pale-faces. My opinion, however, is different; and I derive it from my experience in the woods as a lumberer. I have always thought that the fires began by the accidental fall of one dry trunk against another, when their rubbing together, especially as many of them are covered with resin, would produce fire. The dry leaves on the ground are at once kindled; next the twigs and branches, when nothing but the intervention of the Almighty could stop the progress of the fire.

"In some instances, owing to the wind, the destructive element approached the dwelling of the inhabitants of the woods so rapidly that it was difficult for them to escape. In some parts, indeed, hundreds of families were obliged to flee from their homes, leaving all they had behind them, and here and there some of the affrighted fugitives were burned alive."

At this moment a rush of wind came down the chimney, blowing the blaze of the fire toward the room. The wife and daughter, imagining for a moment that the woods were again on fire, made for the door, but the husband, explaining the cause of their terror, they resumed their work.

"Poor things," said the lumberer, "I dare say that what I have told you brings sad recollections to the minds of my wife and daughter, who, with myself, had to fly from our home, at the time of the great fires." I felt so interested in his relation of the causes of the burnings, that I asked him to describe to me the particulars of his misfortunes at the time. "If Prudence and Polly," said he, "looking toward his wife and daughter, will promise to sit still, should another puff of smoke come down the chimney, I will do so." The good natured smile with which he accompanied this remark, elicited a return from the women, and he proceeded:

"It is a difficult thing, sir, to describe, but I will do my best to make your time pass pleasantly. We were sound asleep one night, in a cabin about a hundred miles from this, when about two hours before day, the snoring of the horses and lowing of the cattle which I had ranging in the woods suddenly awakened us. I took my rifle and went to the door to see what beast had caused the hubbub, when I was struck by the glare of light reflected on all the trees before me, as far as I could see through the woods. My horses were leaping about, snorting loudly, and the cattle ran among them with their tails raised straight over their backs. On going to the back of the house I plainly heard the crackling made by the burning brushwood, and saw the flames coming toward us in a far extended line. I ran to the house, told my wife to dress herself and the child as quickly as possible, and take the little money we had, while I managed to catch and saddle the two best horses. All this was done in a very short time, for I guessed that every moment was precious to us.

"We then mounted, and made off from the fire. My wife, who is an excellent rider, stuck close to me; my daughter, who was then a small child, I took in one arm. When making off as I said, I looked back and saw that the frightful blaze was close upon us, and had already laid hold of the house. By good luck there was a horn attached to my hunting clothes, and I blew it, to bring after us, if possible, the remainder of my live stock, as well as the dogs. The cattle followed for a while; but, before an hour had elapsed, they all ran as if mad through the woods, and that, sir, was the last of them. My dogs, too, although at all other times extremely tractable, ran after the deer that in bodies sprang before us, as if fully aware of the death that was so rapidly approaching.

"We heard blasts from the horns of our neighbors, as we proceeded, and knew that they were in the same predicament. Intent on striving to the utmost to preserve our lives, I thought of a large lake, some miles off, which might possibly check the flames; and, urging my wife to whip up her horse, we set off at full speed, making the best way we could over the fallen trees and the brush heaps, which lay like so many articles placed on purpose to keep up the terrific fires that advanced with a broad front upon us.

"By this time we could feel the heat; and we were afraid that our horses would drop every instant. A singular kind of breeze was passing over our heads, and the glare of the atmosphere shone over the daylight. I was sensible of a slight faintness, and my wife looked pale. The heat had produced such a flush in the child's face, that, when she turned toward either of us, our grief and perplexity were greatly increased. Ten miles, you know, are soon gone over on swift horses; but, notwithstanding this, when we reached the borders of the lake, covered with sweat and quite exhausted, our hearts failed us. The heat of the smoke was insufferable, and sheets of blazing fire flew over us in a manner beyond belief. We reached the shores, however, coasted the lake for a while, and got round to the lee side. There we gave up our horses, which we never saw again. Down among the rushes we plunged by the edge of the water, and laid ourselves flat, to wait the chance of escaping from being burned or devoured. The water refreshed us, and we enjoyed the coolness.

"On went the fire, rushing and crashing through the woods. Such a sight may we never see! The heavens themselves, I thought, were frightened; for all above us was a red glare, mixed with clouds of smoke, rolling and sweeping away. Our bodies were cool enough, but our heads were scorching, and the child, who now seemed to understand the matter, cried so as nearly to break our hearts.

"The day passed on, and we became hungry. Many wild beasts came plunging into the water beside us, and others swam across to our side and stood still. Although faint and weary, I managed to shoot a porcupine, and we all tasted its flesh. The night passed I cannot tell you how. Smouldering fires covered the ground, and the trees stood like pillars of fire, or fell across each other. The stifling and sickening smoke still rushed over us, and the burnt cinders and ashes fell thick about us. How we got through that night I really cannot tell, for about some of it I remember nothing." Here the hunter paused and took breath. The recital of his adventure seemed to have exhausted him. His wife proposed that we should have a bowl of milk, and the daughter having handed it to us, we each took a draught.

"Now," said he, "I will proceed. Toward morning, although the heat did not abate, the smoke became less, and blasts of fresh air sometimes made their way to us. When morning came, all was calm, but a dismal smoke still filled the air, and the smell seemed worse than ever. We were now cool enough, and shivered as if in an ague fit; so we removed from the water, and went up to a burning log, where we warmed ourselves. What was to become of us I did not know. My wife hugged the child to her breast, and wept bitterly; but God had preserved us through the worst of the danger, and the flames had gone past, so I thought it would be both ungrateful to Him, and unmanly to despair now. Hunger once more pressed upon us, but this was soon remedied. Several deer were still standing in the water, up to the head, and I shot one of them. Some of its flesh was soon roasted; and, after eating it, we felt wonderfully strengthened.

"By this time the blaze of the fire was beyond our sight, although the ground was still burning in many places, and it was dangerous to go among the burnt trees. After resting awhile, and trimming ourselves, we prepared to commence our march. Taking up the child, I led the way over the hot ground and rocks; and, after two weary days and nights, during which we shifted in the best manner we could, we at last reached the 'hard woods,' which had been free of the fire. Soon after we came to a house, where we were kindly treated for a while. Since then, sir, I have worked hard and constantly as a lumberer; but, thanks be to God, we are safe, sound, and happy!"

A CHRISTIAN VIEWING DEATH.

I have seen one die: she was beautiful; and beautiful were the ministries of life that were given her to fulfil. Angelic loveliness enrobed her; and a grace as if it were caught from heaven, breathed in every tone, hallowed every affection, shone in every action—invested as a halo her whole existence, and made it a light and blessing, a charm and a vision of gladness, to all around her: but she died! Friendship, and love, and parental fondness, and infant weakness, stretched out their hand to save her; but they could not save her: and she died! What! did all that loveliness die! Is there no land of the blessed and the lovely ones, for such to live in! Forbid it reason, religion! bereaved affection, and undying love! forbid the thought! It cannot be that such die, in God's counsel who live, even in frail human memory, forever!

I have seen one die—in the maturity of every power, in the earthly perfection of every faculty; when many temptations had been overcome, and many hard lessons had been learned; when many experiments had made virtue easy, and had given a facility to action, and a success to endeavor; when wisdom had been learnt from many mistakes, and a skill had been laboriously acquired in the use of many powers; and the being I looked upon had just compassed that most useful, most practical of all knowledge, how to live, and to act well and wisely; yet I have seen such an one die! Was all this treasure gained, only to be lost? Were all these faculties trained, only to be thrown into utter disuse? Was this instrument—the intelligent soul, the noblest in the universe—was it so laboriously fashioned, and by the most varied and expensive apparatus, that, on the very moment of being finished, it should be cast away forever? No, the dead, as we call them do not so die. They carry our thoughts to another and a nobler existence. They teach us, and especially by all the strange and seemingly untoward circumstances of their departure from this life, that they, and we, shall live forever. They open the future world, then, to our faith.

Oh! death!—dark hour to hopeless unbelief! hour to which, in that creed of despair, no hour shall succeed! being's last hour! to whose appalling darkness, even the shadows of an avenging retribution, were brightness and relief—death! what art thou to the Christian's assurance? Great hour answer to life's prayer—great hour that shall break asunder the bond of life's mystery: hour of release from life's burden—hour of reunion with the loved and lost—what mighty hopes, hasten to their fulfilment in thee! What longings, what aspirations—breathed in the still night, beneath the silent stars—what dread emotions of curiosity—what deep meditations of joy—what hallowed imaginings of never experienced purity and bliss—what possibilities shadowing forth unspeakable realities to the soul, all verge to their consummation in thee! Oh! death! the Christian's death! What art thou, but a gate of life portal of heaven, the threshold of eternity!—Deo.

WINTER EVENINGS.

During the winter season, most of the youth of our land, particularly those of the country, have the evening at their own disposal, to devote to amusement, recreation, or whatever pursuit they choose. We speak now of those who are employed in some active or necessary pursuit during the day, and to whom evening brings their only leisure; for the youth has not some such employment, or who does not seek it, is not the one to be benefitted by any thing that may be said on the improvement of his leisure hours. We therefore address our remarks to the industrious youth of our country, who are trained to useful and laudable purposes. Such young men will hail the long evenings of this season with delight, and bless the glad hours which they may devote uninterruptedly to the cultivation of their minds.

Few young men are at all aware of the amount of valuable knowledge of which they might become the masters and possessors, by a careful and judicious improvement of the leisure afforded by the evenings of a single winter, and when we add to this the acquisition of ten or fifteen winters, the aggregate amount of what a youth of common capacity might attain would make him a learned man in any section of the Union. Many who rendered themselves eminent and useful in their day—the Franklins, the Shermans, the Rittenhouses, and the Bowditches of our own country—the Watts, the Fergusons, and the Simpsons of England—names conspicuous in the list of contributors, and the benefactors of that species—made themselves what they were by a diligent use of less leisure time than falls to the lot of four-fifths of the young men of the United States. The greatest men of every age have in general been self-taught and self-made. They have risen from obscurity, and struggled with adverse circumstances. A diligent use of their time, (studying and laboring while others slept or played,) a steady perseverance and an indomitable energy gave them their attainments and their eminence. Cicero, by far the most learned man of all antiquity, as well as the greatest orator of Rome, lets us at once into the secret of all his vast and varied learning, when he tells us that the time which others gave to feasts, and dice, and sports, he devoted to patient study.

It matters not what may be a young man's intended pursuit of life; he cannot choose any for which reading and study, during his leisure hours, will not the better qualify him. If he is to be a farmer, let him read books and treatises on agriculture; if he is to be a mechanic, let him study the mathematics and works on mechanism, architecture, &c.; if he is to be a merchant, let him become familiar with the principles of political economy, the statistics of trade, and the history of commerce; and, finally, if he is to be an American citizen, one of the millions to whom is to be intrusted the rich heritage of civil and religious liberty bequeathed to us by our fathers, let him study well the history, the Constitution, and the institutions of the United States, and let him contemplate frequently the lives and character of those who wrought out and framed our liberties.

Nor is the knowledge to be thus acquired the only inducement for a young man to devote the hours of his leisure to reading and study. The pleasure to be found in such pursuits is as much superior to that transient and giddy excitement attendant merely on the gayer amusements, as it is purer, more elegant, and more refined. The young man, too, who habituates his mind to find pleasure and gratification in reading and study, can never want for society; for he creates around him a society of which he can never be deprived—a society which will never weary of his presence, which has nothing cold or artificial or false—a society composed of the very elite of the earth—the master minds of all ages and all countries. With them he can retire into his library, to spend a leisure hour, whenever opportunity occurs, certain of finding them ever ready to delight and instruct.—[Prentice's Louisville Journal.]

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1841

—The law to abolish imprisonment for debt has passed the House of Delegates in Maryland, by a vote of 36 to 28. It will undoubtedly pass the Senate.

We hear nothing as yet of the total abolition of imprisonment in Massachusetts. The commerce of Boston still suffers, as that of New York did a year ago, from the fact that non-resident traders may be seized and incarcerated in that hospitable city. The press seems to be quite silent on the subject; if the journals of Boston would urge the matter as strenuously and ably as it was urged here, we have no doubt that a law, placing non-residents on the same footing with resident debtors, would easily pass the Legislature of Massachusetts. We cut the following from the Baltimore Sun of Monday:

NON-IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—By the proceedings of the House of Delegates, of this State, we perceive that previous to the passage of Mr. Legrand's bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, it was amended in conformity with our suggestion, so as to include non-residents within the scope of its benevolent provisions. In the place of "residents of the State of Maryland," the words "person or persons" have been substituted, thus avoiding the unjust and invidious distinction which would make that a crime on the part of a non-resident, which in an inhabitant of the State would be only a misfortune. This amendment, few as the words are of which it consists, will be found of great importance to the interests of Baltimore. The honest non-resident customers of our merchants (should the bill pass the Senate) will not be apprehensive of incarceration, should they visit us on business, even though they should be unable to liquidate all balances against them.

New-York, Jan. 16, 1841.

MR. EDITOR: Will you oblige a reader by giving in your paper a statement of the strength of parties in the U. S. Senate and House of Representatives? It would be a great gratification to many.

A. B.

REPEY.—The Harrison or Whig strength in the SENATE has been considerably and in the HOUSE slightly increased of late. We believe the present Senate is politically divided as follows:

Harrison or Whigs.—Messrs. Ruggles of Maine, Webster and Bates (in place of Davis) of Mass., Prentiss and Phelps of Vt., Knight and Dixon of R. I., Huntington of Ct., Tallmadge of N. Y., Southard of N. J., Clayton and Bayard (just elected) of Del., Merrick and Kerr (just elected) of Md., Mangum and Graham (new) of N. C., Preston of S. C., Henderson of Miss., Clay and Crittenden of Ky., O. H. Smith and A. S. White of Ind., Porter of Michigan—in all, 23.

Van Buren Democrats.—Messrs. Williams of Me., Hubbard and Pierce of N. H., Perry Smith of Conn., Wright of N. Y., Wall of N. J., Buchanan and Sturgeon of Pa., Roane of Va., Calhoun of S. C., Lumpkin and Cuthbert of Ga., Wm. R. King and Clem. C. Clay of Ala., Walker of Miss. Mouton and Nicholas of Lou., Tappan and Allen of Ohio, Anderson and Nicholson (new) of Tenn., Robinson and Young of Ill., Benton and Linn of Mo., Sevier and Fulton of Ark., and Norvell of Mich.—in all 28.

Virginia probably this day elects Hon. Wm. C. Rives to fill an existing vacancy, making the Whig strength 24 to 28.

The new Senate is called by the President to convene on the 4th of March to act on President Harrison's nominations. This body will consist of as many Whigs as are stated above with one more each from New-Jersey, Georgia, Louisiana and Michigan—28 to 24 certainly—and probably one more Whig in due time from Virginia and Tennessee, making 30 to 22.

In the present HOUSE, if we count right, the Whigs have Members from the following states, viz.:

Maine 2, Massachusetts 10, Vermont 5, Rhode Island 2, New-York 21, New-Jersey 1, Pennsylvania 11, Maryland 3, Virginia 9, North-Carolina 5, South-Carolina 1, Georgia 7 (including Hines Holt, just elected), Alabama 2, Louisiana 3, Ohio 8, Kentucky 11, Tennessee 7, Indiana 3 (including Lang new), Illinois 1—total 112. Doubtful—Speaker Hunter of Va., John Campbell of S. C., Casey of Ill.—3.

The balance—127, including the 5 from New Jersey, the Calhoun men from South Carolina, 2 from Georgia, 1 from N. Carolina, and 1 from Alab.—are accounted Van Buren democrats.

The new House, it is well known, differs very materially in political complexion from the above. The Harrison majority will probably vary from 40 to 60, according to the result of the elections not yet holden.

We have taken some pains to answer our correspondent's question—we hope, to his satisfaction.—Ed. WORLD.

—The Boston Morning Post has, several times, alluded to the Rev. Mr. Kirk in a very reprehensible manner. We can in no wise approve of such conduct. Col. Greene has behaved naughtily—and the ladies are "put out" with him. If they choose to present Mr. Kirk with a dozen shirts, why not? Who have a better right? Should the Post therefore report their proceedings, and disclose secret and confidential conversations? Certainly not. It seems to us that the Post further insinuates that the Rev. Mr. Kirk is about to be married to a wealthy widow, and that, in spite of the sad assurance, the ladies persist in being captivated with him. Whatever may have been the reverend gentleman's success with the souls of the fair sex, he appears to have succeeded eminently in changing their hearts.

We learn from an individual source that one young lady in particular, is fairly expiring with the pangs of unrequited love. Not finding any monument near Boston (that on Bunker Hill not being completed, and being too intimately associated with the name of a profane dancer,) upon which she could sit in imitation of Patience "smiling at grief," she thinks of going to Baltimore on purpose to display her "green and yellow melancholy" in a picturesque manner. The Editor of the Dial is engaged to write the emotions of her disturbed rentient region—and, in imitation of his great Transcendental master, he will style it "The Confessions of a fair Saint."

As the Post has published the proceedings of the meeting held on occasion of the presentation of the shirts, we see not why we should withhold them from the New-York public.

THE SHIRTS.—The following account has been handed to us for publication:—

Presentation of Shirts.—About two weeks since, a paper, of which this is a copy, was carried through the city by three or four "beautiful girls."

"Whereas it has been intimated that Mr. —, by his untiring and zealous exertions in the cause of humanity, and by his brilliant bursts of eloquence, has rent asunder all his garments, called by the gentlemen, shirts, and whereas it is inconsistent with a sound state of morals that he should be without such garments, therefore we, the undersigned, agree to furnish Mr. — with two dozen of the above named garments, to be made of strong cotton cloth, with round corners, and by our own hands."

This paper was signed by about two hundred and fifty of our most fashionable and respectable ladies. The names were obtained in a single morning, and as the number seemed already inconveniently large, it was thought best to close the list; This occasioned much dissatisfaction. But there was no alternative! There were more than could work to advantage, and the gentleman had conscientiously and magnanimously declared, that he would not receive one more than the number originally intended. This he told to a committee who waited upon him, to whom he also suggested that the bosoms and wristbands should be made of linen, as no strain could possibly be brought upon those parts. The ladies immediately commenced their labors; the first eleven on the list agreeing to make shirt No. 1, the second No. 2, and so on—drawing lots among themselves for the different portions of each garment. On Thursday, at nine o'clock, met and examined the garments minutely. They were ascertained to be all well made, of the right dimensions, and durable materials. It was then moved and seconded that a committee of two to be appointed from the Chair to wait upon Mr. —, and to request his immediate attendance. The committee withdrew, but soon returned with the gentleman between them, hand in hand. The ladies rose "en masse," and welcomed him with the waving of perfumed handkerchiefs, and a variety of exclamations, such as, "O! how beautiful!"—"perfectly lovely!"—"a saint upon earth!"—"dear Mr. —," &c. &c.

The lady presiding then addressed him as follows: "Sir,—I am requested by the ladies here assembled, to present to you these garments, as a token of their personal feelings towards you as a man, and of their respect for your generous and disinterested exertions in the cause of good morals. May they prove as safe a protection to your physical, as your exalted character is to your moral, parts."

The gentleman having bowed gracefully, deposited upon his fingers' ends a multitude of kisses, which he waved through the room and replied as follows:

"Madam,—I receive this token of regard from the ladies, which you have so delicately and flatteringly presented, with feelings which I cannot express. It may be a weakness in my character—if so, I pray you to pardon it—but if there is any thing that I particularly live for, it is the approbation of the ladies. Woman! She is the star to my wandering bark—the temple at whose shrine I worship. Wherever, I wander—among my native hills, in merry England, or in sunny France—wherever my duty calls me, I shall feel my burden less, when I receive the sympathy of woman. I exclaim with the poet,

—“Oh woman! whose form and whose soul
Are the spell and the light of each path we pursue;
Whether sunn'd in the tropics or chill'd at the pole,
If woman be there, there is happiness too.”

The time has arrived when I must say, farewell—farewell, and blessings be upon you, one and all. Beloved friends! I do indeed leave you, but I take with me the images of your young and beautiful faces, deeply engraven on the tablets of my memory—where they will remain.

—“Till Time's effacing fingers Shall mar the spot where beauty lingers.”

DEFENSOR VERITATIS....NO. II.

MR. EDITOR.—The invitation, given in your paper, does away with the necessity of an apology on my part for this continuation of my articles. To the press alone can our Naval officers look for relief from the disrepute that numerous frauds, oppression and dishonorable acts among the higher officers have brought upon the service to which they belong—a service whose support should be even-handed, impartial justice, and which no other than sentiments of the purest chivalry should pervade.

In the present article I wish to call the attention of the public, to the difficulty, even in the most glaring cases, of bringing superior officers to a Court Martial; to the trifling punishments awarded them when found guilty; to the evasions of those punishments by the Secretary and President, and to the great disparity of punishment inflicted by the same court, for the same offence, upon officers of higher and lower grades. It may be readily recollected that, some six years since, a captain ordered a midshipman to go aloft as a punishment. Refusing to obey an order unjust and illegal, the midshipman was seized, made fast to the royal halliards, and, though the ship was under double-reefed topsails, was triced up to the masthead. For this unparalleled outrage upon the feelings of a man, upon the dignity of an officer, he preferred charges against the Captain. But the difference of rank was too great. The just complaint—the outraged feelings—and, we may say, the broken heart, of a midshipman, were not to be weighed for a moment with the whims or privileges, (call it which you will,) of a post-captain. Not the slightest regard was paid to the call for justice; and the heartless tyrant would have walked abroad unpunished, had not the Editor of the Richmond Whig enlisted himself disinterestedly, but warmly, against the oppression, and raised such an outcry throughout the Union, that the criminally supine Secretary was forced to bend to public opinion and bring the offender to justice.

The captain was suspended for two years; at the end of which time the midshipman, broken in body and mind, was in his grave. The captain, as if to prove that tyranny and oppression were among the surest stepping-stones to promotion in the American Navy, was made a Commodore. What but the force of the press in a late case, would have procured a Court Martial, when a Commodore was charged with some dozen instances of fraud, oppression and neglect of duty—of a majority of which he was found guilty? His time-serving sycophancy procured a remission of that part of his sentence which took away his pay. The remainder of the sentence was highly advantageous to him, as it permits him, while enjoying the emoluments of his office, to carry on the speculations (peculations?) in which he had embarked. As a contrast to this—a few months before, a young officer was charged with—not fraud, or a dishonorable act—but with a breach of etiquette. In his case, no delay took place, though, whether justice was done, I will not determine. Again, when he of the toad-fish dignity, and gospel-bearing tongue, returned home—after violating confidence and staining his honor irreparably by breaking open and using the contents of another's letter—where was the sense of justice in the Secretary that should have made him at once bring this man to a trial? a trial which, in a civil court, would consign his felonious favorite to the state prison. What was the course of the Secretary? Upon the first vacancy, this fit representative of the American Navy was placed in an honorable and delightful command, where, in a few months we find him, first oppressing by unjust confinement, and then bringing to a Court Martial a young officer whose only crime was that he had too much honest blood in him to clasp in friendship a hand that had committed a felonious deed. In spite of every charge that his contemptible accuser could bring against him, let me for once proclaim that justice was done, and that he was honorably acquitted.

The commander who snatched up and attempted to run off with the stakes from a gambling-table, who, when threatened with a cow-hiding for this attempt at robbery, prepared himself with a pair of loaded pistols, the priming of which he boastfully examined a few minutes before the rencontre; who, when cow-hided—which he was, soundly—was afraid to use the arms he had provided, but abjectly called upon a bystander for protection. This was, it is true, brought to trial, convicted and cashiered, but a father-in-law shielded his worthy son in his judge's robes, and on the plea of a flaw (and how contemptible a quibble it was!) forced him back upon the Navy, to again and again dishonor it. Of this judge, may I ask, does he feel less dishonored in the family connection by having his son clothed in a uniform? It does not purify him. Does he think by that to raise him above scorn? The looks that fall upon his relative, when his brazen assurance, induces him to seek the haunts of gentlemen, would soon convince him of his error. Or does he feel that his son is truly a credit to his family? If so, let me congratulate him on the increased honors that must accrue from his later and more worthy deeds, and let me also beg the Secretary—whose charge it is to foster actions that redound so much to the credit of the service—to lose no time, but to follow the usual custom, and make haste to heap rewards upon the head of one that has so well deserved them.

But let me more earnestly ask the judge where would have been his sense of justice had this man been tried before him, and proof strong as human testimony can make it, had shown his son-in-law a drunkard, a coward, and a felon? Let me ask the President why this man's name could not have been stricken out from the rolls of the service? But a few months before, he had, without the formality of a court, with a stroke of his pen, deprived a lieutenant of his office for a mere breach of discipline. Why cannot the present President save the expense of a Court, and erase this name from the rolls? Would such delay take place were a young officer to disgrace his uniform by even one of the many flagrant crimes that this commander has committed? Well knows he there would not, but fortunately for the wearer, that second epaulette can cover more crimes and indecencies than the whole coats of a dozen lieutenants. Let me congratulate the grade that is entitled to it upon the immunities it affords them, and the very great use made of these immunities by some of their numbers.

Following the precedent established in our Naval service, this man's previous acts and late repetitions, will soon be rewarded by a squadron. Honored in the station given them, and confident of perpetuating the glory of their country's flag, will those officers esteem themselves who, in case of difficulty with another nation, might be placed under this man's command. Cheered by the thickened tongue of an inebriate, high will beat their hearts with anticipations of fame and glory; headed by a staggering drunkard—whose bleared and leaden eye shows the resort he has had for the courage which his heart never felt, great will be their deeds; and if victory should follow (and with such a leader, who could doubt the result?) honorable will be their conduct to captives, with such a manly, gentlemanly spirit to take the lead! But why harp upon this case alone, when another occurs so similar that, to one aware of the two, both would simultaneously present themselves.

A Commander, himself suspended for his offences, obtained a Court Martial against his medical officers for want of that respect to him which no honorable man could possibly feel. Dismissed from the service, the Assistant Surgeon sought that justice from a cowhide which he could not obtain from a set of men without one sympathizing feeling and who felt that, at any risk, they must support the grade to which they belonged. Forewarned, he was fore-armed; yet this Commander received his well-merited punishment with a brace of pistols in his pocket on a public race-course, in presence of the assembled members of Congress and other distinguished men. Conduct so valorous could not go unrewarded in a superior officer! he was soon after made a Captain, and will no doubt shortly have the command of a squadron. Nor is this all—even while I write, one of the grossest outrages upon justice that the veriest despot would scarce have perpetrated has just been made public, showing clearly that, elsewhere than to Courts Martial must younger officers look for redress when wronged, or for respect when they themselves are accused.

A short time since a Court Martial was convened for the trial of a habitual drunkard—a Commander, who was proved guilty on fourteen charges of intemperance. His sentence was a private reprimand and to be deprived of his command. We will do the Secretary justice to suppose that he was reprimanded, and we know he was deprived of his command. But mark—he was taken from a command that exposed him to the troubles and dangers of a sea life and given a pleasant station ashore, and even his private feelings were consulted and he was further favored by being placed on the same station with a sympathetic soul—the honorable Commodore of the toad-fish dignity—the false tongue and the light fingers. The same Court Martial found a Lieutenant guilty of one single charge for the same offence. His sentence was ten years' suspension on half pay. Can this outrage upon decency, this flagrant disregard of any thing like justice, this brazen, barefaced attempt to support whatever may be of iniquity in men of their own grade and to trample under foot whatever inferior officer may be exposed to their malice—can this criminal disregard of the sacredness of their oath in a set of Captains and Commanders of the American Navy be believed? Does not the reader involuntarily mistrust my statement? Can he fully realize the fact? If he cannot—nor is it strange he should not—let him look to the records of the Department. Fortunately the sense of justice in the President, and an inability to sanction such an outrage, induced him to remit four fifths of the term of the suspension—but where was the same reason or principle which would not permit him to deprive a Commodore of the means of supporting his dignity and which restored to one of that grade his pay when deprived of it by a Court Martial? The Lieutenant has no dignity, we take it for granted, to support, as his pay is not returned him. But with this partial remission, how unequal still the punishment! With equal crimes how unequal would the punishment be. But the crime of the Commodore was fourteen times greater than that of the Lieutenant; yet his punishment is only nominal, and in fact is turned into an advantage by the Secretary!

Let me ask the President of that Court whether he recollects that in February, 1817 (I can give the day) a Captain in the Mediterranean squadron struck one of his officers, and but slight notice was taken of the outrage? Does he recollect that, burning under a sense of the wrong, he with his brother officers (excepting two) signed a memorial to the Senate, containing the following words: “The undersigned have now no guarantee for the safety of their persons but the use of those arms that the laws of their country have placed in their hands, and that personal strength with which nature has blessed them. To these means they must resort and on them in future depend, unless the Honorable Senate, to whom they look with filial confidence, will by timely interference,” &c. &c. Where are the feelings that then actuated him? Why does he not protest against the verdict of the Court? For, born under the shade of the Palmetto, in a land whose boast it is that it never sheltered dishonor, he never could have signed so unjust a sentence.

It is but too evident that, from men like those of whom I have spoken, constituting the accusers, the judge and the jury, and holding almost in their own hands too often the power of calling a court or not, no justice can be expected; nor can one damning act of the many that now disgrace their corps be wiped out, or one of the many miscreants, whose association brings dishonor and disrepute upon their body, be stricken from among them. With the bad, a similarity of feeling, with the good a false expediency or misconception of mercy present an insuperable bar to the attainment of justice. To the mighty power of the press must the gallant officers of our Navy look for a redress of their numerous wrongs. Your disinterested call, Mr. Editor, will, I do not doubt, be answered, and by some who, as officers in the service (the cause of which I from a sense of justice alone advocate) will with better knowledge and more energy enter the field. As you say, what has already appeared has been felt, and I mention a proof in the circumstance of a gifted Lieutenant, whose ready and elegant pen has lately been enlisted in the cause of a service so dear to him, being removed from his command immediately upon the appearance of an article by him containing strictures upon the present method of Courts Martial. Still more ludicrous was the attempt of one of the grade animated upon to stop the engine at work, by taking his subscription from the paper! Well is it for that editor, if he is not ruined by the withdrawal of the patronage of such a Solomon! As for the worthy Lieutenant, he is still at work. Let him be diligent, for his hand will soon be stopped and his tongue silenced by orders for a foreign station. Y.

INSPIRATION.—In the mind of a man of genius the thoughts rise so rapidly, and clothe themselves in such striking and appropriate imagery, that in his public discourses, especially of a religious kind, he appears to the vulgar to be inspired. But this idea is quite erroneous. The term inspiration, so applied, has no real meaning. It is only that the quickness and activity of his mental operations so much surpass those of ordinary men, that we are apt to consider it as more than could be accomplished by the unassisted efforts of the mind, and are tempted to ascribe it to something supernatural; whereas it is the result of much thought and of that habitual meditation, which never leaves the mind at a loss when its powers are called into action. The effect appears wonderful in many instances, but there is no other secret in it than what is here given.

THE ECONOMY OF LEGISLATIVE ELOQUENCE.—It is stated that the members of the Ohio Legislature lately spent ten days in debating whether they should publish 5000 or 6000 copies of the Governor's Message, and finally decided in favor of the smaller number—thereby saving the enormous sum of five dollars and fifty cents, the price asked for the extra thousand copies. The expense of the ten days legislation cost the people of the State the sum of six thousand and three hundred dollars!

Congressional.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 13, 1841.

IN SENATE, the Hon. John Leeds Kerr, the new Senator from Maryland, appeared and was qualified.

The President submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury of the names and compensations of the clerks in the State Department. Also, a report showing the rates of exchange, foreign and domestic, and the prices of bank notes and specie on the first day of each month during the years 1838, 39, and 40, &c. The communications were ordered to be printed.

The Senate voted $500 to defray the expense of transporting to Vermont, and of burying the remains of its late Sergeant-at-arms, Stephen Haight, deceased; also to pay his widow his salary to the end of the session.

The Commissioner of Public Buildings reported that about $350,000 had been expended on those within the District during the past year.

The Post Master General reported that the revenue of his Department for the last quarter of 1840 was five per cent. less than that of the corresponding quarter of 1839—that no increase of revenue this year could be anticipated, while the expenditures are rather increased. He estimates the Post Office revenue and expenditures of 1841 at $4,811,620.

THURSDAY, JAN. 14.

In the SENATE, Mr. Clay presented a petition for a Bankrupt Law, and a memorial from the American Peace Society, which were appropriately referred.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Rhet, of S. C. appeared for the first time this session.

Mr. Barnard of N. Y. reported a bill establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy: committed to Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union. Adjourned.

FRIDAY, JAN. 15.

In the SENATE, the credentials of Messrs. Clayton and Bayard, Senators elect from the State of Delaware, were read and placed on file.

Among the memorials presented was one from the Legislature of Illinois, requesting a remission of duty on rail-road iron. Also, several memorials from New-York, praying that Banks and Corporations may be included in the proposed Bankrupt Law.

The HOUSE refused, by a vote of 57 to 96, to make the Bankrupt bill the special order for the 28th inst.

The consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections was resumed. The report is in favor of the right of Mr. Naylor to the seat he occupies.

After some debate the previous question was demanded, when the House came to a direct vote upon the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections, which was adopted: Yeas 117; nays 85. So the right of Mr. Naylor to the seat he now occupies was confirmed.

SATURDAY, JAN. 16.

Petitions were presented to the Senate for and against the passage of a Bankrupt Law.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported in favor of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with the sureties of Robert Swartwout.

Mr. Benton introduced a resolution calling upon the Committee of Finance to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the Fishing bounty; and took occasion to recite his speech on that subject to the Senate.

MONDAY, JAN. 18.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department in relation to experiments made upon American water-rotted hemp, and expressing the opinion that it will be found equal to imported hemp.

Among the petitions presented was one from New-York, remonstrating against the passage of a Bankrupt Law; also, several from Ohio and Connecticut, advocating its passage.

HOUSE. The Treasury note bill, being the special order of the day the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Adams in the chair.

Mr. Jones, of Va. advocated the passage of the bill at some length, assigning various reasons in its favor.

Mr. Barnard, of N. Y., then took the floor, and addressed the Committee at great length on the financial condition of the Government, and at 20 minutes past four gave way that the House might adjourn.

TUESDAY, JAN. 19.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the plan proposed by him for a permanent change of the tariff.

Among the bills reported was one directing warrants to be issued for the bounty lands due Generals Dupertail, Anand and Major De La Alombe, on account of services rendered during the revolution.

The bill appropriating $3000 for the benefit of the lunatics of the District of Columbia was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill making appropriations for the Patent office was then taken up. Mr. Calhoun's motion to strike out the $1000 appropriated for Agricultural Statistics was rejected, 23 to 14. The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

The Pre-emption bill again coming up, Mr. White, of Ia., addressed the Senate until a late hour. After Mr. White had concluded, a vote was taken on Mr. Calhoun's motion to cede the Public Lands to the States on certain conditions. This amendment was rejected: yeas 18; nays 23.

The amendments offered by Messrs. Crittenden and Prentiss were likewise rejected, after which the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE the Treasury note bill was taken up at an early hour. Mr. Barnard resumed and concluded the remarks he commenced the day before. At the close of his speech Mr. B. gave notice that he should offer an amendment instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow ten millions on the credit of the government, and another imposing additional duties on wines, silks, spices and other articles of luxury.

Mr. Evans of Maine followed. He differed somewhat from Mr. Barnard in one respect—he thought a loan could not be negotiated soon enough to meet the wants of the Treasury. He would therefore go for the passage of this bill. When he had concluded Mr. Bell, of Tenn., obtained the floor for the following day.

MR. HON. WILLIAM C. RIVES, was on Monday elected a United States Senator, from Virginia, by a joint vote of both branches of the Legislature. In the Senate, Rives 16; Mason McDowell and others, 16. In the House, Rives 69; Mason McDowell and others, 63; Joint vote 85 to 79, one seat vacant, (disputed,) one member absent, (V. B.) One Whig gave a scattering vote; one V. B. Senator, representing a Whig District, voted for John Robertson, (Whig) as did Gen. Bayley, of Accomac. So that thing is settled.

THE National Intelligencer of January 20, says: "We were startled by a statement in one of the Eastern papers of last week, on the authority of a letter from this city, respecting the health of Chief Justice TANEY, who was therein represented to be dangerously ill. There has, we are glad to be able to say, been some great misunderstanding in this matter. The Chief Justice, so far from being so ill, as represented, presides daily in the Supreme Court; and, although his health is not as robust as his friends could wish, we find, upon inquiry, that there is no reason to suppose that his life is in greater danger than that of most persons whom we meet daily on the highway of life."

SAD, SAD.—It is a mournful thing to read of an accident like the following, related in the Delaware Gazette. It seems very strange to us that a parent could even for one moment expose a child to the possibility of such an accident: "A little daughter of Mr. Lewis Minck, between four and five years of age, was burnt to death on Saturday night last. Her mother, having occasion to go a short distance from the house, left the little girl playing in the room, where a lamp was burning on the table. The mother had not been gone long before the little girl got upon the table to view herself in the glass, and whilst doing so, her dress came in contact with the lamp, and when the mother returned, she was completely enveloped in flame. The little girl survived the melancholy accident until about 2 o'clock the following morning, when death put an end to her suffering."

STEPHEN HAIGHT, Esq., Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, died at Washington on the 12th inst., aged 50 years.

Mr. Haight was, as we learn from the National Intelligencer, a native of Vermont. He was reared upon a farm, and enjoyed but very limited means of early intellectual culture. But, overcoming the obstacles of a defective education by the energy of superior intellect, he rose to important civil stations in the State—having been, for many years, a member of its legislature, and successively a judge and sheriff of the county in which he resided.

He has left a wife and daughter in Vermont to mourn the loss of a kind husband and an affectionate father. In the earlier stages of his last sickness, he forbore to send for his wife, under a belief that he should recover so as to be able to reach Vermont, as well as from a regard to the delicacy of her health, which would have been much endangered by a journey, in midwinter, to this city.

On Friday last, after appropriate religious services, the remains of the deceased were followed by the Vermont delegation in both Houses of Congress, and other friends of the bereaved family, to the public cemetery in this city, from whence they are to be removed to Vermont, under an appropriation made by the Senate for that purpose.

GOVERNOR OF MAINE.—The Maine Senate have, on the morning of the 12th inst., accepted the report which was made by Mr. Davies, from the joint select committee to whom the returns of the votes for Governor were referred. The whole number of votes legally returned, as allowed and counted by the committee, is 91,179—that the number, therefore, necessary for a choice is 45,590—no person has that number—

GEORGIA.—We learn from the Milledgeville Journal, that in 56 counties, Hines Holt, Whig, for the present Congress, in the place of Judge Colquitt, V. B. resigned, has received 20,336 votes, against 15,124 for Mr. Watson, V. B. Holt's majority thus far, is 5,212. This majority may be somewhat reduced by the remaining counties, but his election is certain.

LAMENTABLE ACCIDENT.—On Monday, 11th inst., Mr. Myers, of Alleghany township, Penn., took his axe and went into the woods to cut sticks for sled runners. As he did not return home by the next day, his family became alarmed and set out in search for him. After searching through the woods for a considerable time, he was found lying dead, within a few yards of the place where he had been cutting wood. It appeared that a limb had been knocked from the tree that he was cutting, which struck him on the side of the head and disabled him—he must have made great effort to reach home, as there were at least thirteen distinct impressions in the snow, where he had risen and fallen until finally overcome. Mr. M. was a man of sober habits, much respected, and has left a large family to mourn his loss.

THE MAIL ROBBERS.—Judge Erving has fixed the bill of Dr. Braddee, charged with robbing the mail near Uniontown, Pa. at $100,000—$50,000 on his own part and $25,000 in two sureties each. Dr. Braddee is extensively known and was celebrated in the vicinity of Uniontown as an "Indian Doctor," and Straes, one of his accomplices, is represented as being the son of one of the most respectable and upright citizens of that place.

MORE TROOPS FOR FLORIDA.—A detachment of 104 recruits, for the first regiment of infantry, embarked yesterday for Tampa Bay on board the ship Tuskuina. The detachment is under command of Lieut. W. S. Henry, second infantry. Lieut. J. W. Martin, also of the second regiment, is attached to the command.

THE Richmond Compiler of Monday last announces the death of Hiram Haines, Esq., of Petersburg, Va., editor of the Virginia Star.

A STRONG DESCRIPTION.—De Tocqueville, in his work on America, gives this forcible sketch:

"A newspaper can drop the same thought into a thousand minds at the same moment. A newspaper is an adviser who does not require to be sought, but who comes to you of his own accord, and talks to you briefly every day, of the common weal, without distracting your private affairs. Newspapers, therefore, become more necessary in proportion as men become more equal, and individuals more to be feared. To suppose that they only serve to protect freedom would be to diminish their importance; they maintain civilization."

THE SCIOTA VALLEY.—VIRGINIA FARMING IN OHIO.—The last number of the Cultivator contains an interesting description, by A. B. Allen, of Buffalo, of the princely domains of the Messrs. Sullivan's in the Sciota Valley, near Columbus, Ohio. These gentlemen occupy an estate of eight thousand acres of the most productive land, all lying in one body on the Sciota river, and intersected by the National Road. This large tract, however, is only the homestead; the three brothers owning some twenty-five or thirty thousand acres more in that and the adjoining counties, of the best quality of lands, a large portion of which is devoted to the raising of stock.

LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM TEXAS.—The fast running steamship Neptune, Captain Rollins, arrived yesterday from Galveston, bringing dates from that city up to the 3d instant.

The news from the frontier, if true, is highly important. A letter has been received at Austin, from San Antonio, which declares positively that it is the intention of the Mexican Government to invade Texas. According to the letter, the loan of $3,000,000 lately obtained by Mexico is to be expended as follows: $2,000,000 toward purchasing and arming two steamships to act against the Texian navy; the balance to be applied in carrying on operations by land; Gen. Arista to have the command of the invaders. His first object is to take possession of Goliad and San Antonio, and then propositions will be made to the Texian Government, which of course the latter would not accept.

Business at Galveston, during the Christmas holidays, was extremely dull.

The Texian Congress has passed a law by which property cannot be sold at all under execution, unless it shall bring two-thirds its appraised value.

J. W. Oruger, Esq., has been elected public printer at Austin. His competitor was Major Whiting.

We examined our files attentively, but could find no news of importance, with the exception of the above.—[N. O. Picayune.

A ROGUE CAUGHT IN HIS OWN TRAP.—A singular incident occurred during the holidays on the opposite side of the river. Two ladies, who resided in Illinois, came to the city to make purchases. A well dressed man followed them into several stores, at one of which one of them got a ten dollar bill changed, receiving the change in small bills. In the evening, on their return home, when but a short distance from the Ferry in the prairie, the same man they had seen in the city rode up to them and demanded their money. The one who had the money drew it out, and in attempting to hand it to him the wind caught the bills and carried them off on to the ground. The man dismounted to pick them up, and as soon as he was down the ladies put whip to their horses and made off as fast as possible. On their way they heard the clatter of a horse's hoofs following them, but were too much terrified to stop or look back. When they reached their own gate behold the robber's horse was with them, a fine animal, with an elegant saddle and a pair of saddle-bags, but the man was nowhere in sight; they suppose his horse escaped whilst he was picking up the bills. On examining the saddle-bags a large sum of money was found, and several articles of wearing apparel, but nothing by which his name could be discovered. Up to Saturday last no one had appeared to claim the horse or the property.

The above facts we have from a respectable gentleman of the city, who assures us that singular as the circumstances may appear they are strictly correct.—[St. Louis Republican.

Capt. Mumford of the ship Garrick, states that the ship has not bilged, and that his mainmast has not been driven through her bottom. The goods are being saved as fast as possible; and if the weather continues moderate, no doubt that all the cargo will be landed and the ship be brought into port. Two heavy anchors have been carried from the vessel outside the Bar—and during the last high winds the vessel was moved but slightly from her former position. The Osiris steamboat went down yesterday morning with every material necessary to clear her of water, and there is no doubt that by this time she is pumped out. The ship stands perfectly straight, and does not appear to be strained. Captain Skiddy is actively engaged superintending the discharge of the cargo.

THE Richmond Enquirer says that Mr. Van Buren has not acceded to the request of Mr. Stevenson (our Minister at St. James) that he may be recalled; but, in consequence of the new aspect of affairs in regard to the boundary question, and the affair of the Carolise, has desired Mr. Stevenson to remain in England until a successor should be appointed and reach London.

There are outstanding at the present time $750,005 of the notes of the old United States Bank, most of which are supposed to be destroyed, as they have almost entirely ceased to make their appearance for redemption.

JOHN BROCKENBROUGH has been re-elected President of the Bank of Virginia, after a struggle—5 to 3.

HON. BATES COOKE has resigned the post of Comptroller of the Finances of this State.

The bill providing for the election of members of Congress by the General Ticket System, has passed both branches of the Alabama Legislature. The vote was closed. In the Senate by a vote of 15 to 12, and in the House by 48 to 45.

From the Baltimore American.
EDUCATION IN KENTUCKY.—The Superintendent of Public Instruction in Kentucky stated in his last report, that in a certain county of the State, out of fifteen Grand Jurors, the Judge could not find one whom he might appoint foreman; also that in a collection of some forty or fifty persons accidentally convened in a country tavern, not one could be found who could give his signature as a witness to a bond. He furthermore stated that in 1830 there were in the commonwealth 140,000 children of proper ages to be at school; and that in June last the whole number at school was only about 32,000.

These statements having given occasion to some expressions of incredulity, the superintendent has published in several of the Kentucky papers proofs in confirmation of his assertions. In reference to the last mentioned particular he gives later statistics, obtained, we presume, by the recent census. It is stated that in 1840 there were 175,000 children between the ages of 5 and 15, of whom on the first of June, only 32,904 were at school. Reference is also made to authentic returns from various counties at the Auditor's office for the year 1840, from which the following results appear:

Floyd County—population 6,302; between 5 and 15, 2,055; at school June 1st, none; teachers none; above 20 years old unable to read, 673.

Clay County—population 4,607; between 5 and 15, 1,180; at school none; teachers none; above 20 unable to read, 671.

Knox County population 5,726; between five and 16, 2,566; at school forty-six; teachers one; above 20 unable to read, 512.

Ohio County—population 6,592; between 5 and 15, 1,714; at school twenty-five; teachers one; above 20 unable to read, 5556.

Pike County—population 3,564; between 5 and 15, 1,066; at school twenty-five; teachers one; above 20 unable to read, 852.

Barren County—population 17,292; between 5 and 15, 3,829; at school eight hundred and fifty-nine; teachers thirty-five; above 20 unable to read, 1,190.

Mercer County—population 18,720; between 5 and 15, 3,545; at school one thousand one hundred and ninety-one; teachers thirty-seven; unable to read above 20 years, 747.

Died, in this city, on the morning of the 10th instant, Charles H. Locke, Esq. aged 26 years. Thus has passed from our community, in the midst of life and usefulness, one who, by his eminently fine qualities of mind and heart, had won for himself a character and standing, among a numerous circle of friends and acquaintances, that will be long and tenderly remembered and cherished. The subject of this notice was no common and ordinary man. At an early age, after receiving a good common school education, he was placed in a counting house, to be trained for commercial pursuits; but at an early period he abandoned the occupation of a merchant for that which was more congenial to his taste, and devoted himself unremittingly to the acquisition of that knowledge of men and things which fitted him to undertake the editorial charge of a public newspaper. In this employment, as editor, and as a contributor to the press, most of his life from the period of his maturity to his decease, was passed. [Boston Daily Gazette.]

DROWNED, in Alstead, N. H., on Friday, the 8th inst., Miss Caroline Murphy, aged 17 years.

The fact of this young lady's death we learned while at Bellows Falls. The circumstances were as follows: She had set out to attend a cotillion party that evening, in company with a young man by the name of Anderson. They were in a wagon, and in attempting to pass where the water came into the road, and the current was swift, the wagon was upset, and both were precipitated into the stream. The young man clung to the cloak of the young lady with one hand, and with the other he grasped a root or branch of a tree. The young lady's cloak, however, came off over her head, without unhooking, and she was washed down the stream. The young man was soon rescued, but the body of the young lady was not found till the next morning. She had been carried two miles down the stream, and when found, one hand was grasped around the limb of a tree, and frozen. Her body was exceedingly bruised and mutilated.

This calamity is solemn and awful. Here was a young lady, beautiful, amiable and accomplished, decked in her ball-room attire, seated by the side of her lover, to whom in a few short months she expected to be united in the holy bands of wedlock, doubtless meditating many years of happiness and social enjoyment with him who sat by her side, when suddenly, and at once, both were precipitated into the maddened current. Her lover was saved, while she was speedily ushered into a world of spirits. We learn that her family were of great respectability and of high standing in society. How suddenly are they called to mourn the loss of their beloved daughter—and what heart-rending emotions must pervade the bosom of young Anderson. "In the midst of life we are in death." [Lowell Souvenir.]

NEW COUNTERFEIT.—H. R. Seymour, Esq., has this morning shown us a new counterfeit bank note, which was passed in Alden, in this county, a few days since. The note is of the denomination of $10 on the Bank of Newburgh—letter B—date Aug. 31, 1840—William Walsh, Pres't. Geo. W. Kerr, Cashier—payable to E. D. Miller—Rawdon, Wright & Hatch, engravers. The vignette on the left is a rail road car, on the right a wild Indian with a train of cars in the distance. The note is poorly executed, on coarse white paper, and bears no resemblance to the genuine. They may be detected at a glance, by observing that "Safety" in the words "Safety Fund," is spelt without the e.—[Buff. Com. Adv.]

(*) The editor of the American Traveller, (Boston,) is a man of peculiarly excellent discrimination and profound good sense. Hear him!

"We are particularly pleased with 'THE NEW WORLD,' in the quarto form, as others must be, when we say it is a decided improvement upon the former edition, which every body pronounced in good taste. The mechanical execution is surpassed by none of its cotemporaries, and the editorial talent evinced in each number deserves as high praise."

SUIT AGAINST THE PRIZE MASTER OF THE TIGRIS.—On Saturday evening, Henry S. Jackson, midshipman of the British brig Water-Wich, was arrested, on actions of trespass, brought by four of the American crew of the Tigris, Mr. Jackson having, as prize master, put on board by Lieut. Matson, brought the said seamen to Salem, without their consent. They have laid their damages at $4000, and, in order to prevent the immediate commitment of Mr. J. on Saturday night, Mr. Grattan, Her B. M. Consul, became his surety in the sum of $8000. The writs are made returnable at the Court of Common Pleas in Essex county.—[Boston Post.]

[The SENATE of the United States now consists of 37 supporters of the expiring and 21 of the coming Administration; four vacancies to be filled—from Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and Tennessee—the first three almost certainly with friends of the powers that are to be, making 24 Harrison to 28 Van Buren Members. After the 4th of March, there will be added 1 Whig from each of the States of New Jersey, Georgia, Louisiana, Michigan, and probably Virginia, giving the new Administration at least 23 to 24 and probably 29 to 23 Members. There is a report that Mr. Walker of Miss will consider himself instructed to resign at the close of the session; but we see no confirmation of it. Eleven other Van Buren Senators are in the minority in their several States—seven of them very signally. Mr. Preston of S. C. is the only Whig Senator at present in that predicament. We mean to give a tabular view of the Senate as soon as the vacancies are filled.]

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES now consists of 124 friends of the retiring and 114 of the approaching Administration, with one vacancy in the Virginia and one in the Georgia Delegation to be filled. Mr. Speaker Hunter we count neutral. The Whigs will probably have both of these, making their number 116 to 124. (Is the latter number are included the 5 anti-"Broad Seal" New-Jersey Members.) In running our eye hastily over the list of Members, we remark that forty-nine of the Van Buren and nine of the Harrison Members are each left in a minority in his District on the vote for President. If the House were politically constituted, therefore, according to that vote, it would consist of 156 Harrison and 85 Van Buren Members; Mr. Speaker Hunter's District having given a Van Buren majority. The elections to the next Congress thus far indicate a Harrison ascendancy nearly equal to this.]

THE FUNERAL OF NAPOLEON.

The strongest grow faint in the chill of the air,
The sun looks about with a smile of despair;
'Tis a day of delusion, of glitter and gloom,
As brilliant as glory, as cold as the tomb!

The pageant is passing: the multitude sways,
Awaiting, pursuing, the line with its gaze;
'Mid the tramp of battalions, the tremor of drums,
And the grave exultation of trumpets, He comes.

It passes—what passes? He comes,—who is He?
Is it Pleasure too deep to be uttered in glee?
Oh no! it is Death, the dethroner of old,
Who is folded in purple and girded with gold!

It is Death who enjoys that magnificent car,—
It is Death whom the warriors have brought from afar—
It is Death to whom thousands have knelt on the shore,
And sainted the ship and the treasure it bore.

What other than Death, in his terrible calm,
Could mingle for myriads this bitter and balm?
Could hush into silence this ocean of men,
And bid the wild passion lie still in its den?

What other than Death could have placed side by side,
The chief and the humblest that, serving him, died?
Could the blood of the past to the childless atone,
And let each bless the name that had orphaned their own?

From the shades of the olive, the palm, and the pine,
From the Danube, the Moskwa, the Nile, and the Rhine,
From the sands and the glaciers, in armaments dim,
Come all that have perished for France and for him.

Rejoice! ye sad mothers, whose desolate years
Have been traced in the desert of life by your tears;
The children for whom ye have hearts that still burn,
In this triumph of Death, it is They that return!

And ye in whose breasts are the images true
Of parents that loved him still better than you,
No longer lament o'er a cenotaph urn—
In this triumph of Death, it is They who return!

From legion to legion the watchword is sped,
"Long life to the Emperor! Life to the Dead?"
His prayer is accomplished—the Hero is laid
'Mid the People he loved, on the banks of the Seine!

On the throne of emotions, through kingdoms of speech,
In dominions of thought that no traitor can reach,
As now, so for ever Napoleon shall reign
'Mid the People he loved, on the banks of the Seine!

AMERICAN ORATORS AND STATESMEN.*

The Rev. Sydney Smith once wrote an article in the Edinburgh Review, (re-published amongst his works,) proving, to the entire dissatisfaction of the Americans, that they had produced no names in art, science, or literature, since they became a nation, capable of standing a minute's competition with those produced by England within the same period. This was a little too much; and one of their crack reviewers was commissioned to answer the divine. After a little preliminary castigation, he proceeded to demolish him by a set of searching interrogatories, commencing somewhat in this fashion:

"Has this writer never heard of Jared Sparks, or Timothy Dwight? Has he never heard of Buckminster, Griscom, Ames, Wirt, Brown, Fitch, Flint, Frieble, and Sullivan?"

Now it is most assuredly no matter of boast; for many of the writers on the list were men of undoubted talent, and have since obtained well-merited celebrity; but we much ear that Mr. Sydney Smith never heard of one of them. If he had, he would certainly have been proportionally in advance of the great majority of the reading English public at the time. We have since done a little towards supplying our deficiencies in this respect; but if we were put through the same sort of catechism, most of us should still betray a lamentable degree of ignorance as to the indigenous literature of the United States—and not less as to their oratory. During Mr. Webster and Miss Sedgewick's visit to England last spring, it was quite amusing to watch the puzzled faces of the company on the announcement of their names in a drawing-room; for notwithstanding the reprint of Miss Sedgewick's "Tales," and the constant mention of Mr. Webster by the "Genevieve Traveller" of the "Times," nine persons out of ten in the elite of English society had about as accurate a notion of their respective claims to celebrity as Lord Melbourne of Mr. Faraday's, when it was proposed to add that gentleman's name to the pension-list.

To prevent the recurrence of such scenes when Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun, or Mr. Everett shall honor us with a visit, we propose, in the present article, to bring our readers acquainted with the leading orators in the United States, by short sketches of their career and characteristic passages from their speeches—to play, in short, the "Timon" of America; and any comparison we may afterwards choose to institute as to the respective excellence of the two countries in this branch of intellectual exertion, will at least not expose us to the reproach of having selected a field in which the advantage is necessarily on the side of the mother-country. Seventy years of democratic institutions may not be sufficient to form a style or perfect a school of art, but they are enough, in all conscience, to show what a nation can do in eloquence and statesmanship.

The eloquence of the Americans, like that of the French, dates from their revolution; but they started under widely different auspices. When the National Assembly was first called together, the members were utterly unacquainted with the forms of business, or the tactics of debate. Du-Roi tells us that the only orators who possessed any talent for improvisation were Maury, Clermont-Tonnerre, Barnave and Thouret; and of these Barnave alone was capable of extemporising an entire speech of any length. Mirabeau clearly was not; and most of his best passages are short, rapid, and electrical, flashing out from between the trains of argumentation laboriously prepared for him, like lightning through clouds. In North America, on the contrary, the habit of public speaking was as familiar as in the mother-country at this hour: each provincial assembly was a school; and the very first Congress conducted their debates and carried their resolutions in as orderly and business-like a manner, as if the contending parties had been led by the leaders of our House of Commons, with Lord Canterbury to preside; indeed, in a much more orderly and business-like manner than since the excitement of the crisis has passed away. Unluckily their most momentous sittings were held with closed doors: newspaper reporters did not come into existence as a class, even in England, till full twenty years afterwards; and the vanity of publication had no influence in such a crisis on men whose lives and fortunes were at stake. General descriptions of the principal speakers (Adams, Lee, Dickinson, Hancock) have come down to us; but the one orator who had fire and force enough to stamp his very words and image upon the memory, and blend them indissolubly with the best traditions of the land, was Henry.

Demosthenes left corrected copies of all his best speeches. Demades left none. For aught we know to the contrary, therefore, Theophrastus might have been quite right in saying, as reported in Plutarch, that Demosthenes was worthy of Athens, and Demades above it. But when a speaker takes his fair chance with his fellows, and his thoughts and expressions are laid up in cedar for no other reason than from their being of a kind that the world would not willingly let die, the bare fact is decisive of his claims. If, for example, we knew nothing of Lord Chatham's eloquence but what is recorded by Walpole, we should entertain no doubt of his superiority to Fox or Pulteney; and the few genuine fragments of Mirabeau which have been preserved—preserved only by constant repetition at the time—are more conclusive than volumes; for if the specimens do not entirely come up to the traditional reputation of the man, we are rather tempted to suppose that the thought or expression has lost something of its original brightness on its way to us, than that the concurrent voices of his contemporaries spoke false.

Applying the same criterion to Henry, we cannot well err in placing his name at the head of our list. His authenticated remains consist merely of a few insulated passages, enshrined in the note book of some zealous admirer, or handed down from mouth to mouth; but what are called "Henry's speeches" form the favorite subjects of declamation in the schools; and the traditional accounts of the effects produced by his voice and manner, with all those other nameless attributes which Demosthenes included under the word action, transcend most things of the kind recorded in history; except the consummate acting of Lord Chatham, who folded his flannels round him like a toga, and awed his adversaries into silence by a sweep of his crutch. Jefferson, no mean authority, declared Henry to be the greatest orator that ever lived; and a firm conviction of the justice of this estimate has been the means of obtaining for him so distinguished a biographer as Mr. Wirt.

Patrick Henry was the second son of Col. John Henry, a Scotch settler, who emigrated prior to 1730.* Patrick was born in May, 1736, at the "family seat" called Studley, in Virginia, but "was raised and educated" (to borrow the precise expression of Mr. Wirt) at another "seat" in the same colony. Colonels and seats, however, are good cheap in America, as Blackstone said of gentlemen in England; and there is nothing in Patrick Henry's "raising" that bears token of aristocracy. He picked up a little Latin, and less Greek, with a smattering of mathematics, under the direction of his father, who, it is rather enigmatically stated, "had opened a grammar-school in his own house;" but he manifested a decided aversion to study, and when the hour for it arrived, was generally to be found in the woods with his gun, or by the river with his fishing-rod. The melancholy Jaques, however, not Nimrod, was his prototype; and the sports of the field were little better than a pretence to get away from books and men, and enjoy the solitary luxury (or vice) of day-dreaming. His person at that period was coarse, his manners awkward, his dress slovenly, his conversation rude, and if he gave any indications of future excellence, they were not of a sort to attract the attention of his friends. A fondness and aptness for the observation of character were the only creditable peculiarities they saw in him. At the age of fifteen, he was placed behind the counter of a merchant, (Anglic, shop-keeper), and after a year's novitiate was set up in business for himself, in partnership with his brother William, whose habits closely resembled his own. The result may be guessed, and was not long in coming. The firm failed within a year; but its ill-success had one good effect on Patrick; it drove him first to music, then to books, as a relief; he learnt to play well on the flute and violin, and acquired for the first time, a relish for reading. He had also found out one mode of turning his customers to account. When they met to gossip in his store, he availed himself of the opportunity to pursue his favorite study of character; and it was subsequently remembered that, so long as they were gay and talkative, he generally remained silent, but whenever the conversation flagged, he adroitly recommenced it in such a manner as to bring their peculiarities of mind and disposition into play. At eighteen he married, and turned farmer, but he was as little fitted for agriculture as for trade. After a two years' trial, he gave up his farm and re-commenced shop-keeping, which soon reduced him a second time to insolvency. Part of the abundant leisure, however, in which he uniformly indulged himself, had been devoted to books, and while his farm was going to rack and ruin, or his customers were waiting to be served, he was deep in a translation of Livy, whose eloquent harangues particularly attracted him.

It was now that, all other experiments having failed, he resolved to make trial of the law; but his confirmed habits of idleness had induced a general belief that he would stand no chance against the formidable array of competitors which the Virginia bar presented at the time, and he set to work with so little energy as to justify a suspicion that his own expectations were extremely limited. "To the study of a profession," says Mr. Wirt, "which is said to require the lucubrations of twenty years, Mr. Henry devoted not more than six weeks; Judge Tyler says one month; and he adds, This I had from his own lips. In this time he read Coke upon Littleton, and the Virginia laws.

A student must be endowed with considerable powers of application who could read Coke upon Littleton in a month; and we incline to think that Henry's personal was of a cursory description, for his license to practise was obtained with difficulty, and the examiners who granted it acknowledged that they found him very ignorant of law, but perceived him to be a young man of genius, and did not doubt that he would soon qualify himself. Four years passed away before these expectations were fulfilled, and during much of this period he acted as assistant to his father-in-law, a tavern-keeper. An occasion at length presented itself peculiarly adapted to his powers, and he sprang by one bold bound into celebrity.

The ministers of the established church of Virginia (the Church of England) were then paid in kind, i. e. each was legally entitled to an annual stipend of 16,000 pounds of tobacco. In 1755 the crops failed, and an act was passed enabling the planters to discharge their tobacco debts in money, at the rate of 16s. 8d. per hundred weight, when the actual value was 50s. or 60s. This Act, though invalid for want of the royal assent, was submitted to; but when it was revived in 1758, the clergy took the alarm, and one of their body brought the question before the courts. It came on for argument in the shape of a demurrer, and judgment being given for the minister, nothing remained but to assess the damages under a writ of inquiry. The leading counsel of the colony threw up the cause as hopeless.

* According to Mr. Wirt, John Henry "is said to have been a nephew of the maternal line to the great historian, Dr. William Robertson." Had this been so, he must also have been cousin-german to the mother of Lord Brougham. But dates are awkward things. Dr. Robertson was born in 1721. There may have been some connection.

its imperfections are frankly admitted by the reporter, it proves that Henry could thoroughly master a great legal question, and argue according to the strict rules of logic when he chose. (See Wirt, p. 331.) The case of John Hook is ordinarily put forward as an example of what he could do in the comic line. This Hook was a Scotchman, fond of money, and suspected of being unfavorable to the American cause. Two of his bullocks had been seized for the use of the troops in 1781; and so soon as peace was established he brought an action against the commissary. Henry was engaged for the defence:

"He painted the distresses of the American army, exposed almost naked to the rigor of a winter's sky, and marking the frozen ground over which they marched with the blood of their unshod feet. "Where was the man," he said, "who had an American heart in his bosom, who would not have thrown open his fields, his barns, his cellars, the doors of his house, the portals of his breast, to have received with open arms the meanest soldier in that little band of famished patriots? Where is the man? There he stands; but whether the heart of an American beats in his bosom, you, gentlemen, are to judge." He then carried the jury, by the powers of his imagination, to the plains around York, the surrender of which had followed shortly after the act complained of. He depicted the surrender in the most glowing and noble colors of his eloquence: the audience saw before their eyes the humiliation and dejection of the British, as they marched out of their trenches; they saw the triumph which lighted up every patriot face, and heard the shouts of victory, and the cry of Washington and liberty, as it rang and echoed through the American ranks, and was reverberated from the hills and shores of the neighboring river. "But hark! what notes of discord are these which disturb the general joy, and silence the acclamations of victory? they are the notes of John Hook, hoarsely bawling through the American camp, beef! beef!"—pp. 389, 390."

It is added that the clerk of the court, unable to contain himself, and unwilling to commit any breach of decorum, rushed out and was found rolling on the grass in a paroxysm of laughter by Hook, the hero of the day. "Jemmy Steptoe, what the devil ails ye, mon?" Mr. Steptoe could only say that he could not help it. "Never mind ye," said the defendant; "wait till Billy Cowan gets up; he'll show him the la'." Billy Cowan's exertions, however, proved vain. The cause was decided by acclamation; and a cry of tar and feathers having succeeded to that of beef, Mr. Hook was fain to make a precipitate retreat.

His last appearance on the stage of public life was in 1799, when, alarmed at the violent measures meditated by the democratic party, he thought it his duty to stem the torrent, and presented himself as a candidate for the House of Delegates for Charlotte County. On the day of election he received such homage from the people that a Baptist minister demanded why they followed him about: "Mr. Henry is not a god." "No, indeed, my friend," was the reply; "I am but a poor worm, as fleeting and unsubstantial as the shadow of the cloud that flies over your fields, and is remembered no more." In the course of his address he painted the horrors that would ensue if they compelled Washington to march against them:

"And where (he asked) are our resources to meet such a conflict? Where is the citizen of America who will dare to lift his hand against the father of his country?" A drunken man in the crowd threw up his arm, and exclaimed that "he dared to do it." "No," answered Mr. Henry, rising aloft in all his majesty: "you dare not do it: in such a parricidal attempt, the steel would drop from your nerveless arm!"

He was elected by a large majority, and the assembly was thrown into commotion by the tidings of his approach; but his health was irretrievably broken, the crisis was accelerated by the agitations of the period, and on June 6th, 1799, he died.

The person of an orator who produced such effects by action is important. Henry was tall and raw-boned, with a slight stoop of the shoulders; his complexion was dark and sunburnt, without any appearance of blood in the cheeks; his ordinary expression was that of gravity, and he had an habitual contraction of the brow, which gave him a look of harshness till he spoke. His forehead was high and straight—nose Roman, and eyes of singular power and brilliancy, overshadowed by dark thick eyebrows. His voice was clear, firm, and of extraordinary compass. His delivery was easy and natural when he warmed; but he often hesitated at the commencement, and had the air of laboring under a distressing degree of modesty or timidity, which indeed continued to characterize his manner throughout, unless he was led to throw it off by some high excitement. His information was very limited, for his disinclination to study returned upon him so soon as his reputation was established. "Take my word for it," was his remark to a friend in advanced life—"we are too old to read books: read men—they are the only volumes we can read to advantage." What he did read was always ready for use. Mr. Lee (the Cicero of the Virginia Assembly) was descending tediously, till a late hour, on the beauties of Don Quixote. Henry assented, but added, "you have overlooked in your eulogy one of the finest things in the book—the divine exclamation of Sancho—"Blessed be the man who first invented sleep: it covers one all over, like a cloak."

We have already suggested a parallel; and no one can help being struck by the striking resemblance which Henry's oratory (so far as it can be collected from description) bears to Lord Chatham's, notwithstanding the startling discrepancy between their birth, breeding, tastes, habits, and pursuits. The one, a born member of the English aristocracy—the other, the son of a Virginian farmer: the one, educated at Eton and Oxford—the other, picking up a little Latin grammar at a day-school: the one, reading Bailey's Dictionary twice over, and articulating before a glass to perfect his use of language—the other, affecting a still greater carelessness of style and rusticity of pronunciation than were natural to him: the one, so fine a gentleman and so inveterate an actor, that, before receiving the most insignificant visitor, he was wont to call for his wig, and set it on himself in an imposing attitude—the other, slouching into the provincial parliament with his leather gaiters and shooting-jacket. But they meet in all the grand leading elemental points—in fire, force, energy and intrepidity—the sagacity that works by intuition—the faculty of taking in the entire subject at a glance, or lighting up a whole question by a metaphor—the fondness for Saxon words, short unadorned idiomatic sentences, downright assertions, and hazardous apostrophes—above all, in the singular tact and felicity with which their dramatic (or rather melo-dramatic) turns and touches were brought in.

It is in vain to say that people could never have been such fools as to be awed by what reads very like buffoonery or impertinence; or to cite the failure of Burke, who, when he flung the dagger on the floor of the House, produced nothing but a smothered laugh, and a joke from Sheridan:—"The gentleman has brought us the knife—but where is the fork?" The scene would have gone off differently, had the actor been equal to the part. Lord Chatham often succeeded in worse. On one occasion, for example, he rose and walked out of the House, at his usual slow pace, immediately after he had finished his speech. A silence ensued till the door opened to let him into the lobby. A member then started up, saying, "I rise to reply to the right honorable member." Lord Chatham turned back and fixed his eye on the orator, who instantly sat down dumb; then his lordship returned to his seat, repeating, as he hobbled along, the verses of Virgil:

"At Danaum procera, Agamemnoniaque phalanges,
Ut videre virum fulgentiaque arma per umbras,
Ingenti trepidare metu: pars tollere terga,
Ceu quendam petiere rates: pars tollere vocem
Exiguam: inceptus clamor frustratur hiatibus."

Then placing himself in his seat he exclaimed, "Now let me hear what the honorable member has to say to me." When the late Mr. Charles Butler, from whom we borrow this anecdote, asked his informant, an eye-witness, if the House did not laugh at the ridiculous figure of the poor member, he replied, "No, sir, we were all too awed to laugh."

Another extraordinary instance of his command of the House is the manner in which he fixed indelibly on Mr. Grenville the appellation of "the gentle shepherd." At the time in question, a song of Dr. Howard, which began with the words, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where," each stanza ending with that line, was in every mouth. In the course of the debate, Mr. Grenville exclaimed, "Where is our money? where are our means? I say again, where are our means? where is our money?" He then sat down, and Lord Chatham paced slowly out of the House, humming the line, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where."

Mr. Butler states that a gentleman mentioned the two last circumstances to the late Mr. Pitt; the minister observed that they were proofs of his father's ascendancy in the House; but that no specimens remained of the eloquence by which that ascendancy was procured. The gentleman recommended him to read slowly his father's speeches for the repeal of the stamp-act; and while he repeated them to bring to his mind, as well as he could, the figure, the look, and the voice, with which his father might be supposed to have pronounced them. Mr. Pitt did so, and admitted the probable effect of the speeches thus delivered.

In the case of his Transatlantic rival we must go still further: we must infer both language and action from the wonders recorded of him; but when we find Americans of all classes, parties, and shades of opinion, bearing concurrent testimony to these, there is obviously no alternative but to assume the direct falsehood of their statements, or admit that Patrick Henry possessed the genuine vis viva, the in-born genius of oratory, as much, perhaps, as any other modern, dead or living, with the exception of Chatham and Mirabeau.

ENGLISH CHURCHES.

BY MARY HOWITT.

I.
How beautiful they stand,
Those ancient altars of our native land!
Amid the pasture fields and dark green woods,
Amid the mountain's clouds and solitudes;
By rivers broad that rush into the sea:
By little brooks that with a hissing sound,
Like playful children, run by copse and lea!
Each in its little drop of holy ground,
How beautiful they stand,
Those old gray churches of our native land!

II.
Our lives are all turmoil;
Our souls are in a weary strife and toil,
Grasping and straining—tasking nerve and brain,
Both day and night for gain;
We have grown worldly; have made gold our god;
Have turned our hearts away from lowly things:
We seek not now the wild-flower on the sod;
We see not snowy folded angel's wings
Amid the sunny skies;
For visions come not to polluted eyes!

III.
Yet, blessed, quiet fanes!
Still piety, still poetry remains,
And shall remain, whilst ever on the air
One chapel-bell calls high and low to prayer—
Whilst ever green and sunny church-yards keep
The dust of our beloved, and tears are shed
From fountains which in the human heart lie deep!
Something in these aspiring days we need
To keep our spirits lowly,
To set within our hearts sweet thoughts and holy!

IV.
And 't is for this they stand,
The old grey churches of our native land!
And even in the gold-corrupted mart,
In the great city's heart
They stand: and chantry dome and organ sound,
And stated services of prayer and praise,
Like to the righteous ten which were not found,
For the polluted city shall praise,
Meek faith and love sincere—
Better in time of need than shield or spear!

POEMS BY THE LADY FLORA HASTINGS.

ITALY.

Oh, name it not! there is a spell
Around its memory clinging—
To which I would not bid farewell
For all the Future's bringing.

The skies of radiant Italy,
Oh, they are deeply blue,
And nothing, save their kindred waves,
Can match their sapphire hue!
No little clouds e'er flit across
To dim their heavenly light;
Would that my soul were pure as they,
As spotless and as bright!

The gales of balmy Italy!
Oh, as they fleet along
They bear upon their downy wings
The treasured wealth of song!
They linger through the blooming scenes
Where once my footsteps roved;
And they are free, though I am not,
To kiss the flowers I loved.

The songs of tuneful Italy!
They wake within the heart
Those visions of the olden time
Which will not thence depart,
And Freedom, Love, and Honor bright
Rise from the dust again.
Would that my feeble lyre could wake
The spirit-stirring strain!

The flowers of sunny Italy!
Oh, blissful is their doom!—
A brief, bright space to bloom, then sink,
Untrodden, to the tomb,
Still breathing fragrance as they droop
Beneath the golden ray:
Oh, thus were 't mine to sigh my soul
In ecstasy away!

The tombs of holy Italy!
The earth where heroes trod;
Where sainted martyrs glorified
In death th' incarnate God!
Where all is bright, and pure, and calm,
On earth, in air, and sea.
Oh, Italy! among thy tombs
Hast thou not one for me?

THE IDEALIST.

Look on this grave: the rank grass waves o'er it;
The startled fawn, upspringing from our tread,
Shakes from the dewy fern its liquid gems;—
Yet here blooms the first primrose—the last violet
That sheds its fragrance on the chill, damp air
Of a November morn, like Love in death,
Springs from this sod; and in the summer nights
The glow-worm layeth here her lamp of light;
The heavenward lark begins its motions here,
And the pale moonbeams kiss the sacred earth.

And well may bird, and flower, and moonbeam pale,
With fragrance, and with radiance, and with song
Hallow his bed of rest who slumbereth here—
For he was one whose heart entwined itself
With all of being—who beheld all things
That lived, instinct with th' Immaterial Mind,
All things that were, as that Mind's handiwork;
Who knew himself the brother of the worm,
And yet akin to angels and archangels.
His was the Poetry of Life. His heart
Was steeped in Love, and in the deep, unuttered,
Unfathomed sense of Beauty and Perfection.
He would go forth from his sweet cottage-home,
Drinking the sounds and sights of blessedness
That throng this faerie world, to treasure them
In the deep silence of his lofty soul.
His spirit sought no words in which to clothe
His consciousness of bliss: he poured it forth,
In deep, low murmurs, to the mountain wind.
He gazed upon the countless orbs of night,
Brightly careering in their mystic paths,
Until he felt his soul blend with their beams
By the intensity with which he loved them.
And when the tempest woke, and the dread North
Cast forth her lightnings and her fleecy snows,
He bent his brow in raptur'd awe, and hailed
The present God—the ruler of the storm!
The Past gave up her wealth of thought: he pored
Upon the scrolls of by-gone time, until
The mighty men, the giant minds of old,
Came at his call, peopling his solitude
Like his accustomed and familiar friends.

The Future brought her hopes, her glorious promise;
Ages unborn fitted before his sight.
The world of air was his: his spirit yearned,
With deep and passionate longing, to arrest
The vague and spiritual realities
Whose shadows brighten o'er Life's toilsome way.
They answered to his call, and round his couch
Came, nightly thronging, messengers of light;
He felt the ether tremble with their wings;
Their voices sank upon his slumbering ear
Like echoes from another sphere, and gave
To Time the music of Eternity.

And was he happy? Stooped his spirit never
From its exalted paths? Was he still free
To tread the empyrean, and to bathe
His being in essential ecstasy?
Sorrow and sickness came, and this world's cares,
Cramping the noble soul that scorned its hopes
And mocked at its delusions; and he chafed
Against the galling chain that bound him down,
As the caged eagle chafes in slavery.

His heart grew chilled and reckless; and his sense
Of the ideal faded and waned away.
He was most wretched—but amid the gloom
The voice of Mercy spake: he raised his eyes,
And, from the mystery of the Holy Cross,
He learned to read the mystery of Life.
Linking the present with the future world,
He worshipped, he believed, adored and loved!

THE VESPER HOUR.

I.
When vesper hour, with stilly spell,
Shall lead thee to her hermit cell,
Chasing from round thy path away
The varied visions of the day—
When no vain dreams thy thoughts may share,
No lowly hope, no earth-born care;
What time thou bend'st at the suppliant knee
And pour'st thy fervid soul in prayer,
Think of me—pray for me—for me.

II.
Too garish glows the golden day—
Blend not my memory with its ray,
The tissue of its hopes and fears,
Its promises of other years:
But when the chastened hour is come
That bids thy fancy cease to roam,
And when thy soul, from trammels free,
Is soaring to the spirit's home,
Think of me—pray for me—for me.

THE SWAN SONG.

Grieve not that I die young.—Is it not well
To pass away ere life hath lost its brightness?
Bind me no longer, sisters with the spell
Of love and your kind words. List ye to me:
Here I am blessed—but I would be more free;
I would go forth in all my spirit's lightness.
Let me depart.

Ah, who would linger till bright eyes grow dim,
Kind voices mute, and faithful bosoms cold?
Till carking care, and coil, and anguish grim,
Cast their dark shadows o'er this fairy world;
Till Fancy's many colored wings are furled,
And all, save the proud spirit, waxeth old?
Let me depart.

Thus would I pass away—yielding my soul
A joyous thank-offering to Him who gave
That soul to be, those starry orbs to roll.
Thus—thus exultingly would I depart,
Song on my lips, ecstasy in my heart.
Sisters, sweet sisters, bear me to my grave—
Let me depart.

HYMN—THANK OFFERING.

In every place, in every hour,
Whate'er my wayward lot may be,
In joy or grief, in sun or shower,
Father and Lord! I turn to Thee.
Thee, when the incense-breathing flowers
Pour forth the worship of the spring,
With the glad tenants of the bowers
My trembling accents strive to sing.
Thee, when upon the frozen strand
Winter, begirt with storms, descends;
Thee, Lord, I hail, whose gracious hand
O'er all a guardian care extends.
Thee, when the golden harvests yield
Their treasures to increase our store;
Thee, when through ether's gloomy field
The lightnings flash, the thunders roar!
Thee, when athwart the azure sky
Thy starry hosts their mazes lead,
And when Thou sheddest from on high
Thy dew-drops on the flowery mead.
Thee, when my cup of bliss o'erflows;
Thee, when my heart's best joys are fled;
Thee, when my breast exulting glows;
Thee, when I bend beside the dead.
Alike in joy and in distress,
Oh, let me trace Thy hand Divine!
Righteous in chastening, prompt to bless,
Still, Father, may Thy will be mine!

TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF KENT.

August 17, 1834.

Fain would I waken, for thy natal day,
The sweetest tones that poet's lyre can breathe:
For thee pour forth the glad and festive lay,
And for thy brow a rosy chaplet wreath.
But deeper thoughts forbid—I may not bring,
With thoughtless gaiety and sportive glee,
To thee, so light, so vain an offering—
This day is full of memory for thee.

Voices long hushed are whispering to thee now,
The loved—the lost—the absent round thee press;
The true of heart, the early friends laid low,
Whose presence wont in former years to bless—
Not with such hallowed memories as these
May the light flow of minstrel numbers blend;
They bid the votive strains of fancy cease—
More fervent homage shall on thee attend.

In simple phrase, with lips sincere, for thee,
Lady, I breathe a blessing and a prayer:
Long be thy precious days vouchsafed, to see
The blessed results of thy maternal care.
Few be thy trials, and, thy path to cheer,
Be many a ray of gracious mercy given;
And earth, more happy each revolving year,
Be the bright earnest of a brighter heaven!

LIGHT IN DARKNESS.

I.
The stormy winds raved loud, and vexed
The chafing waters' troubled breast,
When lo! the voice of mercy spake
And soothed the ruffled waves to rest.

II.
Saviour! when thy poor, wayward child
Droops faithless ly' amidst doubt or ill,
Thy voice shall calm the inward strife,
And bid her aching heart "Be still."

St. Leonard's, Nov. 27, 1834.

THE RAINBOW.

Soft glowing in uncertain birth
"Twixt Nature's smiles and tears.
The bow, Lord! which thou hast bent,
Bright in the cloud appears.
The portal of thy dwelling-place
That pure arch seems to be,
And, as I bless its mystic light,
My spirit turns to Thee.

Thus, gleaming o'er a guilty world,
We hail the ray of love;
Thus dawns upon the contrite soul
Thy mercy from above;
And as thy faithful promise speaks
Repentant sin forgiven,
In humble hope we bless the beam
That points the way to Heaven.

SONNET.

I ask no storied urn, nor sculptured stone,
To mark the spot where my cold ashes sleep.
Calm be that place of rest—to all unknown,
Save to the kindred few who round it weep.
Wide o'er the hillock wave the linden tree,
And round it bloom the flowerets of the spring;
While from the sod, exulting to be free,
Burst the blithe lark on heaven-aspiring wing;
Still on my grave may summer sunbeams play,
Still on the turf may nightly dew descend;
Still tremble over it the paly ray
I love so well, and whispering night-flowers bend.
Grieve not—in peace and humble faith I rest,
Waiting the morn that wakens for the blest.

INSCRIPTION FOR A SUN-DIAL.

As o'er the dial flits the rapid shade,
So speed the hours of Life's eventful day;
As from the plate thou see'st the shadows fade,
Time, unimproved, fleets tracelessly away.

Let thy bright hours, like sunbeams, call forth flowers,
Truth, Mercy, Justice, Holiness and Love—
Here may they droop beneath affliction's showers—
Doubt not their fragrance shall ascend above.

THE PRESS.

BY MRS. ABDY.

I.
Oh! the wondrous Press has a magic sway
In its great and giant force,
To the east and west it bends its way,
And it takes o'er the seas its course;
Gay dazzling stores may the good ship fill,
In the pride of vain excess,
But it boasts a treasure more precious still,
In the wealth of the mighty Press.

II.
The son of genius, unsought, unknown,
May his heaven-born theme pursue,
Their brightness gladdens himself alone,
For his friends are far and few.
But see, in the ranks of fame he stands,
Lo! thousands his lays possess,
And his name is blazoned in distant lands,
Through the aid of the mighty Press.

III.
The poet's numbers, the scholar's lore,
Cast their radiant spell o'er all;
Those strains are coned in the cottage door
That enchant the lordly hall:
And the Book more holy than all beside,
Which alone can truly bless,
To the heathen shines as a lamp and guide,
By the power of the mighty Press.

IV.
Alas! that a scene so bright, so dear,
Should a dark reverse disclose;
Alas! that a boon so great, so dear,
Should be ever linked with woes;
But the lawless doctrines of men profane,
To the world their guile address,
Proving to thousands a snare and a bane,
Through the sway of the mighty Press.

V.
Yet the summer sky has its wintery doom,
And the rose reveals a thorn,
And evil must ever mix with good
In a race to evil born;
We must bear the pangs of a thwarted will
Where we fondly hoped success,
We must sigh o'er the mass of social ill,
Diffused by the mighty Press.

VI.
Yet the light of Faith let us humbly seek
To illumine our dangerous road,
Let us deem all knowledge poor and weak
That would lead our hearts from God;
Then may we welcome Instruction's tide,
As it flows our land to bless,
And greet with unmingled joy and pride
The gift of our glorious Press.

Lockhart's Spanish Ballads.

BAVIECA.

Montaigne, in his curious Essay entitled "Des Desastres," says that all the world knows every thing about Bucephalus. The same of the favorite charger of the Cid Ruy Diaz, is scarcely less celebrated. Notice is taken of him in almost every one of the hundred ballads concerning the history of his master; and there are one or two of these, of which the horse is more truly the hero than his rider. In one of these ballads, the Cid is giving directions about his funeral. He desires that they shall place his body "in full armor upon Bavioca," and so conduct him to the church of San Pedro de Cardena. This was done accordingly; and, says another ballad,

Truxeron pues a Babioca;
Y en mirandole se puso
Ten triste como si fuera
Mas razonable que bruto.

In the Cid's last will mention is also made of this noble charger. "When ye bury Bavioca, dig deep," says Ruy Diaz; "for shameful thing were it, that he should be eat by curs, who hath trampled down so much curliish flesh of Moors."

I.
The King look'd on him kindly, as on a vassal true;
Then to the King Ruy Diaz spake after reverence due:
"Oh, King, the thing is shameful, that any man beside
The liege lord of Castille himself should Bavioca ride;

II.
"For neither Spain nor Araby could another charger bring
So good as he, and certes, the best befits my King.
But that you may behold him and know him to the core,
I'll make him go as he was wont when his nostrils smelt the Moor."

III.
With that, the Cid, clad as he was in mantle furr'd and wide,
On Bavioca vaulting, put the rowel in his side:
And up and down, and round and round, so fierce was his career,
Stream'd like a pennon on the wind Ruy Diaz' minivere.

IV.
And all that saw them praised them; they lauded man and horse,
As matched well, and rivalless for gallantry and force;
Ne'er had they look'd on horseman might to this knight come near,
Nor on other charger worthy of such a cavalier.

V.
Thus, to and fro a-rushing, the fierce and furious steed,
He snapt in twain his hither rein: "God pity now the Cid, God pity Diaz," cried the Lords; but when they look'd again,
They saw Ruy Diaz ruling him with the fragment of his rein;
They saw him proudly ruling with gesture firm and calm,
Like a true lord commanding, and obey'd as by a lamb.

VI.
And so he led him foaming and panting to the King;
But "No," said Don Alphonso, "it were a shameful thing
That peerless Bavioca should ever be bestrid
By any mortal but Bivar; mount, mount again, my Cid."

THE EXCOMMUNICATION OF THE CID.

The last specimen I shall give of the Cid-ballads is one the subject of which is evidently of the most apocryphal cast. It is, however, so far as I recollect, the only one of all that immense collection that is quoted or alluded to in Don Quixote. "Sancho," cried Don Quixote, "I am afraid of being excommunicated for having laid violent hands upon a man in holy orders. Justa illud; si quis eadem diabolo, &c. But yet, now I think better on it, I never touched him with my hands, but only with my lance; besides, I did not in the least suspect I had to do with priests, whom I honor and revere as every good Catholic and faithful Christian ought to do, but rather took them to be evil spirits. Well, let the worst come to the worst, I remember what befel the Cid Ruy Diaz, when he broke to pieces the chair of a king's ambassador in the Pope's presence, for which he was excommunicated; which did not hinder the worthy Rodrigo de Bivar from behaving himself that day like a valorous knight and a man of honor."

It was when from Spain across the main the Cid had come to Rome, [ter's dome.
He chanced to see chairs four and three beneath Saint Pe-
"Now tell, I pray, what chairs be they?"—"Seven kings do sit thereon,
As well doth suit, all at the foot of the holy Father's throne.

"The Pope he sitteth above them all, that they may kiss his toe;
Below the keys the Flower-de-lys doth make a gallant show;
For his great puissance, the King of France, next to the Pope may sit;
The rest more low, all in a row, as doth their station fit."

"Ha!" queth the Cid, "now God forbid! it is a shame I wish,
To see the Castle* planted beneath the Flower-de-lys.†
No harm, I hope, good Father Pope, although I move thy chair."

—In pieces small he kick'd it all, ('t was of the ivory fair.)

The Pope's own seat he from his feet did kick it far away,
And the Spanish chair he planted upon its place that day;
Above them all he planted it, and laugh'd right bitterly;
Looks sour and bad I trow he had, as grim as grim might be.

Now when the Pope was aware of this, he was an angry man; [ban:
His lips that night, with solemn rite, pronounced the awful
The curse of God, who died on rood, was on that sinner's head— [said:
To hell and wo man's soul must go if once that curse be

I wot, when the Cid was aware of this, a woful man was he;
At dawn of day he came to pray at the blessed Father's knee:
"Absolve me, blessed Father, have pity upon me; Absolve my soul, and penance I for my sin will do."

"Who is this sinner," queth the Pope, "that at my foot doth kneel?"

—"I am Rodrigo Diaz, a poor Baron of Castille."
Much marvell'd all were in the hall, when that name they heard him say, [away;
—"Rise up, rise up," the Pope he said, "I do thy guilt

"I do thy guilt away," he said, "and my curse I blot it out.
God save Rodrigo Diaz, my Christian champion stout;
I trow, if I had known thee, my grief it had been sore,
To curse Ruy Diaz de Bivar, God's scourge upon the Moor."

STANLEY THORN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'VALENTINE VOX.'

CHAPTER XXIX....The Nomination.

WHEN the expressed determination of the independent band had been communicated by Bob to the committee, they knew at once how to proceed; for as Stanley was to be the first candidate applied to, only in the event of no proposal being made, it was clearly expedient to wait for such application, as the value of property, and more especially that peculiar species of property, so varies by circumstances, that in general a difference of something like a hundred per cent. fluctuates between an offer to buy and an offer to sell.

Bob was therefore instructed to keep an extremely sharp eye upon the patriots still; and, stimulated by the applause lavished upon him for his vigilance, he continued to watch them with indefatigable zeal, albeit deprived of the companionship of his friend, through that venerable gentleman's unhappy indiscretion.

From day to day, as no offer from either party had been made, the anxiety of the independent people increased; for although they possessed intact the power to punish either of the candidates, and thereby to have their revenge, they did not—looking at the thing in a purely commercial point of view—prefer that revenge, however sweet per se, to the more substantial coin of the realm; which was indeed extremely natural, as well as very provident, inasmuch as the majority of them, having an appropriate contempt for the meanness of labor, lived in an enviable state of independence from year to year upon the golden produce of their electoral rights. Their indignation at the backwardness of those who had come forward can therefore astonish no right-minded man, nor is it surprising that on the day of nomination they should have become so incensed at the ungenerous, unjust, and ungentlemanlike behavior of the candidates, that they resolved to show him whom they conceived to be the richer, and therefore the more reprehensible of the two, that they were not with impunity to be swindled.

Now, although philosophical persons may carp at the novel knowledge about to be imparted, it may be held to be highly necessary that all the civilized nations of the earth should know, that in England, previously to the conscientious votes of a constituency being recorded, the candidates have to go through a sound constitutional ordeal, involving the high and indisputable privilege of pelting, and hooting, and yelling at those candidates—a privilege which forms one of the most characteristic and strongly developed features of pure liberty with which a perfectly free and enlightened people can be blessed. That the glorious process of nomination throws a halo of security around our sacred institutions is a fashionable fact, plainly demonstrable by our very adherence to that process, and that the speeches delivered on that interesting occasion are essential to the existence of a good understanding between candidates and electors, is abundantly proved by the mere circumstance of those speeches being made. So also is the show of hands a glorious transaction, and as valuable as it is glorious, inasmuch as it amounts to a mighty demonstration of public opinion, which is of itself so conclusive, that it is in no slight degree remarkable that in a country like this the unpopular practice of demanding a poll should be tolerated at all.

It is however true, very true, that there may exist two rational opinions about that; but it is also true that there cannot exist two opinions about this, that when on the day of nomination the returning officer had deliberately read the writ, Stanley was proposed by a locally influential person, in a most brilliant speech, of which not a single syllable could be heard beyond 'Brother Electors!—Stanley Thorn, Esquire!—honour to represent!—rampant faction!—purity of election!—the eye of Europe!—and the last drop of blood in his veins!'

As it is just possible that it may be observed that this was rather extraordinary, considering Stanley was the popular candidate, it will be proper to explain that the independent portion of the constituency—utterly disgusted with the prospect of being unbought—proceeded en masse to the hustings with aprons, hats, and pockets full of turnips, carrots, cabbage-stalks, potatoes, and other equally handy vegetables, with the view of giving expression to the feelings by which they were animated in a manner the most striking and effective. They hated Stanley with a most correct hate; they felt that they had, by him especially, been treated with contempt; and as contempt is about the last thing which true patriots in general are disposed to endure, they resolved à l'instant to bring him to his senses; and when they had assembled, Bob, cognizant of this high resolve, pressed with unexampled zeal through the crowd to inspire them with additional ardor. Unhappily, they did not know Stanley, and a loud cry arose from time to time of 'Which is he?'—some pointing, in reply, to one devoted individual, and some to another. Bob was well aware of their lamentable ignorance in this particular, and resolving to take advantage of it, rushed with great presence of mind through the mass, shouting just as the person who had nominated Stanley required, 'Now then!—look out, brother boroughmongers!—fire!'

In an instant the hands of the independents grasped their ammunition, and as a gentleman stepped forward to second the nomination, they, mistaking him for the nominee, charged, and the air was darkened with vegetable matter.

In vain the unhappy gentleman thus assailed—being utterly unable to understand it, for he was sure that he had done nothing to offend the constituency—protested against this popular expression of public opinion; in vain the returning officer appealed to their deliberate sense of justice!—they answered by discharging fresh volleys of vegetables—they would not be influenced; their spirit could not be subdued; they were men, independent men, good men and true; in short, men who knew their rights and would maintain them.

'Fire!—fire!' reiterated Bob. 'Wot! is Britons goin' fer to be slaves!'

'No!' responded the patriots in a chorus of thunder, and again their ammunition partially shut out the light.

Now, it may well be known by experienced men, that there is nothing in a siege of this character so efficient as a turnip. It requires but a powerful aim and a strictly correct eye to make it go straight to the point proposed. Carrots are all very well in their way; but in general their flight is extremely irregular, while in unpractised hands they are apt to snap in the throwing; but turnips pierce the air in the most steady style; and albeit many inexperienced persons may prefer a potatoe, there seems to be no just or legitimate ground for such preference; for a potatoe has not half the moral influence of a turnip, because it does not, in proportion to its size, carry with it half the weight.

On this occasion the turnips did great execution. They went with force and dignity at the heads of the individuals by whom the platform was crowded, and whose gestures were in consequence less graceful than grotesque. With the exception of the returning officer, who for a small man was highly indignant, not one upon the hustings dared to face the besiegers. Some, with great self-possession, stooped down, and took a retrospective view through their legs; some witnessed the exciting scene by peeping occasionally over their shoulders; while others formed themselves into picturesque groups, each modestly striving to give the precedence to his friend by placing that friend just before him. Stanley, who enjoyed the thing exceedingly, was in a corner, properly panopied by a beadle, who, being an excessively corpulent person, shielded him with very great effect.

The platform, of course, was soon covered with vegetables; sufficient, indeed, had been poured in to stock a metropolitan market; but Bob, perceiving that the patriots had plenty still in store, was indefatigable in his efforts to urge them on.

'Keep it up!' he cried; 'never give in! Now—now, brother boroughmongers, at him! Hurrah!—I say,' he added privately, turning to his venerable friend, 'just cut away, and put missus up to it, will you, or else she'll be fit to break her heart. There she is, with old missus, and the Captain, in the carriage.'

As the patriots, with deafening shouts, poured in their reserved ammunition, the venerable gentleman pressed towards the carriage; and, the instant Amelia saw him, she exclaimed,

'Joseph, for goodness' sake! run to the hustings, and—'

'Do not be uneasy, ma'am, about it,' said the venerable gentleman; 'Bob's arrangin' on it beautiful, ma'am, a hinni-watin' into 'em that t'other genelman is him, so as the swells may hexhort themselves of every hindividual vegetable afore his master comes forrard.'

'What, was this attack intended for him?' cried the widow.

'It was, ma'am: its werry onreg'lar, but it vos.'

'The brutes!' exclaimed the widow, indignantly. 'The wretches! Where on earth are the police? Why do not they do their duty? Run, Joseph, and tell him from me to leave the hustings this instant. Be quick, Joseph: there's a good man!'

The venerable gentleman at once started off to deliver his message to Stanley, while the Captain was endeavoring to calm the ladies' fears by explaining precisely the effect of Bob's ruse.

Stanley, however, felt that he had a great public duty to perform. He had to address the independent electors, which is so indispensable on the day of nomination, that it may with great propriety be questioned whether the wanton violation of that duty would not only ensure individual defeat, but strike at the very root of the British Constitution. It is no answer to this, nor is it a sufficient proof of the inutility of the practice, to show that of the speeches delivered on those high occasions it frequently happens that no syllable can be heard: it may be held to be distinctly and absolutely essential to the noble institutions of this country, nevertheless. Individuals, it is true, may pelt. Why, let them pelt! Are free and intelligent men to be deprived of their liberties? They may drown every word,—let them drown every word; are members of a civilized community to be gagged? Is the public voice to be stifled? Are the people of this country to be prohibited from giving full expression to the sentiments and feelings with which they are inspired? He who would contend for the expediency of adopting such a course is no statesman. Besides, there cannot by any possibility be a stronger proof of the practical virtue of delivering speeches on these great occasions, in defiance of the people to whom those speeches are addressed, than that afforded by the fact that the ancient and fine constitutional custom is still adhered to by the most brilliant men of the age.

When, therefore, Mr. Swansdown had been nominated and seconded, and the whole of the vegetables had been duly discharged, Stanley came forth, and boldly faced the electors; but when the independent band perceived the error into which they had been led, when they found that they had been lavishing their favors upon the wrong man, and that they had not so much as a root of mangel-wurzel with which to honor the right one, they became at once so thoroughly disgusted with themselves that they scarcely knew how to give expression to their rage.

'Gentlemen,' said Stanley—'gentlemen! gentlemen!'

He could go no further. The patriots were resolved not to hear another word: they shouted, and bellowed, and yelled, and felt strongly disposed to make a rush, with a view to the restoration of their vegetable ammunition.

'Oh! I'm not going to talk to these vile dirty wretches,' said Stanley, with great impropriety, addressing Sir William, who stood beside him.

'You had better say something.'

'Of what earthly use is it when they'll not hear me?'

'Go on; never mind: tell them how you love them: you are sure to be faithfully reported in the papers. They'll make a speech for you. Do but keep at it for a time, and appear to be dreadfully energetic: that's the way.'

Stanley accordingly set to work like an alarm bell, firmly determined that nothing should stop him. He shouted, and looked extremely fierce, and clenched his fist tightly, and sent in the crown of his hat, and assumed a variety of very imposing attitudes, apparently inspired with unexampled fervor; in short, he performed his part with so much perfection that even the independent patriots became amazed, and wished to hear what this palpable enthusiasm was all about; but the moment this natural wish became manifest, the moment they were sufficiently silent to hear him—he concluded by saying, in a firm, loud voice,

'It therefore follows, that if you do but your duty to yourselves, my return will be triumphant!'

Mr. Swansdown then nobly stepped forward, and the contrast between him and Stanley was striking in the extreme. Mr. Swansdown was a man of noble and gentlemanlike bearing, but he was at the same time remarkably short.

'Gentlemen,' said he, at the very top of a very high voice, 'I am proud—'

'Vot!' exclaimed Venerable Joe, who had stationed himself near the hustings, 'air yer goin' for to 'ear that 'air leetle Lilliprussian speak arter yer vood n't 'ear the t'other! Look at the little swell! Vy he'd have to clamber up upon a cheer to scratch his blessed leetle head, he's sich a werry onreg'lar leetle dodger.'

'Now, my brother boroughmongers!' promptly exclaimed Bob, 'three reg'lar boroughmongering groans for the Lilliprussian!'

Three groans were accordingly started, but they were drowned by the cheers of the patriotic band.

'Gentlemen!' screamed Mr. Swansdown.

'Gentlemen!' echoed Bob, with a shriek which rent the air; and, as similar echoes were established among the crowd, they produced loud and long-continued laughter.

Again Mr. Swansdown tried back, and again; but these trials had no other effect than that of exciting a spirit of emulation among masses, for each man strove to make his echo the most perfect. And it certainly was an unfortunate voice for an eloquent public speaker; but even this was not all, for, while his tones resembled those of an indignant cockatoo, his refined articulation partook of the character of that of Demosthenes before he had recourse to the pebbles.

At length, after making a series, of unsuccessful attempts, he was clearly inclined to give it up in disgust, for the popular reflections upon his physical faculties wounded his private feelings deeply: as, however, an extremely judicious friend represented to him the absolute necessity for going on, and explained that, as these imitations were simply the development of their undoubted constitutional privileges as free and devoted Britons, they ought not to be contemned, he tried again to enlighten them; but, as the more energetic he became the more laughter he created, he had no sooner thrown them all into convulsions than he thanked them fervently for the patient and deliberate attention with which they had honored him, complimented them highly upon the manifestation of their surpassing intellectual characteristics, and with a striking expression of gratitude, withdrew.

The awful moment now arrived for the highly-constitutional show of hands to be demanded, and all living men by whom the importance of this terrific process is appreciated properly, will admit that it is one of the most intense interest, inasmuch as the result involves the dreadful responsibility of demanding a poll. On this occasion the show was decidedly ten to one in favor of Swansdown, which was very remarkable, and being quite unexpected, had a powerful effect. Stanley, however, by no means dismayed, demanded a poll on the spot; when the masses, having given him three highly-enthusiastic cheers, formed themselves into groups to review the chief points, and dispersed without striking a blow.

CHAP. XXX....The Election.

Although Stanley's committee had been again and again assured that no offer had been made to the independent patriots, they now felt convinced that the Swansdown party had purchased them under the rose. The show of hands had amazed them; it afforded in their view an incontrovertible proof of a purchase having been effected, and, as without the support of the patriotic band success was utterly hopeless, they naturally thought that the time had arrived for their opponents to be boldly outbid.

On the other hand, the Swansdown party were equally amazed at the mighty demonstration in their favor. They had concluded that the patriots had been secured by Stanley, and that, therefore, they should lose the election by means which would ensure their eventual success. Their energies had, in consequence, been devoted to the accumulation of sufficient facts to support a petition against Stanley's return; but the show of hands threw a new light upon the subject, and tended to inspire them with the conviction not only that the patriots had not been corrupted, but that they had resolved to adhere firmly to those pure principles by which alone it was supposed the strict integrity of the British Empire could at that particular period be maintained.

Stanley's committee, notwithstanding, at once opened a negotiation with the Independents, and assuming that their votes had already been bought, their first object was to learn the exact price at which the property had been sold. There was much tact and judgement in this, forasmuch as experience had proved to the committee that when electors have been bought by both parties, a great deal depends upon their honor, they knew that the development of that fine moral attribute could be ensured only by giving the highest price. The patriots, however, solemnly declared that their property had not been purchased, which was repudiated at once as being utterly absurd by the committee; who, nevertheless, agreed with them as to the price, and proposed that the payment should be made when the votes had been recorded; but the patriots, exalted by the purity of their principles, spurned this proposal with flashing indignation, as a direct and unwarrantable imputation upon their strictly public virtue. They would have the money down; and they had it.

The great point now to be considered, was, how to secure them. This puzzled the committee for some considerable time; but at length having consulted the best authorities on the subject, they inclined to the belief that the patriots would never dream of leaving a house while they were able to procure liquor gratis, and that, therefore, on being made particularly bacchanalian, they would have no disposition to violate their honor.

A supper was accordingly provided at their own headquarters, and, touching the liquor, the host was instructed to let the supply at least equal the demand. This was done. A bottle of wine was placed by the side of each patriot to begin with, and jugs of ardent spirits were established at regular intervals in the most tempting manner that could be conceived. Accustomed as they had been to the liberality of candidates, this display quite surprised them. It won all their hearts; and, as they partook of the wines and spirits with the most perfect freedom and with an energy which was clearly indicative of the existence of an idea that they had not a moment to lose, they soon became in a most glorious state of affectionate philanthropy. Nothing could surpass their enthusiasm in favor of Stanley. He was a prince: his health was drunk fifty times, for each patriot felt himself bound to propose it the moment he had arrived at the verge of oblivion.

Having soaked themselves up to this point with wine, rum, gin, and brandy, punch was introduced, which, being a new and unexpected feature, was laded out with great spirit, while it drank so excessively smooth that even those who had retained sufficient sense to suspect that they had had quite enough, were unable to resist the flowing bowl. They therefore drank and drank, and dropped off as they drank, and as they dropped they were thrust beneath the table by the survivors, who gradually followed to a man.

When this consummation had arrived, the landlord extinguished the lights, and locked them up, and there they remained snoring snugly until eight in the morning, when Bob and his venerable friend came down with a company of musicians, who aroused them by their correct and energetic execution of "Hail, smiling morn."

At first the patriots felt rather confused, and looked about as if they did not exactly comprehend the true meaning of the extraordinary state of things which then existed. The host, however, supplied them with excellent purl, and their faculties, in consequence, became somewhat clearer; indeed, before an hour had elapsed, they were enabled to entertain a faint notion that they had been at head-quarters all night, which was really very singular. Still they kept drinking the purl—it was so strong and so refreshing—until the clock struck nine, when down came the carriages to convey them to the poll before it was possible for them to be tampered with by the Swansdown faction. Not a patriot, however, thought for a moment of deserting his colors then! They were all too happy—too glorious! "Thorn forever!" was perpetually upon their lips. They would have voted for him for nothing if put to the test!—the purl was so good, and the music so enchanting. They were, indeed, all fervor, all enthusiasm; the excitement was delightful, and hence with joy they entered the carriages to place their votes upon record, surrounded by an enthusiastic mob of embryo patriots, and preceded by a banner, on which was inscribed in letters of gold, "THORN, AND PURITY OF ELECTION."

This was the first grand step, and the consequence was, that at ten o'clock Stanley was eighty a-head. The moral influence of this majority was powerfully felt: at eleven it had increased to one hundred and fifty, and at twelve it had reached two hundred.

The Swansdown party perceiving that, in order to succeed, they must make a mighty effort, now put forth the whole of their strength. The masters ran about like wild Indians, to bring their men up to the poll, and so successfully were their energies brought into play, that at one o'clock Stanley's majority had been reduced to seventy-five. This was hailed as a glorious reaction; but more glorious still was it deemed when at three o'clock Swansdown was seven ahead.

Now came the grand struggle. The excitement was hot. The supporters of each party darted from house to house in a state of intense perspiration, while the utmost anxiety pervaded the town. The agents of Swansdown would not bribe. It was amazing how immensely in their estimation the value of sundry small articles increased, and with how much avidity snuff-boxes, knives, pipes, paper caps, sticks, and old stockings were purchased; but nothing on earth could induce them to bribe.

At this time both parties felt sure of success, although driven to the point of desperation. Bob, acting upon instructions, secured four electors who were reeling toward the poll to vote for Swansdown, and having, with the assistance of his venerable friend, got them into a carriage, drove out of the town. The widow saw this from the room she had engaged, and waved her handkerchief to express her admiration. She also saw, or imagined she saw, Mr. Ripstone displaying the utmost zeal in Stanley's favor; but her faculties were so much confused at the time, that on reflection she felt that she must have been deceived. Just, however, as the poll was about to close, there burst forth an enthusiastic cheer, and, on rushing to the window, she saw him again leading on half-a-dozen electors. She could not be mistaken: it was indeed he—the kind-hearted, dear, good soul!—she felt ready to sink into the earth. He led them boldly to the booth; they were Stanley's colors—their votes were recorded amidst loud cheers—they were the last. The poll finally closed.

In due time the numbers were proclaimed. Stanley had triumphed!—he was fifteen a-head, and the announcement was hailed with reiterated shouts of exultation; but the result was no sooner communicated to Amelia and the widow, who had been in a most painful state of excitement throughout the day, than they sank upon the sofa, and instantly fainted. The attendants were alarmed: they conceived that the nature of the communication had been misunderstood, and tried with zeal to bring them back to a state of consciousness in order to undeceive them; but they remained for some time insensible as statues. At length, however, by virtue of the application of restoratives, their perception returned, and again they had the happiness to hear that he in whom their hearts were centred had indeed been victorious. And oh! with what delight they felt inspired! They embraced; and while affectionately mingling their tears of joy, each chid the other for weeping.

Another mighty shout now arose, and on reaching the window they saw Stanley thanking the electors for the zealous exertions they had made in his behalf; and how noble he looked then, in the judgment of Amelia may be conceived.

A messenger was instantly despatched to urge his return to them the moment he had concluded his address; and as this was but a short one, he soon obeyed the summons, and by doing so deprived them of the power to utter one word of congratulation. They flew to him as he entered the room, and embraced him, and kissed him with fervor, and sobbed like children upon his breast, but they could not speak.

"God bless you?" said Stanley, who felt nearly overpowered, when, on turning to the window, he saw his opponent standing in the pillory by prescription, seeing that the electors of that enlightened borough held the process of pelted the defeated candidate to be one of their highest constitutional privileges, and they certainly did on this particular occasion exercise that privilege, not only with unexampled zeal, but without the slightest feeling of remorse, in consequence of Swansdown having dared to threaten a petition against Stanley's return. They had therefore no mercy; they pelted him with all their characteristic ardor, and continued to pelt him until he deemed it expedient to retire from the scene, when they marked his retreat with three glorious groans.

CHAP. XXXI.—The Chairing.

As success had been held from the commencement of the contest to be sure, the chief preliminaries for the chairing had already been accomplished; and as from the hour the poll closed until midnight, Stanley, Amelia, the widow, and the committee were occupied in giving additional instructions, the whole arrangements for the pageant were, before the time appointed, complete.

The returning officer had named twelve o'clock for the official declaration of the poll, and at that hour Stanley, accompanied by the General, the Captain, and Sir William, proceeded to the Hall in an open carriage, drawn by a mob of remarkably muscular electors, and surrounded by a patriotic multitude anxious to do him all possible honor.

On arriving at the Hall, Stanley entered with his friends, and took his station upon the platform, and almost immediately afterwards the final state of the poll was declared by the returning officer, who proclaimed Stanley "duly elected;" whereupon there were loud cries of "No, no, no!" but the voices of the dissentients were drowned in the general applause that succeeded.

Stanley then came forward, and in a brief but pointed speech, in which he acknowledged the high honor conferred on him, announced it to be "the proudest day of his life," and so on; after which he gracefully offered Mr. Swansdown his hand, which was taken in a gentlemanlike spirit—and having led him forward to address the electors, begged of them to give him a fair and impartial hearing.

The very moment, however, Swansdown stood before them, he was assailed with the most approved expressions of popular disapprobation. They would not hear a word he had to utter. Nothing could induce them for an instant to defer the active exercise of their constitutional power to groan. They would groan, and they did, until he became well convinced that any farther attempt to address them would be useless, when thanks were voted to the Mayor for his urbanity and general good behavior, and amidst loud acclamations the Hall was dissolved.

Now came the great business of this memorable day. During the official declaration, and the important proceedings which were consequent thereon, the procession had been arranged with an appropriate view to the greatest possible effect; and, on leaving the Hall with his immediate friends, Stanley was yielded up to the patriots, who led him at once to his brilliant car, and raised him in triumph aloft.

For some moments, having lost the point of sight, he was somewhat unsteady; but he was soon able to reconcile himself to his exalted position, and when he had done so, the glorious pageant passed in array before him.

First came two stout well-mounted trumpeters, each of whom rejoiced in a pair of balloon cheeks, which were blown out until in the annals of cheeks nothing like them could ever be found upon record. Then came the committee wearing scarfs and rosettes, while their horses—with their bridles and manes decorated with ribands—were prancing and champing their bits with delight, apparently proud beyond all other animals in creation. A magnificent banner followed, with "THORN AND LIBERTY" thereon inscribed. Then a military band playing up with great power and precision; then various other banners, with appropriate inscriptions, the principal bearing the arms of the town; then a line of open carriages, with the Mayor, the chief members of the corporation, and Stanley's private friends; then another extremely powerful band; then a company of morris dancers, duly arrayed in a style the most grotesque, and performing evolutions of a character the most fantastic; then twelve blooming damsels attired in white, each bearing a basket of flowers, which they strewed with due foresight and skill.

When all these had passed in most admirable order, the triumphal car was turned, and Stanley joined the procession. It was then that he had a full view of the scene, which was indeed on the whole most imposing. Independently of the regular inhabitants of the town, streams of gaily-dressed persons had poured in from the surrounding villages; and while the trumpets were sounding, and the bands were playing, and the bells were ringing, and the cannon at intervals roaring in the distance; the colors were flying, and the masses were cheering, and all seemed inspired with joy.

It is, however, necessary to mention that this was not the end of the pageant. A vehicle drawn by two severe looking donkeys immediately succeeded the car, and in front of this vehicle a machine was fixed, bearing a powerful resemblance to a gibbet, from which a well-conceived effigy of Mr. Swansdown was suspended in a picturesque position, with a short pipe firmly established in his mouth, and his person thickly studded with crackers, while beneath him sat a gentleman in the similitude of an unearthly personage, grinning with truly ferocious delight, and fiddling away as if he then strongly felt that he had not many minutes to live.

It may be added as an extraordinary fact, that Stanley did not much approve of this highly characteristic exhibition, and therefore actually intimated something like a desire to have it suppressed; but the patriots, possessing a more exquisite taste for the sublime, and being consequently far more delighted with that than with any other portion of the pageant, would not hear of its suppression for one moment, and hence, having the power in their own hands then, the thing was preserved in all its pristine integrity, while the truly Satanic musician kept fiddling fit to break his heart, and thus the imposing procession moved on.

The reception Stanley met with as he passed was highly flattering. The ladies were especially delighted with his appearance, and waved their handkerchiefs in an absolute state of rapture, he was such a remarkably fine young man, such a really charming fellow, so handsome, so graceful, so excessively elegant. In nearly every window his colors appeared, while with the crowd he was an idol, he did distribute the handfulls of half crowns and shillings at the corner of each street with so much liberality.

These scrambles were a source of great amusement, he having learned the art of making them to perfection from the chief of the Sons of Glory. It is true there was no mud, which was certainly unfortunate as far as it went; but there was plenty of dust, which, when duly commingled with the perspiration of the patriots, had a very good effect, and more especially as during the whole of the morning they had been paying their best respects to the barrels of beer which were freely established in all parts of the town.

Having passed through nearly all the principal streets, the procession reached the inn at which Amelia, and the most distinguished ladies of the borough, had taken up their quarters. Here a splendid triumphal arch had been erected, with the trellis-work of which wreaths of ribands and flowers had been ingeniously and effectively interwoven, while the whole was surmounted with an elegant banner, presented to Stanley by the ladies of the town.

Beneath this arch, as had been previously arranged, the car stopped; and, as Stanley was acknowledging the joyous greeting of all around, a trumpet sounded, when the music and the cheering simultaneously ceased, and in an instant, as if by magic, a dead silence prevailed. Stanley, from whom this arrangement had been kept a strict secret, looked amazed; but, before he had time to inquire the cause, the poor children belonging to the various schools to which the widow had sent munificent donations in his name, and who had been stationed upon platforms on either side of the arch, commenced singing a hymn, in which the blessing of Heaven was fervently invoked on the head of their benefactor. The effect of this was electrical: all were touched deeply: the handkerchiefs of the ladies were no longer waving, and even the hardy crowd, as the strains of the children fell like heavenly music upon their ears, and thus realised their conception of a choir of angels, were awed, and hundreds of men, whom few calamities could have softened, hundreds who had been shouting, and drinking, and acting in a manner the most reckless but a moment before, were seen wiping their eyes with the sleeves of their coats as the tears trickled into their bosoms.

Stanley was much affected: he tried to conceal it, but could not; while Amelia wept and sobbed like a child: her heart was so full, and she felt so happy.

The moment the strains of the children had ceased, the trumpet again sounded, and again the enlivening music was heard; and when Stanley had directed the largest coin of the realm to be given to each child to be worn as a medal in remembrance of him, the pageant continued its course.

At length it arrived at head-quarters—the inn at which Stanley's committee had been held—when the Mayor, and the members of the corporation, alighted, and having received their representative in form, they conducted him at once to the principal room.

The crowd had not, however, seen sufficient of him yet; albeit he had been in this perilous position for nearly two hours—and that position really was one of peril, inasmuch as the patriots by whom the car was borne had been taking a little too much strong ale—they loudly summoned him again to appear, and he eventually obeyed that summons: he appeared upon the balcony, and the shouts with which they hailed him were tremendous. He then addressed them, and in his address thanked them for the enthusiasm they had displayed; and, having intimated to them that it was nearly three o'clock—an intimation which was well understood—he begged of them all to be merry and wise.

A circle was then formed in front of the inn, and when the wretched looking effigy of Mr. Swansdown had been placed in the centre, the crackers with which his devoted person had been filled were ignited, and blew him to atoms.

The patriots, bearing in mind the highly palatable intimation they had received, then repaired to the various houses of entertainment at which really enormous quantities of beef and plum-pudding had been provided; and at six o'clock Stanley sat down to dinner, with two hundred of the principal inhabitants of the town.

Here the utmost enthusiasm prevailed up to the hour of nine when—that being the time appointed for dancing to commence—the whole party retired from the table. Stanley opened the ball with the lady of the Mayor, and was delighted to see his guests so joyous and happy. Here, again, he was the admiration of all the gentlemen present. Sir William danced with the widow the greater part of the evening, and nothing could exceed her delight; he was so graceful, so attentive, so kind: she was in raptures. Mr. Ripstone was absent, which she could not but think very odd; but, then, Sir William was present; and, although Mr. Ripstone was a dear, good creature, Sir William surpassed him in every point.

Having danced with spirit until twelve o'clock, Stanley, worn out with fatigue and excitement, retired with his party almost unperceived; and when the carriages were ordered, the crowd, who were waiting outside to do him honor, insisted upon drawing him themselves to his residence; which was situated nearly a mile from the town. All opposition to this was, of course, vain, and the horses were accordingly removed from both carriages, the traces and poles only remaining attached; and, when Stanley and his party had entered, three cheers were given as the signal for starting, and off they went, preceded by a military band. Instead, however, of taking them directly home, they drew them round the town, which was brilliantly lighted up, and it was not till they imagined that their chosen representative had seen enough of the general illumination that they would consent to proceed towards his mansion.

Having once got upon the road, they were not long before they reached the gates, and here they were met by enthusiastic thousands, who, by the light of large bonfires, had been dancing on the lawn. The committee had arranged this quite unknown to Stanley, and had instructed their agents to regale the happy multitude with boiled beef and beer.

This was, of course, a fresh source of delight to Stanley, who not only encouraged the dancers to proceed, but by way of acknowledging the compliment they had paid him, took the hand of one of the ladies, and having placed her at the head of about two hundred couples, led off the next dance, The Triumph!—much to the amusement of Amelia and her friends, who were enjoying the sport at the drawing-room window. This, however, settled him. The line for nearly an hour seemed interminable, for even those who had before no intention to dance, stood up to have the honor of dancing with him. He did, however, at length, reach the bottom, when, feeling quite sure that he had had enough of it, he restored his proud partner to her friends, and left the lawn.

A signal was now given, and in an instant it was answered by a grand and unexpected flight of rockets, and as this was succeeded by a really magnificent display of fireworks of every description, it was rationally supposed that the enthusiastic guests would withdraw; but, no, nothing of the sort; although Stanley and his party retired to rest in an absolute state of exhaustion, the multitude immediately recommenced dancing, and kept it up with infinite spirit until the rosy morning dawned.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

But the court said that a "copy" meant a copy, and this was not a copy: where was the line to be drawn? Were they to have a contest on every occasion of a party's carelessness as to the materiality, or immateriality, of the variance it had occasioned? So the rule was made absolute with costs. Another scamp sought to be discharged out of custody, or rather that his bail-bond should be delivered up to be cancelled, because his name therein was called "Smyth," whereas in the writ it was "Smythe;" but after his counsel had cited half-a-dozen cases, the court thought that the maxim of idem sonans applied, and discharged the rule. Then half-a-dozen young gentlemen moved for judgment as in case of a nonsuit—some of them with much self-possession and nonchalance; another moved for an attachment against a party for non-payment of costs, pursuant to the Master's allocatur; and the last, in the very back row of all, moved for a rule to compute principal and interest on a bill of exchange. Then all the bar had been gone through, in about half an hour's time, during which the Attorney-General had come into court, and arranged all his books and papers before him; Mr. Subtle sitting next to him with a slip of paper before him, to take a note of the grounds on which he moved.

"Does any other gentleman move?" inquired Lord Widdrington, looking over the court. He received no answer.

"Mr. Attorney-General," said he; and the Attorney-General rose.

"If your Lordship please, in a case of Doe on the Demise of Titmouse against Jolter, tried before your Lordship at the last assizes for the county of York, I have humbly to move your Lordship for a rule to show cause why a nonsuit should not be entered, or why the verdict entered for the plaintiff should not be set aside, and a new trial had." He proceeded to state the facts of the case, and what had taken place at the trial, with great clearness and brevity. In like manner—with infinite simplicity and precision—he stated the various points arising upon the evidence, and the general grounds of law, which have been already specified; but I am so grateful to the reader for his patience under the infliction of so much legal detail as was continued in the last part of this history, that I shall now content myself with the above general statement of what took place before the court. As soon as he had sat down, the court consulted together for a minute or two, and then—

"You may take a rule to show cause Mr. Attorney-General," said Lord Widdrington.

"On all the grounds I have mentioned, my Lord?"

"Yes. Mr. Solicitor-General, do you move?"

Up rose, thereat, the Solicitor-General.

"I shall discharge your rule," whispered Mr. Subtle to the Attorney-General.

"I am afraid you will," whispered the Attorney-General, leaning his head close to Mr. Subtle, and with his hand before his mouth. Then his clerk removed the battery of books which stood before him, together with his brief, and taking another out of his turgid red bag, the Attorney-General was soon deep in the details of an important shipping case, in which he was going to move when next it came to his turn.

Thus the court had granted a rule nisi, as it is called, (i. e. it commanded a particular thing to be done, "unless" sufficient "cause" could be thereafter shown to the court why it should not be done,) for either entering a nonsuit, or having a new trial. Now, had this rule been obtained in the present day, at least two years must have elapsed, owing to the immense and perhaps unavoidable arrear of business, before the other side could have been heard in answer to it; so, at least, it has been reported to me, in this green old solitude where I am writing, recalling long-past scenes of the bustling professional life from which I am thankful for having been able, with a moderate competence, years ago to retire. Now, had such been the state of business at the time when the Rule in Doe v. Titmouse v. Jolter was moved for, see the practical effect of it; had Mr. Aubrey, instead of the high-minded and conscientious man he undoubtedly was, been a rogue, he might have had the opportunity of getting in twenty thousand pounds, and setting off with it to spend upon the Continent, as soon as he found that the court had decided against him; or, if the tenants should have been served with notice not to pay their rents to any one but Mr. Titmouse—at all events not to Mr. Aubrey—how was Mr. Aubrey and his family to have subsisted during this interval?—and with the possibility that, at the end of the two years, Mr. Aubrey might be declared to be the true owner of Yatton, and consequently all the while entitled to those rents, &c., the non-payment of which might have entailed upon him most serious embarrassments. During the same interval, poor Mr. Titmouse, heart-sick with hope deferred, might have taken to liquor, as a solace under his misery, and drunk himself to death before the rule was discharged—or brought his valuable life to a more sudden and abrupt conclusion: which affecting event would have relieved the court from deciding several troublesome points of law, and kept the Aubreys in possession of the Yatton estates. If what I am informed of as to the accumulation of arrears in the Court of King's Bench in the present day, in spite of the anxious and unprecedented exertions of its very able and active judges, be correct, I suspect that I shall not be believed, when I inform the reader, that within ten or twelve days after the rule nisi, in the present case, had been moved, "cause was shown" against it by Mr. Subtle and Mr. Lynx, and very admirably shown against it too. (Mr. Quicksilver, unfortunately for the interests of Mr. Titmouse, was absent, attending a great meeting in the city, called by himself, to establish a society for the Meral and Intellectual Regeneration of Mankind on the Basis of Pure Reason.) The Attorney-General exerted himself to the utmost in support of his rule. He felt that the court—though scarcely at all interfering during his address—was against him; yet he delivered perhaps one of the most masterly arguments that had ever been heard in the place where he was speaking. Mr. Sterling and Mr. Crystal wisely avoiding the ground so admirably occupied by the Attorney-General, contented themselves with strengthening those positions which appeared to them less fortified by positive authority than the others; and then the court said they would take a day or two's time to consider, "less on account," said Lord Widdrington, "of the difficulty of the case, than the magnitude of the interests which would probably be affected by their decision."

"You have them dead with you, Subtle," whispered the Attorney-General, a slight expression of chagrin stealing over his features, as he heard the observation of Lord Widdrington.

"I never doubted it," replied Mr. Subtle, with a confident air. Every day afterward, from the sitting to the rising of the court, did the anxious Aubrey attend in the King's Bench, to hear the judgement of the court delivered. At length arrived the last day of the term. Soon after the sitting of the court, Lord Widdrington pronounced judgement in two or three cases; but not seeing the Attorney-General (who was engaged before the House of Lords) in his place, delayed giving judgement in the case of Doe and Jolter. About two o'clock he made his appearance, and shortly afterward, Lord Widdrington, after disposing of the matter then before the court, said—"There was a case of Doe on the demise of Titmouse against Jolter, in which, early in the term, a rule was obtained, calling upon the lessor of the plaintiff to show cause why,"—and he proceeded to state the rule, and then to deliver the written unanimous judgement of the court. A clear and elaborate statement of the facts, out of which the questions submitted to the court had arisen, and of those questions themselves, was listened to by Mr. Aubrey in breathless suspense, before he could obtain the faintest intimation of the judgement which the court was about to pronounce. Lord Widdrington went on to dispose, one by one, with painful deliberation and precision, of the seven points presented for the decision of the court. One or two questions they decided in favor of the defendant; but added, that it had become unnecessary to do so, in consequence of the answers given by the witnesses to other questions, at the trial, and which disposed of the doubts arising on the former questions. The documentary evidence, subsequently put in, got rid of another difficulty in the earlier part of the plaintiff's case, and rendered immaterial a question put by the plaintiff's counsel, and strenuously objected to on the part of the defendant; which question the court was of opinion, as had been Lord Widdrington at the trial, ought not to have been allowed. Then, as to the question of ADVERSE POSSESSION, on which very great stress had been laid by the defendant's counsel, the court was of opinion that none existed; since there had been a disability—indeed a series of disabilities—through infancy, coverture, and absence beyond seas, of the various parties through whom the lessor of the plaintiff claimed. Finally, as to the question concerning the ERASURE; the court was clearly of opinion, that the deed in which it occurred, had been properly rejected; inasmuch as the erasure occurred in a clearly material part of the deed, and there were no recitals in the deed by which it could be helped. That it was clearly incumbent upon those proffering the deed in evidence, to account for its altered appearance, although the deed was more than thirty years old, and rebut the presumption of fraud arising therefrom. That the erasure was a clear badge of fraud! and to hold otherwise would be to open a wide door to frauds of the most extensive and serious description. That there had been no evidence offered to show that the deed had ever been a valid deed; the very first step failed; and, in short, in its then state, it was in contemplation of law no deed at all; and, consequently, had been properly rejected. "For all these reasons, therefore, we are clearly of opinion, that the verdict ought not to be disturbed, and the rule will, consequently, be DISCHARGED." As these last words were pronounced, a mist seemed for a moment to intervene between Mr. Aubrey and the objects around him, for his thoughts had reverted to Yatton, and the precious objects of his affection who were there, in sickening suspense, awaiting the event which had that moment taken place. The words yet sounding in his excited ears, seemed like the sentence of expulsion from Paradise passed upon our dismayed and heart-broken first parents. Yes, in that solemn region of matter-of-fact and common-place—that dead sea, as far as feeling, sentiment, incident, or excitement is concerned, the Court of King's Bench—there sat a man of exquisite sensibility—pure and high-minded—whose feelings were, for a while paralysed by the words which had fallen from the judgement-seat, uttered with a cold, business-like air—oh! how horribly out of concert with the anxious and excited tone of him whom, with his lovely family, they consigned, in fact, to destitution! After remaining for about a quarter of an hour, during which brief interval he resumed the control over his feelings which he had so long and successfully struggled to maintain, he rose, and quitted the court. It was a heavy, lowering afternoon—one which seemed to harmonize with the gloomy and desolate mood in which he slowly walked homeward. He encountered many of his friends, on foot, on horseback, and in carriages, on their way down to the Houses of Parliament: the very sight of them, in the morbid state of his feelings, gave him a pang that was indescribable. With them matters were the same as they had ever been—as they had till then been: with him—and as probably they would be with them to the end of their career; but he had been forced, suddenly and for ever, to quit the scene of high excitement. He heaved many heavy sighs, as he exchanged nod after nod with those he met, as he approached Charing Cross. There he encountered Lord C—, the brilliant Foreign Secretary, arm in arm with two eloquent and leading members of the Government—all of them evidently in high spirits, on their way down to the House.

"Ah! Aubrey!—In town?—An age since we met!" exclaimed they in a breath, shaking him cordially by the hand. "You know, of course, that the budget comes on to-night—eh?"

"I assure you," said Lord C—, "our friends will do us great service—very essential service, by being early in their attendance! You know that Mr. Quicksilver intends to come out against us to-night in great force? My dear Aubrey, you are going the wrong way."

"I am not going down to the house to-night."

"Not going down?—Eh? My dear Aubrey, you astonish me! Have you paired off? You can't think how I lament your absence!"

"I am returning to Yorkshire almost immediately."

"But surely you can come for an hour, or so to-night—eh? Come? Do n't let a trifle stand in the way."

"I would not let a trifle stand in the way," replied Mr. Aubrey, in a tone and manner that at once arrested the attention of those whom he was addressing, and suddenly reminded them of what, in their political eagerness, they had for a moment lost sight of—namely, the perilous position of his private affairs.

"My dear Aubrey, I beg a thousand pardons for intruding such matters upon you," said Lord C—, with sudden earnestness, "but we shall have an opportunity of meeting before you leave town?"

"I fear not; I set off by the mail to-morrow evening—and have, in the meantime, much to attend to," said Mr. Aubrey, unable to repress a sigh—and they parted. But for a determination not to yield to a morbid sensibility, he would have got into a hackney-coach, and so have avoided the "troops of friends," the hosts of "old familiar faces," all wending down to the scene in which he had begun so eminently to distinguish himself—but from which he seemed now to be forever excluded. He therefore pursued his way on foot. One of those on whom his troubled eye lit, was a well known figure on horseback—the great Duke of —, on his way down to the House of Lords, going very slowly, his head inclined on one side, his iron-cast features overspread with an expression of stern thoughtfulness. He did not observe Mr. Aubrey—in fact, he seemed too much absorbed with his own thoughts to observe or recognise any body; yet he now and then mechanically raised his finger to his hat, in acknowledgment of the obeisances of those whom he met. Poor Aubrey sighed; and felt as if circumstances had placed him at an immeasurable distance from him whom, so lately, he had entertained familiarly at dinner; that there seemed suddenly to have arisen, as it were, a great and impassable gulf between them.

On reaching his house in Grosvenor Street, his heart fluttered while he knocked and rang; and he seemed to shrink from the accustomed obsequious voice and manner of the powdered menial who admitted him. Having ordered a slight dinner, he repaired to his library. The only letter which had arrived since he had left in the morning, bore the Grilston post-mark, and was in the handwriting of Mrs. Aubrey. He opened it with trembling eagerness. It was crossed—the dear familiar handwriting!—from beginning to end, and full of heart-subduing tenderness. Then it had a little enclosure, with a strange, straggling superscription, "To my Papa;" and on opening it he read, in similar characters,—

"My dear Papa, I love you very, very much. Do come home. Mamma sends her love. Your dutiful son,
"CHARLES AUBREY.

"P. S. Agnes sends her love; she cannot write because she is so little. Please to come home directly.

"CHARLES A. Yatton."

Aubrey saw how it was—that Mrs. Aubrey had either affected to write in her little son's name, or had actually guided his pen. On the outside she had written in pencil—"Charles says, he hopes that you will answer his letter directly."

Aubrey's lip quivered, and his eyes filled with tears. Putting the letters into his bosom, he rose and walked to and fro, with feelings which cannot be described. The evening was very gloomy; it poured with rain incessantly. He was the only person in that spacious and elegant house, except the servants left in charge of it; and dreary and desolate enough it felt. He was but its nominal owner—their nominal master! In order to save the post, he sat down to write home—(home! his heart sunk within him at the thought)—and informed Mrs. Aubrey and his sister of the event for which his previous letters had prepared them; adding, that he should set off for Yatton by the mail for the ensuing night, and that he was perfectly well. He also wrote a line or two, in large printed characters, by way of answer to his little correspondent, his son, towards whom how his heart yearned! and having dispatched his packet, probably the last he should ever frank, he partook of a hasty and slight dinner, and then resigned himself to deep meditation upon his critical circumstances. He was perfectly aware of his precise position in point of law, namely, that he was safe in the possession of the Yatton property, (with the exception of the trifle which was occupied by Jolter, and had been the object of the action just determined,) till another action should have been brought, directly seeking its recovery; and that by forcing his opponent to bring such action, he might put him to considerable risk of retaining his verdict, and, thereby, greatly harass him, and ward off, indefinitely, the evil day from himself. By these means he might secure time, possibly, also, favorable terms, for the payment of the dreadful arrear of mesne profits, in which he stood indebted to his successor. To this effect he had received several intimations from as upright and conscientious an adviser, Mr. Runnington, as was to be found in the profession. But Mr. Aubrey had decided upon his course; he had taken his ground, and intended to maintain it. However sudden and unlooked-for had been the claim set up against him, it had been deliberately and solemnly confirmed by the law of the land; and he had no idea but of yielding it a prompt and hearty obedience. He resolved, therefore, to waste no time—to fritter away no energy in feeble dalliance with trouble; but to face her boldly, and comply with all her exactions. He would, on the morrow, instruct Mr. Runnington to write to his opponent's solicitors, informing them that within three weeks' time the estates at Yatton would be delivered up to their client, Mr. Titmouse. He would also direct his own private solicitor to arrange for the quickest possible disposal of his house in Grosvenor Street, and his wines and his furniture, both there and at Yatton. He resolved, moreover, on the morrow, to take the necessary steps for vacating his seat in Parliament, by applying for the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds; and having determined on these arrangements, consequent upon the adverse decision of the Court of King's Bench of that day, he felt the momentary relief and satisfaction of the seaman who has prepared his vessel for the approaching storm. He felt, indeed, relieved for a while from a dreadful pressure.

"And what, now, have I really to complain of?" said he to himself; "why murmur presumptuously and vainly against the dispensations of Providence? I thank God that I am still able to recognise His hand in what has befallen me, and to believe that 'He hath done all things well,' that prosperity and adversity are equally from Him, means of accomplishing His all-wise purpose! Is it for me, poor insect, to question the goodness, the wisdom, or the justice of my Maker? I thank God for the firm belief I have that He 'governs the world in righteousness,' and that He has declared that He will protect and bless them who sincerely endeavor to discover, and conform to, His will concerning them. He it was that placed me in my late condition of prosperity and eminence: and why should I fret, when He sees fit gently to remove me from it, and place me in a different sphere of exertion and suffering? If the dark heathen could spend a life in endeavoring to steel his heart against the sense of suffering, and to look with cheerless indifference upon the vicissitudes of life, shall I, a Christian, shrink with impatience and terror from the first glimpse of adversity? Even at the worst, how favored is my situation in comparison with that of millions of my fellow-creatures? Shall I not lessen my own sufferings, by the contemplation of these which the Almighty has thought fit to inflict upon my brethren? What if I, and those whom I love, were the subjects of direful disease—of vice—of dishonor? What if I were the object of a just and universal contempt, given up to a reprobate mind; miserable here, and without hope hereafter! Here have I health, a loving family—have had the inestimable advantages of education, and even now, in the imminent approach of danger, am enabled to preserve, in some measure, a composure of feeling, a resolution which will support me, and those who are dearer to me than life." Here his heart beat quickly, and he walked rapidly to and fro. "I am confident that Providence will care for them! As for me, even in sight of the more serious and startling peril that menaces me—what is it to a Christian but a trial of his constancy? 'There hath no temptation taken you,' say the Scriptures, written for our instruction, 'but such as is common to man;' but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above what ye are able, but will, with the temptation, also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." This consolatory passage led Aubrey, in a calm and exalted mood of mind, to meditate upon that picture of submission to manifold misfortune, simple and sublime beyond all comparison or approach, drawn by the pencil of one inspired with wisdom from on high—calculated at once to solemnize, to strengthen, and elevate the heart and character of man; and which is to be found in the first and second chapters of the Book of Job. Oh! reader! who, brilliant as may be at this moment thy position in life, may have been heretofore, or may be hereafter, placed in circumstances of dreadful suffering and peril, suffer him whose humble labors now for a moment occupy thy attention, reverently to refer thee, again and yet again, to that memorable passage of Holy Writ! With danger surrounding him, with utter ruin staring him in the face, Mr. Aubrey read this glorious passage; his shaken spirit gathered from its calmness and consolation, and retiring early to bed, he enjoyed a night of tranquil, undisturbed repose.

"They are determined not to let the grass grow underneath their feet, Mr. Aubrey," said Mr. Runnington, who, the next morning made his appearance at breakfast, pursuant to appointment; "within two hours' time of the court delivering judgment yesterday afternoon, I received the following communication. He handed to Mr. Aubrey this letter:

"GENTLEMEN: "SAFFRON HILL, 15th April, 18—

"Doe d. Titmouse, v. Joller.

"The rule for a new trial herein having been this day discharged, and the unanimous judgment of the court delivered in favor of the claims to the Yatton estate of the lessor of the plaintiff of the present action, we shall feel obliged by an intimation from you, at your earliest possible convenience, of the course which your client may now think fit to adopt. You are, of course, aware that we are now in a situation to attack, successfully, the entire property at Yatton, at present in the possession of Mr. Aubrey; and that, had we thought fit, we might have sought and recovered it all in the action which has just been decided in favor of our client. It is now in our power materially to strengthen the evidence adduced at the late trial, and we beg to be informed whether it is your client's intention to put Mr. Titmouse to the enormous expense and the delay of a second trial, the issue of which cannot be doubtful; or, with the promptitude and candor which are to be expected from a gentleman of the station and character of your client, at once yield to our client the substantial fruits of his verdict.

"If his reasonable wishes in this matter be disregarded, we would merely intimate that it will be for your client most seriously to weigh the consequences; to see whether such a line of conduct may not greatly prejudice his interests, and place him in a far worse position than, perhaps, he would otherwise have occupied. As we understand your client to be in town, we trust you will forgive us for requesting you immediately to communicate with him, and at * Anthropines signifies in this place, (1st Cor. x. 13.) says a great Commentator on this memorable passage of Scripture, "such as is suited to the nature and circumstances of man; such as every man may reasonably expect, if he considers the nature of his body and soul, and his situation in the present world."

your earliest convenience enable us to announce the result to our client. We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants, "QUIRK, GAMMON & SNAP.

"Messrs. Runnington & Co."

"Well—I own I see nothing to find fault with in this letter," said Mr. Aubrey, calmly, but with a suppressed sigh, as soon as he had read the letter.

"Rather quick work, too—is it not, Mr. Aubrey?—with in an hour or two after judgment pronounced in their favor: but, to be sure, it's very excusable, when you consider the line of business, and the sort of clients that Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap are accustomed to."

"I have made up my mind as to the course I shall adopt," said Mr. Aubrey.

"Oh, of course, that is quite clear," said Mr. Runnington, pouring out his coffee—"we shall stand another shot, and see if there's ammunition enough left for the purpose: and we'll tender a bill of exceptions, and carry the case into the Exchequer chamber, and thence into the House of Lords—ah! we'll work them, I warrant them!"—and he rubbed his hands with a little excitement in his manner.

"Why, Mr. Runnington," answered Mr. Aubrey, gravely, "would it not be wanton—most unconscious in me to put them to the expense and anxiety of a second trial, when the whole case, on both sides, has been fairly brought before both the court and the jury?"

"Good Heavens, Mr. Aubrey! who ever heard of an estate of ten thousand a-year being surrendered after one assault?"

"If it were ten thousand times ten thousand a-year, I would submit, after such a trial as ours."

"How do we know what fraud and perjury may have been resorted to in order to secure the late verdict, and which we may have the means of exploding against the next trial? Ah, Mr. Aubrey, you do not know the character of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap in the profession; they learn a fresh trick from every scoundrel, swindler, and thief, whose case they undertake."

"I thought that fraud and perjury were never to be presumed, Mr. Runnington! Besides, had we not the advantage of most acute and experienced counsel? How could it escape them?"

"I would only venture to remind you," said Mr. Runnington, firmly but respectfully, "of the observations of the Attorney-General, at our last consultation."

"I thought I was unanswered, Mr. Runnington, though I did not feel at liberty to press the matter," replied Mr. Aubrey with a melancholy smile.

"Excuse me, but we must take the chance of a second trial," said Mr. Runnington.

"I have decided upon the course I shall adopt," replied Mr. Aubrey, calmly and determinedly—"I shall instruct you to write this day to the gentlemen upon the other side, and inform them that within three weeks I shall be prepared to deliver up possession of Yatton."

"My dear sir—Do I hear aright? Deliver up possession of the estates? and within three weeks?"

"That was what I said, Mr. Runnington," replied Mr. Aubrey, rather peremptorily.

"I give you my honor, Mr. Aubrey, that in the whole course of my practice I never heard of such a procedure."

"And I shall further request you to state that the last quarter's rents are in my banker's hands, and will be paid over to the order of Mr. Titmouse."

"Good gracious, Mr. Aubrey!" interrupted Mr. Runnington, with an air of deep concern.

"I have well considered the position in which I am placed," said Mr. Aubrey, with a serious air.

"It is very painful for me to mention the subject, Mr. Aubrey; but have you adverted to the meane profits?"

"I have. It is, indeed, a very fearful matter; and I frankly own that I see no way open before me, but to trust to the forbearance of—"

"Forbearance!—the forbearance of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap!! or of any one counselled by them!"

"Why, what can I do? I might as well undertake to pay off the national debt, as this sum of sixty thousand pounds."

"That's just the very thing," replied Mr. Runnington, with a dismaying air.

"Whatever honorable negotiation can effect, I leave it in your hands to do. With reference to the time that may be obtained for the liquidation of it,"—Mr. Aubrey changed color, but spoke with firmness—"I must own that this is a matter that has occasioned me inexpressible anxiety, Mr. Runnington. I really do not see what length of time will enable me to discharge so fearful a sum of money, or even to make any sensible impression upon it. I am quite at their mercy." Here both maintained a silence of several minutes duration.

"I am far from thinking it clear that equity would not interpose to relieve against meane profits, in such a case as the present—a dormant claim set up."

"I cannot see, Mr. Runnington, on what principle such an interference could be supported."

"No more do I, at present," replied Mr. Runnington, "but I'll lose no time in having the best advice on the subject. Gracious me! when one thinks of it, it deprives one of—"

At this moment a thundering appeal to the knocker of the door announced an arrival; and presently the servant entered and stated that Lord C— had called, and was waiting in the library. After repeating two or three directions to Mr. Runnington, Mr. Aubrey begged to be excused, and presently entered the library, where Lord C— was waiting to receive him. Lord C— was a middle-aged man, tall, of elegant person, a strikingly handsome countenance, and most winning address; he was a thorough politician, possessed of eloquence, immense practical knowledge, and a very commanding intellect. He was made for eminent office, and got through the most complicated and harassing business with singular ease and celerity. He had for several years entertained a sincere regard for Mr. Aubrey, whom he considered to be a very rising man in the House of Commons, and who had, on several occasions, rendered him special service in debate. He was much shocked to hear of the sudden misfortune which had befallen Mr. Aubrey; and had now come to him with a sincere desire to be of service to him; and also not without a faint hope of prevailing upon him to come down that evening and support them in a very close division. He was as kind-hearted a man as a keen politician could be.

"I am really shocked beyond expression to hear all this," said he, after Aubrey had, at his earnest request, explained the position in which he was placed; the dreadful loss he had sustained, the still more dreadful liabilities to which he was subject. "Really who can be safe? It might have happened to me—to any of us! Forgive me my dear Aubrey," continued Lord C—, earnestly, "if I venture to express a hope that at all events Mrs. Aubrey and your family are provided for, and your very lovely sister; she, I trust, is out of the reach of inconvenience!" Mr. Aubrey's lip quivered, and he remained silent.

"Allow me a friend's freedom, Aubrey, and let me repeat my question: are your family provided for?"

"I will be frank, Lord C—," replied Mr. Aubrey, with a strong effort to preserve his composure. "The little provision that was made for them goes with Yatton: but for them—my wife, my children, my sister—I would have submitted to this misfortune with unshrinking fortitude; but they are, alas, involved in my ruin! My wife had nothing when I married her; and of course the settlements which I made on her were out of the Yatton property; as also was the little income left my sister by my father. With Yatton all is gone—that is the plain fact; and there is no disguising it."

Lord C— seemed much moved.

"The Duke of —, I, and two or three other of your friends, were talking about these matters last night; we wish we could serve you. What is the sort of foreign service you would prefer, Aubrey?"

"Foreign service," echoed Mr. Aubrey, significantly.

"Yes; an entire change of scene would be highly serviceable in diverting your thoughts from the distressing subjects which here occupy them, and must continue to occupy them for some time to come."

"It is very kindly meant, Lord C—; but do you really think I can for a single moment entertain the idea of quitting the country to escape from pecuniary liability?"

"That's the point exactly; I decidedly think you ought to do so; that you must," replied Lord C—, in a matter-of-fact manner.

"Nothing upon earth shall induce me to do so," replied Mr. Aubrey firmly. "The bare idea shocks me. It would be the meanest, most unprincipled conduct—it would reflect disgrace on the King's service."

"Poh—this is mere eccentricity—knight-errantry; I'm sure that when you are in a calmer mood you will think differently. Upon my honor, I never heard of such a thing in my life. Are you to stay at home, to have your hands tied behind your back, and be thrust into prison—to court destruction for yourself and your family?" Mr. Aubrey turned aside his head, and remained silent.

"I must plead in favor of Mrs. Aubrey—your children—your sweet lovely sister;—good God! it's quite shocking to think of what you are bringing them to."

"You torture my feelings, Lord C—," said Mr. Aubrey, tremulously, and very pale; "but you do not convince my judgement. Every dictate of conscience and honor combines to assure me that I should not listen to your proposal."

"Good God! what an outrage on common sense! But has any thing been yet said on the subject of these liabilities—these meane profits, as I suppose they are called?"

"Nothing; but they follow as a matter of course."

"How is it that you owe only sixty thousand pounds, Aubrey?"

"Only sixty thousand!"

"At the rate of ten thousand a-year, you must have had at least a hundred thousand pounds."

"The statute of limitation prevents more than six years' arrears being recoverable."

"But do you intend, Aubrey, to avail yourself of such a protection against the just claims of this poor, unfortunate, ill-used gentleman? Are not the remaining forty thousand pounds justly due—money of his which you have been making away with? Will you let a mere technical rule of law outweigh the dictates of honor and conscience?"

"I do not exactly understand your drift, Lord C—."

"Your sovereign has a right to command your services; and by obeying him and serving your country, you are enabled to prevent a malignant opponent from running you and your family, by extorting a vast sum of money not equitably due: I protest I see no difference in principle, Aubrey, between availing yourself of the statute of limitations and of the call of the King to foreign service; but we must talk of this again. By the way, what is the name of your worthy opponent? Tittlemouse, or some such strange name?"

"Titmouse! By the way, you lose a set for Yatton," said Aubrey, with a faint smile. Lord C—, pricked up his ears.

"Ay, ay! how's that?"

"The gentleman you have named professes, I understand, Liberal principles; probably he will sit for the borough himself: at all events, he will return the member."

"He's a poor ignorant creature, isn't he? What has made him take up with Liberal principles? By taking a little notice of him early, one might—eh?—influence him;—but you don't intend to vacate this session?"

"I intend this day to apply for the Chiltern Hundreds; and this evening, if you like, a new writ may be moved for the borough of Yatton."

"You must come down to night, my dear Aubrey, you really must," said Lord C—, with undissimulated anxiety—more than he had shown during the interview. "The numbers will run very close; they are stirring heaven and earth;—good Heavens! my dear Aubrey, a vote's invaluable to night;—Gad, you shan't have the Chiltern Hundreds; you mustn't really apply for it—at all events, not till to-morrow."

"I shall sit no more in the House of Commons," said Mr. Aubrey, with a sad, determined air;—"besides I leave for Yatton by to-night's mail. There are those waiting for me whom you would not have me disappoint, Lord C—."

"Not for worlds, my dear Aubrey," replied Lord C—, half absently;—he was intensely disappointed at not obtaining Mr. Aubrey's vote that evening, and rose to go.

"Then I direct to Yatton, when I have occasion to write to you?" said he.

"For the next three weeks only. My movements after that period are not yet fixed."

"Adieu, Aubrey; and I intreat of you to remember me most sincerely to Mrs. Aubrey and your sister; and when you look at them, remember—remember our conversation to-day." With this, Lord C— took his departure, and left poor Aubrey much depressed. He quickly, however, roused himself, and occupied the principal part of the day in making the necessary and melancholy arrangements for breaking up his establishment in Grosvenor street, and also disposing of his wines, books, and furniture at Yatton. He also instructed a house-agent to look out for two or three respectable but small houses in the outskirts of town, out of which they might choose the one which should appear most suitable to himself and Mrs. Aubrey, on their arrival in London. About eight o'clock he got into the York mail, and his heart was heavy within him.

MASTER HUMPHREY'S CLOCK.

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP.

CHAPTER LX.

Kit stood as one entranced, with his eyes opened wide and fixed upon the ground, regardless alike of the tremulous hold which Mr. Brass maintained on one side of his cravat, and of the firmer grasp of Miss Sally upon the other; although this latter detention was in itself no small inconvenience, as that fascinating woman, besides screwing her knuckles rather inconveniently into his throat from time to time, had fastened upon him in the first instance with so tight a grip, that even in the disorder and distraction of his thoughts he could not divest himself of an uneasy sense of choking. Between the brother and sister he remained in this posture, quite unresisting and passive, until Mr. Swiveller returned with a police constable at his heels.

This functionary, being of course well used to such scenes, looking upon all kinds of robbery, from petty larceny up to house-breaking or ventures on the highway, as matters in the regular course of business, and regarding the perpetrators in the light of so many customers coming to be served at the wholesale and retail shop of criminal law, where he stood behind the counter, received Mr. Brass's statement of facts with about as much interest and surprise, as an undertaker might evince if required to listen to a circumstantial account of the last illness of a person whom he was called in to wait upon professionally, and took Kit into custody with a decent indifference.

"We had better," said this subordinate minister of justice, "get to the office while there's a magistrate sitting. I shall want you to come along with us, Mr. Brass, and the—" he looked at Miss Sally as if in some doubt whether she might not be a griffin or other fabulous monster.

"The lady, eh?" said Sampson.

"Ah!" replied the constable. "Yes—the lady. Likewise the young man that found the property."

"Mr. Richard, sir," said Mr. Brass in a mournful voice. "A sad necessity. But the altar of our country, sir—"

"You'll have a hackney-coach, I suppose?" interrupted the constable, holding Kit (whom his other captors had released) carelessly by the arm, a little above the elbow. "Be so good as send for one, will you?"

"But hear me speak a word," cried Kit, raising his eyes and looking imploringly about him. "Hear me speak a word. I am no more guilty than any one of you. Upon my soul I am not. I, a thief! Oh, Mr. Brass, you know me better. I am sure you know me better. This is not right of you, indeed."

"I give you my word, constable—" said Brass. But here the constable interposed with the constitutional principle "words be blown"; observing that words were but spoon-meat for babes and sucklings, and that oaths were the food for strong men.

"Quite true, constable," assented Brass, in the same mournful tone. "Strictly correct. I give you my oath, constable, that down to a few minutes ago, when this fatal discovery was made, I had such confidence in that lad, that I'd have trusted him with—a hackney-coach, Mr. Richard, sir; you're very slow, sir."

"Who is there that knows me," cried Kit, "that would not trust me—that does not ask any body whether they have ever doubted me; whether I have ever wronged them of a farthing. Was I ever once dishonest when I was poor and hungry, and is it likely I would begin now? Oh consider what you do. How can I meet the kindest friends that ever human creature had, with this dreadful charge upon me?"

Mr. Brass rejoined that it would have been well for the prisoner if he had thought of that before, and was about to make some other gloomy observations, when the voice of the single gentleman was heard demanding from above—stairs what was the matter, and what was the cause of all that noise and hurry. Kit made an involuntary start towards the door, in his anxiety to answer for himself, but being speedily detained by the constable, had the agony of seeing Sampson Brass run out alone to tell the story in his own way.

"And he can hardly believe it, either," said Sampson, when he returned, nor nobody will. I wish I could doubt the evidence of my senses, but their depositions are unimpeachable. It's of no use cross-examining my eyes," cried Sampson, winking and rubbing them, "they stick to their first account, and will. Now, Sarah, I hear the coach in the Marks; get on your bonnet, and we'll be off. A sad errand! a moral funeral, quite!"

"Mr. Brass," said Kit, "do me one favor. Take me to Mr. Witherden's first."

Sampson shook his head irresolutely.

"Do," said Kit. "My master's there. For Heaven's sake, take me there first."

"Well, I don't know," stammered Brass, who perhaps had his reasons for wishing to show as fair as possible in the eyes of the notary. "How do we stand in point of time, constable, eh?"

The constable, who had been chewing a straw all this while with great philosophy, replied that if they went away at once they would have time enough, but that if they stood shilly-shallying there any longer they must go straight to the Mansion House; and finally expressed his opinion that that was where it was, and that was all about it.

Mr. Richard Swiveller having arrived inside the coach, and still remaining immovable in the most commodious corner with his face to the horses, Mr. Brass instructed the officer to remove his prisoner, and declared himself quite ready. Therefore the constable, still holding Kit in the same manner, and pushing him on a little before him, so as to keep him at about three-quarter's of an arm's length in advance (which is the professional mode), thrust him into the vehicle and followed himself. Miss Sally entered next; and there being now four inside, Sampson Brass got upon the box, and made the coachman drive on.

Still completely stunned by the sudden and terrible change which had taken place in his affairs, Kit sat gazing out of the coach-window, almost hoping to see some monstrous phenomenon in the streets, which might give him reason to believe he was in a dream. Alas! Every thing was too real and familiar; the same succession of turnings, the same houses, the same streams of people running side by side in different directions upon the pavement, the same bustle of carts and carriages in the road, the same well-remembered objects in the shop-windows; a regularity in the very noise and hurry which no dream ever mirrored. Dream-like as the story was, it was true. He stood charged with robbery; the note had been found upon him, though he was innocent in thought and deed; and they were carrying him back, a prisoner.

Absorbed in these painful ruminations, thinking with a drooping heart of his mother and little Jacob, feeling as though even the consciousness of innocence would be insufficient to support him in the presence of his friends if they believed him guilty, and sinking in hope and courage more and more as they drew nearer to the notary's, poor Kit was looking earnestly out of the window, observant of nothing—when all at once, as though it had been conjured up by magic, he became aware of the face of Quilp.

And what a leer there was upon the face! It was from the open window of a tavern that it looked out; and the dwarf had so spread himself over it, with his elbows on the window-sill and his head resting on both his hands, that what between this attitude and his being swollen with oppressed laughter, he looked puffed and bloated into twice his usual breadth. Mr. Brass, on recognizing him, immediately stopped the coach. As it came to a halt directly opposite to where he stood, the dwarf pulled off his hat, and saluted the party with a hideous and grotesque politeness.

"Aha!" he cried, "where now, Brass? where now? Sally with you, too? Sweet Sally! And Dick? Pleasant Dick! And Kit? Honest Kit!"

"He's extremely cheerful!" said Brass to the coachman. "Very much so! Ah, sir—a sad business! Never believe in honesty any more, sir."

"Why not?" said the dwarf. "Why not, you rogue of a lawyer, why not?"

"Bank-note lost in our office, sir," said Brass, shaking his head. "Found in his hat, sir—he previously left alone there—no mistake at all, sir—chain of evidence complete—not a link wanting."

"What!" cried the dwarf, leaning half his body out of the window, "Kit a thief! Kit a thief! Ha, ha, ha! Why, he's an uglier-looking thief than can be seen any where for a penny. Eh, Kit—eh? Ha, ha, ha! Have you taken Kit into custody before he had time and opportunity to beat me? Eh, Kit, eh?" And with that he burst into a yell of laughter, manifestly to the great terror of the coachman, and pointed to a dyer's pole hard by, where a dangling suit of clothes bore some resemblance to a man upon a gibbet.

"Is it coming to that, Kit?" cried the dwarf, rubbing his hands violently. "Ha, ha, ha, ha! What a disappointment for little Jacob, and for his darling mother! Let him have the Bethel minister to comfort and console him, Brass. Eh, Kit, eh? Drive on, coach, drive on. Bye, bye, Kit; all good go with you; keep up your spirits; my love to the Garlands—the dear old lady and gentleman. Say I inquired after 'em, will you? Blessings on 'em, and on you, and on every body, Kit. Blessings on all the world."

With such good wishes and farewells, poured out in a rapid torrent until they were out of hearing, Quilp suffered them to depart; and when he could see the coach no longer, drew in his head, and rolled upon the ground in an ecstasy of enjoyment.

When they reached the notary's, which they were not long in doing, for they had encountered the dwarf in a bye street at a very little distance from the house, Mr. Brass dismounted: and opening the coach door with a melancholy visage, requested his sister to accompany him into the office, with the view of preparing the good people within for the mournful intelligence that awaited them. Miss Sally complying, he desired Mr. Swiveller to accompany them. So, into the office they went; Mr. Sampson and his sister arm-in-arm; and Mr. Swiveller following alone.

The notary was standing before the fire in the outer office, talking to Mr. Abel and the elder Mr. Garland, while Mr. Chuckerster sat writing at the desk, picking up such crumbs of their conversation as happened to fall in his way. This posture of affairs Mr. Brass observed through the glass-door as he was turning the handle, and seeing that the notary recognized him, he began to shake his head and sigh deeply while that partition yet divided them.

"Sir, said Sampson, taking off his hat, and kissing the two forefingers of his right hand beaver glove, "my name is Brass—Brass of Bevis Marks, sir. I have had the honor and pleasure, sir, of being concerned against you in some little testamentary matters. How do you do, sir?"

"My clerk will attend to any business you may have come upon, Mr. Brass," said the notary, turning away.

"Thank you, sir," said Brass, "thank you, I am sure. Allow me, sir, to introduce my sister—quite one of us, sir, although of the weaker sex—of great use in my business, sir, I assure you. Mr. Richard, sir, have the goodness to come forward, if you please—No, really," said Brass, stepping between the notary and his private office (towards which he had begun to retreat,) and speaking in the tone of an injured man, "really, sir, I must, under favor, request a word or two with you, indeed."

"Mr. Brass," said the other, in a decided tone, "I am engaged. You see that I am occupied with these gentlemen. If you will communicate your business to Mr. Chuckerster, yonder, you will receive every attention."

"Gentlemen," said Brass, laying his right hand on his waistcoat, and looking towards the father and son with a smooth smile—"Gentlemen, I appeal to you—really, gentlemen—consider, I beg of you. I am of the law. I am styled 'gentleman' by act of Parliament. I maintain the title by the annual payment of thirteen pound ten shillings for a certificate. I am not one of your players of music, stage actors, writers of books, or painters of pictures, who assume a station that the laws of their country don't recognize. I am none of your strollers or vagabonds. If any man brings his action against me, he must describe me as a gentleman, or his action is null and void. I appeal to you—is this quite respectful? Really, gentlemen—"

"Well, will you have the goodness to state your business, then, Mr. Brass," said the notary.

"Sir," rejoined Brass, "I will. Ah, Mr. Witherden! you little know the—but I will not be tempted to travel from the point, sir. I believe the name of one of the gentlemen is Garland."

"Of both," said the notary.

"Indeed!" rejoined Brass, cringing excessively. "But I might have known that from the uncommon likeness. Extremely happy, I am sure, to have the honor of an introduction to two such gentlemen, although the occasion is a most painful one. One of you gentlemen has a servant called Kit?"

"Both," replied the notary.

"Two Kits?" said Brass, smiling. "Dear me!"

"One Kit, sir," returned Mr. Witherden, angrily "who is employed by both gentlemen. What of him?"

"This of him, sir," rejoined Brass, dropping his voice impressively. "That young man, sir, that I have felt unbounded and unlimited confidence in, and always behaved to as if he was my equal—that young man has this morning committed a robbery in my office, and been taken almost in the act."

"This must be some falsehood!" cried the notary.

"It is not possible," said Mr. Abel.

"I'll not believe one word of it!" exclaimed the old gentleman.

Mr. Brass looked mildly round upon them, and rejoined—

"Mr. Witherden, sir, your words are actionable, and if I was a man of low and mean standing, who could not afford to be slandered, I should proceed to damages. However, sir, being what I am, I merely scorn such expressions. The honest warmth of the other gentleman I respect, and I'm truly sorry to be the messenger of such unpleasant news. I should not have put myself in this painful position, I assure you, but that the lad himself desired to be brought here in the first instance, and I yielded to his prayers. Mr. Chuckerster, sir, will you have the goodness to tap at the window for the constable that's waiting in the coach?"

The three gentlemen looked at each other with blank faces when these words were uttered; and Mr. Chuckerster, doing as he was desired, and leaping off his stool with something of the excitement of an inspired prophet whose foretellings had in the fulness of time been realized, held the door open for the entrance of the wretched captive.

Such a scene as there was when Kit came in, and bursting into the rude eloquence with which truth at length inspired him, called heaven to witness that he was innocent, and that how the property came to be found upon him he knew not! Such a confusion of tongues, before the circumstances were related, and the proofs disclosed! Such a dead silence when all was told, and his three friends exchanged looks of doubt and amazement!

"Is it not possible," said Mr. Witherden, after a long pause, "that this note may have found its way into the hat by some accident—such as the removal of papers on the desk, for instance?"

But this was clearly shown to be quite impossible. Mr. Swiveller, though an unwilling witness, could not help proving to demonstration, from the position in which it was found, that it must have been designedly secreted.

"It's very distressing," said Brass, "immensely distressing, I am sure. When he comes to be tried, I shall be happy to recommend him to mercy on account of his previous good character. I did lose money, before, certainly, but it does not quite follow that he took it. The presumption's against him—strongly against him—but we're Christians, I hope?"

"I suppose," said the constable, looking round, "that no gentleman here can give evidence as to whether he has been flush of money of late. Do you happen to know sir?"

"He has had money from time to time, certainly," returned Mr. Garland, to whom the man had put the question. "But that, as he always told me, was given him by Mr. Brass himself."

"Yes, to be sure," said Kit, eagerly. "You can bear me out in that, sir?"

"Eh?" cried Brass, looking from face to face with an expression of stupid amazement.

"The money, you know—the half crowns, that you gave me—from the lodger," said Kit.

"Oh dear me!" cried Brass, shaking his head and frowning heavily. "This is a bad case, I find; a very bad case indeed."

"What, did you give him no money on account of any body, sir?" asked Mr. Garland, with great anxiety.

"I gave him money, sir?" returned Sampson Brass. "Oh, come, you know this is too barefaced. Constable, my good fellow, we had better be going."

"What!" shrieked Kit. "Does he deny that he did? ask him, somebody, pray. Ask him to tell you whether he did or not?"

"Did you, sir?" asked the notary.

"I tell you what, gentleman," replied Brass, in a very grave manner, "he'll not serve his case this way, and really, if you feel any interest in him, you had better advise him to go upon some other tack. Did I, sir? Of course I never did."

"Gentlemen," cried Kit, on whom a light broke suddenly, "Master, Mr. Able, Mr. Witherden, every one of you—he did it! What I have done to offend him, I do not know, but this is a plot to ruin me. Mind, gentlemen, it's a plot, and whatever comes of it, I will say with my dying breath that he put that note in my hat himself. Look at him, gentlemen. See how he changes color. Which of us looks the guilty person—he, or I?"

"You hear him, gentleman?" said Brass, smiling, "you hear him. Now, does this case strike you as assuming rather a black complexion, or does it not? Is it at all a treacherous case, do you think, or is it one of mere ordinary guilt? Perhaps, gentlemen, if he had not said this in your presence, and I had reported it, you'd have held this to be impossible likewise, eh?"

With such pacific and bantering remarks did Mr. Brass refute the foul aspersion on his character; but the virtuous Sarah, moved by stronger feelings, and, having at heart perhaps a more jealous regard for the honor of the family, flew from her brother's side without any previous intimation of her design, and darted at the prisoner with the utmost fury. It would undoubtedly have gone hard with Kit's face, but that the wary constable, foreseeing her design, drew him aside at the critical moment, and thus placed Mr. Chuckster in circumstances of some jeopardy; for that gentleman happening to be next the object of Miss Brass's wrath, and rage being, like love and fortune, blind, was pounced upon by the fair enslaver, and had a false collar plucked up by the roots, and his hair very much dishevelled, before the exertions of the company could make her sensible of her mistake.

The constable, taking warning by this desperate attack, and thinking perhaps that it would be more satisfactory to the ends of justice if the prisoner was taken before a magistrate whole, rather than in small pieces, led him back to the hackney-coach without more ado, and further insisted on Miss Brass becoming an outside passenger; to which proposal the charming creature, after a little angry discussion, yielded her consent: and so took her brother Sampson's place upon the box, Mr. Brass with some reluctance agreeing to occupy her seat inside. These arrangements perfected, they drove to the justice-room with all speed, followed by the notary and his two friends in another coach. Mr. Chuckster alone was left behind—greatly to his indignation; for he held the evidence he could have given, relative to Kit's returning to work out the shilling, to be so very material as bearing upon his hypocritical and designing character, that he considered its suppression little better than a compromise of felony.

At the justice-room they found the single gentleman, who had gone straight there, and was expecting them with desperate impatience. But not fifty single gentlemen rolled into one could have helped poor Kit, who in half an hour afterward was committed for trial, and was assured by a friendly officer on his way to prison that there was no occasion to be cast down, for the sessions would soon be on, and he would in all likelihood get his little affair disposed of, and be comfortably transported in less than a fortnight.

CHAPTER LXI.

Let moralists and philosophers say what they may, it is very questionable whether a guilty man would have felt half as much misery that night, as Kit did, being innocent. The world, being in the constant commission of vast quantities of injustice, is a little too apt to comfort itself with the idea that if the victim of its falsehood and malice have a clear conscience, he cannot fail to be sustained under his trials, and somehow or other to come right at last; "in which case," say they who have hunted him down, "though we certainly do not expect it—nobody will be better pleased than we." Whereas, the world would do well to reflect, that injustice is in itself, to every generous and properly constituted mind, an injury, of all others the most insufferable, the most torturing, and the most hard to bear; and that many clear consciences have gone to their account elsewhere, and many sound hearts have broken, because of this very reason; the knowledge of their own deserts only aggravating their sufferings, and rendering them the less endurable.

The world, however, was not in fault in Kit's case. But Kit was innocent, and feeling that his best friends deemed him guilty—that Mr. and Mrs. Garland would look upon him as a monster of ingratitude—that Barbara would associate him with all that was bad and criminal—that the pony would consider himself forsaken—and that even his own mother might perhaps yield to the strong appearances against him, and believe him to be the wretch he seemed—knowing and feeling all this, he experienced at first an agony of mind which no words can describe, and walked up and down the little cell in which he was locked up for the night, almost beside himself with grief.

Even when the violence of these emotions had in some degree subsided, and he was beginning to grow more calm, there came into his mind a new thought, the anguish of which was scarcely less. The child—the bright star of the simple fellow's life—she, who always came back upon him like a beautiful dream—who had made the poorest part of his existence, the happiest and best—who had ever been so gentle, and considerate, and good—if she were ever to hear of this, what would she think! As this idea occurred to him, the walls of the prison seemed to melt away, and the old place to reveal itself in their stead, as it was wont to be on winter nights—the fireside, the little supper-table, the old man's hat, and coat, and stick—the half-opened door, leading to her little room—they were all there. And Nell herself was there, and he—both laughing heartily as they had often done—and when he had got as far as this, Kit could go no farther, and flung himself upon his poor bedstead and wept.

It was a long night, that seemed as though it would have no end; but he slept too, and dreamed—always of being at liberty, and roving about, now with one person and now with another; but ever with a vague dread of being recalled to prison; not that prison, but one which was in itself a dim idea, not of a place, but of a care and sorrow; of something oppressive and always present, and yet impossible to define. At last the morning dawned, and there was the jail itself—cold, black, and dreary, and very real indeed.

He was left to himself, however, and there was comfort in that. He had liberty to walk in a small paved yard at a certain hour, and learned from the turnkey, who came to unlock his cell and show him where to wash, that there was a regular time for visiting every day, and that if any of his friends came to see him, he would be fetched down to the grate. When he had given him this information, and a tin porringer containing his breakfast, the man locked him up again, and went clattering along the stone passage, opening and shutting a great many other doors, and raising numberless loud echoes which resounded through the building for a long time, as if they were in prison too, and unable to get out.

This turnkey had given him to understand that he was lodged, like some few others in the jail, apart from the mass of prisoners; because he was not supposed to be utterly depraved and irreclaimable, and had never occupied apartments in that mansion before. Kit was thankful for this indulgence, and sat reading the church catechism very attentively (though he had known it by heart from a little child,) until he heard the key in the lock, and the man entered again.

"Now then," he said, "come on."

"Where to, sir?" asked Kit.

The man contented himself by briefly replying "Visitors;" and taking him by the arm in exactly the same manner as the constable had done the day before, led him through several winding ways and strong gates into a passage, where he placed him at a grating, and turned upon his heel. Beyond this grating, at the distance of about four or five feet, was another, exactly like it. In the space between, sat a turnkey reading a newspaper; and outside the further railing Kit saw, with a palpitating heart, his mother, with the baby in her arms, Barbara's mother, with her never-failing umbrella, and poor little Jacob, staring in with all his might, as though he were looking for the bird, or the wild beast, and thought the men were mere accidents with whom the bars could have no possible concern.

But directly little Jacob saw his brother, and, thrusting his arms between the rails to hug him, found that he came no nearer, but still stood afar off, with his head resting on the arm by which he held to one of the bars, he began to cry most piteously; whereupon Kit's mother and Barbara's mother, who had restrained themselves as much as possible, burst out sobbing and weeping afresh. Poor Kit could not help joining them, and not one of them could speak a word.

During this melancholy pause, the turnkey read his newspaper with a waggish look (he had evidently got among the facetious paragraphs) until, happening to take his eye off it for an instant, as if to get, by dint of contemplation, at the very marrow of some joke of a deeper sort than the rest, it appeared to occur to him for the first time that somebody was crying.

"Now, ladies, ladies," he said, looking round with surprise, "I'd advise you not to waste time like this. It's allowed here, you know. You must n't let that child make that noise either. It's against all rules."

"I'm his poor mother, sir," sobbed Mrs. Nubbles, cursing humbly, "and this is his brother, sir. Oh dear, dear me!"

"Well!" replied the turnkey, folding his paper on his knee, so as to get with greater convenience at the top of the next column. "It can't be helped, you know. He can't be the only one in the same fix. You must n't make a noise about it!"

With that, he went on reading. The man was not naturally cruel or hard-hearted. He had come to look upon felony as a kind of disorder, like the scarlet fever or erysipelas: some people had it—some had n't—just as it might be.

"Oh! my darling Kit," said his mother, whom Barbara's mother had charitably relieved of the baby—"that I should see my poor boy here!"

"You do n't believe I did what they accuse me of, mother dear?" cried Kit, in a choking voice.

"I believe it!" exclaimed the poor woman. "I, that never knew you tell a lie, or do a bad action from your cradle—that have never had a moment's sorrow on your account, except it was for the poor meals you have taken with such good humor and content, that I forgot how little there was when I thought how kind and thoughtful you were, though you were but a child—I believe it of the son that's been a comfort to me from the hour of his birth to this time, and that I never laid down in anger with! I believe it of you, Kit!"

"Why, then, thank God!" said Kit, clutching the bars with an earnestness that shook them, "and I can bear it, mother. Come what may, I shall always have one drop of happiness in my heart when I think that you said that."

At this, the poor woman fell a crying again, and Barbara's mother too. And little Jacob, whose disjoined thoughts had by this time resolved themselves into a pretty distinct impression that Kit could n't go out for a walk if he wanted, and that there were no birds, lions, tigers, or other natural curiosities behind those bars—nothing indeed, but a caged brother—added his tears to theirs with as little noise as possible.

Kit's mother, drying her eyes (and moistening them, poor soul, more than she dried them,) now took from the ground a small basket, and submissively addressed herself to the turnkey, saying, would he please to listen to her for a minute? The turnkey, being in the very crisis and passion of a joke, motioned to her with his hand to keep silent one minute longer, for her life. Nor did he remove his hand into its former posture, but kept it in the same warning attitude until he had finished the paragraph, when he paused for a few seconds; with a smile upon his face, as who should say, "this editor is a comical blade—a funny dog," and then asked her what she wanted.

"I have brought him a little something to eat," said the good woman. "If you please, sir, might he have it?"

"Yes—he may have it. There's no rule against that. Give it to me when you go, and I'll take care he has it."

"No, but if you please, sir—do n't be angry with me, sir—I am his mother, and you had a mother once—If I might only see him eat a little bit, I should go away so much more satisfied that he was all comfortable."

And again the tears of Kit's mother burst forth, and of Barbara's mother, and of little Jacob. As to the baby, it was crowing and laughing with all its might—under the idea, apparently, that the whole scene had been invented and got up for its peculiar satisfaction.

The turnkey looked as if he thought the request a strange one, and rather out of the common way; but, nevertheless, he laid down his paper, and coming round to where Kit's mother stood, took the basket from her, and after inspecting its contents, handed it to Kit, and went back to his place. It may be easily conceived that the prisoner had no great appetite, but he sat down upon the ground and ate as hard at he could, while at every morsel he put up to his mouth, his mother sobbed and wept afresh, though with a softened grief that bespoke the satisfaction the sight afforded her.

While he was thus engaged, Kit made some anxious inquiries about his employers, and whether they had expressed any opinion about him; but all he could learn was, that Mr. Abel had himself broken the intelligence to his mother, with great kindness and delicacy, late on the previous night, but had himself expressed no opinion of his innocence or guilt. Kit was on the point of mustering courage to ask Barbara's mother about Barbara, when the turnkey who had conducted him re-appeared, a second turnkey appeared behind his visitors, and the third turnkey with the newspaper cried "Time's up!"—adding, in the same breath, "Now for the next party," and then plunging deep into his newspaper again. Kit was taken off in an instant, with a blessing from his mother, and a scream from little Jacob, ringing in his ears. As he was crossing the next yard with the basket in his hand, under the guidance of his former conductor, another officer called to them to stop, and came up with a pint-pot of porter in his hand.

"This is Christopher Nubbles, is n't it, that come in last night for felony?" said the man.

His comrade replied that this was the chicken in question.

"Then here's your beer," said the other man to Christopher. "What are you looking at? There an't a discharge in it."

"I beg your pardon," said Kit. "Who sent it me?"

"Why, your friend," replied the man. "You're to have it every day, he says. And so you will, if he pays for it."

"My friend!" repeated Kit.

"You're all abroad, seemingly," returned the other man. "There's his letter. Take hold."

Kit took it, and when he was locked up again, read as follows:

"Drink of this cup. You'll find there's a spell in its every drop 'gainst the ills of mortality. Talk of the cordial that sparkled for Helen! Her cup was a fiction, but this is reality (Barclay & Co.'s.) If they ever send it in a flat state, complain to the Governor. Yours, R. S."

"R. S.!" said Kit, after some consideration. "It must be Mr. Richard Swiveller. Well, it's very kind of him, and I thank him heartily."

CHAPTER LXII.

A faint light, twinkling from the window of the counting-house on Quilp's wharf, and looking inflamed and red through the night-fog, as though it suffered from it like an eye, forewarned Mr. Sampson Brass, as he approached the wooden cabin with a cautious step, that the excellent proprietor, his esteemed client, was inside, and probably waiting with his accustomed patience and sweetness of temper the fulfilment of the appointment which now brought Mr. Brass within his fair domain.

"A treacherous place to pick one's steps of a dark night," muttered Sampson, as he stumbled for the twentieth time over some stray lumber, and limped in pain. "I believe that boy strews the ground differently every day, on purpose to bruise and maim one; unless his master does it with his own hands, which is more than likely. I hate to come to this place without Sally. She's more protection than a dozen men."

As he paid this compliment to the merit of the absent charmer, Mr. Brass came to a halt; looking doubtfully toward the light, and over his shoulder.

"What's he about, I wonder?" murmured the lawyer, standing on tiptoe, and endeavoring to obtain a glimpse of what was passing inside, which at that distance was impossible—"drinking, I suppose—making himself more fiery and furious, and heating his malice and mischievousness till they boil. I'm always afraid to come here by myself, when his account's a pretty large one. I do n't believe he'd mind throttling me, and dropping me softly into the river when the tide was at its strongest, any more than he'd mind killing a rat—indeed I do n't know whether he would n't consider it a pleasant joke. Hark! Now he's singing!"

Mr. Quilp was certainly entertaining himself with vocal exercise, but it was rather a kind of chant than a song: being a monotonous repetition of one sentence in a very rapid manner, with a long stress upon the last word, which he swelled into a dismal roar. Nor did the burden of this performance bear any reference to love, or war, or wine, or loyalty, or any other, the standard topics of song, but to a subject not often set to music, or generally known in ballads; the words being these: "The worthy magistrate, after remarking that the prisoner would find some difficulty in persuading a jury to believe his tale, committed him to take his trial at the approaching sessions; and directed the customary recognizances to be entered into for the prosecution."

Every time he came to this concluding word, and had exhausted all possible stress upon it, Quilp burst into a shriek of laughter, and began again.

"He's dreadfully imprudent," muttered Brass, after he had listened to two or three repetitions of the chant. "Horribly imprudent. I wish he was dumb. I wish he was deaf. I wish he was blind. Hang him," cried Brass, as the chant began again, "I wish he was dead."

Giving utterance to these friendly aspirations in behalf of his client, Mr. Sampson composed his face into its usual state of smoothness, and waiting until the shriek came again and was dying away, went up to the wooden house, and knocked at the door.

"Come in," cried the dwarf,

"How do you do to-night, sir?" said Sampson, peeping in. "Ha, ha, ha! How do you do, sir? Oh dear me, how very whimsical! Amazingly whimsical to be sure!"

"Come in, you fool," returned the dwarf, "and do n't stand there shaking your head and showing your teeth. Come in, you false witness, you perjurer, you suborner of evidence, come in!"

"He has the richest humor!" cried Brass, shutting the door behind him; "the most amazing vein of comicality! But is n't it rather injudicious, sir—?"

"What?" demanded Quilp. "What, Judas?"

"Judas!" cried Brass. "He has such extraordinary spirits! His humor is so extraordinary playful! Judas! Oh yes—dear me, how very good! Ha, ha, ha!"

All this time Sampson was rubbing his hands, and staring with ludicrous surprise and dismay, at a great goggle-eyed, blunt-nosed figure-head of some old ship, which was reared up against the wall in a corner near the stove, looking like a goblin or hideous idol whom the dwarf worshipped. A mass of timber on its head, carved into the dim and distant semblance of a cocked-hat, together with a representation of a star on the left breast, and epaulettes on the shoulders, denoted that it was intended for the effigy of some famous admiral; but without those helps, any observer might have supposed it the authentic portrait of a distinguished merman, or great sea-monster. Being originally much too large for the apartment which it was now employed to decorate, it had been sawn short off at the waist. Even in this state it reached from floor to ceiling; and thrusting itself forward with that excessively wide-awake aspect, and air of somewhat obtrusive politeness, by which figure-heads are usually characterized, seemed to reduce everything else to mere pigmy proportions.

"Do you know it?" said the dwarf, watching Sampson's eyes. "Do you see the likeness?"

"Eh!" said Brass, holding his head on one side, and throwing it a little back, as connoisseurs do. "Now I look at it again, I fancy I see a—yes, there certainly is something in the smile that reminds me of—and yet upon my word I—"

Now, the fact was, that Sampson, having never seen any thing in the smallest degree resembling this substantial phantasm, was much perplexed; being uncertain whether Mr. Quilp considered it like himself, and had therefore bought it for a family portrait; or whether he was pleased to consider it as the likeness of some enemy. He was not very long in doubt; for, while he was surveying it with that knowing look which people assume when they are contemplating for the first time portraits which they ought to recognise but do not, the dwarf threw down the newspaper from which he had been chanting the words already quoted, and seizing a rusty iron bar, which he used in lieu of a poker, dealt the figure such a stroke on the nose that it rocked again.

"Is it like Kit—is it his picture, his image, his very self?" cried the dwarf, aiming a shower of blows at the insensible countenance, and covering it with deep dimples. "Is it the exact model and counterpart of the dog—is it—is it?" And with every repetition of the question, he battered the great image until the perspiration streamed down his face with the violence of the exercise.

Although this might have been a very comical thing to look at from a secure gallery, as a bull-fight is found to be a very comfortable spectacle by those who are not in the arena, and a house on fire is better than a play to people who don't live near it, there was something in the earnestness of Mr. Quilp's manner which made his legal adviser feel that the counting-house was a little too small, and a great deal too lonely, for the due enjoyment of these humors. Therefore he stood as far off as he could while the dwarf was thus engaged; whimpering out but feeble applause; and when he left off, and sat down again from pure exhaustion, approached with more obsequiousness than ever.

"Excellent indeed!" cried Brass. "He he! Oh, very good sir. You know," said Sampson, looking round as if in appeal to the bruised admiral, "he's quite a remarkable man—quite!"

"Sit down," said the dwarf. "I bought the dog yesterday. I've been screwing gimlets into him, and sticking forks in his eyes, and cutting my name on him. I mean to burn him at last."

"Ha, ha!" cried Brass. "Extremely entertaining, indeed!"

"Come here!" said Quilp, beckoning him to draw near. "What's injudicious, hey?"

"Nothing sir—nothing. Scarcely worth mentioning sir; but I thought that song—admirably humorous in itself you know—was perhaps rather—"

"Yes," said Quilp, "rather what?"

"Just bordering, or as one may say remotely verging upon the confines of injudiciousness perhaps, sir," returned Brass, looking timidly at the dwarf's cunning eyes, which were turned towards the fire and reflected its red light.

"Why?" inquired Quilp, without looking up.

"Why, you know, sir," returned Brass, venturing to be more familiar:—"the fact is, sir, that any allusion to these little combinings together of friends for objects in themselves extremely laudable, but which the law terms conspiracies, are—you take me, sir?—best kept snug and among friends, you know."

"Eh!" said Quilp, looking up with a perfectly vacant countenance. "What do you mean?"

"Cautious, exceedingly cautious, very right and proper!" cried Brass, nodding his head. "Mum, sir, even here—my meaning sir, exactly."

"Your meaning exactly, you brazen scarecrow,—what's your meaning?" retorted Quilp. "Why do you talk to me of combining together? Do I combine? Do I know anything about your combinings?"

"No, no, sir—certainly not; not by any means," returned Brass.

"If you so wink and nod at me," said the dwarf, looking about him as if for his poker, "I'll spoil the expression of your monkey's face, I will."

"Do n't put yourself out of the way I beg, sir," rejoined Brass, checking himself with great alacrity. "You're quite right, sir, quite right. I should n't have mentioned the subject, sir. It's much better not to. You're quite right, sir. Let us change it, if you please. You were asking, sir, Sally told me, about our lodger. He has not returned, sir."

"No!" said Quilp, heating some rum in a little saucepan, and watching it to prevent its boiling over. "Why not?" "Why sir," returned Brass, "he—dear me, Mr. Quilp, sir—"

"What's the matter?" said the dwarf, stepping his hand in the act of carrying the saucepan to his mouth.

"You have forgotten the water, sir," said Brass. And—excuse me, sir—but it's burning hot."

Deigning no other than a practical answer to his remonstrance, Mr. Quilp raised the hot saucepan to his lips, and deliberately drank off all the spirit it contained; which might have been in quantity about half a pint, and had been but a moment before, when he took it off the fire, bubbling and hissing fiercely. Having swallowed this gentle stimulant, and shaken his fist at the admiral, he bade Mr. Brass proceed.

"But first," said Quilp, with his accustomed grin, "have a drop yourself—a nice drop—a good, warm, fiery drop."

"Why, sir," replied Brass, "if there was such a thing as a mouthful of water that could be got without trouble—"

"There's no such thing to be had here," cried the dwarf,

"Water for lawyers! Melted lead and brimstone, you mean; nice, hot, blistering pitch and tar—that's the thing for them—eh, Brass, eh?"

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Mr. Brass. "Oh, very biting! and yet it's like being tickled—there's a pleasure in it too, sir!"

"Drink that," said the dwarf, who had by this time heated some more. "Toss it off, do n't leave any heel-tap scorch your throat and be happy."

The wretched Sampson took a few short sips of the liquor, which immediately distilled itself into burning tears, and in that form came rolling down his cheeks into the pipkin again, turning the color of his face and eyelids to a deep red, and giving rise to a violent fit of coughing, in the midst of which he was still heard to declare, with the constancy of a martyr, that it was "b' careful indeed!" While he was yet in unspeakable agonies, the dwarf renewed their conversation.

"The lodger," said Quilp; "what about him?"

"He is still, sir," returned Brass, with intervals of coughing, "stopping with the Garland family. He has only been home once, sir, since the day of the examination of that culprit. He informed Mr. Richard, sir, that he could n't bear the house after what had taken place; that he was wretched in it; and that he looked upon himself as being in a certain kind of way the cause of the occurrence. A very excellent lodger, sir. I hope we may not lose him."

"Yah!" cried the dwarf. "Never thinking of any body but yourself—why do n't you retrench then—scrape up, hoard, economise, eh?"

"Why, sir," replied Brass, "upon my word I think Sarah's as good an economiser as any going. I do indeed, Mr. Quilp."

"Moisten your clay, wet the other eye, drink man," cried the dwarf. "You took a clerk to oblige me."

"Delighted, sir, I am sure, at any time," replied Sampson. "Yes, sir, I did."

"Then, now you may discharge him," said Quilp. "There's a means of retrenchment for you at once."

"Discharge Mr. Richard, sir?" cried Brass.

"Have you more than one clerk, you parrot, that you ask the question? Yes."

"Upon my word, sir," said Brass. "I was n't prepared for this—"

"How could you be?" sneered the dwarf, "when I was n't? How often am I to tell you that I brought him to you that I might always have my eye in him and know where he was—and that I had a plot, a scheme, a little, quiet piece of enjoyment afoot, of which the very cream and essence was, that this old man and grandchild (who have sunk underground I think) should be, while he and his precious friend believed them rich, in reality as poor as frozen rats?"

"I quite understand that, sir," rejoined Brass. "Thoroughly."

"Well, sir," retorted Quilp, "and do you understand now, that they're not poor—that they can't be, if they have such men as your lodger searching for them, and scouring the country far and wide?"

"Of course I do, sir," said Sampson.

"Of course you do," retorted the dwarf, viciously snapping at his words. "Of course do you understand, then, that it's no matter what comes of this fellow? Of course do you understand that for any other purpose he's no man for me, nor for you?"

"I have frequently said to Sarah, sir," returned Brass, "that he was of no use at all in the business. You can't put any confidence in him, sir. If you'll believe me I've found that fellow, in the commonest little matters of the office that have been trusted to him, blurring out the truth, though expressly cautioned. The aggravation of that, chap, sir, has exceeded any thing you can imagine, it has indeed. Nothing but the respect and obligation I owe to you, sir—"

As it was plain that Sampson was bent on a complimentary harangue, unless he received a timely interruption, Mr. Quilp politely tapped him on the crown of his head with the little saucepan, and requested that he would be so obliging as to hold his peace.

"Practical, sir, practical," said Brass, rubbing the place, and smiling; "but still extremely pleasant—immensely so!"

"Hearken to me, will you?" returned Quilp, "or I'll be a little more pleasant, presently. There's no chance of his comrade and friend returning. The scamp has been obliged to fly, as I learn, for some knavery, and has found his way abroad. Let him rot there."

"Certainly, sir. Quite proper. Forcible!" cried Brass, glancing at the admiral again, as if he made a third in company. "Extremely forcible!"

"I hate him," said Quilp between his teeth, "and have always hated him, for family reasons. Besides, he was an intractable ruffian; otherwise he would have been of use. This fellow is pigeon-hearted, and light-headed. I do n't want him any longer. Let him hang or drown—starve—go to the devil."

"By all means, sir," returned Brass. "When would you wish him, sir, to—ha, ha!—to make that little excursion?"

"When this trial's over," said Quilp. "As soon as that's ended, send him about his business."

"It shall be done, sir," returned Brass; "by all means. It will be rather a blow to Sarah, sir, but she has all her feelings under control. Ah, Mr. Quilp, I often think, sir, if it had only pleased Providence to bring you and Sarah together in earlier life, what blessed results would have flowed from such a union. You never saw our dear father, sir? A charming gentleman. Sarah was his pride and joy, sir. He would have closed his eyes in bliss, would Foxey, Mr. Quilp, if he could have found her such a partner. You esteem her, sir?"

"I love her," croaked the dwarf.

"You're very good, sir," returned Brass, "I am sure. Is there any other order, sir, that I can take a note of, besides this little matter of Mr. Richard?"

"None," replied the dwarf, seizing the saucepan. "Let us drink the lovely Sarah."

"If we could do it in something, sir, that was n't quite boiling," suggested Brass humbly, "perhaps it would be better. I think it will be more agreeable to her feelings, when she comes to hear from me of the honor you have done her, if she learns it was in liquor rather cooler than the last, sir."

"But to these remonstrances Mr. Quilp turned a deaf ear. Sampson Brass, who was by this time anything but sober, being compelled to take further draughts of the same strong bowl, found that, instead of at all contributing to his recovery, they had the novel effect of making the counting-house spin round and round with extreme velocity, and causing the floor and ceiling to heave in a very distressing manner. After a brief stupor, he awoke to a consciousness of being partly under the table and partly under the grate. This position not being the most comfortable one he could have chosen for himself, he managed to stagger to his feet, and holding on by the admiral, looked round for his host.

Mr. Brass's first impression was that his host was gone and had left him there alone—perhaps locked him in for the night. A strong smell of tobacco, however, suggesting a new train of ideas, he looked upwards and saw that the dwarf was smoking in his hammock.

"Good bye, sir," cried Brass, faintly. "Good bye, sir." "Won't you stop all night?" said the dwarf, peeping out. "Do stop all night."

"I could n't, indeed, sir," replied Brass, who was almost dead from nausea and the closeness of the room. "If you'd have the goodness to show me a light, so that I may see my way across the yard, sir—"

Quilp was out in an instant; not with his legs first, or his head first, but bodily—altogether.

"To be sure," he said, taking up a lantern, which was now the only light in the place. "Be careful how you go, my dear friend. Be sure to pick your way among the timber, for all the rusty nails are upwards. There's a dog in the lane. He bit a man last night, and a woman the night before, and last Tuesday he killed a child—but that was in play. Do n't go too near him."

"Which side of the road is he, sir?" asked Brass, in great dismay.

"He lives on the right hand," said Quilp, "but sometimes he hides on the left, ready for a spring. He's uncertain in that respect. Mind you take care of yourself. I'll never forgive you if you do n't. There's the light out—never mind—you know the way—straight on!"

Quilp had slyly shaded the light, by holding it against his breast, and now stood chuckling and shaking from head to foot in a rapture of delight, as he heard the lawyer stumbling up the yard, and now and then falling heavily down. At length, however, he got quit of the place, and was out of hearing.

The dwarf shut himself up again, and sprang once more into his hammock.

CHAPTER LXIII.

The professional gentleman who had given Kit that consolatory piece of information relative to the settlement of his trifle of business at the Old Bailey, and the probability of its being very soon disposed of, turned out to be quite correct in his prognostications. In eight days' time, the sessions commenced. In one day afterwards the Grand Jury found a True Bill against Christopher Nubbles for felony; and in two days from that finding, the aforesaid Christopher Nubbles was called upon to plead Guilty or Not Guilty to an Indictment for that he the said Christopher did feloniously abstract and steal from the dwelling-house and office of one Sampson Brass, gentleman, one Bank Note for Five Pounds issued by the Governor and Company of the Bank of England; in contravention of the Statutes in that case made and provided, and against the peace of our Sovereign Lord the King, his crown, and dignity.

To this indictment, Christopher Nubbles, in a low and trembling voice, pleaded Not Guilty: and here let those who are in the habit of forming hasty judgements from appearances, and who would have had Christopher, if innocent, speak out very strong and loud, observe, that confinement and anxiety will subdue the stoutest hearts; and that to one who has been close shut up, though it be only for ten or eleven days, seeing but stone walls and a very few stony faces, the sudden entrance into a great hall filled with life, is a rather disconcerting and startling circumstance. To this it must be added, that life in a wig is to a large class of people much more terrifying and impressive than life with its own head of hair; and if, in addition to these considerations, there be further taken into account Kit's natural emotion on seeing the two Mr. Garlands and the little Notary looking on with pale and anxious faces it will perhaps seem matter of no very great wonder that, he should have been rather out of sorts, and unable to make himself exactly at home.

Although he had never seen either of the Mr. Garlands, or Mr. Witherden, since the time of his arrest, he had been given to understand that they had employed counsel for him. Therefore, when one of the gentlemen in wigs got up and said "I am for the prisoner, my Lord," Kit made him a bow; and when another gentleman in a wig got up and said "And I'm against him my Lord," Kit trembled very much, and bowed to him too. And did n't he hope in his own heart that his gentleman was a match for the other gentleman, and would make him ashamed of himself.

The gentleman who was against him had to speak first, and being in dreadfully good spirits (for he had, in the last trial, very nearly procured the acquittal of a young gentleman who had the misfortune to murder his father) he spoke up you may be sure; telling the Jury that if they acquitted this prisoner they must expect to suffer no less pangs and agonies than he had told the other Jury they would certainly undergo if they convicted that prisoner. And when he had told them all about the case, and that he had never known a worse case, he stopped a little while, like a man who had something terrible to tell them, and then said that he understood an attempt would be made by his learned friend (and here he looked sideways at Kit's gentleman) to impeach the testimony of those immaculate witnesses whom he should call before them; but he did hope and trust that his learned friend would have a greater respect and veneration for the character of the prosecutor; than whom, as he well knew, there did not exist, and never had existed, a more honorable member of that most honorable profession to which he was attached. And then he said, did the jury know Bevis Marks? And if they did know Bevis Marks, (as he trusted, for their own characters, they did) did they know the historical and elevating associations connected with that most remarkable spot? Did they believe that a man like Brass could reside in a place like Bevis Marks, a not be a virtuous and most upright character? And when he had said a great deal to them on this point, he remembered that it was an insult to their understandings to make any remarks on what they must have felt so strongly without him, and therefore called Sampson Brass into the witness-box, straightway.

Then up comes Mr. Brass, very brisk and fresh; and having bowed to the judge, like a man who has had the pleasure of seeing him before, and who hopes he has been pretty well since their last meeting, folds his arms, and looks at his gentleman as much as to say, "Here I am—full of evidence—Tap me!" And the gentleman does tap him presently, and with great discretion too; drawing off the evidence by little and little, and making it run quite clear and bright in the eyes of all present. Then Kit's gentleman takes him in hand, but can make nothing of him; and after a great many very long questions and very short answers, Mr. Sampson Brass goes down in glory.

To him succeeds Sarah, who in like manner is easy to be managed by Mr. Brass's gentleman, but very obdurate to Kit's. In short, Kit's gentleman can get nothing out of her but a repetition of what she has said before (only a little stronger this time, against his client,) and therefore lets her go, in some confusion. Then Mr. Brass's gentleman calls Richard Swiveller, and Richard Swiveller appears accordingly.

Now Mr. Brass's gentleman has it whispered in his ear that this witness is disposed to be friendly to the prisoner—which, to say the truth, he is rather glad to hear, as his strength is considered to lie in what is familiarly termed badgering. Wherefore he begins by requesting the officer to be quite sure that this witness kisses the book, and then goes to work at him, tooth and nail.

"Swiveller," says this gentleman to Dick, when he has told his tale with evident reluctance and a desire to make the best of it: "pray sir, where did you dine yesterday?"—"Where did I dine yesterday?"—"Aye sir, where did you dine yesterday—was it near here sir?"—"Oh to be sure—yes—just over the way"—"To be sure. Yes. Just over the way"—repeats Mr. Brass's gentleman, with a glance at the court—"Alone sir?"—"I beg your pardon," says Mr. Swiveller, who has not caught the question—"Alone sir?" repeats Mr. Brass's gentleman in a voice of thunder, "did you dine alone? Did you treat anybody sir? Come."—"Oh yes to be sure—yes, I did," says Mr. Swiveller with a smile. "Have the goodness to banish a levity, sir, which is very ill-suited to the place in which you stand (though perhaps you have reason to be thankful that it's only that place)," says Mr. Brass's gentleman, with a nod of the head insinuating that the dock is Mr. Swiveller's legitimate sphere of action; "and attend to me. You were waiting about here yesterday in expectation that this trial was coming on. You dined over the way. You treated somebody. Now, was that somebody brother to the prisoner at the bar?"—"Mr. Swiveller is proceeding to explain—"Yes or No, sir," cries Mr. Brass's gentleman—"But will you allow me—"—"Yes or No, sir,"—"Yes it was, but—"—"Yes it was," cries the gentleman, taking him up short—"And a very pretty witness you are!"

Down sits Mr. Brass's gentleman. Kit's gentleman, not knowing how the matter really stands, is afraid to pursue the subject. Richard Swiveller retires abashed. Judge, jury, and spectators, have visions of his lounging about with an ill-looking, large-whiskered, dissolute young fellow of six feet high. The reality is, little Jacob, with the calves of his legs exposed to the open air, and himself tied up in a shawl. Nobody knows the truth, everybody believes a falsehood—and all because of the ingenuity of Mr. Brass's gentleman!

Then come the witnesses to character, and here Mr. Brass's gentleman shines again. It turns out that Mr. Garland has had no character with Kit, no recommendation of him but from his own mother, and that he was suddenly dismissed by his former master for unknown reasons. "Really Mr. Garland," says Mr. Brass's gentleman, "for a person who has arrived at your time of life, you are, to say the least of it, singularly indiscreet, I think." The Jury think so too, and find Kit guilty. He is taken off, humbly protesting his innocence. The spectators settle themselves in their places with renewed attention, for there are several female witnesses, to be examined in the next case, and it has been rumored that Mr. Brass's gentleman will make great fun in cross-examining them for the prisoner.

Kit's mother, poor woman, is waiting at the grate below stairs, accompanied by Barbara's mother (who, honest soul, never does anything but cry, and hold the baby,) and a sad interview ensues. The newspaper-reading turnkey has told them all. He don't think it will be transportation for life, because there's time to prove the good character yet, and that is sure to serve him. He wonders what he did it for. "He never did it," cries Kit's mother. "Well," says the turnkey, "won't contradict you. It's all one now, whether he did or not."

Kit's mother can reach his hand through the bars, and claps it—God, and those to whom he has given such tenderness, only know in how much agony. Kit bids her keep a good heart, and under pretence of having the children lifted up to kiss him, prays Barbara's mother in a whisper to take her home.

"Some friend will rise up for us," cries Kit, "I am sure. If not now, before long. My innocence will come out, mother, and I shall be brought back again; I feel a confidence in that. You must teach little Jacob and the baby how all this was, for if they thought I had ever been dishonest, when they grew old enough to understand, it would break my heart to know it, if I was thousands of miles away. Oh! is there no good gentleman here, who will take care of her!"

The hand slips out of his, for the poor creature sinks down upon the earth, insensible. Richard Swiveller comes hastily up, elbows the bystanders out of the way, takes her (after some trouble) in one arm, after the manner of theatrical ravers, and nodding to Kit, and commanding Barbara's mother to follow, for he has a coach waiting, bears her swiftly off.

Well; Richard took her home. And what astonishing absurdities in the way of quotation from song and poem, he perpetrated on the road, no man knows. He took her home, and staid till she was recovered; and having no money to pay the coach, went back in state to Bevis Marks, bidding the driver (for it was Saturday night) wait at the door while he went in for "change."

"Mr. Richard, sir," said Brass cheerfully, "Good evening."

Monstrous as Kit's tale had appeared at first, Mr. Richard did, that night, half suspect his affable employer of some deep villany. Perhaps it was but the misery he had just witnessed which gave his careless nature this impulse; but be that as it may, it was very strong upon him, and he said in as few words as possible, what he wanted.

"Money!" cried Brass, taking out his purse. "Ha, ha! To be sure, Mr. Richard, to be sure, sir. All men must live. You have n't change for a five pound note, have you, sir?"

"No," returned Dick, shortly.

"Oh!" said Brass, "here's the very sum. That saves trouble. You're very welcome I'm sure. Mr. Richard sir—"

Dick, who had by this time reached the door, turned round.

"You need n't," said Brass, "trouble yourself to come back any more, sir."

"Eh?"

"You see, Mr. Richard," said Brass, thrusting his hands in his pockets and rocking himself to and fro upon his stool, "the fact is, that a man of your abilities is lost sir, quite lost, in our dry and mouldy line. It's terrible drudgery—shocking. I should say now that the stage, or the—or the army Mr. Richard, or something very superior in the licensed victualling way, was the kind of thing that would call out the genius of such a man as you. I hope you'll look in to see us now and then. Sally, sir, will be delighted, I'm sure. She's extremely sorry to lose you, Mr. Richard, but a sense of her duty to society reconciles her. An amazing creature that, sir! You'll find the money quite correct, I think. There's a cracked window, sir, but I've not made any deduction on that account. Whenever we part with friends, Mr. Richard, let us part liberally. A delightful sentiment, sir!"

To all these rambling observations, Mr. Swiveller answered not one word, but returning for the aquatic jacket, rolled it into a tight round ball, looking steadily at Brass, meanwhile, as if he had some intention of bowling him down with it. He only took it under his arm, and marched out of the office in profound silence. Directly he had closed the door, he opened it; stared in again, for a few moments, with the same portentous gravity; and nodding his head once, in a slow and ghost-like manner, vanished.

He paid the coachman and turned his back on Bevis Marks, big with great designs for the comforting of Kit's mother and the aid of Kit himself.

But the lives of gentlemen devoted to such pleasures as Richard Swiveller, are extremely precarious. The spiritual excitement of the last fortnight, working upon a system affected in no slight degree by the spiritual excitement of some years, proved a little too much for him. That very night, Mr. Richard was seized with an alarming illness, and in twenty-four hours was stricken with a raging fever.

CHAPTER LXIV.

Tossing to and fro upon his hot, uneasy bed; tormented by a fierce thirst which nothing could appease; unable to find, in any change of posture, a moment's peace or ease; and rambling for ever through deserts of thought where there was no resting place, no sight, or sound suggestive of refreshment, or repose, nothing but a dull, eternal weariness, with no change but the restless shiftings of his miserable body, and the weary wanderings of his mind, constant still to one ever-present anxiety—to a sense of something left undone, of some fearful obstacle to be surmounted, of some carking care that would not be driven away, and haunted the disordered brain, now in this form, now in that—always shadowy and dim, but recognizable for the same phantom in every shape it took, darkening every vision like like an evil conscience, and making slumber horrible; in these slow tortures of his dread disease, the unfortunate Richard lay wasting and consuming, inch by inch, until at last, when he seemed to fight and struggle to rise up, and to be held down by devils, he sunk into a deep sleep, and dreamed no more.

He awoke; and, with a sensation of most blissful rest, better than sleep itself, began gradually to remember something of these sufferings, and to think what a long night it had been, and whether he had not been delirious twice or thrice. Happening in the midst of these cogitations to raise his hand, he was astonished to find how heavy it seemed, and yet how thin and light it really was. Still he felt indifferent and happy: and having no curiosity to pursue the subject, remained in the same waking slumber until his attention was attracted by a cough. This made him doubt whether he had locked his door last night, and feel a little surprised at having a companion in the room. Still, he lacked energy to follow up this train of thought; and unconsciously fell, in a luxury of repose, to staring at some green stripes upon the bed-furniture, and associating them strangely with patches of fresh turf, while the yellow ground between made gravel-walks, and so helped out a long perspective of trim gardens.

He was rambling in imagination upon these terraces, and had quite lost himself among them indeed, when he heard the cough once more. The walks shrunk into stripes again at the sound; and raising himself a little in the bed, and holding the curtain open with one hand, he looked out.

The same room, certainly, and still by candle-light; but with what unbounded astonishment did he see all those bottles, and basins, and articles of linen airing by the fire, and such-like furniture of a sick chamber—all very clean and neat, but all quite different from anything he had left there, when he went to bed! The atmosphere, too, filled with a cool smell of herbs and vinegar; the floor newly sprinkled; the—the what? The Marchioness? Yes; playing cribbage with herself at the table. There she sat, intent upon her game, coughing now and then in a subdued manner, as if she feared to disturb him—shuffling the cards, cutting, dealing, counting, pegging; going through all the mysteries of cribbage as though she had been in full practice from her cradle!

Mr. Swiveller contemplated these things for a short time, and suffering the curtain to fall into its former position, laid his head upon the pillow again.

"I'm dreaming," thought Richard, "that's clear. When I went to bed, my hands were not made of eggshells; and now I can almost see through 'em. If this is not a dream, I have woke up by mistake in an Arabian Night instead of a London one. But I have no doubt I'm asleep. Not the least."

Here the small servant had another cough.

"Very remarkable!" thought Mr. Swiveller. "I never dreamt such a real cough as that, before. I don't know, indeed, that I ever dreamt either a cough or a sneeze. Perhaps it's part of the philosophy of dreams that one never does. There's another—and another—I say, I'm dreaming rather fast."

For the purpose of testing his real condition, Mr. Swiveller, after some reflection, pinched himself in the arm.

"Queerer still!" he thought. "I came to bed rather plump than otherwise, and now there's nothing to lay hold of. I'll take another survey."

The result of this further inspection was, to convince Mr. Swiveller that the objects by which he was surrounded were real, and that he saw them, beyond all question, with his waking eyes.

"It's an Arabian Night, that's what it is," said Richard. "I'm in Damascus or Grand Cairo. The Marchioness is a Genie, and having had a wager with another Genie about who is the handsomest young man alive, and the worthiest to be the husband of the Princess of China, has brought me away, room and all, to compare us together. Perhaps," said Mr. Swiveller, turning languidly round upon his pillow, and looking on that side of his bed which was next the wall, "the Princess may be still—No, she's gone."

Not feeling quite satisfied with this explanation, as, even taking it to be the correct one, it still involved a little mystery and doubt, Mr. Swiveller raised the curtain again, determined to take the first favorable opportunity of addressing his companion. An occasion soon presented itself. The Marchioness dealt, turned up a knave, and omitted to take the usual advantage; upon which Mr. Swiveller called out as loud as he could—"Two for his heels!"

The Marchioness jumped up quickly, and clapped her hands. "Arabian Night, certainly," thought Mr. Swiveller; "they always clap their hands instead of ringing the bell. Now for the two thousand black slaves, with jars of jewels on their heads."

It appeared, however, that she had only clapped her hands in joy; for directly afterwards she began to laugh, and then to cry: declaring, not in choice Arabic but in familiar English, that she was "so glad, she didn't know what to do."

"Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, thoughtfully, "be pleased to draw nearer. First of all, will you have the goodness to inform me where I shall find my voice; and secondly, what has become of my flesh?"

The Marchioness only shook her head mournfully, and cried again; whereupon Mr. Swiveller (being very weak) felt his own eyes affected likewise.

"I begin to infer, from your manner and these appearances, Marchioness," said Richard, after a pause, and smiling with a trembling lip, "that I have been ill."

"You just have!" replied the small servant, wiping her eyes. "And have n't you been in a talking nonsense?"

"Oh!" said Dick. "Very ill, Marchioness, have I been?"

"Dead, all but," replied the small servant. "I never thought you'd get better. Thank Heaven, you have!"

Mr. Swiveller was silent for a long while. Bye and bye, he began to talk again—inquiring how long he had been there.

"Three weeks to-morrow," replied the small servant.

"Three what?" said Dick.

"Weeks," returned the Marchioness emphatically; "three long, slow weeks."

The bare thought of having been in such extremity, caused Richard to fall into another silence, and to lie flat down again at his full length. The Marchioness, having arranged the bed-clothes more comfortably, and felt that his hands and forehead were quite cool—a discovery that filled her with delight—cried a little more, and then applied herself to getting tea ready, and making some thin dry toast.

While she was thus engaged, Mr. Swiveller looked on with a grateful heart, very much astonished to see how thoroughly at home she made herself, and attributing this attention, in its origin, to Sally Brass, whom, in his own mind, he could not thank enough. When the Marchioness had finished her toasting, she spread a clean cloth on a tray, and brought him some crisp slices and a great basin of weak tea, with which (she said) the doctor had left word he might refresh himself when he awoke. She propped him up with pillows, if not as skillfully as if she had been a professional nurse all her life, at least as tenderly; and looked on with unutterable satisfaction while the patient—stopping every now and then to shake her by the hand—took his poor meal with an appetite and relish, which the greatest dainties of the earth, under any other circumstances, would have failed to provoke. Having cleared away, and disposed every thing comfortably about him again, she sat down at the table to take her own tea.

"Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, "how's Sally?"

The small servant screwed her face into an expression of the very uttermost entanglement of slyness, and shook her head.

"What, have n't you seen her lately?" said Dick.

"Seen her!" cried the small servant. "Bless you, I've run away!"

Mr. Swiveller immediately laid himself down again quite flat, and so remained for about five minutes. By slow degrees he resumed his sitting posture, after that lapse of time, and inquired:

"And where do you live, Marchioness?"

"Live!" cried the small servant. "Here!"

"Oh!" said Mr. Swiveller. And with that he fell down flat again, as suddenly as if he had been shot. Thus he remained, motionless and bereft of speech, until she had finished her meal, put every thing in its place, and swept the hearth; when he motioned her to bring a chair to the bedside, and being propped up again, opened a farther conversation.

"And so," said Dick, "you have run away?"

"Yes," said the Marchioness, "and they've been a tizing of me."

"Been—I beg your pardon," said Dick—"what have they been doing?"

"Been a tizing of me—tizing you know—in the newspapers," rejoined the Marchioness.

"Aye, aye," said Dick, "advertising?"

The small servant nodded, and winked. Her eyes were so red with weeping and crying, that the Tragic Muse might have winked with greater consistency. And so Dick felt.

"Tell me," said he, "how it was that you thought of coming here."

"Why, you see," returned the Marchioness, "when you was gone, I had n't any friend at all, because the lodger he never come back, and I didn't know where either him or you was to be found, you know. But one morning, when I was—"

"Was near a keyhole?" suggested Mr. Swiveller, observing that she faltered.

"Well then," said the small servant, nodding; "when I was near the office keyhole—as you see me through, you know—I heard somebody saying that she lived here, and was the lady whose house you lodged at, and that you was took very bad, and would n't nobody come and take care of you. Mr. Brass, he says, 'It's no business of mine;' and Miss Sally, she says, 'He's a funny chap, but it's no business of mine;' and the lady went away, and slammed the door to, when she went out, I can tell you. So I run away that night, and come here, and told 'em you was my brother, and they believed me, and I've been here ever since."

"This poor little Marchioness has been wearing herself to death!" cried Dick.

"No I have n't," she returned, "not a bit of it. Do n't you mind about me. I like sitting up, and I've often had a sleep, bless you, in one of them chairs. But if you could have seen how you tried to jump out o' winder, and if you could have heard how you used to keep on singing and making speeches, you would n't have believed it—I'm so glad you're better, Mr. Liverer."

"Liverer, indeed!" said Dick thoughtfully. "It's well I am a liverer. I strongly suspect I should have died, Marchioness, but for you."

At this point, Mr. Swiveller took the small servant's hand in his again, and being, as we have seen, but poorly, might in struggling to express his thanks have made his eyes as red as hers, but that she quickly changed the theme by making him lie down, and urging him to keep very quiet.

"The doctor," she told him, "said you was to be kept quite still, and there was to be no noise nor nothing. Now, take a rest, and then we'll talk again. I'll sit by you, you know. If you shut your eyes, perhaps you'll go to sleep. You'll be all the better for it, if you do."

The Marchioness, in saying these words, brought a little table to the bedside, took her seat at it, and began to work away at the concoction of some cooling drink, with the address of a score of chemists. Richard Swiveller, being indeed fatigued, fell into a slumber, and waking in about half an hour, inquired what time it was.

"Just gone half after six," replied his small friend, helping him to sit up again.

"Marchioness," said Richard, passing his hand over his forehead, and turning suddenly round, as though the subject but that moment flashed upon him, "what has become of Kit?"

He had been sentenced to transportation for a great many years, she said.

"Has he gone?" asked Dick—"his mother—how is she—what has become of her?"

His nurse shook her head, and answered that she knew nothing about them.

"But, if I thought," said she, very slowly, "that you'd keep quiet, and not put yourself into another fever, I could tell you—but I won't now."

"Yes, do," said Dick. "It will amuse me."

"Oh! would it though?" rejoined the small servant, with a horrified look. "I know better than that. Wait till you're better, and then I'll tell you."

Dick looked very earnestly at his little friend: and his eyes being large and hollow from illness assisted the expression so much, that she was quite frightened, and besought him not to think any more about it. What had already fallen from her, however, had not only piqued his curiosity, but seriously alarmed him, wherefore he urged her to tell him the worst at once.

"Oh! there's no worst in it," said the small servant. "It has n't any thing to do with you."

"Has it any thing to do with—is it any thing you heard through chinks or keyholes—and that you were not intended to hear?" asked Dick, in a breathless state.

"Yes," replied the small servant.

"In—in Bevis Marks?" pursued Dick hastily. "Conversations between Brass and Sally?"

"Yes," cried the small servant again.

Richard Swiveller thrust his lank arm out of bed, and gripping her by the wrist and drawing her close to him, bade her out with it, and freely too, or he would not answer for the consequences; being wholly unable to endure that state of excitement and expectation. She, seeing that he was greatly agitated, and that the effects of postponing her revelation might be much more injurious than any that were likely to ensue from its being made at once, promised compliance, on condition that the patient kept himself perfectly quiet, and abstained from starting up or tossing about.

"But if you begin to do that," said the small servant, "I'll leave off. And so I tell you."

"You can't leave off till you have gone on," said Dick. "And do go on, there's a darling. Speak, sister, speak. Pretty Polly say—Oh tell me when, and tell me where, pray Marchioness, I beseech you."

Unable to resist these fervent adjurations, which Richard Swiveller poured out as passionately as if they had been of the most solemn and tremendous nature, his companion spoke thus:

"Well! Before I run away, I used to sleep in the kitchen—where we played cards, you know. Miss Sally used to keep the key of the kitchen door in her pocket, and she always came down at night to take away the candle and rake out the fire. When she had done that, she left me to go to bed in the dark, locked the door on the outside, put the key in her pocket again, and kept me locked up till she come down in the morning—very early I can tell you—and let me out. I was terrible afraid of being kept like this, because if there was a fire, I thought they might forget me and only take care of themselves you know. So whenever I see an old rusty key anywhere, I picked it up and tried if it would fit the door, and at last I found in the dust cellar, a key that did fit it."

Here Mr. Swiveller made a violent demonstration with his legs. But the small servant immediately pausing in her talk, he subsided again, and pleading a momentary forgetfulness of their compact, entreated her to proceed.

"They kept me very short," said the small servant. "Oh! you can't think how short they kept me. So I used to come out at night after they'd gone to bed, and feel about in the dark for bits of biscuit, or sangwitches that you'd left in the office, or even pieces of orange peel to put into cold water and make believe it was wine. Did you ever taste orange peel and water?"

Mr. Swiveller replied that he had never tasted that ardent liquor; and once more urged his friend to resume the thread of her narrative.

"If you make believe very much, it's quite nice," said the small servant; "but if you do n't, you know, it seems as if it would bear a little more seasoning, certainly. Well, sometimes I used to come out after they'd gone to bed, and sometimes before, you know; and one or two nights before there was all that precious noise in the office—when the young man was took, I mean—I come up stairs while Mr. Brass and Miss Sally was a sittin' at the office fire; and I'll tell you the truth, that I come to listen again, about the key of the safe."

Mr. Swiveller gathered up his knees so as to make a great cone of the bedclothes, and conveyed into his countenance an expression of the utmost concern. But the small servant pausing, and holding up her finger, the cone gently disappeared, though the look of concern did not.

"There was him and her," said the small servant, "a sittin' by the fire, and talking softly together. Mr. Brass says to Miss Sally, 'Upon my word,' he says, 'it's a dangerous thing, and it might get us into a world of trouble, and I do n't half like it.' She says—you know her way—she says, 'You're the chicken-hearted, feeblest, faintest man I ever see, and I think,' she says, 'that I ought to have been the brother, and you the sister. Is n't Quilp,' she says, 'our principal support?' 'He certainly is,' says Mr. Brass. 'And an't we,' she says, 'constantly raining somebody or other in the way of business?' 'We certainly are,' says Mr. Brass. 'Then does it signify,' she says, 'about ruining this Kit, when Quilp desires it?' 'It certainly does not signify,' says Brass. Then they whispered and laughed for a long time about there being no danger if it was well done, and then Mr. Brass pulls out his pocket-book, and says, 'Well,' he says, 'here it is—Quilp's own five-pound note. We'll agree that way, then,' he says. 'Kit's coming to-morrow morning, I know. While he's up stairs, you'll get out of the way, and I'll clear off Mr. Richard. Having Kit alone, I'll hold him in conversation, and put this property in his hat. I'll manage so, besides,' he says, 'that Mr. Richard shall find it there, and be the evidence. And if that don't get Christopher out of Mr. Quilp's way, and satisfy Mr. Quilp's grudges,' he says, 'the Devil's in it.' Miss Sally laughed, and said that was the plan, and as they seemed to be moving away, and I was afraid to stop any longer, I went down stairs again. There!"

The small servant had gradually worked herself into as much agitation as Mr. Swiveller, and therefore made no effort to restrain him when he sat up in bed and hastily demanded whether this story had been told to any body.

"How could it be?" replied his nurse. "I was almost afraid to think about it, and hoped the young man would be let off. When I heard 'em say they had found him guilty of what he did n't do, you was gone, and so was the lodger—though I think I should have been frightened to tell him, even if he'd been there. Ever since I come here, you've been out of your senses, and what would have been the good of telling you then?"

"Marchioness," said Mr. Swiveller, plucking off his nightcap, and flinging it to the other end of the room; "if you'll do me the favor to retire for a few minutes and see what sort of a night it is, I'll get up."

"You must n't think of such a thing," cried his nurse.

"I must indeed," said the patient, looking round the room. "Whereabouts are my clothes?"

"Oh I'm so glad—you have n't got any," replied the Marchioness.

"Ma'am!" said Mr. Swiveller, in great astonishment.

"I've been obliged to sell them every one, to get the things that was ordered for you. But do n't take on about that," urged the Marchioness, as Dick fell back upon his pillow. "You're too weak to stand, indeed."

"I am afraid," said Richard, dolefully, "that you're right. What ought I to do! what is to be done?"

It naturally occurred to him, upon very little reflection, that the first step to take would be to communicate with one of the Mr. Garlands instantly. It was very possible that Mr. Abel had not yet left the office. In as little time as it takes to tell it, the small servant had the address in pencil on a piece of paper; a verbal description of father and son, which would enable her to recognise either without difficulty; and a special caution to be shy of Mr. Chuckster, in consequence of that gentleman's known antipathy to Kit. Armed with these slender powers, she hurried away, commissioned to bring either old Mr. Garland or Mr. Abel, bodily, to that apartment.

"I suppose," said Dick, as she closed the door slowly, and peeped into the room again to make sure that he was comfortable, "I suppose there's nothing left—not so much as a waistcoat even!"

"No, nothing."

"It's embarrassing," said Mr. Swiveller; "in case of fire—even an umbrella would be something—but you did quite right, dear Marchioness. I should have died without you."

CHAPTER LXV.

It was well for the small servant that she was of a sharp, quick nature, or the consequence of sending her out alone, from the very neighborhood in which it was most dangerous for her to appear, would probably have been the restoration of Miss Sally Brass to the supreme authority over her person. Not unmindful of the risk she ran, however, the Marchioness no sooner left the house than she dived into the first dark by-way that presented itself, and without any present reference to the point to which her journey tended, made it her first business to put two good miles of brick and mortar between herself and Bevis Marks.

When she had accomplished this object, she began to shape her course for the notary's office, to which—shrewdly inquiring of apple-women and oyster-sellers at street-corners, rather than in lighted shops, or of well-dressed people, at the hazard of attracting notice—she easily procured a direction. As carrier-pigeons, on being first let loose in a strange place, beat the air at random for a short time, before darting off toward the spot for which they are designed, so did the Marchioness flutter round and round until she believed herself in safety, and then bear swiftly down upon the port for which she was bound.

She had no bonnet—nothing on her head but a great cap, which in some old time had been worn by Sally Brass, whose taste in head-dresses was, as we have seen, peculiar—and her speed was rather retarded than assisted by her shoes, which, being extremely large and slipshod, flew off every now and then, and were difficult to find again among the crowd of passengers. Indeed the poor little creature experienced so much trouble and delay from having to grope for these articles of dress in mud and kennel, and suffered in these researches so much jostling, pushing, squeezing, and bandying from hand to hand, that by the time she reached the street in which the notary lived, she was fairly worn out and exhausted, and could not refrain from tears.

But to have got there at last was a great comfort, especially as there were lights still burning in the office window, and therefore some hope that she was not too late. So the Marchioness dried her eyes with the backs of her hands, and stealing softly up the steps, peeped in through the glass door.

Mr. Chuckster was standing behind the lid of his desk, making such preparations toward finishing off for the night, as pulling down his wristbands and pulling up his shirt-collar, settling his neck more gracefully in his stock, and secretly arranging his whiskers by the aid of a little triangular bit of looking-glass. Before the ashes of the fire stood two gentlemen, one of whom she rightly judged to be the notary, and the other (who was buttoning his great-coat, and was evidently about to depart immediately) Mr. Abel Garland.

Having made these observations, the small spy took counsel with herself, and resolved to wait in the street until Mr. Abel came out, as there would be then no fear of having to speak before Mr. Chuckster, and less difficulty in delivering her message. With this purpose she slipped out again, and crossing the road, sat down upon a door-step just opposite.

She had hardly taken this position, when there came dancing up the street, with his legs all wrong, and his head every where by turns, a pony. This pony had a little phaeton behind him, and a man in it; but neither man nor phaeton seemed to embarrass him in the least, as he reared up on his hind legs, or stopped, or went on, or stood still again, or backed, or went sideways, without the smallest reference to them, just as the fancy seized him, and as if he was the freest animal in the creation. When they came to the notary's door, the man called out in a very respectful manner, "Woa then;" intimating that if he might venture to express a wish, it would be that they stopped there. The poney made a moment's pause; but as if it occurred to him that to stop when he was required might be to establish an inconvenient and dangerous precedent, he immediately started off again, rattled at a fast trot to the street-corner, wheeled round, came back, and then stopped of his own accord.

"Oh! you're a precious creature!" said the man—who did n't venture, by the bye, to come out in his true colors until he was safe upon the pavement. "I wish I had the rewarding of you—I do."

"What has he been doing?" said Mr. Abel, tying a shawl round his neck as he came down the steps.

"He's enough to fret a man's heart out," replied the hostler. "He is the most vicious rascal—woa then, will you?"

"He'll never stand still, if you call him names," said Mr. Abel, getting in, and taking the reins. "He's a very good fellow if you know how to manage him. This is the first time he has been out this long while, for he has lost his old driver, and would n't stir for any body else till this morning. The lamps are right, are they? That's well. Be here to take him to-morrow, if you please. Good night!"

And after one or two strange plunges, quite of his own invention, the pony yielded to Mr. Abel's mildness, and trotted gently off.

All this time Mr. Chuckster had been standing at the door, and the small servant had been afraid to approach. She had nothing for it now, therefore, but to run after the chaise, and call to Mr. Abel to stop. Being out of breath by the time she came up with it, she was unable to make him hear. The case was desperate; for the pony was quickening his pace. The Marchioness hung on behind for a few moments, and feeling that she could go no further, and must soon yield, clambered, by a vigorous effort into the hinder seat, and in so doing lost one of the shoes for ever.

Mr. Abel, being in a thoughtful frame of mind, and having quite enough to do to keep the pony going, went jogging on without looking round, little dreaming of the strange figure that was close behind him, until the Marchioness, having in some degree recovered her breath, and the loss of her shoe, and the novelty of her position, uttered close into his ear the words—

"I say, sir!"

He turned his head quickly enough then, and stopping the pony, cried, with some trepidation, "God bless me, what is this?"

"Do n't be frightened, sir," replied the still panting messenger. "Oh, I've run such a way after you!"

"What do you want with me?" said Mr. Abel. "How did you come here?"

"I got in behind," replied the Marchioness. "Oh! please drive on, sir—do n't stop—and go toward the city, will you? And oh do please make haste, because it's of consequence. There's somebody wants to see you there. He sent me to say would you come directly, and that he knowed all about Kit, and could save him yet, and prove his innocence."

"What do you tell me, child?"

"The truth, upon my word and honor I do. But please do drive on—quick, please. I've been such a time gone, he'll think I'm lost."

Mr. Abel involuntarily urged the pony forward. The pony, impelled by some secret sympathy or some new caprice, burst into a great pace, and neither slackened it, nor indulged in any eccentric performances, until they arrived at the door of Mr. Swiveller's lodging, where, marvellous to relate, he consented to stop when Mr. Abel checked him.

"See! It's that room up there," said the Marchioness, pointing to one where there was a faint light. "Come!"

Mr. Abel, who was one of the simplest and most retiring creatures in existence, and naturally timid withal, hesitated; for he had heard of people being decoyed into strange places to be robbed and murdered, under circumstances very like the present, and for anything he knew to the contrary, by guides very like the Marchioness. His regard for Kit, however, overcame every other consideration. So entrusting Whisker to the charge of a man who was lingering hard by in expectation of the job, he suffered his companion to take his hand, and to lead him up the dark and narrow stairs.

He was not a little surprised to find himself conducted into a dimly-lighted sick chamber, where a man was sleeping tranquilly in bed.

"An't it nice to see him lying there so quiet?" said his guide, in an earnest whisper. "Oh! you'd say it was, if you had only seen him two or three days ago."

Mr. Abel made no answer, and to say the truth, kept a long way from the bed and very near the door. His guide, who appeared to understand his reluctance, trimmed the candle, and taking it in her hand, approached the bed. As she did so, the sleeper started up, and he recognised in the wasted face the features of Richard Swiveller.

"Why, how is this?" said Mr. Abel kindly, as he hurried towards him. "You have been ill?"

"Very," replied Dick. "Nearly dead. You might have chanced to hear of your Richard on his bier, but for the friend I sent to fetch you. Another shake of the hand, Marchioness, if you please. Sit down, sir."

Mr. Abel seemed rather astonished to hear of the quality of his guide, and took a chair by the bedside.

"I have sent for you, sir," said Dick—"but she told you on what account?"

"She did. I am quite bewildered by all this. I really don't know what to say or think," replied Mr. Abel.

"You'll say that presently," retorted Dick. "Marchioness, take a seat on the bed, will you? Now, tell this gentleman all that you told me; and be particular. Don't you speak another word, sir."

The story was repeated; it was, in effect, exactly the same as before, without any deviation or omission. Richard Swiveller kept his eyes fixed on his visitor during its narration, and directly it was concluded, took the word again.

"You have heard it all, and you'll not forget it. I'm too giddy and too queer to suggest anything; but you and your friends will know what to do. After this long delay, every minute is an age. If ever you went home fast in your life, go home fast to-night. Don't stop to say one word to me, but go. She will be found here, whenever she's wanted; and as to me, you're pretty sure to find me at home, for a week or two. There are more reasons than one for that. Marchioness, a light. If you lose another minute in looking at me, sir, I'll never forgive you!"

Mr. Abel needed no further remonstrance or persuasion. He was gone in an instant; and the Marchioness, returning from lighting him down stairs, reported that the poney, without any preliminary objection whatever, had dashed away at full gallop.

"That's right!" said Dick; "and hearty of him; and I honor him from this time. But get some supper and a mug of beer. It will do me as much good to see you take it as if I might drink it myself."

Nothing but this assurance could have prevailed upon the small nurse to indulge in such a luxury. Having eaten and drunk to Mr. Swiveller's extreme contentment, given him his drink, and put everything in neat order, she wrapped herself in an old coverlet and lay down upon the rug before the fire.

Mr. Swiveller was by that time murmuring in his sleep, "Strew then, oh strew, a bed of rushes. Here will we stay, till morning blushes. Good night, Marchioness."

A PRUDENT WIFE AND A STRONG APRON.

Mrs. W., consort and help meet of Mr. W., merchant of New-York, was a very economical woman, and, if her eulogist was not mistaken, had a very strong apron. The circumstance narrated by the friend of Mrs. W. was as follows: Mr. W. was a merchant in affluent circumstances, did a very heavy business, and conducted all his affairs with the utmost regularity. Every department of business was completely systematized; even family expenditures were restricted to regular daily appropriations, and no surer is the sailing master of a ship to make his observation, work his traverse and ascertain his exact latitude and longitude every noon, than was Mr. W. to have all his accounts nicely balanced, and ascertain his exact whereabouts in business every night. But as wise, prudent and punctilious as he was, he could not withstand the temptation to overtrading during one of the great paper expansions; and when the revulsion came, he found himself embarrassed beyond all his efforts to extricate himself. He had stood firm as a rock while many of the most reputable houses tumbled to ruins around him, but he could not collect money due him from his best customers, and there was one remaining note of ten thousand dollars that would fall due in a few days, and he could devise no way to meet it. The notice came from the Bank, but three days remained, and every resource failed. The first of these three days was spent in fruitless attempts to borrow. The second was as fruitlessly spent in trying to force a sale of goods. Nobody had money to lend—no body had money to purchase goods at any price. Failure presented itself before him with all its frightfulness.

The last day of grace arrived, and horror was depicted in his countenance. Mrs. W. knew nothing of his troubles, and on perceiving him evidently in great distress of mind, she insisted on knowing what was the cause of his trouble. It was folly to conceal his ruin from her, and he condescended to make her acquainted with the cause of his misery. How much, she inquired, will save you from failure? Ten thousand dollars, he replied, will pay my last note in bank; but for want of this I must suffer the disgrace of having my note protested, assign my property for the benefit of my creditors, and suffer my name to go to the world as a bankrupt. Is this all, said she? Why bless me, my dear

Mr. W., I can supply you with that sum without going out of the house. Not waiting to hear the question which he was preparing to ask, she tripped up stairs, and in less time than I have occupied in telling the story, she returned with seventeen thousand dollars in her apron, all in change, which she had saved within a few years from her daily allowance of market money!

All who heard the recital of this circumstance by the friend of Mrs. W. were highly delighted with it, save one sharp-nosed slabsided yankee, who would not believe though an angel had told it, till he had applied the test of figures to it, to ascertain its probability. As he finished his calculation and was in the act of returning his pencil to his pocket, he burst into a roar of laughter. All eyes were turned upon him, and the narrator demanded what he meant by such uncivil deportment. "Nothin' at all, stranger," said the calculator, "only I was thinkin' what a far-nal strong apron that ere woman must a had on to bring seventeen thousand dollars worth of change down stairs. I've cyphered it out on this here paper, and it will weigh just half a ton if there ain't a single copper among the whole on 't.—[Buffalo Republican.]

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1841

—We publish in the NEW WORLD of this week an article from the London Quarterly Review, just received, on AMERICAN ORATORS AND STATESMEN. The tone and temper of the article differ materially from the style of that journal in reference to this country in past times. Under the editorship of the late Mr. Gifford, it was disgraced by the most atrocious attacks upon the character and institutions of the United States.

Mr. Gifford was a man of extraordinary acerbity of feeling, partly from constitutional temperament, and partly from the memory of his poverty and wretchedness in early life. Springing from the lowest dregs of the people himself, and raised to an eminent position only by the fostering hand of the British aristocracy, he lavished all the concentrated bitterness of his nature and of the miserable reminiscences of a suffering childhood, upon popular institutions, popular opinions, and liberal politics. He had no associations with the people that were other than painful to him; no associations with the aristocracy other than agreeable; and the strong anti-popular bent which his mind received from both these influences was shown through the whole course of the Quarterly Review while he was its editor.

The efforts of American intellect were studiously depreciated; the moral character of the American nation was elaborately vilified; historical facts were perverted and falsified for the shameful purpose of tarnishing the fair fame of our ancestors. Every deed of the past, every institution of the present, every association dear to the American heart, was pointed at with systematic scorn and contempt. Not a little of whatever hostility to each other now exists in the feelings of the two nations may be traced directly to this "fountain of bitter waters." Never in the history of literature was a more criminal abuse of the power of the press committed; and no individual of the race of literary men, just past away, went to his great account with a heavier load of literary guilt upon his soul than Mr. Gifford.

But, happily, the tone of intercourse between the two nations is much changed for the better. The inter-union of literature has partaken largely of this better spirit. The labors of American talent and genius are studied with an appreciating and candid spirit, in England. The writings of Washington, edited by Mr. Sparks, are nearly as well known there as here. Mr. Prescott's classical history of Ferdinand and Isabella has run through as many editions in London as in Boston, and is no less indispensable to an English than to an American historical library. Bryant and Halleck and Longfellow are read and admired with the same affectionate appreciation on both sides of the water; and Washington Irving is, like Addison, a beloved name in English literature.

"The era of good feeling" has evidently come. The better minds of the two nations have ceased to think it dignified to stand forever in a hostile attitude. The straining athlete of ancient sculpture has been, but is no more, the emblem of the intellectual relations between the two countries. Our journalists no longer deem it their duty to play "the fretful porcupine," and assail each other with the points of hostile quills. And, strange enough, our ancient enemy, the Quarterly Review, has changed his whole bearing, silenced his terrible broadsides and run up the friendly flag. The article which we republish, we doubt not, will surprise and gratify our readers. It is written with a knowledge of American affairs very unusual in an Englishman; and is free from the sneering spirit which has been so unworthy a characteristic of most English commentaries upon American genius.

The sketches of the persons, style, and rhetorical peculiarities of our leading orators and statesmen are generally correct. We notice a mistake here and there, but none of material consequence; and if the estimates of their intellectual powers and literary attainments fall somewhat below the American mark, we must remember that they come from a foreigner, naturally, and not unreasonably, prejudiced in favor of his countrymen; from an Englishman with whom the mighty names of Chatham, and Fox, and Burke, and Pitt, are names before which all others must "vail their crests." On the whole, we have reason to be well satisfied with the rank conceded to our eminent countrymen by the able writer in the Quarterly; and to be more than satisfied with the conscientious endeavors he has evidently made to collect all the requisite facts, and to place the oratorical abilities and general intellectual characters of the men, who are the pride and glory of America, in the light of truth before the British public.

From the sprightliness and purity of the style, the abundance and felicitous application of literary anecdotes, and the ever ready wit which sparkles on its pages, we suppose the article to be from the pen of the author of the papers on the French Orators, Journalism in France, and the Review of Mrs. Trollope's work on Austria—papers which we have always heard attributed to Mr. Hayward, the accomplished translator of Faust.

CHARLES SUMNER, Esq.—The name of this gentleman—who has recently returned to Boston after a three years' sojourn in Europe, and who, while abroad, visited familiarly in the most distinguished circles of European society—is mentioned in the last number of the London Quarterly Review in terms of high and well-deserved praise. The following passage occurs in the article, which we are publishing in the NEW WORLD, on American Orators and Statesmen.

"Mr. Justice Story's charges to juries are much admired: and his judgements are admirable specimens of judicial statement and reasoning. The most important are reported by Mr. Charles Sumner, barrister, who recently paid a visit of some duration to this country, and presents in his own person a decisive proof that an American gentleman, without official rank or wide-spread reputation, by mere dint of courtesy, candor, an entire absence of pretension, an appreciating spirit and a cultivated mind, may be received on a perfect footing of equality in the best English circles, social, political and intellectual; which, be it observed, are hopelessly inaccessible to the itinerant note-taker, who never gets beyond the outskirts of the show-houses."

—We are desirous of calling the particular attention of our readers to an article on "Currency and Banking," which has just appeared in the Westminster Review, in London, and which will doubtless be issued here, with the usual dispatch of all of Mrs. Mason's republications. It is divided into two parts; the first part considers those principles of the currency that have recently been the subject of parliamentary investigation, and the second part takes a review of those plans that have been proposed for the administration of the currency in England. Under the first head the following questions are examined:—1. What effects have fluctuations in the currency upon the prices of commodities? 2. How do fluctuations in the currency influence the foreign exchanges? 3. What effects are produced by the substitution of paper money for coin? 4. Ought Bank deposits to be regarded as currency? And, 5. Ought bills of exchange to be regarded as currency? Under the second head are noticed the plans of Mr. Horsley Palmer, Colonel Torrens, Mr. Loyd, Mr. Tooke, Mr. Gilbert, and Mr. Bailey, the first three of which are subjected to a calm and searching investigation. As a specimen of the article, we transcribe the writer's remarks on the banking system of America:—

AMERICAN BANKING.

The case of America has been so often adduced by Mr. Loyd, Mr. Norman, and others, as exhibiting the evils of a free system of banking, that it seems to require a special consideration.

It strikes us as extraordinary that, to prove the evils of free trade in banking, we are directed to a country in which free trade in banking has never existed. Neither an individual nor a company can carry on banking in America without the permission of the State. All the banks in America are chartered banks, and differ from our Joint-Stock Banks in many particulars, and especially in the limitation of the liability of the shareholders. Now admitting that the system of chartered banks has failed in America, it seems very illogical to infer that consequently a system of unchartered Joint-Stock Banks must fail in England. But it is contended that the history of banking in America shows the evil of having numerous banks, and hence similar evils must arise from having numerous banks in England. To maintain this argument, it should be shown that the banks in the two countries are of the same kind, and that the circumstances of the two countries, as far as they bear upon banking, are similar. But is this the case? Besides, we may ask, what evils have been produced in America by a number of chartered banks which have not heretofore been produced in England by one chartered bank? Are they charged with issuing their notes to excess? Have not similar charges been made against the bank of England even by those who are now most clamorous for the extension of her monopoly? Have the American banks suspended payment? And did not the Bank of England suspend payment, and was not her suspension continued for a much longer period? Although it is clear that the American system of chartered banks is inferior to the Scotch system of Joint-Stock Banks, yet it is not so evident that numerous chartered banks are a less evil than one chartered bank.

The argument presumes, too, that in case of free banking the number of banks would be very great. Are we justified in supposing that this would be the case? Theory exclaims "yes;" experience whispers "no." The numerone banks in America are not the result of free trade, but are the results of the acts of the Legislature. The State Legislatures have thought proper to give a large number of charters, and of course there is a large number of banks. Had the charters been fewer, the banks would have been larger and more respectable. The number of banks in England, too, have been the result of the interference of the Legislature. In the renewal of the charter of the Bank of England in 1708 it was enacted, that no other bank having more than six partners should have the privilege of issuing notes. As the growing trade and wealth of the country required banks of some sort, and as banks having more than six partners could not be formed, a great number of banks, each not having more than six partners, rose into existence as they were required by the increasing trade and wealth of the country. Hence, instead of having a small number of large banks, we have had a large number of small banks.

If we look to Scotland, where banking has been free, we find that the total number of private and Joint-Stock Banks is only twenty-eight. Banking has been free beyond fifty miles from Dublin for the last fifteen years, yet throughout that district there are only five banks of issue, with the exception of the Bank of Ireland. In England, where there has been, as we are told, a frenzy in their favor, the Joint Stock Banks of issue are only ninety-one, and probably they would have been less numerous had not the law excluded them from London. The capital which has been embarked in a number of small local banks would have been invested in large London establishments, and the place of the local banks would have been occupied by branches of the London banks. From these facts it seems fair to infer that some of the small Joint-Stock Banks and many of the private banks will, in the course of the next twenty years, be merged in larger establishments. The supposition that unlimited freedom of banking would lead to the establishment of an inconvenient multitude of banks, is wholly unsupported by the testimony of experience.

In adducing instances from the history of banking in America, some of the witnesses are guilty of another fallacy. When they wish to prove the expediency of a sole bank of issue in England, they adduce the instance of the former Bank of the United States. Readers unacquainted with the subject, are led to suppose that the Bank of the United States was the sole bank of issue in America. Had this been the fact, it would have been, as the lawyers say, a case in point. But how stands the fact? This bank had no more exclusive privileges than the Bank of Scotland. It was merely the Government Bank, and it had the power of opening a branch in every State of the Union. With regard to the issue of notes, it had no exclusive privileges, but was exposed to fair competition with the other banks. That the Bank of the United States conferred numerous advantages upon the country cannot be doubted by reasonable men; and the destruction of that institution may fairly be adduced as an example of the mischiefs that may be inflicted on a country by a meddling spirit of legislation with regard to banking. Had the law in America been the same as in Scotland, instead of one Bank of the United States, a dozen establishments of equal respectability would probably have been formed, extending their branches throughout the Union, and those mushroom banks, that have obtained charters from the State Legislatures, would have had no existence. Experience teaches us that whenever banking is free, the result is the formation of a few large banks, each having numerous branches. Local banks having their head-quarters in the smaller towns, are always of subsequent growth, and are kept from adopting a wrong course of action by the system of surveillance adopted towards them by the larger establishments.

Besides the fact of the American banks being chartered banks, and the shareholders being exempt from liability, the American system is practically defective. It being without that system of exchanges between the banks which exists so beneficially in Scotland and England, and which Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Norman have attempted to disparage.

However extraordinary it may appear to English and Scotch bankers, it is a fact that the American banks do not periodically exchange their notes with each other, and pay the difference in gold. When one bank in the course of its business receives the notes of another bank, they are merely carried to account against the bank that issued them. Hence in all balance sheets of American banks that we see in the newspapers, we find that "debts due to other banks," and "debts owing by other banks," are two very considerable items. Mr. Gallatin informs us that the Bank of the United States acquired the ill-will of the States by insisting on frequent exchanges. He says, "The manner in which the bank checks the issue of the State banks is equally simple and obvious. It consists in receiving the notes of all those which are solvent and requiring payment from time to time, without suffering the balance due by any to become too large. We think we may say that on this operation, which requires particular attention and vigilance, and must be carried on with great firmness and due forbearance, depends almost exclusively the stability of the currency of the country."

Language such as this from a man so eminent as Mr. Gallatin, shows how very far the Americans are behind the English in the practical knowledge of banking. The exchanges of notes which is represented by Mr. Gallatin as being peculiar to one bank in America, is common to every bank of England and Scotland; and the operation is performed not merely from "time to time," but at least twice a week; and it is so much a matter of routine that we were totally unconscious of the particular attention and vigilance, which this process displays. And the effect of these exchanges to secure prudent management on the part of the banks, and to check an excessive issue of notes, is not with us a doubtful matter of opinion, but a doctrine that we consider most firmly established.

In his anxiety to support his own view, Mr. Lloyd has quoted the authority of Mr. Webster, "one of the most enlightened and talented members of the American Senate," as favorable to one bank of issue. The quotation made by Mr. Lloyd from a speech of Mr. Webster expresses no such opinion. Mr. Webster says he is in favor of a national bank, by which he meant probably such a bank as was the former Bank of the United States. That he did not mean his national bank to be the sole bank of issue is evident from his stating, as one of its advantages, that it would restrain the excessive issue of the State banks. If he intended his national bank to be the sole bank of issue, this language would have been absurd.

The case of America suggests to us a striking difference between theory and experience. The theory of American banking appears very rational. There we behold the State with maternal care watching over the interests of her banking institutions, prohibiting all except those to which she herself may give birth; to those she gives a charter as a special mark of her affection, prescribing the amount of the capital, the extent of their issue, the sums of gold to be kept in reserve; and to ensure obedience to her orders, she requires ample returns, and sends her officers at stated periods to examine the amount of their treasure. What a beautiful theory. Had it never been tried, how loudly would it be applauded. Let us look at another theory. Suppose it were now proposed for the first time to pass a law permitting any one individual to set up a bank and issue as many notes as he pleased, would not the plan be condemned as absurd? Should we not be told that banks would become as numerous as gin-shops, and that every pauper and swindler in the community would be issuing "promises to pay," which would never be fulfilled? Yet this is the case in London at the present time. Any individual, or any number of individuals not exceeding six, may take out a license and issue as many post notes as they please, even in London. Yet where are the practical evils of this state of the law? Some people assert that no evils have arisen because the number of partners is limited to six; but if this privilege were extended to partnerships of more than six persons, then dreadful indeed would be the evils that would come upon the community. When people cease to reason and begin to prophesy, they must be left to themselves. We may rebut an argument, but we cannot refute a prediction.

[35-] The Hon. Mrs. Norton has addressed a letter to the Editor of the London Sunday Times, in reference to the persecutions and annoyances, to which, in despite of the mournful character of her misfortunes, she is still constantly subject. More despicable or degraded wretches cannot exist than the authors of anonymous letters—and it is a matter of surprise that the afflicted lady gives them any heed or attention whatsoever. Upon opening such letters, she should, upon discovering their import, instantly commit them in the flames without perusal.

We sometimes think that true gallantry is extinct in the bosoms of men. Whenever any question arises in which woman is a party, mankind seem to think it incumbent upon them to set about vilifying and traducing her and defending their own sex. The D'Hautville case, which has of late occupied no small share of public attention in our country, is an instance in point. A great majority of the Editors and the same proportion of the lawyers have taken up their cudgels in defence of D'Hautville, as if the dearest rights of "the lords of creation" were invaded and in danger of utter subversion from the just decision of the Court, which gave to Madame D'Hautville the care and possession of her infant child. In the case of Mrs. Norton, her innocence was proved, in spite of suborned testimony, as clearly as any fact which ever came before a court of justice—and yet she is followed with a blood-hound ferocity into the sheltered retirement accorded to her by her near relations.

THE HON. MRS. NORTON'S CASE.

MR. EDITOR.—The just and generous spirit manifested in your brief allusion to my affairs, last Sunday, emboldens me to notice the only sentence in the paragraph which gave me pain. You speak of my brother as if he had failed to give me that protection he could, in the hour of insult and annoyance. I should ill deserve the unwearied tenderness and earnest support I have always received from him, if I let that comment pass without contradiction. What help could be given, has been given; what protection could be afforded, has been afforded: patiently, steadily, from first to last, through evil report and good report. That it has not always availed to shield me, is no fault of my brother's.

There is but one human being whose position towards a woman enables him, while he continues her friend, to baffle the attacks of her most bitter foes; and when he becomes her enemy, to neutralize the efforts of her warmest supporters:—the man who swore at God's altar to protect her.

I have not, at any time since the separation, lived alone. I have found a second home with my uncle, Mr. Charles Sheridan (during whose temporary absence the late annoyance took place), but that home has been perpetually invaded by annoyances, from which neither brothers, relatives, or friends have power to relieve me. For upward of three years I have received, at frequent intervals, anonymous letters; some evidently proceeding from vulgar and illiterate persons, but many more,—to the eternal disgrace of those who penned them—from persons whose superior and educated style stamped their attacks with a double baseness; and in one particular and persevering instance, from a person whose familiar acquaintance with foreign languages, and introduction of perverted quotations, vexed him no ordinary scholar. From this species of vexation no one can defend me; nor from the various discomforts I detailed to the magistrates; the tampering with my servants; watching my house; sending persons to my residence to make inquiries calculated to destroy the respect of those around me, and keeping up, as it were, a perpetual round of wearying insults and evidences of enmity.

Had it been possible that any private friend could shield me from all this, I never should have been driven to make a public appeal for protection. It was because neither my brother nor any other relative had power to check the efforts made against me, that after three years' endurance I determined on that most painful step; I left a sick bed to give evidence in a police-court.

I am, sir, yours obediently,

CAROLINE NORTON.

[36-] The Editor of the Philadelphia U. S. Gazette received, on the 20th of January, 1841, for examination, from Mr. Joseph M. Fox, a pear of the Duchesse d'Angouleme kind, which he (Mr. Fox) received from Havre in France, weighing (not France but the pear) ONE POUND AND SIX OUNCES! Concerning that pear, the Editor remarks, "It was a magnificent affair, such as we never saw before." To call a pear an affair strikes us as peculiar—particularly in prose. In poetry it might do—for the sake of the rhyme—as, for example,

A more magnificent affair

Was never seen than this huge pear;

or, vice versa:

We never saw, than this huge pear,

A more magnificent affair.

Perhaps the latter distich is preferable; rhetorically speaking it is more sublime, and, as Dr. Blair would say, impresses the hearer with a sense of awe. Were all the remarkable incidents, detailed by the learned Editor of the Gazette, to be done into metre, they might run in this fashion:

By Mr. Fox to us was shown

A fruit not all unknown to fame,

From Havre, France, by breezes blown—

Its kind, the Duchesse D'Angouleme.

We speak not like a man who bounces,

When we assert it was a pear,

Weighing full one pound and six ounces—

A most magnificent affair!

It detracts from Mr. Fox's (Fox et præterea nihil) merits, that he displayed the pear merely "for examination" and not as a gift. Oh, Mr. Fox, Mr. Fox, how could you be so stingy? Did you think that, if you suffered the loss of your pear, nothing could repair it? How delighted you must have been, when the examining editor held up both hands and exclaimed with the poet,

"Sure such a pear was never seen!"

Arrival of the Columbia.

Eleven Days Later From England.

The Steamship Columbia sailed from Liverpool on the 5th inst., and arrived at Boston on the morning of the 21st, making her passage in 15 1-2 days. She brings Liverpool papers to the 5th, and London to the 4th, and eleven days later news.

There are eighty-eight passengers in all from Halifax to Boston.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

London, Monday, Jan. 4, 1841.

The Court has been at Windsor for some time. It is to remain there until after the meeting of Parliament, which is fixed for the 26th of this month. It will then come to London for two or three days, after which it will return to Windsor, where it will remain until within a day or two of the christening of the Princess Royal. No day is yet fixed for the latter ceremony, but it is understood that it will take place in one of the state apartments of Buckingham palace, about the middle of February, and be on a scale of great splendor.

The Queen and her royal infant continue in the enjoyment of the best health. Prince Albert also enjoys seeming good health; but it is said that the court physician, Sir James Clark, is very particular in his instruction to his Royal Highness to avoid unnecessary exposure to colds, as he thinks he discovers in him the symptoms of incipient consumption.

It appears from the will of the late Marquis of Camden, which has been proved in the Doctor's Commons, that his personal property is under £40,000, and that his estates are worth about £8,000 a year.

A lady, evidently belonging to the higher classes, calling herself the Countess Rastalitz, made another attempt, a few weeks ago, to gain admittance into Buckingham Palace. She drew a mourning dress from under her clothes, and brandished it in a menacing manner when the sentinel sought to obstruct her entrance into the palace. She labors under the delusion that she has some pecuniary claims on Prince Albert. She has been committed to a Lunatic Asylum.

A letter from Constantinople says, that the Sultan has directed that a splendid brilliant necklace, to be composed entirely of diamonds of the first water, be immediately prepared as a present to Queen Victoria.

Among the officers who served on board Sir Robert Stopford's flag-ship, at the recent siege of Acre, was the son of Sir Robert Peel. The bravery which the young man displayed on the occasion is said to have been the admiration of all who witnessed it.

On Christmas morning, shortly after six o'clock, a dreadful catastrophe occurred in the Roman Catholic Church of St. Nicholas without, Francis street, Dublin. One of the planks on which the people were kneeling, having given way, some one raised a cry that the chapel was falling, when a simultaneous and tremendous rush was made toward the door. There being a flight of three or four steps at the approach to the place, upwards of one hundred persons fell down it at once, and were immediately trampled upon by hundreds of others. The screaming and terror were dreadful; and six or seven persons were killed on the spot, while several others have since died from the injuries they received.

The Chartists are again increasing in numbers, and assuming an attitude which is causing no little apprehension for the preservation of the public peace. It is a curious fact that the physical force demonstrated is most alarming in the very district in Wales in which the insurrection broke out eighteen months ago, and for heading which, Frost, Williams and Jones are now in exile and in chains.

Sir Robert Stopford has refused to ratify the Convention between Commodore Napier and Mehemet Ali, on the ground that the brave Commodore exceeded the powers with which he was invested in entering into that Convention. Sir Robert, however, immediately afterward proposed essentially similar terms to Mehemet Ali, who immediately accepted them. The Eastern Question is consequently now considered as fairly settled. The circumstance has given the greatest satisfaction in England. Intelligence being received of Mehemet's acceptance of the terms of England, the funds immediately rose. The terms are that he return to his allegiance to the Sultan as his Sovereign; that he restore the Turkish fleet; and that he evacuate the possessions he now holds in Syria.

The Duke of Wellington has issued cards of invitation to a grand dinner party at Apley House, for the 25th inst., the day before the meeting of Parliament, to all the Tory Peers.

FROM A FRIENDLY CORRESPONDENT.

LONDON, January 2, 1841.

DEAR SIR: You have done so excellently well in securing James Grant, Esq., author of Random Recollections &c., &c., for your London Correspondent, that I presume you will hardly deem my letters of sufficient value, to pay upon them the heavy postage charged by Cunard's Steamers. But, to show my anxiety to comply with your request, I hasten to write, notwithstanding, and to communicate some literary intelligence that will be interesting to your countrymen.

It is now well understood and known in the literary circles of London and Edinburgh, that Samuel Warren, the popular author of Passages from the Diary of a Late Physician, first published in Blackwood's Magazine and afterwards republished in volumes, both in England and America—is the author of that grandest of all modern stories, Ten Thousand a Year. It has, since its commencement, been an extraordinary favorite; the sale of Blackwood has been greatly increased, and a perfect rush is made at the booksellers' for each number on the first of the month. The interest culminates as the story goes on—and, me judice, you have done most wisely in giving it to the American public through the columns of the New World. It cannot fail to be appreciated as it deserves; so intimate a knowledge of human character in all its various phases; such ready and brilliant powers of description; so clear an insight into the motives and conduct of all classes of men and of individuals of all classes; such conversational tact so fluent and graceful a style; such humor, wit, pathos, satire—harmoniously combined—are not to be found in any modern romance. I will not except even the works of Dickens, admirable as they are. He, who does not eagerly read "Ten Thousand a Year," if within his reach, gives up his claim to a good taste or voluntarily foregoes a gratification—the like of which is seldom offered to the lovers of narrative. You will find Number Fourteen in the January Blackwood, quite equal, if not superior to the numbers which have preceded it. Do not withhold it from your readers a single day, if you can avoid it. I learn that Warren means to continue the story through the present year, and afterwards to collect it in volumes—of which it will make six in liberal English type, and three or four after the American style of publication.

Master Humphrey's Clock is purchased weekly by forty thousand people and devoured of a Saturday evening with greedy eyes. Was there ever anything more touching than the adventure of poor Nell, or more laughable than the eccentric vagaries and poetical conversation of Mr. Richard Swiveller? Mr. Dickens is in receipt of about £3500 a year for the labors of his pen: his first publishers, Chapman and Hall, whom he has never deserted—not even while he lent his name and Oliver Twist to Mr. Bentley—have realized a fortune out of the sale of his works.

In consequence of the superior style in which Master Humphrey is produced, it is less profitably than Nicholas Nickleby and the Pickwick papers.

I am well acquainted with Dickens, and, should he commence any new work, you shall be the first to hear of it, and shall assuredly be furnished with the sheets full a week before they appear in England. I can give you the same assurance with regard to any thing new by Sheridan Knowles or Dr. Lever, the author of Charles O'Malley; they are both countrymen of mine, and I know them intimately. Dr. Lever has his new work, "Harry Lorrequer Married," fairly under way. I have secured a promise of a copy for you of the first numbers, considerably anticipating their days of publication. "The author of Virginian" has already a new drama on the stocks; the subject is peculiarly adapted to his glowing though somewhat abrupt style—you will be delighted with it. By the by, I learn from Mr. Knowles that he saw a great deal of you in America; his praises of you were loud, and so they are of every body. He is the most generous and kind-hearted of men, and is universally beloved. He spoke of some royal beefsteak dinners which he enjoyed with a set of companions, whom he calls "the glorious Boston boys." Col. Morris of your city, editor of the New York Mirror, also comes in for no small share of the dramatist's warm recollections.

Did you ever read that beautiful German, child's story, entitled "A Story without an end"? A sequel to it has been published, called "The Child and the Hermit." It has an excellent religious tone, and is rendered attractive by numerous pictorial embellishments. Moxon has just issued "Fugitive Verses" by Joanna Baillie. The poems of Chaucer, the father of English poetry as he is called, have been modernized—id est done into understandable English. In his antique garb, his works are very little read except by scholars; since it requires almost as much study and reference to a glossary to comprehend them fully, as it does to acquire a foreign language. To critics the charm of Chaucer may appear to be gone with the quaintness of his etymology and his old rhymes; but this modernization will have the good effect to attract many readers who never take up anything which is not as clear as noonday. The task has been done with delicacy and faithfulness. It is no "version," no "translation," or "paraphrase," but the poet himself; the same quaint phrases; his own mode of speaking and describing; all has been preserved as far as the bounds of modern language, to be intelligible, would admit. It will be well for you to recommend the republishing of the work to some American bookseller. The "modernizations" are by different authors of celebrity; Wordsworth, Leigh Hunt, R. H. Horne, &c. Such names would surely secure a large demand for the volume. Bulwer's new novel is looked for with considerable anxiety. He thinks it, I am told, his very best production.

DR. ELDRIDGE'S CASE.—The jury in this case have at length been discharged, after having suffered an imprisonment of thirteen days. They stated to the court that they could not agree. They stood, eleven for conviction; one for acquittal.

ANOTHER PATRIOT OF THE REVOLUTION IS FALLEN.—MR. THOMAS BUCK, a resident of Oak Hill, near Dansville, N. Y., lost his life very unexpectedly a few days since, while on his way to visit some of his relations.

THE TENNESSEANS are making arrangements to erect a monument to the memory of the late Hugh L. White, a good and great man, worthy of such commemoration.

OUR LEGISLATURE is going on very quietly at Albany. In the Senate, Gen. Roor's resolution urging such an amendment to the Federal Constitution as will restrict the eligibility of each President to a single term, limit the powers of removal and appointment of the Executive, and discourage the selection of members of Congress from office, are under consideration. Mr. A. B. Dickinson advocated their passage in a speech on Monday. A bill to change radically the Constitution of the Fire Department of this city, so as to render it nearly independent of the Common Council, has been introduced by Mr. Verplanck, and meets with evident favor.

THE HOUSE is chiefly engaged in the consideration of bills of slight general interest.

A BILL has been reported in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania authorizing the institution of suits against the Commonwealth, by individuals having claims against it, and granting them the right of trial by jury.

THE VIRGINIA BANKS having come into the arrangement proposed by the Maryland Banks, they will all certainly resume specie payments on Monday, the first of February.

VERA CRUZ.—The New Orleans papers confirm the news of the loss of the British Steamer Argyle. This vessel left Vera Cruz on the 3d of December, having the Villaneuva, a Spanish schooner, in tow, bound for Havana.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.—Mr. Linn, of the United States Senate, has introduced a bill declaring that the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon is certain and will not be abandoned.

THE CONVENT.—A proposition has been made in the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and so far entertained as to be referred to a select committee, to pay, from the State treasury, the amount of damages sustained by the destruction of the convent at Charlestown, in 1834.

MR. J. SILK BUCKINGHAM has been expatiating, since his return to England on the immense advantages of the total abstinence system. The papers call him "the travel led tee-totaler."

ANNOUNCEMENT—A NOVEL PLAN.

No paper enjoys a more favorable circulation than the Evening Signal. It is distributed by carriers, and sold by the newsboys daily to many of the most intelligent readers in the city. It is eminently a "family newspaper." No expense and exertions are spared to give the latest intelligence, both foreign and domestic, at the earliest possible moment; and there is unremitting industry, if nothing more, displayed in its columns. We arrogate no superiority over any other journal, and we appreciate as fully and as freely, as their best friends can, the merits of the numerous daily papers, issued morning and evening, in our city. We do not wish to encroach upon their circulation; we ask no man to substitute the Signal for the paper or papers which he is in the habit of taking in; but we do ask our fellow-citizens to add it to the amount of their daily reading. Its extreme cheapness authorizes us to make this request; and, furthermore, a novel plan which we have just adopted, a new and striking feature which we are about to introduce, persuades us to make it at this time.

"THE NEW WORLD," with its thirty-two ample columns, is, nevertheless, unable to contain the vast supply of interesting matter, of which we are in receipt upon the arrival of the steam-packets from England. Ainsworth, the author of Rookwood, Crichton and the Tower of London, has just commenced, in the Sunday Times, a new romance, entitled OLD ST. PAUL'S, which promises to equal, if not to surpass, all his former efforts. Henry Cockton, the author of "Valentine Vox" and "Stanley Thorn," has also commenced a novel called "George St. George Julian," a story of commercial life, which, judging from the specimen before us, will be vastly entertaining, and especially in a mercantile community—both of these, it is our intention to publish in the Evening Signal daily, but not in such quantities as to interfere, in the slightest degree, with our usual quota of important news, or editorial articles. This plan will involve a serious expense; but we are willing to undergo it for the sake of adding largely to the gratification of our readers, and of materially increasing the circulation of the Signal. Should these effects not follow the plan, we shall abandon it; but of this we entertain not the slightest apprehension, for the popularity of the authors, whose works we are about to issue in this novel manner, is so great, that thousands of readers will be anxious to see their productions at the earliest possible moment. It is, moreover, our confident expectation that men of business, becoming aware of the great circulation which must attend this project, will aid and sustain us by their advertisements. Of one thing they can even now, assure themselves—the Evening Signal is read by most of the respectable families of the city, and it will henceforth, instead of being thrown aside, be carefully preserved on account of the interesting publications which it will make nearly every day in the year. This will, of course, render it a most valuable channel for communications of all kinds.

Let it not be supposed that these stories will be published in the New World—that is utterly out of the question. The New World already gives to its numerous subscribers, five continued stories—and no other can be begun in it, till these are concluded. Besides, the commencing of any more extended works would interfere with that variety, which is essential to the success of our large paper. The new works, therefore, of Ainsworth and the author of Valentine Vox will appear exclusively in the Evening Signal. A very large edition will be published daily, so that all new subscribers and purchasers can be supplied with back numbers for some weeks to come.

"OLD ST. PAUL'S" was commenced in yesterday's paper; on Monday next will appear the beginning of George St. George Julian. They will be published hereafter at the rate of one column a day.

Subscribers can be served at their residences, by leaving their names at the office of publication—30 Ann street. If any back numbers are wanted, they can be obtained at a penny a piece—a trifling consideration, which, it is hoped, no lover of good reading will refuse to pay for the productions of the most popular of modern authors.

N. B. As it will be absolutely necessary for us, in consequence of so largely augmenting our edition, to go to press at much earlier hour than usual, advertisers are requested to send in their favors not later than half-past ten o'clock, A. M.—[Evening Signal of Thursday.]

THE QUARTO NEW WORLD.—Although we increased our edition on the 1st of January (second volume) more than three thousand copies, yet such has been the rush of new subscribers, that only 800 sets remain in the office. Should the demand continue as great hereafter, (and it is increasing every day) we shall be able to supply subscribers from the commencement but a few weeks longer. Those, therefore, intending to subscribe, must hasten their orders, and our agents every where are desired to look to it.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Those new subscribers who wish the commencement of this justly celebrated and thrilling story in a form to be bound up with the second volume of the Quarto, are informed that we have a few sets of back numbers, (from No. 16 to 30,) and they would do well to order the back numbers from that time. We shall not be able to supply the commencement of this story in the quarto form but a few weeks longer.

Married.

January 26, at the Transfiguration Church, by Rev. F. Varela, Mr. Charles C. Spencer and Mary Jane, daughter of the late John Hurley, January 26, by Rev. Mr. Jones, Mr. E. Gilbert Bennett and Miss Elizabeth Weaver, daughter of Joseph Weaver, Esq., all of this city. January 26, by Rev. Mr. Burdard, Mr. James N. Monument to Sir Walter Scott in Edinburgh.

The above is an accurate representation of the Monument to be erected to the memory of the Wizard of the North in his own city of Edinburgh. It was drawn on the wood and engraved by J. J. Butler, after a very beautiful copperplate impression, for which we are indebted to a lady, who received it from a friend in Scotland. It is believed to be the only picture of the Monument in this country; and it therefore deserves to be prized by our readers. The corner-stone was laid August 15th, 1840. The ceremony was attended by armies of people. From all quarters, near and far, thronged thousands, eager to testify by their presence their deep-seated, affectionate respect for that CLARUM ET VENERABILE NOME, so justly dear to Scotchmen. The Monument is placed midway between the old and new towns of Edinburgh, on a large space of ground, occupied as a nursery and flower-garden.

In default of something from a more worthy hand, we give

A SONNET

Written on hearing that a Monument was to be erected to the memory of SIR WALTER SCOTT.

'T is said that, 'mid the Alps and Pyrenees,
And other lofty mountains, and in groves,
And hidden places where the bandit roves,
Uptowering piles of stones the traveller sees,
That mark the spot where some have fallen and died:
For them these shapeless monuments are reared,
And, though to none who passes by endeared,
Each, from his journeying, will turn aside
To cast his mite upon the rising moles,
And guard the memory of the lost unknown:
In this a deep, strong sentiment is shown—
A kindred for the dead in living souls.
If such, oh world-renowned, thy grave could be,
An Alp would rise a monument to thee!

REVIEW.

Patchwork. By Captain Basil Hall, R. N., F. R. S.

Captain Hall is a man of extensive observation. He has travelled a good deal, and looked out upon the world in many countries from the shrewd and successful corner of his own experiences. The book we are now noticing is good, agreeable reading, which one finds oneself the wiser for having read.

The first volume is occupied with Switzerland, as it appeared to Captain Hall on a visit of some twenty years ago. And when we have said of this part of the work, that, in addition to some pointed and pleasant remarks on tourist incidents and accidents in themselves of no particular novelty, it supplies a number of very interesting and curious suggestions to the study of popular geology, we do not know that it is necessary to say more.

Captain Hall's travelled experience, and known acquaintance with some of the loftiest and most celebrated ranges of mountains in the world, as the Andes and Himalayas, give interest and authenticity to this observation on the Alps:

"There are vastly higher peaks, both in India and in America, and even occasionally whole districts in which continuous ridges of higher elevation occur than the Alps can boast of. But it must be recollected, that mere height above the general surface of the earth, though a grand feature, is not the only circumstance which gives interest to a mountainous country. And I may frankly state, for the satisfaction of those whose travels are limited to Europe, that, in every thing constituting either that striking interest which merely astonishes at the moment, or that which comes so strongly home both to the reason and the imagination, as to endure for ever in the memory, the Alps bear away the palm from every other."

And this is to be attributed, he thinks, to the superior capabilities they possess for exhibiting, not only grandeur and beauty of scenery, but a multitude of objects of scientific as well as popular curiosity, in every part of their range. Several of these are afterwards instructively adverted to.

We do not recollect to have seen noticed before, either in prose or poetry, a remarkable change which Capt. Hall describes to take place in the color of the snow on the higher ridges of the Alps, immediately after sunset. We recommend it to the use of the poets:

"While the eye is feasting on the rich tints which succeed to the bright light of day, and wishes they might last for ever, the rose color gradually dies away, and its place is taken by a livid, dead white, resembling so fearfully that of a corpse, that I felt quite shocked as well as startled by the change—nor have I ever met with any one whose nerves were not more or less disturbed by this painful transition from the blush of health, as it were, to the paleness of death! I have seen very wild deserts in Peru and elsewhere, and many other scenes of desolation in the world, but none which has struck me with so deep a feeling of melancholy as the sight of Mont Blanc during the period, fortunately a brief one, in which this livid hue is spread over it. Before the shades of night finally settle over all, a very slight and scarcely perceptible return of the rose-tint is often visible on the snow, a sort of reanimation of the scene, which is most cheering and consolatory."

The first volume closes with some remarks on the habits of English travellers abroad, which may be called a mixture of the sensible and straight-laced; we pass these, to quote a seasonable note on the Spanish mode of fattening a Christmas Turkey:

"Some six weeks or a couple of months before the day on which he is destined to be roasted, a single walnut is crammed down his throat; on the next day he is made to swallow two; and so on increasing his meal in arithmetical progression till he can hold no more, say thirty or forty. He is then supposed to have reached the maximum point of a turkey's happiness. From that period his allowance of walnuts is daily diminished by one, till at the last, when his bodily condition is at the best, and his appetite the sharpest possible, his fare, like that of a Frenchman's horse, becomes nothing at all. He then receives the coup de grace of the cocinero!"

The patchwork of the second volume is a compound of colors from Paris and Sicily, with interlacing streaks of more homely pattern, from Argyleshire, Edinburgh, and Melrose. We shall content ourselves with brief samples of each, premising merely, that here as before, the more valuable and striking parts of the book consist in scientific suggestions of a popular kind. Captain Hall remarks on the cold of a Paris winter:

"How the wretched coachmen manage to live at all in such weather as I have seen in Paris, is to me inconceivable: for even to the inside passengers the cold becomes at times so severe, that with all the contrivances they can think of—warm furs, hot-water bottles, great-coats, boat-cloaks, and shawls, they can scarcely go from one house to another, without being frozen to death,—a fate which actually befel two poor sentries, and an unfortunate donkey, one bitter night of the winter alluded to. The soldiers were found at the hour of their relief, as it is called, with their muskets shouldered, standing as stiff and erect at their post at the palace gate, as when their corporal had planted them. The honest donkey was found standing across the path in the Boulevards at day-break, with his tail straight on end, as rigid as a bar! In his death the poor old fellow retained his wonted look of patience and contentment so completely, that the people, thinking him still alive, drubbed him soundly as they passed, for being in the way."

In an interesting chapter on the traces of revolutionary tempests that have passed over Paris, we find, in some little facts, a curious and graphic illustration of some great things:

"In the famous wardrobe of the cathedral of Notre Dame I remember, when Napoleon was a prisoner at St. Helena, seeing the robes in which he had been crowned. With the most extraordinary want of what may be called historical taste, the restored Bourbon family had ordered that the innumerable bees, with which it had pleased Buonaparte to have his robes, should be picked out! In a similar spirit, the same of some other emblem of the empire was carefully removed from a magnificent carpet of the Gobelin manufacture, used to cover the floor of one of the principal rooms of the Tuileries. In their place had been substituted, of course, a set of fleur-de-lis, the ancient device of the Bourbon line. These held their places till the fierce lustre of the glorieuses Journees burnt up the lilies of Charles X. in France, that is to say, in Paris, which is France, just as Constantinople is Turkey, whatever the geography books may say to the contrary. As soon as the bustle of the 'Revolution of July' was well over, and the elder branch of the Bourbons expatriated, the fleur-de-lis, the ancient symbol of so much royal renown, was held in so much abhorrence that the poor carpet was once more packed off to the Gobelins, where I saw a party of workmen actually employed in taking out the lilies and substituting stars in their place."

And in connection with the revolution of July, some noticeable things are mentioned:—

"I must mention one very curious musket-shot, the effect of which, for aught I know, may exist to this hour, ten years after the event, for I saw it in 1836, five years and a half after it had been fired, though in a spot where one would have least expected to meet with such things. It is on that side of the statue gallery of the Louvre which faces the north, and looks into the Place de l'Oratoire, where the division between the pillars is filled up with plate glass. A musket-ball, fired from the court, having entered one of the windows, and crossed the aisle or side gallery, had penetrated the sheet of glass. The velocity must have been considerable, otherwise the plate must have been shattered to pieces, instead of which a clean round hole has been pierced through it, encircled by a set of rays streaming from it as a centre in a manner well worthy of observation, independently of the historical interest of the accident. Most fortunately, this shot, though fired, probably, with no such consideration, threaded its way among the statues without touching any one of them; and we shudder to think how much mischief a small deviation in its course might have effected! Had it struck that well known statue, so dear to every papa, in which Silenus is dandling the infant Bacchus, or, worse still, had it injured the exquisite Milo Venus, how much more lasting would our regrets have been at the violence committed during that transient but fierce revolution."

From Captain Hall's Sicilian voyages we give one delightful extract. It is impossible to imagine a piece of description, in which every thing tells to an effect in such exquisite keeping with the scene described:—

"Towards evening we stretched across from Reggio to Messina, of which pretty city we had a fine moonlight view. We passed so near to the shore that we could hear the voices of the boys bawling in the streets, the dogs baying the moon, and lastly, at nine o'clock, the drums of the garrison setting the watch. By this time it had fallen quite calm, with a heavy dew settling on every thing. Overhead hung so clear and starlight a sky that we lingered on deck till late enjoying the mysterious kind of view which a great town seen by moon-light always presents, especially if it be built on steep ground, with high mountains behind it, all cut, as those of Sicily are, into deep glens, with intervening ridges richly clad with cultivation, and spangled with country houses, the pleasure-seats of the more wealthy citizens. As we leaned over the vessel's quarter, admiring this beautiful prospect, we caught the first breath of the land wind which was beginning to waft us gently along. The sails scarcely bulged out, the rich perfume of the orange flower came drifting off to us, and we thought every soul in Messina must be asleep, and that we alone were awake to enjoy the night. Suddenly a loud crash from the bells of all the churches altered the whole character of the scene, and gave life to what but the instant before had seemed buried in the deepest repose."

From the Scottish reminiscences, we shall borrow only this:—

"Although the whole length of Glencoe may be about ten miles, we counted in it only three cottages; nor could we imagine where the rest, if any, were situated. This absence of human habitations lends additional melancholy to the scene,—making it seem as if the slaughter of the clan, who dwelled in it nearly a century and a half ago, had rendered the spot uninhabitable."

Through the greater part of the third volume, the subject of Sicily is continued, with some very valuable details and descriptions connected with the phenomena of Mount Etna. We shall confine ourselves, however, to two more extracts.

One is the mention of Smollet's tomb at Leghorn:—

"What interested me most in the burying-ground at Leghorn was the tomb of a brother sailor, Smollet, though I was rather provoked to find it scribbled all over with the signatures and trashy remarks of innumerable tourists, who seemed to imagine that by hooking on their unknown names and insignificant compositions, both in prose and verse, to the shrine of the poet, they too might have a chance of some touch of distinction. As it did not strike me at first that this disfigurement of a great author's monument is really one of the best compliments that can be paid to his renown, I turned to the sexton, and in the impulse of the moment promised him a few pauls if he would clear away all these impertinent additions. Before we had left the ground he had procured a bucket of water and a bit of marble, with which he had effectually restored the stone to its original brightness. Till then it did not occur to me that I had missed the true point, and, by thus assimilating Smollet's tomb to those around it, had in fact lessened the only distinction which such things are capable of conferring on the memory of the dead."

And the other is a description of some manuscripts, recently discovered in the library of the Falconieri family at Rome, which illustrates disputed points in the life and fortunes of Tasso:

"Among the papers we have the originals of several autograph letters of his, most of them dated, I think, in 1572. Tasso, if I recollect rightly, was born in 1544, and died in 1595. There is also one very interesting letter addressed to the Duke of Ferrara, which is curious from its having been the proximate cause of his imprisonment. In it he improbably makes some allusion to his attachment; and the whole secret, of which this unfortunate letter gave the clue, was then let out by the treachery of a page who, happening to get hold of a book of Tasso's manuscript poetry, tore out the half of one of the leaves on which there was written, in his own hand, lines enough to convict him of the crime of love in a quarter to which the poet, then unknown to high fame, and merely the retained servant of the proud lord, ought not, it seems, to have cast his eyes. What is in the highest degree singular is, that one of these manuscripts is the actual half leaf which convicted the culprit, and it, as well as the above-mentioned letter, are docketed by the duke himself. He says that, 'as Torquato seems to be mad, it is fit that he should be sent to an hospital to be duly purified.'"

"So he was ordered to prison; but it appears that Leonora gained intelligence of the impending mischief, and wrote to advise Tasso to fly from the court. This affectionate letter reproaches her lover with this excessive want of ordinary discretion, and advises him to get away as fast as he can. Although he appears to have been the simplest creature on the face of the earth, and totally ignorant of the ways of a court, he had yet sense enough to take such a hint as this and fly. By this means he evaded Alfonso's anger for nearly two years, when he indiscreetly returned, being impelled by motives which are abundantly obvious in this correspondence."

"There occur in this collection numerous characteristic traits of all the parties concerned in these intrigues—very trivial in themselves, but which the renown of Tasso invests with a high degree of importance. One day Tasso having, it would seem, been struck by some piece of embroidery done by Leonora's sister, she made him a present of it, and he, as in poetical duty bound, wrote her a copy of verses on the occasion, the original of which, in his hand-writing, forms one of Count Alberti's papers. Leonora, on reading them, felt, or affected to feel, a little jealous of this transaction, and playfully scolded the poet for his defective allegiance. Upon this he indites a sonnet beseeching her to embroider for him the cover of a book which she was then reading. She of course complies, and we saw the letter accompanying the gift, as well as the gift itself, which bears on one of its blank pages an inscription in Tasso's own hand-writing, declaring that he would never part with it till his latest breath. The book is Boccaccio's Essay or Treatise on Woman, which I am told (for I never saw it except on this occasion) is a sharp satire on the sex. In Leonora's note accompanying the present, she alludes to the subject of the book in very lively terms, calling her own conduct truly evangelical, inasmuch as by treating him in this way, she obeys the gospel precept of returning good for evil. The book is a pocket volume, very neatly embroidered on the outside. Within, on the first blank page, there is a sonnet, in Tasso's writing, in praise of the lady and her workmanship, which, he declares, far beats that of the spider, which, seeing it, is struck dumb. 'Nevertheless,' he goes on to say, 'the web of love, which is thrown over his heart, though still finer than either, is quite strong enough to bind him for ever.'"

"Count Alberti showed us Tasso's copy of Virgil, of which the margins are filled with annotations in his hand-writing. One passage was pointed out in which Virgil indulges in some reflections upon courts and courtiers. This has given occasion to Tasso to add a note of great asperity against princes. There is also a well-thumbed and scribbled-over copy of Polybius, and another of Livy on some military matters, which it is probable Tasso had studied closely, that he might acquire a knowledge of battles and sieges while composing his Jerusalem Delivered."

From all which it would seem that the grand poet was really beloved, and not merely tolerated, by the great Lady Leonora. This had been on very good grounds suspected, but we do not think it was capable of direct proof before the recovery of these papers.

We should not omit to say that this book concludes with some remarks of considerable interest on matters connected with the author's profession. On all these no one has better claims to be heard than Captain Basil Hall.

SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED MEN.

(Written for the New World, by the Author of 'Random Recollections,' 'The Great Metropolis,' 'Portraits of Public Characters,' &c.)

COMMODORE NAPIER.

What man could be named, I should like to know, more deserving of a place in my portrait gallery, than the gallant sailor whose recent brilliant exploits in the East, are the theme of every tongue and the subject of universal admiration? The Commodore is a native of Stirlingshire, in Scotland, and still retains his northern accent as strongly as if he had only quitted the land of "moor and mountain" a few months ago. He is a singularly kind-hearted, good-natured man. There is an openness and manifest sincerity in his manner, which renders him a favorite the moment you are introduced to him. He has no lofty opinion of himself: he appears as if unconscious that he had ever done any thing out of the common way, or which merits distinction. Like Lord Nelson, he knows not what fear is. He is quite as cool and collected in the heat of conflict, and when the roar of cannon is reverberating in his ears, as if he were sitting in his own cabin, smoking his pipe and quaffing his grog before going to bed.

I have said that Commodore Napier is an open-hearted, straight-forward man. The remark, however, only applies to his conduct in his private or individual capacity. In all matters appertaining to the naval service, he preserves a rigid secrecy, even from his most intimate acquaintances. Even when they suspect, from his motions, that he has some great enterprise in contemplation, and endeavor to learn what that enterprise is by putting ingenious questions to him, he invariably preserves his own secret. Previous to his undertaking the expedition to Portugal, where he performed such brilliant exploits, his more intimate acquaintances shrewdly suspected that he was about to be engaged in active and important service, and, anxious to ascertain what it was, used to put the question to him—"Napier, come, do tell us what you are going to be about." His uniform answer was, "You shall hear by-and-by." It is generally understood that he conceals all his intended military movements even from the nearest and dearest members of his own family.

The Commodore has on several occasions been a candidate for a seat in the Legislature. In 1833, he contested the representation of Portsmouth, in the Tory interest. In the course of his canvass, in answer to the question who he was, he gave the following rich and racy account of himself and his public services:

"In the course of my canvass," said the gallant officer, "I have been asked who I am?—I'll tell you. I am Captain Charles Napier, who five-and-twenty years ago commanded the Recruit brig, in the West Indies, and who had the honor of being twenty-four hours under the guns of three French line-of-battle ships, flying from a British squadron, the nearest of which with the exception of the Hawk brig, was from five to six miles astern: the greatest part of the time I kept flying double-shotted broadsides into them. One of these ships, the Hautpolt, only was captured by the Pompey and Caster; the other two escaped by superior sailing. Sir Alexander Cochrane, my commander-in-chief, promoted me on the spot into her. At the siege of Martinique, the Æolus, Cleopatra, and Recruit, were ordered to beat up in the night, between Pigeon Island and the main, and anchor close to Fort Edward; the enemy, fearing an attack, burnt their shipping. At daylight in the morning, it appeared to me that Port Edward was abandoned; this, however, was doubted; I offered to ascertain the fact, and with five men landed in open day, scaled the walls, and planted the union jack. Fortunately, I was undiscovered from Fort Bourbon, which stood about one hundred yards off, and commanded it. On this being reported to Sir Alexander Cochrane, a regiment was landed in the night, Fort Edward was taken possession of, and the mortars turned against the enemy. I am in possession of a letter from Sir A. Cochrane, saying that 'my conduct was the means of saving many lives, and of shortening the siege of Martinique.' I had once the misfortune of receiving a precious licking from a French corvette; the first shot she fired broke my thigh, and a plumper carried away my mainmast. The enemy escaped, but the English flag was not tarnished. On my return to England in command of the Jason, I was turned out of her by a Tory Admiralty, because I had not interest; but as I could not lead an idle life, I served a campaign with the army in Portugal as a volunteer, when I was again wounded. At the battle of Busaco, I had the honor of carrying off the field my gallant friend and relative, Colonel Napier, now near me, who was shot in the face. Busaco was not the only field where he shed his blood; at Corunna he was left for dead, but thank God, he escaped with six wounds. On my return to England I was appointed to the Thames, in the Mediterranean; and if I could bring the inhabitants of the Neapolitan coast into the room, they would tell you that from Naples to the Faro point there was not a spot where I did not leave my mark, and brought off with me upwards of one hundred sail of gun-boats and merchant vessels. I had the honor of running the Thames and Furcate into the small mole of Ponza, which was strongly defended, and before they could recover from their surprise, I captured the island without the loss of a man. I was then removed to the Euryalus, and had the good fortune to fall in with two French frigates and a schooner. I chased them in the night close into Calvi, in the island of Corsica, passing close under the stern of one, plumpering her as I passed; and though we were going eight knots, I tried to run aboard of her consort, who was a little outside standing athwart my hawse; the night was dark, the land close, and she succeeded in crossing me, but I drove her ashore on the rocks, where she was totally wrecked, and her consort was obliged to anchor close to her. The Euryalus then wore round and got off, almost brushing the shore as she passed. These two ships were afterwards ascertained to be armes en suite, mounted 22 guns each, and the schooner 14. From the Mediterranean I was ordered to America; and if my gallant friend Sir James Gordon was here, he would have told you how I did my duty on that long and arduous service up the Potomac: he would have told you that in a tremendous squall the Euryalus lost her bowsprit and all her topmasts, and that in two hours she was again ready for work. We brought away a fleet from Alexandria, were attacked going down the river by batteries, built close to what was the residence of the great Washington, and I was again wounded in that action in the neck. On the peace taking place I went on half-pay, where I remained till I was appointed to the Galatea, which ship I commanded for three years on this station; and I hope and trust that I have faithfully done my duty during that period to my king and country."

From the peculiarity of his manner in company, a stranger would conclude that he is a man who is guided in all his actions by the impulses of the moment: you could not come to a more erroneous conclusion; for though seemingly a person who had abandoned himself to the inspirations of the instant, everything he does is the result of the deepest forethought. He lays his plans, in their leading features, beforehand, with the most scrupulous care; and anticipates and provides for contingencies which may arise to defeat him, with a certainty which amounts to a species of intuition.

Nor is the genius of Commodore Napier limited to the laying down of those plans which hold out the greatest probability of his being able to accomplish his purposes; he is equally happy in carrying into practical effect the schemes which he has devised. He hesitates in such cases at no personal sacrifices; he deems no employment too degrading for him provided he can thereby further the object he has in view. He does when occasion requires it, what very few commanders could undertake to do without diminishing their authority over their men, namely, engage personally in doing the work of the common sailors, and for a time identifying himself as closely with them in conversation and conduct as if he had all his life been the humblest man that ever paced the deck, or mounted the shrouds. Of this he furnished a memorable proof during the recent siege of St. Jean d'Acre. There he was to be seen, with his coat off and his shirt sleeves tucked up, toiling away at the lowest and hardest description of labor in which the allied forces found it necessary on that occasion to engage. And not only was the gallant officer to be seen toiling as if his own life had depended on his labor, at the humblest and hardest work consequent on that engagement, but he displayed a sort of temporary ubiquity. He was to be seen at all places, and engaged in all sorts of manual labor at once.

Commodore Napier is a man of singularly plain and unsophisticated manners on shore as well as at sea. Nothing affords him greater pleasure than to meet with some old acquaintances, however humble in circumstances—especially if they were the companions of his early life—in the streets of Portsmouth, or any other place. If he should happen to meet at the same moment with an old acquaintance and the first nobleman in the land, in any of our public thoroughfares, he would give an unhesitating preference to an interchange of friendship with the former. In our leading government sea-ports, he is known to "the inhabitants generally" by the frequency with which he is to be seen giving a pinch of snuff to the jolly tars he meets in the streets, out of the valuable gold box, richly studded with brilliants, which Don Pedro presented to him some years ago, in testimony of his sense of the service which the gallant gentleman rendered to the liberal cause in Portugal.

His mode of dressing, and personal appearance, are as much out of the beaten path as his manners are eccentric. His carelessness in the article of dressing borders on slovenliness. When in this country, his head is encircled by a broad-brimmed, low-crowned, worn-out hat, which he always wears in such a way as would lead the uninitiated to conclude, that he intended it for the protection of his shoulders rather than for the convenience or ornament of the more elevated part of his person. When at sea, and in warm latitudes, he is partial to a straw chapeau, the brim of which is of such ample proportions as to serve the purpose of an umbrella, or rather of a parasol, to protect him from the inconveniences of a burning sun.

On several occasions during his recent service in the East, he was to be seen astride a donkey—one that on some occasions too, "wouldn't go"—with his straw hat hanging over his shoulders, without cravat, waistcoat, or neckerchief, while his shirt sleeves were tucked up to his shoulders. The reader will readily imagine, what a picture it must have been to see the gallant Commodore on such occasions.

The aspect of his countenance is singular. In his dark brown eyes there is an extraordinary expression of wildness mingled with energy of purpose. His features are large and marked. The form of his countenance is more than usually circular; his complexion is dark, and his hair, though here and there exhibiting symptoms of a coming greyish color, is still essentially black. In size he is slightly below the middle height, and of a hardy, compact make. He was born in 1786, and is consequently in his fifty-fifth year.

A LETTER FROM SCOTLAND.

Burns's Highland Mary—Her Grave—The Birth-place of Burns—Alloway Kirk—Burns's Monument—The Brig o' Doon.
Glasgow, 8th November, 1840.

MY DEAR J.: I am approaching classic ground—the land of Burns. I know from your admiration of the great poet of Nature, that you will be pleased to look, even through my dim eyes, upon the cottage where first he saw the light of this world; upon the monument that has been raised by his admirers to his genius; upon the two Brigs of Ayr; upon Alloway Kirk, of Tam O'Shanter notoriety; upon the Banks and Braes o' bonny Doon, &c. And first, you remember my mentioning, in one of my Lectures on Scottish Song, that Burns's Highland Mary had died in Greenock, on her return from a visit to her friends previous to her marriage with the poet, and that her remains, her mortal remains, had been laid in an obscure nook in the Greenock churchyard—yes, you do, and also of my repeating the exquisite lines "To Mary in Heaven"—which a few of your countrymen, whose praise was no mean compliment, professed themselves not displeased with—I might add, your countrywomen too: at least two of them.

Well, I yesterday paid a visit to the grave of Highland Mary, in company with the Misses Smith, whom I have before mentioned to you, nieces of the dowager Countess of Essex, and whom I hope you will have the pleasure of seeing in New-York on some occasion when days are brighter than they have been. The grave was pointed out to us by the old grave-digger, a curious-looking old fish, who looked as black as if he had just been spouted forth from the nether regions—he had a right eye, and an apology for a left one, but that is not saying much for all that is left of it—and rather a humorous expression in his countenance. There is no stone to tell Mary's story, as one would naturally expect there might be—but there is a general one of her family, pointing out the "bit of ground" where her father's bairns are laid. I asked old Vulcan if he was certain that was the spot.

"Ay," said he, "this is it I'm standing on—she lies just under this—there's her head, and there's her feet—I buried her myself."

I have no doubt as to its being the grave, but I think he must be mistaken as to his having buried her, for he cannot have been a digger of graves since Mary was buried. He said, "They did not use to think any more of her than other folk till about twenty years ago, when they began to make an unco wark about her—and they're speaking o' pitting' up a monument till her the noo."

I could not help recalling to my memory the sorrowful parting of Mary and Burns, when they were doomed ne'er to meet again. I saw them before my eyes, swearing eternal faith to each other, on each side of the gurgling stream—I saw him give her the Bible—I saw them part—I repeated the exquisite lines—"Thou lingering star,"—a tear trickled down my cheek—a tribute to such sad sweet memories. "We turned and left the spot," and wended our way among the little hillocks, each containing dust dear to fame—the heavy gate closed, and we were once more in the busy streets, where one would suppose death never walks.

8th Nov.—Yesterday I arrived in Ayr, which Burns says "ilkither town surpasses, for honest men and bonny lasses," and to-day I and the rest of the party went to view those places in the neighborhood which have been rendered classic by the magic pen of Robert Burns. Our first visit was to the cottage about two miles and a half from Ayr—the auld clay biggin' where the poet first saw the light. It is kept by an honest old couple, John Gowdie and his wife, who have been in it for the last thirty-nine years; precious to which they kept a small public house at Doonside, in the vicinity, John being the miller of Doonside, and a crony of the poet's. He told me it was in this house he last saw Burns—he met him, he said, at some distance from the mill, and the poet returned with him to his own house, where they drank "three gills o' whiskey thegither;" but "we were a good while about it, amais twa hours, and folk could get fou, if they liket, at little expence in these days."

I asked him if Burns often got fou. "No," he said, "I never saw him the worse of drink—he was unco fond of meeting a few shields and haeing a crack, but he did not drink much—he used to sit rather dull, with his hands upon his knees till something excited him, and then he would speak away like a pen-gun." John said, if Burns were alive, he was just be twa years aulder than himsel. I asked the gudewife if she had ever seen Burns's Bonnie Jean.

"Deed sir," she said, "I'll no tell you a lee—I never saw her—she cam to the cottage one day wi' the poet, and I'm sorry to say I was in the toon that day, and mis'd seeing her—but," she said, as if to make her not having seen her of as little consequence as possible, "I believe she was no very bonny, for a' that—she had a nice leg and ankle, and a fine pair o' black e'en, and a very gude figure, but the folk tould me she was na very bonny."

In one of the apartments of the cottage is the famous portrait by Nasmyth, which John assured me was very like the poet—there are also two tables, as completely covered over with names and initials of persons from all quarters of the globe, as if they were specimens of carved work. We had a very long chat with John and his wife—the latter much excelled her husband in volubility of tongue, but John excelled us all in the relish with which he swallowed glass after glass of his own Campbellton whiskey, with which we regaled him. His good dame said, "Puir body, he couldna live without it. We partook of some Scotch cake made from oats raised by themselves on the farm that was once Burns's father's; and with the adieus and good wishes of John and his wife ringing in our ears, we hied us on to see the Monument. I must not forget to tell you, though, that as we were within hearing of the gushing of the Doon, the Misses Smith warbled forth "Ye banks and braes o' bonny Doon," and I gave "Of a' the airts the wia' can blaw," with which the old couple seemed not a little pleased.

On our way to the Monument, we stopped at Alloway Kirk, of which nothing now remains but the bare walls, which are in tolerable preservation: at the east end the old bell still hangs, with a piece of chain attached to it, by which, in days of old it was tolled. I was surprised to find the Kirk so small, and could not help fancying that Auld Cloutie, sitting in the "winnock bunker in the east," and the witches about him, had but little room for their midnight revelries. Its style of architecture is that usually yeclipt bairns, being nothing but four plain bare walls. Burns, however, has rendered it more famous by his genius than the most splendid architectural design could have done. Its little churchyard is studded with tombstones, among which is one over the remains of Burns's father, William Burns, and containing the tribute to his memory which is found in the works of the bard. At the distance of a very few yards, we entered upon the grounds surrounding the Monument, which are most tastefully laid out: The Monument is every elegant, and beautifully situated, and commands from its summit a most extensive view, embracing many of the spots rendered classic by the poet. I need not attempt to describe it to you, as I think I have seen it in your own house in some of your books of views. In the monument there is a copy of Nasmyth's picture of the poet, and in a grotto close by are the two statues—by the self-taught sculptor Thom, now in America—of Tam o'Shanter and Souter Johnnie.

I went on a little farther to the auld brig o' Doon, where Tam o'Shanter's gude grey mare Meg was deprived of her tail by Cutty Sark, and I possessed myself with some difficulty of a stone from the famous brig, and I now have it among other curiosities. The situation is romantic and beautiful, deriving, of course, additional romance and beauty from its connection with Burns; for it is impossible to listen to the meanderings of the bonny Doon, as it gurgles on, without fancying to one's self that there Burns wandered in propria persona, and called into existence some of his most exquisite lyrics; and when standing on the Auld Brig o' Doon, it does not require a great stretch of imagination to see Tam spurring on his mare, and looking over his shoulder, at the witch, as she docked the tail of poor Meg. There is now a new brig over the Doon, some hundred yards below the old one, and at the end of which, next the Monument, an excellent inn has been erected, having a view from its windows of all the noted places—the cottage where he was born—Alloway Kirk—the Monument—the Auld Brig o' Doon—the auld house at Doon side, where he used to meet his cronies sometimes—the tree—the last of a cluster where was

The cairn

Where hunters found the murdered bairn, and also the well, which trickles down and gushes into the door, where, it is said in Tam o'Shanter, "Mungo's mother hanged herself."

The public are indebted for this inn, and for the beauty with which the grounds around the inn and monument are laid out, to the enthusiasm and enterprize of Mr. David Auld, who first encouraged Thom to commence his well-known statues, and supplied him with the means to finish them. He has erected a cottage for himself, on the banks of the Doon, just opposite the river, which is laid out with great taste, having beautiful and romantic walks on the river's side. An old quarry-hole he has transmogrified into an elegant pond, overshadowed by birks and pines, and tenanted by a pair of fine, majestic-looking swans, by ducks, &c., and at the one end of it there is a magnificent grotto, covered with shells of all descriptions, very tastefully displayed. The walls inside are also covered with shells, and so are the seats; and to add to its beauty, there are mirrors in every corner. It is the place of all others, where, on a summer's day, one might puff away time with Havana or Principe cigars, with a mint julap or a sherry cobbler to give them a zest, and a good friend like yourself to talk of the cares, cankers, troubles, turmoils, pleasures and pains of the busy world without.

The day was remarkably fine, and although the trees were rest of their summer clothing, which was scattered around in myriads of withered leaves, yet the sky was clear, and the sun shone brightly, the air was balmy, and as pleasant as a day in November could well be in this northern region—every thing, in fact, tended to make our first visit to the land of Burns one of unqualified delight.

We returned to Ayr in great spirits, full of Burns, of whose eventful life every particular epoch seemed to start up before me with peculiar freshness. We ended the day at the festive board of Dr. Memes, the Rector of the Academy in Ayr, a first rate scholar and gentleman, an enthusiastic admirer of Burns, and the husband of the sister of one of my oldest chums.

AMERICAN ORATORS AND STATESMEN.

Botta, the Italian, who, in his "History of the American Revolution," has thrown the arguments for and against the Declaration of Independence into the form of harangues, after the manner of the historians of antiquity, makes Lee and Dickinson the champions of their respective parties. Lee certainly moved the resolutions, but Jefferson says, "the colossus of that Congress, the great pillar of support to the Declaration, and its ablest advocate on the floor of the House, was John Adams," who poured forth his passionate appeals in language which "moved his hearers from their seats." It was a bold measure to attempt an imitation, but this has been done by Mr. Webster, artistically interweaving the few original expressions which have been retained. We will quote a few sentences:

"Let us, then, bring before us the assembly which was about to decide a question thus big with the fate of empire. Let us open their doors, and look in upon their deliberations. Let us survey the anxious and care-worn countenances, let us hear the firm-toned voices of this band of patriots."

Hancock presides over the solemn sitting; and one of those not yet prepared to pronounce for absolute independence is on the floor, and is urging his reasons for dissenting from the declaration.

"It was for Mr. Adams to reply to arguments like these. We know his opinions, and we know his character. He would commence with his accustomed directness and earnestness—

"Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart to this vote. It is true, indeed, that in the beginning we aimed not at independence; but there is a Divinity which shapes our ends. The injustice of England has driven us to arms; and, blinded to her own interest for our good, she has obstinately persisted, till independence is now within our grasp. We have but to reach forth to it, and it is ours. Why then should we defer the declaration? For myself, having twelve months ago, in this place, moved you that George Washington be appointed commander of the forces, raised or to be raised, for defence of American liberty, may my right hand forget her cunning, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I hesitate or waver in the support I give him! The war, then, must go on. We must fight it through. And if the war must go on, why put off longer the Declaration of Independence?"

"Sir, I knew the uncertainty of human affairs; but I see, I see clearly, through this day's business. You and I, indeed, may rue it. We may not live to the time when this declaration shall be made good. We may die! die colonists! die slaves! die, it may be, ignominiously, and on the scaffold! Be it so—be it so. If it be the pleasure of Heaven that my country shall require the poor offering of my life, the victim shall be ready at the appointed hour of sacrifice, come when that hour may. But while I do live, let me have a country, or at least the hope of a country, and that a free country.

"But whatever may be our fate, be assured, be assured, that this declaration will stand. It may cost treasure, and it may cost blood; but it will stand, and it will richly compensate for both. Through the thick gloom of the present I see the brightness of the future as the sun in heaven. We shall make this a glorious, an immortal day. When we are in our graves, our children will honor it. They will celebrate it, with thanksgiving, with festivity, with bonfires, and illuminations. On its annual return they will shed tears, copious, gushing tears—not of subjection and slavery, not of agony and distress, but of exultation, of gratitude, and of joy. Sir, before God, I believe the hour is come. My judgement approves this measure, and my whole heart is in it. All that I have, and all that I am, and all that I hope in this life, I am now ready here to stake upon it; and I leave off as I began, that, live or die, survive or perish, I am for the declaration. It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God it shall be my dying sentiment; independence now—and INDEPENDENCE FOR EVER!"

The first sentence of the speech here given to Adams is from his declaration to the attorney-general for Massachusetts in 1774: "The die is now cast. I have passed the Rubicon. To sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish with my country, is my unalterable determination." The passage would be materially improved by leaving out the words "survive or perish;" but a leaning toward pleonasm is one great defect of American style, as we may subsequently have occasion to point out.

Prior to his appearance in Congress, Adams had obtained great celebrity at the bar. He defended Captain Preston, prosecuted for firing on the people in 1770; and, throwing all petty considerations and prejudices aside, called on the jury "to be deaf, deaf as adders, to the clamors of the populace." Captain Preston was acquitted; and the circumstance is often mentioned as a proof of the inherent sense of justice among the people of the United States. But is it quite clear that they retain as a nation all the good qualities which distinguished them as a British colony? Were the ringleaders of the Baltimore mob, who murdered the printer of a newspaper which opposed a war with England in 1812, convicted or acquitted? Or if the slave-owners had tarred and feathered Miss Martineau, and sent her to keep company with wild turkeys, as they threatened, could any southern jury have been persuaded to find them guilty of an assault?

Two other famous speakers of the ante-revolutionary period were John Rutledge and James Otis. The latter argued the great question of writs of assistance (a sort of general warrant) in 1761; and his speech is thus described in one of John Adams's letters:—"Otis was a flame of fire! With a promptitude of classical allusion, a depth of research, a rapid summary of historical events and dates, a profusion of legal authorities, a prophetic glance of his eye into futurity, and a rapid torrent of impetuous eloquence, he hurried away all before him. American independence was then and there born. Every man of an immense crowded audience appeared to me to go away, as I did, ready to take arms against writs of assistance." Jefferson was struck in precisely the same manner by Henry, and gives him credit for the same description of effect. We may split the difference, by supposing that Otis then laid the embers which Henry afterwards lighted and flung abroad.

This is all worth repeating that we have been able to collect regarding the ante-revolutionary epoch, and we gladly pass on to a period which offers something more substantial than scattered allusions to argue from. Common Rumor is an indispensable witness in an inquiry like the present. With all her hundred-tongued propensity to fibbing, she must be put into the box; and our first care was to learn from the most enlightened Americans of our acquaintance, which, according to the popular estimate, were generally regarded as the best speakers of their time. The following is a carefully collated list of the chief names that have been forwarded to us with satisfactory testimonials:

Alexander Hamilton, Fisher Ames, John Quincy Adams, Josiah Quincy, Rufus King, Samuel Dexter, Chief Justice Marshall, John Wells, Thomas Emmett, (the Irish barrister), Harrison Grey Otis, John Randolph, William Wirt, Joseph Hopkinson, Horace Binney, Luther Martin, William Plankney, Robert Harper, Robert Hayne, James Madison, James Bayard, William Preston, Joseph Story, Henry Clay, John Calhoun, Daniel Webster, and Edward Everett.

It is a remarkable fact that the whole of these are lawyers by profession except the last. The order in which they are here named means nothing; and it may be as well to say that no just conclusion can be drawn from the preference we may accord, or the comparative space we may devote to any of them, in our remarks and quotations.

Lord Brougham, in his Dissertation on the Eloquence of the Ancients, says that public speaking among them bore a more important share in the conduct of affairs, and filled a larger space in the eye of the people, than it does now, or indeed ever can again. He afterwards alludes to their interest in oratorical displays as sources of recreation; but it seems to have escaped his attention that "the orators" formed a class distinct from the public men in general, and were more frequently the disturbers than the rulers of the state. Thus Plutarch, in the Life of Phocion, says—"For as princes divert themselves at their meals with buffoons and jesters, so the Athenians attended to the polite and agreeable address of their orators merely by way of entertainment; but when the question was concerning so important a business as the command of their forces, they returned to sober and serious thinking." &c. For this reason it was said that Demosthenes was the fine orator, and Phocion the more persuasive speaker—Phocion, who, when his opinion once happened to be received with universal applause, turned to his friends and asked, "Have I inadvertently let slip something wrong?"

The good sense of mankind has established the same distinction in all countries,—even under a democracy like that of the United States, where, from the undue prevalence of the talking profession, it might be thought that the assembly or the forum afforded the only legitimate means of influence. The name of Jefferson, for example, does not appear upon our list; yet who has played a more important part? The fact is, his voice, weak at best, became guttural and inarticulate in moments of high excitement, and the consciousness of this infirmity prevented him from risking his reputation in debate; though, judging from the productions of his pen, he possessed all except the physical qualifications of an orator. Washington, again, was wont to exercise much the same sort of influence as the Duke of Wellington has long exercised in this country. He delivered his opinion in a few pithy sentences, written or spoken, and the mere declaimers subsided into insignificance. It is remarkable, too, that the patriotic exertions of these great men were generally directed against the same class of politicians—namely, those who sought to gain the favor of the people by relaxing the reins of government and weakening the foundations of authority.*

It is related of Washington, at the conclusion of his campaign against the Indians, that, having to appear before the assembly of Virginia and return thanks for a complimentary vote, he got confused, and was unable to go on. "Sit down, Mr. Washington," said the Speaker; "your modesty is equal to your valor; and that surpasses the power of any language that I possess." He afterwards, however, acquired the power of expressing himself without embarrassment; and when Patrick Henry was asked in 1774 who was the first man in Congress, he replied: "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, is by far the greatest orator; but if you speak of solid information and sound judgement, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor."

* Even amongst those who take rank as orators, there may be some whose speeches possess few attractions in a rhetorical point of view, though grave, dignified, replete with thought and knowledge, and admirably adapted both to the subject-matter and the time. Those of Alexander Hamilton, the most consummate statesman ever "raised" in America, pre-eminently belong to this category. "There is not an element of order, strength, and durability in the constitution of the United States," says M. Guizot, "which he did not powerfully contribute to introduce into the scheme, and cause to be adopted."

What the reader naturally looks for in specimens is the striking metaphor, the happy illustration, the biting sarcasm, the graceful irony, the bold invective, the vehement apostrophe—something, in short, of the stimulating or exciting kind; and these are not always to be found in the models of clear statement or the correctest trains of reasoning. At the same time, it would be unfair in the extreme to infer the absence of statesmanship from the presence or even abundance of these qualities. Fire and fancy are not incompatible with truth and wisdom; or, as Lord Chatham once said in answer to Mr. Pelham—

"What the gentlemen on the other side mean by long harangues or flowers of rhetoric, I shall not pretend to determine; but if they make use of nothing of the kind, it is no very good argument of their sincerity, because a man who speaks from his heart and is sincerely affected with the subject upon which he speaks, as every honest man must be when he speaks in the cause of his country, such a man, I say, falls naturally into expressions which may be called flowers of rhetoric, and therefore deserves as little to be charged with affectation as the most stupid serjeant-at-law that ever spoke for a half-guinea fee."

We have now, it is to be hoped, said enough to escape the risk of wounding the self-love of any irritable individual of the most irritable nation in the world. To save the trouble of frequent repetition, we will next briefly explain the nature of the great party-topics on which the larger, if not the better, half of American eloquence has been expended.

No sooner were the United States recognized as a nation than the powers vested in Congress during the war were found utterly insufficient for the purposes of peace. The British government, perhaps not sorry to mortify the new state, refused to sign a treaty till they were increased. A project of a constitution was accordingly submitted to a convention of delegates of 1787, and, after a warm discussion, adopted by the majority. The most enlightened and (with two or three exceptions) most distinguished statesmen strongly advocated the expediency of giving the largest power to the supreme central authorities. The men of local influence, backed by the lower class, struggled hard to maintain the supremacy of the provincial legislatures, on which the popular voice could be brought to bear with full effect. The views of the former were explained in a series of letters called The Federalist. This gave a name to the party; and Federalist and Anti-Federalist were thenceforward the designations of the two grand divisions into which the entire country was split. Jay, Madison, and Hamilton were the chief leaders of the Federalists, who had also the support of Washington. The principal speaker on the other side was Patrick Henry, but their real leader was Jefferson, then absent on a diplomatic mission. The Federalists leaned towards aristocracy and England, the Anti-Federalists towards democracy and France. "Thus," says M. Guizot, in the little tract already quoted—in our humble opinion the best thing he ever wrote—"the controversy between them involved the social as well as the political order of things—the very constitution of society as well as its government. Thus the supreme, eternal questions, which have agitated and will ever agitate the world, and which are connected with the far higher problem of the nature and the destiny of man, all lay at stake between the parties into which the American community was divided, and were all concealed under their designations."

When the constitution was discussed, the parties were so equally divided, that the decision often hung upon a vote. But after the death of Washington the popular party rapidly gained ground, and the election of Jefferson to the Presidency, in 1801, was the crowning triumph of democracy. His friends then took the name of Democrats or Republicans.

* Many other points of analogy will be suggested by a perusal of the inestimable and (in some measure) parallel compilations of Col. Gurwood and Mr. Sparks.

† Washington. By M. Guizot. Translated by Henry Reeve, Esq. 1840.

The name of Federalist continued till a much later period; but in 1821, when John Quincy Adams was elected President, it was changed for that of National Republicans, and about the same period the democrats who opposed him began to be called Jackson-men. In 1834 both parties were baptised anew. The old federalists, or aristocrats, were christened Whigs; and the Democrats (who supported Van Buren) Tories—which had been regarded as a term of opprobrium ever since the revolution, when the adherents of the mother-country were so called. Some of these new Tories had a meeting at Tammany Hall, New York: the lamps being accidentally extinguished, the hall was re-lighted by Locofoco (Lucifer) matches, and thus arose the term Locafocos, by which the ultra-Radicals of the United States are designated. We need hardly add that these lines have been occasionally crossed by both parties: thus Jackson's proclamation against South Carolina, in 1833, was, to all intents and purposes, a strong Federalist manifesto. Of late years, too, other questions, not strictly referable to either set of principles, have been chosen for rallying points, as the bank, the tariff, the abolition of slavery; and at the present moment topics of a purely personal nature are most in fashion. The suffrages of an enlightened public have been demanded for General Harrison (the Whig, i. e. Conservative, candidate for the Presidency) on the ground of his dwelling in a log-house, and drinking hard cider of his own making; and it is deemed patriotic to use letter-paper headed by a vignette representing him seated in front of such a residence with a cup in his hand and a hoghead by his side.

The speakers whom (with reference to the foregoing considerations, and with reference also to the materials within our reach) we have selected for particular illustration, are: Fisher Ames, John Quincy Adams, Josiah Quincy, Wirt, Story, Randolph, Calhoun, Clay, Everett, and Webster.

Fisher Ames was born at Dedham, Massachusetts, 1758. He graduated at Harvard University, and, after going through a course of legal study at Boston, began the practice of his profession in his native village. In most parts of North America the functions of the barrister and attorney are combined, like those of surgeon and apothecary in an English country-town, and he probably discharged both. He made himself known by his political contributions to the newspapers, and was elected a member of the provincial assembly, where he so highly distinguished himself as to lead to his being soon transferred to a more conspicuous field—the first Congress that met after the constitution was declared.

Fisher Ames has received from the fond partiality of his countrymen the name of the American Burke, and though his political Essays form the chief and most lasting foundation of his fame, there are passages in his speeches which might go far towards accounting for, if they do not quite justify, the appellation. Thus, in his speech on Mr. Madison's motion, in 1794, to impose additional restrictions on foreign commerce, in the hope of inducing other nations to repeal theirs:

"The extravagant despotism of this language accords very ill with our power to give it effect, or with the affection of zeal for an unlimited freedom of commerce. Such a state of absolute freedom of commerce never did exist, and it is very much to be doubted whether it ever will. Were I invested with the trust to legislate for mankind, it is very probable the first act of my authority would be to throw all the restrictive and prohibitory laws of trade into the fire; the resolutions on the table would not be spared. But if I were to do so, it is probable I should have a quarrel on my hands with every civilized nation. The Dutch would claim the monopoly of the spice-trade, for which their ancestors passed their whole lives in warfare. The Spaniards and Portuguese would be no less obstinate. If we calculate what colony monopolies have cost in wealth, in suffering, and in crimes, we shall say they were dearly purchased. The English would plead for their navigation act, not as a source of gain, but as an essential means of securing their independence. So many interests would be disturbed, and so many lost, by a violent change from the existing to an unknown order of things; and the mutual relations of nations, in respect to their power and wealth, would suffer such a shock, that the idea must be allowed to be perfectly Utopian and wild. But for this country to form the project of changing the policy of nations, and to begin the abolition of restrictions by restrictions of its own, is equally ridiculous and inconsistent."

We believe it to be equally Utopian for any country, in the present condition of the world, to form the project of changing the policy of nations, and begin the abolition of restrictions by abolishing its own. But the self-complacency with which our corn-law repealers annually bring forward their commonplaces as novelties, and think it the height of philosophy to have discovered the abstract evil of monopolies, is the principal topic of reflection suggested by this paragraph; though Sir Robert Peel's masterly exposure of their fallacious statements, which he tore to tatters without finding it necessary to go into the main question, has pretty well reduced them to their proper dimensions as economists.

Mr. Ames's countrymen may still learn something from the following:

"In open war, we are the weaker, and shall be brought into danger, if not to ruin. * * * By cherishing the arts of peace, we shall acquire, and we are actually acquiring, the strength and resources for a war. Instead of seeking treaties, we ought to shun them; for the later they shall be formed, the better will be the terms: we shall have more to give, and more to withhold. We have not yet taken our proper rank, nor acquired that consideration which will not be refused us, if we persist in prudent and pacific counsels; if we give time for our strength to mature itself. Though America is rising with a giant's strength, its bones are yet but cartilages. By delaying the beginning of a conflict, we insure the victory."

Burke, in his speech on American affairs, delivered in 1772, calls the Americans "a nation in the gristle;" and Talleyrand, on his return from the United States, described them as "un geant sans os ni nerfs."

Mr. Ames's great speech, however, is one delivered in 1796, in support of the Treaty with Great Britain, which, though ratified by the President, a considerable party in the House of Representatives were anxious to repudiate. He was so weak from severe illness when he rose, that it seemed doubtful whether he would be able to do more than enter his protest against the proposed infraction of public faith; but as he warmed in the argument, he acquired a factitious strength; and there is a kind of feverish force and wildness in the expressions he flings forth, as his convictions deepen in the very act of uttering them:

"Will any man affirm the American nation is engaged by good faith to the British nation, but that engagement is nothing to this House? Such a man is not to be reasoned with. Such a doctrine is a coat of mail that would turn the edge of all the weapons of argument, if they were sharper than a sword. Will it be imagined the King of Great Britain and the President are mutually bound by the treaty, but the two Nations are free?"

"This, sir, is a cause that would be dishonored and betrayed if I contented myself with appealing only to the understanding. It is too cold, and its processes are too slow, for the occasion. I desire to thank God, that, since he has given me an intellect so fallible, he has impressed upon me an instinct that is sure. On a question of shame and honor, reasoning is sometimes useless, and worse. I feel the decision in my pulse—if it throws no light upon the brain, it kindles a fire at the heart."

Upon the treaty in question, certain posts, supposed to be essential to the protection of the American frontier against the Indians, were to be surrendered by Great Britain. This afforded a fine topic of declamation:

"By rejecting the posts, we light the savage fires, we bind the victims. This day we undertake to render account to the widows and orphans whom our decision will make, to the wretches that will be roasted at the stake, to our country, and I do not deem it too serious to say, to conscience and to God. We are answerable; and if duty be any thing more than a word of imposture, if conscience be not a bugbear, we are preparing to make ourselves as wretched as our country."

"There is no mistake in this case; there can be none. Experience has already been the prophet of events, and the cries of our future victims have already reached us. The western inhabitants are not a silent and uncomplaining sacrifice. The voice of humanity issues from the shade of their wilderness. It exclaims, that while one hand is held up to reject this treaty, the other grasps a tomahawk. It summons our imagination to the scenes that will open. It is no great effort of the imagination to conceive that events so near are already begun. I can fancy that I listen to the yells of savage vengeance and the shrieks of torture. Already they seem to sigh in the west wind—already they mingle with every echo from the mountains."

In order to make the resemblance to Burke more complete, the speaker steals a second feather from his wing:

"For when the fiery vapors of the war lowered in the skirts of our horizon, all our wishes were concentrated in this one, that we might escape the desolation of the storm. This treaty, like a rainbow on the edge of the cloud, marked to our eyes the space where it was raging, and afforded, at the same time, the sure prognostic of fair weather. If we reject it, the vivid colors will grow pale; it will be a baleful meteor, portending tempest and war."

This is not exactly the famous Hyder-Ali image, but it is an obvious and rather clumsy imitation of it. A compliment was paid him at the conclusion of this speech, similar to that paid by Pitt to Sheridan at the conclusion of his famous Begum speech.* A member of the opposite party objected to taking a vote at that time, as they had been carried away by the impulse of oratory.

Ill health compelled him to retire into private life; but he viewed the progress of ultra-democratic opinions with ever-deepening interest and alarm, and continued to write a great deal on public matters down to his death, in 1806. He was a man of warm devotional feelings, and is reported to have said, "I will hazard the assertion that no man ever did or ever will become truly eloquent, without being a constant reader of the Bible, and an admirer of the purity and sublimity of its language."

We should have said more of Mr. Ames on this occasion, had we not given an article in a former number to his political essays. They were collected and published the year after his death, in America; and a selection from them was printed here, in 1825, under this title: "The Influence of Democracy on Liberty, Property, and the Happiness of Society, considered, by an American." The appearance of that most remarkable volume was opportune; and it supplied us with some specimens of profound reasoning and terse energetic eloquence, which, we should hope, our readers are not likely to have forgotten.

John Quincy Adams, the son of the orator of the revolutionary Congress, was bred to the bar, and his name occurs once or twice in the Reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court; but he quitted this career for diplomacy, and filled the situation of minister at various foreign courts successively. The rest of his time was actively devoted to general politics, and in 1825 he was elected President. His studies have been as multifarious as his avocations: he affects to know (and really does know almost) every thing: his speeches are profusely interspersed with literary allusions, and no description of subject is rejected as alien to his pursuits. Whenever a Philosophic Society or learned Institution required an inaugural address, he was ready with one: when an eulogy was to be pronounced on Lafayette, he was selected by Congress to pronounce it; and his anniversary orations are numberless.

The only specimens to be found in Mr. Willison's five-volume collection, are his inaugural address as President, in 1825—a manly, statesmanlike, and spirited appeal—and an oration delivered at Plymouth, New England, Dec. 22, 1802, at the anniversary commemoration of the landing of the first settlers, commonly called the Pilgrims, at that place. One grand object on these occasions, is, to vindicate the purity of North American descent:

"The founders of your race are not handed down to you, like the father of the Roman people, as the sucklings of a wolf. You are not descended from a nauseous compound of fanaticism and sensuality, whose only argument was the sword, and whose only paradise was a brethel. No Gothic scourge of God; no Vandal pest of nations; no fabled fugitive from the flames of Troy; no bastard Norman tyrant, appears among the list of worthies who first landed on the rock which your veneration has preserved as a lasting monument of their achievement. The great actors of the day we now solemnize were illustrious by their intrepid valor, no less than by their Christian graces; but the clarion of conquest has not blazoned forth their names to all the winds of Heaven. Their glory has not been wasted over oceans of blood to the remotest regions of the Earth. They have not erected to themselves colossal statues upon pedestals of human bones, to provoke and insult the tardy hand of heavenly retribution. But theirs was 'the better fortitude of patience and heroic martyrdom.' Theirs was the gentle temper of Christian kindness; the rigorous observance of reciprocal justice; the unconquerable soul of conscious integrity. Worldly fame has been parsimonious of her favor to the memory of those generous champions. Their numbers were small; their stations in life obscure; the object of their enterprise unostentatious; the theatre of their exploits remote: how could they possibly be favorites of worldly fame?—That common crier, whose existence is only known by the assemblage of multitudes: that pander of wealth and greatness, so eager to haunt the palaces of fortune, and so fastidious to the houseless dignity of virtue: that parasite of pride, ever scornful to meekness, and ever obsequious to insolent power: that heedless trumpeter, whose ears are deaf to modest merit, and whose eyes are blind to bloodless, distant excellence."

* Let those who judge of speeches by the reported passages account for the praises lavished by contemporaries, without one dissenting voice, on this speech of Sheridan's.

When, amongst other grounds of complaint against the English army for burning Washington, it was urged that the national records had been destroyed, the "Courier" newspaper replied, that this part of the mischief might be easily repaired by presenting Congress with a complete copy of "The Newgate Calendar;" and when a Virginian fine gentleman was once boasting of his family jewels, he was thrown into a frenzy by an English traveller, who inquired whether he meant the irons in which his ancestor made his escape. These are jokes addressed to popular ignorance; but at the same time it might be as well to avoid invidious contrasts, since even English refugees for conscience's sake can hardly be better born than Englishmen; and the population of North America has certainly received considerable additions from a class described by Barrington, the famous pickpocket, in a prologue spoken in New South Wales:

"True patriots we; for, be it understood.

We left our country for our country's good."*

Mr. Adams continues—

"Preserve, in all their purity, refine, if possible, from all their alloy, those virtues which we this day commemorate as the ornament of our forefathers. Adhere to them with inflexible resolution, as to the horns of the altar; instil them with unwearied perseverance into the minds of your children; bind your souls and theirs to the national union as the chords of life are centered in the heart, and you shall soar with rapid and steady wing to the summit of human glory. Nearly a century ago one of those rare minds to whom it is given to discern future greatness in its seminal principles, upon contemplating the situation of this continent, pronounced in a vein of poetic inspiration,

'Westward the Star of empire takes its way.'

Let us all unite in ardent supplications to the Founder of nations and the Builder of worlds, that what then was prophecy may continue unfolding into history—that the dearest hopes of the human race may not be extinguished in disappointment, and that the last may prove the noblest empire of time."

The line of verse is taken from a stanza by Bishop Berkeley:

"Westward the course of empire takes its way.

The four first acts already past,

A fifth shall close the drama with the day.

Time's noblest offspring is the last."

How lamentably the thought is impaired in the citation by the change of a word! Still this is the purest piece of rhetorical composition we have hitherto discovered in the progress of this inquiry.

We should do Mr. Adams injustice were we not to add that he possesses higher merits than occasional force or felicity of style. His political views are almost uniformly broad and enlightened; and his speech on the affair of Texas has been pronounced, by good judges, to be altogether the most statesmanlike ever delivered in North America. His voice, now broken by age, was once clear and musical, and his look and manner are remarkably impressive. Commemorative discourses are usually delivered in a church or meeting-house, and the venerable ex-president, addressing a large audience from the pulpit, with all the animation of his youth, might form as good a subject for a picture as John Knox.

Josiah Quincy is the son of a Boston patriot bearing the same names, who died in 1775, but was considered to have sufficient claims on the gratitude of his countrymen to justify a "Life" by his son; though, he it observed, this is a tribute which has become very common, and is not always, as in the present instance, justified by circumstances and the real merit of the man. Josiah, fits, though we believe bred to the bar, has paid more attention to literature than law. He is reckoned an excellent classic, and has filled the post of president of Harvard University for several years. He is a productive composer of anniversary harangues; but his two best speeches were made as a member of Congress. In 1808 he spoke in support of a resolution to resist the edicts of the belligerent powers, which had the effect of restricting the commerce of the United States:

"Gentlemen exclaim, Great Britain 'smites us on one cheek;' and what does administration? It turns the other also. Gentlemen say, Great Britain is a robber; she 'takes our cloak;' and what say administration? 'Let her take our coat also.' France and Great Britain require you to relinquish a part of your commerce, and you yield it entirely. Sir, this conduct may be the way to dignity and honor in another world, but it will never secure safety and independence in this. * * * But I shall be told, 'this may lead to war.' I ask, 'are we now at peace?' Certainly not, unless retiring from insult be peace; unless shrinking under the lash be peace. The surest way to prevent war is not to fear it. The idea that nothing on earth is so dreadful as war is inculcated too studiously among us. Disgrace is worse. Abandonment of essential rights is worse."

* Mr. Barrington was finally transported for a most successful attendance at a drawing-room of Queen Charlotte's in the character of an Irish bishop; the laws sleeves were crumpled full with stars and diamonds. He rose subsequently to be stage-manager and high sheriff at Botany Bay.

tainly not, unless retiring from insult be peace; unless shrinking under the lash be peace. The surest way to prevent war is not to fear it. The idea that nothing on earth is so dreadful as war is inculcated too studiously among us. Disgrace is worse. Abandonment of essential rights is worse."

We cannot venture to say that the following passage is in strict accordance with modern English taste; but we are quite sure that, had an Irish orator uttered it, his contemporaries would have applauded and his biographers recorded it:—

"But it has been asked in debate, 'will not Massachusetts, the cradle of liberty, submit to such privations?' An embargo liberty was never cradled in Massachusetts. Our liberty was not so much a mountain as a sea-nymph. She was free as air. She could swim, or she could run. The ocean was her cradle. Our fathers met her as she came, like the goddess of beauty, from the waves. They caught her as she was sporting on the beach. They courted her whilst she was spreading her nets upon the rocks. But an embargo liberty; a handcuffed liberty; a liberty in fetters; a liberty traversing between the four sides of a prison, and beating her head against the walls, is none of our offspring. We abjure the monster. Its parentage is all inland."

Yet let us do justice to Ireland. Grattan's personification was immeasurably superior: "Short-lived, indeed, was Irish independence. I sat by her cradle,—I followed her hearse."

The subject of Mr. Quincy's other great speech was the admission of Louisiana into the Union. The exordium (too long to quote) is admirable, though suddenly broken off by an appeal to the Chair. One of Lord Chatham's favorite modes of arresting attention was to say something startling, for the express purpose of provoking a call to order; and we incline to think that Mr. Quincy had laid a trap for an interruption with the same view; for it is stated to us, on good authority, that he invariably learns his speeches by heart, though he, notwithstanding, contrives to deliver them with the required energy. This is one of the most difficult attainments in oratory; for, to do it well, it is necessary to reproduce the same state of thought and feeling under which the oration was composed. Unluckily, the writer is more apt to feel like the litigant who complained to Lysias that the speech provided for him read well enough the first and second time, but sounded rather flat the third and fourth. "The audience," replied Lysias, "are only to hear it once." To put themselves as nearly as possible on a level with the audience in this respect, the practice of the best speakers is to meditate the subject thoroughly, fill their minds with arguments and illustrations, select and arrange the best topics, and trust to the excitement of the moment for the language and the tone.

William Wirt, the biographer of Patrick Henry, has done more than enough, according to American notions, to earn a biographer for himself. He was born in Maryland, in 1772, and, after a successful forensic career, was made Attorney-General to the United States, under the presidency of Monroe. He is known in literature by a series of essays, called "The British Spy," written with a clearness, spirit, and facility, which, independently of extraneous evidence, would lead to the conclusion that he was calculated to excel in oratory. The fact, however, is satisfactorily established by his reported speeches, one of which has attained a high degree of celebrity—his speech against Aaron Burr, prosecuted in 1807 for treason in preparing the means of a military expedition against Mexico, a territory of the King of Spain, with whom the United States were at peace.

The following satirical sketch of his opponent's style (Mr. Wickham) may serve to exemplify his command of language:

"I will treat that gentleman with candor. If I misrepresent him, it will not be intentionally. I will not follow the example which he has set me on a very recent occasion. I will not complain of flowers and graces where none exist. I will not, like him, in reply to an argument as naked as a sleeping Venus, but certainly not half so beautiful, complain of the painful necessity I am under, in the weakness and decrepitude of logical vigor, of lifting first this flounce, and then than furlow, before I can reach the wished-for point of attack. I keep no flounces or furlows ready manufactured and hung up for use in the military of my fancy, and if I did, I think I should not be so indiscreetly impatient to get rid of my wares as to put them off on improper occasions. I cannot promise to interest you by any classical and elegant allusions to the pure pages of Tristram Shandy. I cannot give you a squib or a rocket in every period. For my own part, I have always thought these flashes of wit (if they deserve that name,) I have always thought these meteors of the brain, which spring up, with such exuberant abundance, in the speeches of that gentleman, which play on each side of the path of reason, or, sporting across it, with fantastic motion, decoy the mind from the true point in debate, no better evidence of the soundness of the argument with which they are connected, nor, give me leave to add, the vigor of the brain from which they spring, than those vapors, which start from our marshes, and blaze with a momentary combustion, and which, floating on the undulations of the atmosphere, beguile the traveller into bogs and brambles, are evidences of the firmness and solidity of the earth from which they proceed."

The defendant's counsel had endeavored to shift the principal guilt of the expedition from Colonel Burr to a Mr. Blannerhassett. Mr. Wirt's description of the latter has grown into a common subject of declamation in the schools:

"Who is Blannerhassett? A native of Ireland, a man of letters, who fled from the storms of his own country to find quiet in ours. His history shows that war is not the natural element of his mind. If it had been, he never would have exchanged Ireland for America. So far is an army from furnishing the society natural and proper to Mr. Blannerhassett's character, that on his arrival in America he retired even from the population of the Atlantic States, and sought quiet and solitude in the bosom of our Western forests. But he carried with him taste, and science, and wealth; and lo, the desert smiled! Possessing himself of a beautiful island in the Ohio, he rears upon it a palace, and decorates it with every romantic embellishment of fancy."

A shrubbery, that Shenstone might have envied, blooms around him. Music, that might have charmed Calypso and her nymphs, is his. An extensive library spreads its treasures before him. A philosophical apparatus offers to him all the secrets and mysteries of nature. Peace, tranquillity, and innocence shed their mingled delights around him. And to crown the enchantment of the scene, a wife, who is said to be lovely even beyond her sex, and graced with every accomplishment that can render it irresistible, had blessed him with her love, and made him the father of several children. The evidence would convince you that this is but a faint picture of the real life. In the midst of all this peace, this innocent simplicity, and this tranquillity, this feast of the mind, this pure banquet of the heart, the destroyer comes; he comes to change this paradise into a hell. Yet the flowers do not wither at his approach. No monstrous shuddering through the bosom of their unfortunate possessor warns him of the ruin that is coming upon him. A stranger presents him. Introduced to their civilities by the high rank which he had lately held in his country, he soon finds his way to their hearts by the self dignity and elegance of his demeanor, the light and beauty of his conversation, and the seductive and fascinating power of his address. The conquest was not difficult. Innocence is ever simple and credulous. Conscious of no design itself, it suspects none in others. It wears no guard before its breast. Every door, and portal, and avenue of the heart is thrown open, and all who choose it enter. Such was the state of Eden when the serpent entered its bowers. The prisoner, in a more engaging form, winding himself into the open and unpractised heart of the unfortunate Blannerhasset, found but little difficulty in changing the native character of that heart and the objects of its affection. By degrees he infuses into it the poison of his own ambition. He breathes into it the fire of his own courage; a daring and desperate thirst for glory: an ardor panting for great enterprises, for all the storm and bustle and hurricane of life. In a short time the whole man is changed, and every object of his former delight is relinquished. No more he enjoys the tranquil scene; it has become flat and insipid to his taste. His books are abandoned. His retort and crucible are thrown aside. His shrubbery blooms and breathes its fragrance upon the air in vain—he likes it not. His ear no longer drinks the rich melody of music; it longs for the trumpet's clangor and the cannon's roar. Even the prattle of his babes, once so sweet, no longer affects him; and the angel smile of his wife, which hitherto touched his bosom with ecstasy so unspeakable, is now unseen and unfelt. Greater objects have taken possession of his soul. His imagination has been dazzled by visions of diadems, of stars and garters and titles of nobility. He has been taught to burn with restless emulation at the name of great heroes and conquerors. His enchanted island is destined soon to relapse into a wilderness; and in a few months we find the beautiful and tender partner of his bosom, whom he lately 'permitted not the winds of' summer 'to visit too roughly,' we find her shivering at midnight on the winter banks of the Ohio, and mingling her tears with the torrents that froze as they fell. Yet this unfortunate man, thus deluded from his interest and his happiness, thus seduced from the paths of innocence and peace, thus confounded in the toils that were deliberately spread for him, and overwhelmed by the mastering spirit and genius of another—this man, thus ruined and undone, and made to play a subordinate part in this grand drama of guilt and treason, this man is to be called the principal offender, while he by whom he was thus plunged in misery is comparatively innocent, a mere accessory! Is this reason? Is it law? Is it humanity? Sir, neither the human heart nor the human understanding will bear a perversion so monstrous and absurd! so shocking to the soul! so revolting to reason! Let Aaron Burr, then, not shrink from the high destination which he has courted, and having already ruined Blannerhasset in fortune, character, and happiness for ever, let him not attempt to finish the tragedy by thrusting that ill-fated man between himself and punishment."

The same kind of contrast is beautifully sketched by Curran in a speech delivered in 1794, alluding to the banishment of Muir:

"To what other cause can you ascribe, what in my mind is still more astonishing, in such a country as Scotland, a nation cast in the happy medium between the spiritless acquiescence of submissive poverty and the sturdy credulity of pampered wealth; cool and ardent, adventurous and persevering; winning her eagle flight against the blaze of every science, with an eye that never winks, and a wing that never tires; crowned as she is with the spoils of every art, and decked with the wreath of every muse; from the deep and scrutinising researches of her Humes, to the sweet and simple, but not less sublime and pathetic morality of her Burns—how from the bosom of a country like that, genius, and character, and talents, should be banished to a distant barbarous soil; condemned to pine under the horrid communion of vulgar vice and base-born profligacy, for twice the period that ordinary calculation gives to the continuance of human life?"

The chief fault to be found with Mr. Wirt's description, is that the occasional fancifulness of the images and the ornate grace of the language detract from our conviction of the speaker's earnestness. This objection is not applicable to a holiday discourse, and his eulogy on Jefferson and Adams, who died on the same day, July 4, 1826—and that day the anniversary of American independence—is the best which this remarkable coincidence has called forth.

Mr. Justice Story has established an enduring reputation amongst the lawyers of all countries by his Commentaries on the Conflict of Laws; whilst his works on Bailments and Equity are already exercising a formidable degree of rivalry with the best British books on these subjects. When we find a jurist of this calibre acquiring contemporaneous celebrity for language and style, it would be unjust both to his country and the man not to pay him the compliment of a quotation as we pass. We turn for this purpose to his Miscellaneous Writings, where his best discourses are collected—and lasting monuments they form to his taste, knowledge, truth of feeling, and grasp of thought. Our classical readers will readily give us credit for the justice of this commendation, when they read the defence of their favorite studies of which this passage forms part:

"I pass over all consideration of the written treasures of antiquity, which have survived the wreck of empires and dynasties, of monumental trophies and triumphal arches, of palaces and princes and temples of the gods. I pass over all consideration of those admired compositions, in which wisdom speaks, as with a voice from heaven; of those sublime efforts of political genius which still freshen, as they pass from age to age, in undying vigor; of those finished histories which still enlighten and instruct governments in their duty and their destiny; of those matchless orations which roused nations to arms, and chained senates to the chariot-wheels of all-conquering eloquence. These all may now be read in our vernacular tongue. Ay, as one remembers the face of a dead friend by gathering up the broken fragments of his image—as one listens to the tale of a dream twice told—as one catches the roar of the ocean in the ripple of a rivulet—as one sees the blaze of noon in the first glimmer of twilight.

"There is not a single nation, from the North to the South of Europe, from the bleak shores of the Baltic to the bright plains of immortal Italy, whose literature is not imbedded in the very elements of classical learning. The literature of England is, in an emphatic sense, the production of her scholars; of men who have cultivated letters in her universities, and colleges, and grammar-schools; of men who thought any life too short, chiefly because it left some relic of antiquity unmastered, and any other fame humble, because it faded in the presence of Roman and Grecian genius. He who studies English literature without the lights of classical learning loses half the charms of its sentiment and style, of its force and feelings, of its delicate touches, of its delightful allusions, of its illustrative associations. Who, that reads the poetry of Gray, does not feel that it is the refinement of classical taste which gives such inexpressible vividness and transparency to his diction? Who, that reads the concentrated sense and melodious verification of Dryden and Pope, does not perceive in them the disciples of the old school, whose genius was inflamed by the heroic verse, the terse satire, and the playful wit of antiquity? Who, that meditates over the strains of Milton, does not feel that he drank deep at

'Siloa's brook, that flow'd
Fast by the oracle of God'— that the fires of his magnificent mind were lighted by coals from ancient altars?

"It is no exaggeration to declare that he who proposes to abolish classical studies proposes to render, in a great measure, inert and unifying the mass of English literature for three centuries; to rob us of much of the glory of the past, and much of the instruction of future ages; to blind us to excellencies which few may hope to equal and none to surpass; to annihilate associations which are interwoven with our best sentiments, and give to distant times and countries a presence and reality as if they were in fact our own."

His discourses abound in passages of at least equal merit—such as the description of the effects of modern chemistry (p. 119), which might be placed alongside of Lord Jeffrey's description of the effects of steam, in his Notice of Watt; or the sketch of the view from the Mount Auburn Cemetery, which rivals the same writer's exquisite contrast of highland and lowland scenery, in his Essay on Taste in the Encyclopædia Britannica.

Mr. Justice Story's charges to juries are also much admired; and his judgements are admirable specimens of judicial statement and reasoning. The most important are reported by Mr. Charles Sumner, barrister, who recently paid a visit of some duration to this country, and presents in his own person a decisive proof that an American gentleman, without official rank or wide-spread reputation, by mere dint of courtesy, candor, an entire absence of pretension, an appreciating spirit, and a cultivated mind, may be received on a perfect footing of equality in the best English circles, social, political, and intellectual; which, be it observed, are hopelessly inaccessible to the itinerant note-taker, who never gets beyond the outskirts or the show-houses.

A second legal luminary of the first water was the late Chief Justice Marshall, the Lord Stowell of the United States. The late William Pinkney, Attorney General of the United States, was a third.* But want of space compels us to quit them for the politicians who are still fretting their busy hour upon the stage.

John Caldwell Calhoun (Miss Martineau's "cast-iron man, who looks as if he had never been born") was born March, 1782, in South Carolina. His family are Irish, and had a hard battle to fight with the Cherokees for their settlement. At an early age he applied himself to the reading of history with such diligence as seriously to impair his health, but this led to his being subsequently sent to Yale College, under Dr. Dwight, who said of him, after the animated discussion of a class question, in which the student had the presumption to differ from the Principal, "That young man has talents enough to be President of the United States." Cyril Jackson is reported to have said something of the sort of Mr. Canning, then an under-graduate; but as he foretold about the same time that the late Lords Morley and Darnley would play conspicuous parts, and the late Lord Liverpool do nothing, we cannot take upon ourselves to put the Dean as a prophet on a par with Dr. Dwight, whose prediction has been already verified in spirit, and may be verified to the letter before long.

Whilst studying for the bar Mr. Calhoun was diligent in his attendance upon debating clubs, and has always, it is said, made a point of extemporising his speeches. He took his seat in Congress in 1811, and continued a member till 1817, when he was appointed Secretary-at-War. At the expiration of Mr. Monroe's second term of Presidency, Mr. Calhoun was started as a candidate; but his name was withdrawn to avoid dividing his party, and he was elected Vice-president under General Jackson by a large majority. In 1833 he resigned this office, and, as a member of the Senate, resumed his oratorical career.

His style is more close and sententious than is common in American speakers, his manner energetic, his delivery rapid, his figure tall, his countenance full of animation and intelligence. It is the opinion of good judges that he would succeed better in the English House of Commons than any other Transatlantic orator; but they add that he has somewhat of a metaphysical tendency—which certainly never suits that atmosphere.

We are sorry to see that he supported a motion for increasing the army in 1811, (a warlike demonstration against England,) but the ground on which he rested his argument will astonish Sir Henry Parnell and Mr. Hume:

"Sir, I here enter my solemn protest against this low and 'calculating avarice' entering this hall of legislation. It is only fit for shops and counting-houses, and ought not to disgrace the seat of sovereignty by its squalid and vile appearance. Whenever it touches a sovereign power, the nation is ruined. It is too shortsighted to defend itself. It is an unpromising spirit, always ready to yield a part to save the balance. It is too timid to have in itself the laws of self-preservation. It is never safe but under the shield of honor. Sir, I only know of one principle to make a nation great, to produce in this country not the form but real spirit of union, and that is, to protect every citizen in the lawful pursuit of his business. He will then feel that he is backed by the government, that its arm is his arm, and will rejoice in its increased strength and prosperity. Protection and patriotism are reciprocal. This is the road that all great nations have trod. Sir, I am not versed in this calculating policy; and will not, therefore, pretend to estimate in dollars and cents the value of national independence or national affection. I cannot dare to measure in shillings and pence the misery, the stripes, and the slavery of our impressed seamen; nor even to value our shipping, commercial, and agricultural losses under the orders in council and the British system of blockade. I hope I have not condemned any prudent estimate of the means of a country before it enters on a war. This is wisdom, the other folly."

Mr. Calhoun is the chief supporter of the nullification doctrine; in other words, of the attempt made by South Carolina to nullify the authority of Congress, as regards any individual State which may protest against it. The part he has taken in this controversy has made him so popular amongst the people of his province, that at the late election they placed all their votes at his disposal.

His chief opponent in this debate was John Randolph, of Virginia, a strange, eccentric genius, with a tall, gaunt figure, and a screeching voice like a cunuch—who played an important part as debater in Congress from 1801 to 1802. Amongst other oddities, he took an unaccountable interest in English topography, and could have competed with Pennant himself in a minute acquaintance with our country-seats and villages, though we are not aware that he ever paid a visit of any duration to this country. In 1833 he was appointed Minister to St. Petersburg, but he only resided there six weeks, and died in 1834, leaving several wills, which are still in litigation on the alleged ground of insanity. By one of them he emancipates his slaves, upwards of three hundred in number; and this alone would go far towards persuading a Virginian jury that he was mad. His speeches were awfully long, often occupying three days, but exceedingly effective, particularly when he was in the sarcastic vein. We can only find room for his mode of putting down the attempt to denounce British attachments as a crime:

"Strange! that we should have no objection to any other people or government, civilized or savage, in the world! The great autocrat of all the Russias receives the homage of our high consideration. The Dey of Algiers and his divan of pirates are very civil, good sort of people, with whom we find no difficulty in maintaining the relations of peace and amity. 'Turks, Jews and Infidels,' Melimelli or the Little Turtle: barbarians and savages of every clime and color are welcome to our arms. With chiefs of banditti, negro or mulatto, we can treat and can trade. Name, however, but England, and all our antipathies are up in arms against her. Against whom? Against those whose blood runs in our veins; in common with whom we claim Shakespeare, and Newton, and Chatham, for our countrymen; whose form of government is the freest on earth, our own only excepted; from whom every valuable principle of our own institutions has been borrowed—representation—jury trial—voting the supplies—writ of habeas corpus—our whole civil and criminal jurisprudence; against our fellow protestants, identified in blood, in language, in religion with ourselves. In what school did the worthies of our land, the Washingtons, Henrys, Hancocks, Franklins, Rutledges of America, learn those principles of civil liberty which were so nobly asserted by their wisdom and valor? * * * I acknowledge the influence of a Shakespeare and a Milton upon my imagination, of a Locke upon my understanding, of a Chatham upon qualities which, would to God, I possessed in common with that illustrious man! of a Tillotson, a Sherlock, and a Porteus, upon my religion. This is a British influence which I can never shake off."

In the North American Review for October, 1832, will be found some notes of a conversation between the writer (Mr. A. Everett) and Sir James Mackintosh, who is reported to have said of Randolph, "I have read some of his speeches, but the effect must depend very much on the manner. There is a good deal of vulgar finery. Malice there is too; but that would be excusable, provided it were in good taste." [Concluded next week.]

AN UNDECIDED BRIDE.—On Thursday morning week, a lady and gentlemen, who were unattended, presented themselves at St. Anne's Church, with the avowed intention of being converted into man and wife. Both, apparently, were in the best of humor with themselves and each other. When all the preliminaries had been arranged, and the reverend gentlemen was waiting to execute his part of the ceremony, the lady (who had, for some moments previously, been observed to exhibit an appearance of indecision) entered into conversation with her intended in a subdued tone, the word "regret," however, being distinctly audible. The expectant bridegroom, after many apologies for the trouble which he had occasioned, informed the clergyman that they would take a little longer time to consider of the matter, and would "call again to-morrow." This was the fourth unsuccessful attempt which the gentleman had made to lead the fair one on to the "hymeneal altar;" but she was evidently as yet unprepared for the sacrifice. On one occasion the parties presented themselves at the church after the time prescribed by the rubric; twice they made appointments with the officiating minister which they did not keep, and on the fourth occasion, the result was as above stated. ## TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

The result of a very long consultation between Mr. Runnington and his partners, held on the day after his last interview with Mr. Aubrey, was, that he drew up the following draft of a letter, addressed to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap.

"Lincoln's Inn, 26th April, 18—

"GENTLEMEN,

Dox d. TITMOUSE v. JOLTER.

In answer to your letter of yesterday, (the 25th inst.) we beg to inform you, that after the judgement in this cause pronounced yesterday in the Court of King's Bench, our client, Mr. Aubrey, does not intend to resist the claim of Mr. Titmouse to the residue of the Yatton property. We now, therefore, beg to give you notice, that on the 17th of next month you will be at liberty, on behalf of your client Mr. Titmouse, to take possession of all the property at Yatton, at present in the possession of Mr. Aubrey. The whole of the last quarter's rents, due at Ladyday, have been paid into the bank of Messrs. Harley, at Griston, and will, on the 17th of May, be placed at the disposal of your client.

"We are also instructed to request the delivery of your bill at as early a period as may suit your convenience, with a view to its immediate examination and settlement.

"We cannot forbear adding, while thus implicitly following the instructions of our client, our very great surprise and regret at the course which he has thought fit to adopt, since we have the strongest reasons for believing, that had he been disposed to contest your claim further, in accordance with advice received from a high quarter, his case would have been materially strengthened, and your difficulties greatly increased. We feel confident that the magnanimity displayed by our client, will be duly appreciated by yours. We are, Gentlemen,

"Your obedient servants,

"RUNNINGTON &amp; Co."

"Messrs. QUIRK, GAMMON, } AND SNAP."

"Really," said Mr. Runnington, when he had read over the above to his partners, "I must throw in a word or two about these infernal mesne profits—yet it's a very ticklish subject, especially with such people as those."

One partner shook his head, and the other looked very thoughtful.

"We must not compromise Mr. Aubrey," said the former.

"We have had no instructions on that point," said the latter—"on the contrary, you told us yourself that your instructions were to announce an unconditional surrender."

"That may be; but in so desperate a business as this, I do think we have a discretion to exercise on behalf of himself and family, which, I must say, he seems quite incapable of exercising himself. Nay, upon my honor, I think we are bound not to forego the slightest opportunity of securing an advantage for our client."

His partners seemed struck with this observation; and Mr. Runnington, after a few moments' consideration, added the following postscript.

"P. S.—As to the mesne profits, by the way, of course we anticipate no difficulty in effecting an amicable arrangement satisfactory to both parties, due consideration being had for the critical position in which our client finds himself so suddenly and unexpectedly placed. Indeed, it is not difficult to conceive that Mr. Aubrey, in taking the step of which we have above advised you, must have contemplated—" (here Mr. Runnington paused for a considerable time,) "being met in a similar frank, liberal, and equitable spirit."

It was agreed, at length, that the whole amount and effect of the above postscript was a spontaneous suggestion of Messrs. Runnington's, not in any way implicating, or calculated in any event to annoy Mr. Aubrey; and a fair copy of the letter and postscript having been made, it was signed by the head of the firm, and forthwith dispatched to Saffron Hill.

"Struck, by Jove, Gammon!" exclaimed Mr. Quirk, as, with the above letter open in his hands, he hurried, the instant that he had read it, into the room of his wily partner, and put the letter into his hands. Gammon read it with apparent calmness, but a slight flush overspread his cheek; and as he finished the perusal, a subdued smile of excitement and triumph stole over his countenance.

"Lord, Gammon! is 'nt it glorious?" quoth Mr. Quirk, heatedly, rubbing his hands together; "give us your hand, Gammon! We've fought a precious hard battle together!"—and he shook his partner's hand with vehement cordiality. "This fellow Aubrey is a trump—is 'nt he?—Egad, if I'd been in his shoes, one way or another, I'd have stuck at Yatton for a dozen years to come—ah, ha!"

"Yes, I am sure you would if you had been able," replied Gammon, drily, and with a smile.

"Ay, that I would," replied Mr. Quirk, with a triumphant chuckle; "but now to come to business. By next quarter-day Titmouse will have £5000 in hard cash—half of it on the 17th of next month. Lord! what have we done for him!" he added, with a sort of sigh.

"We've put an ape into possession of Paradise—that's all—" said Gammon, absently and half aloud, and bitterly and contemptuously.

"By the way, Gammon, you see what's said about our bill—eh? The sooner it's made out the better, I should say—and—ahem! hem!—while Mr. Aubrey's on the tight rope he won't think of looking down at the particular items, will he? I should say, now's our time, and strike while the iron's hot! I've got rather a full entry, I can assure you. I must say, Snap's done his duty, and I've not had my eyes shut—ahem!" here Mr. Quirk winked very knowingly.

"All that, Mr. Quirk, I leave, as usual, to your admirable management as to that of a first-rate man of business. You know I'm a sad hand at accounts; but you and Snap are—you'll do all that should be done."

"Ay, ay—trust us!" interrupted Quirk, quickly, with a significant nod, and fancying himself and Snap already at work, plundering the poor Aubreys. "And, by the way, Gammon, there are the mesne profits—that's a mighty fine postscript of theirs, isn't it?" and, replacing his spectacles, he read over the postscript aloud. "All my eye, of course!" he added, as he laid down the letter—"but I suppose one must give 'em a little time; it is a little hard on him just at present; but then, to be sure, that's his look out—not our's or Titmouse's. Off-hand, I should say we ought to be content with—say—twenty thousand down, and the rest in two years' time, so as to give him time to look about him a little!"

"That will be quite an after consideration," said Mr. Gammon, who, for the last few minutes, had appeared lost in thought.

"Egad—an after consideration! Hang me if I think so, Gammon! There's a certain bond—eh? you recollect?"

"I assure you, Mr. Quirk, that my eye is fixed quite as steadily and anxiously on that point as yours," said Gammon, gravely.

"Thank you—thank you, Gammon!" replied Quirk, with rather a relieved air—"it could n't possibly be in better hands. Lud—to go wrong there! It would send me to my grave at a hand gallop—it would, so help me Heaven, Gammon!—Titmouse is a queer hand to deal with—is 'nt he? Was 'nt he strange and bumptious the other day? Egad, it made me quake! Need we tell him, just yet," he dropped his voice, "of the letter we've got? Could n't we safely say only they have sent us word that we shall have Yatton by the 17th?"

"Very great caution is necessary, Mr. Quirk, just now!"

"You do n't think the young scamp's going to turn round on us, and snap his fingers in our face, eh?" inquired Mr. Quirk, apprehensively, violently twirling about his watch-key.

"If you leave him implicitly to me, you shall get all you want," replied Gammon, very gravely, and very pointedly. Quirk's color changed a little, as he felt the keen grey eye of Gammon fixed upon him, and he involuntarily shrunk under it.

"You'll excuse me, Gammon," at length commenced Quirk, with rather a disturbed air; "but there's no fathoming you, when you get into one of your mysterious humors: and you always look so particularly strange whenever you get on this subject! What can you know that I do n't—or ought not?"

"Nothing—nothing, I assure you," replied Gammon, with a gay smile.

"Well, I should have thought not. But, coming back to the main point, if one could but touch some part of that same ten thousand pounds, I should be a happy man!—Consider, Gammon, what a draw there has been on my purse for this last sixteen months!"

"Well, can you doubt being soon richly re-paid, my dear sir? Only do n't be too hasty."

"I take it, Gammon, we've a lien on the rents now in the banker's hands, and to become due next quarter-day; and on the first instalment of the mesne profits, both for our bill of costs, and in respect of that same bond!"

"Mesne profits, Mr. Quirk?" echoed Gammon, rather quickly; "you seem to take it for granted that they are all ready to be paid over! Even supposing Titmouse not to grow restive, do you suppose it probable that Mr. Aubrey, after so vast and sudden a sacrifice, can have more than a very few thousands—probably hundreds—to keep him from immediate want, since we have reason to believe he has got no other resources than Yatton?"

"Not got 'em—not got 'em? D—m him! then he must look sharp and get 'em, that's all! You know we can't be trifled with; we must look after the interests of—Titmouse. And what's he to start with, if there's no mesne profits forthcoming! But, hang it! they must: I should say a gentle pressure, by and by, as soon as he's fairly out of Yatton, must produce money, or security—he must know quantities of people of rank and substance that would rush forward, if they once heard him squeal!"

"Ah, you're for putting the thumb-screws on at once—eh?" inquired Gammon, with subdued energy, and a glance of anger and horror.

"Aye—capital—that's just what I meant."

"Heartless old scoundrel!" thought Gammon, almost expressing as much: but his momentary excitement passed off unobserved by Mr. Quirk. "And, I must say, I agree with you," he added; "we ought in justice to see you first reimbursed in your very heavy outlays, Mr. Quirk."

"Well, that's honorable, Gammon. Oh, Gammon, how I wish you would let me make a friend of you," suddenly added Mr. Quirk, eyeing wistfully his surprised companion. "If you have one sincere, disinterested friend in the world, Mr. Quirk, he is to be found in Oily Gammon," said that gentleman, throwing great warmth into his manner, perceiving that Mr. Quirk was laboring with some communication of which he wished to deliver himself.

"Gammon, Gammon! how I wish I could think so!" replied Quirk, looking earnestly, yet half distrustfully, at Gammon, and fumbling about his hands in his pockets. The mild and friendly expression of Gammon's countenance, however, invited communicativeness; and after softly opening and shutting the two doors, to ascertain that no one was trying to overhear what might be passing, he returned to his chair, which he drew closer to Gammon, who noticed this air of preparation with not a little curiosity.

"I may be wrong, Gammon," commenced Mr. Quirk, in a low tone; "but I do believe you've always felt a kind of personal friendship towards me: and there ought to be no secrets among friends. Friends, indeed? Perhaps it is premature to mention so small a matter; but at a certain silversmith's, not a thousand miles from the Strand, there's at this moment in hand, as a present from me to you"—[Oh dear, dear! Mr. Quirk! what a shocking untruth! and at your advanced period of life, too!—"as elegant a gold snuff-box as can be made, with a small inscription on the lid. I hope you won't value it the less for its being the gift of old Caleb Quirk!"—he paused, and looked earnestly at Mr. Gammon.]

"My dear Mr. Quirk, you have taken me," said he "quite by surprise. Value it? I will preserve it to the latest moment of my life, as a memorial of one whom the more I know of, the more I respect and admire!"

"You, Gammon, are in your prime—scarce even that—but I am growing old"—tears appeared to glisten in the old gentleman's eyes; Gammon, much moved, shook him cordially by the hand in silence, wondering what upon earth was coming next. "Yes;—old Caleb Quirk's day is drawing to a close—I feel it, Gammon, I feel it! But I shall leave behind me—a—child—an only daughter, Gammon;" that gentleman gazed at the speaker with an expression of respectful sympathy;—"Dora! I do n't think you can have known Dora so long, Gammon, without feeling a little interest in her." Here Gammon's color mounted rapidly, and he looked with feelings of a novel description at his senior partner. Could it be possible that old Quirk wished to bring about a match between his daughter and Gammon? His thoughts were for a moment confused. All he could do was to bow with an earnest—an anxious—a deprecating air; and Mr. Quirk, rather hurriedly, preceded,—"and when I assure you, Gammon, that it is in your power to make an old friend and his only daughter happy and proud,"—Gammon began to draw very long breaths, and to look more and more apprehensively at his senior partner,—"in short, my dear friend, Gammon, let me out with it at once—my daughter's in love with Titmouse."

"Whew!" thought Gammon, suddenly and infinitely relieved.]

"Ah, my dear, Mr. Quirk, is that all?" he exclaimed, and shook Mr. Quirk cordially by the hand,—"at length you have made a friend of me indeed. But to tell you the truth, I have long, long suspected as much; I have indeed!"

"Have you really? Well! there is no accounting for tastes, is there—especially among the women? Poor Dora's over head and ears—quite!—she is, so help me Heaven!" continued Quirk, energetically.

"Well, my dear sir, and why this surprise? I consider Titmouse to be a very handsome young fellow; and that he is already rapidly acquiring very gentlemanly manners; and as to his fortune—really, it would be most desirable to bring it about. Indeed, the sooner his heart's fixed, and his word's pledged, the better—for you must of course be aware that there will be many schemers on the look out to entrap his frank and inexperienced nature,—look, for instance, at Tag-rag."

"Eugh!" exclaimed Mr. Quirk, with a sudden motion of sickening disgust—"the old scoundrel!—I smoked him long ago! Now, that I call villainy, Gammon; infernal villainy! Do n't you?"

"Indeed, indeed, Mr. Quirk, I do; I quite agree with you! Upon my honor, I think it is a part of even my duty towards our client, if possible, to protect him against such infamous designs."

"Right—right, Gammon; by Jove, you're quite right—I quite agree with you!" replied Quirk earnestly, not observing the lambent smile upon the features of his calm, crafty, and sarcastic companion.

"You see," said Gammon, "we've a very delicate and difficult game to play with old Tag-rag. He's certainly a toad, ugly and venomous—but then he's got a jewel in his head—he's got money, you know, and to get at it, we must really give him some hopes about his daughter and Titmouse."

"Faugh! eugh! faugh! Nasty wretch! a little trollop! It makes one sick to hear of her! And, by the way, now we're on that subject, Gammon, what do we want of this wretch Tag-rag, now that Titmouse has actually got the property?"

"Want of him? Money—money."

"But, curse me! (excuse me, Gammon,) why go to Tag-rag? That's what I can't understand! Surely any one will advance almost any amount of money to Titmouse, with such security as he can give."

"Very possibly—probably—"

"Possibly? Why, I myself don't mind advancing him five thousand—nay, ten thousand pounds—when we've once got hold of the title-deeds."

"My dear sir," interrupted Gammon, calmly, but with a very serious air, and a slight change of color which did not happen to attract the notice of his eager companion, "there are reasons why I dissuade you from doing so; upon my word, there are; further than that I do not think it necessary to go: but I have gone far enough, I know well, to do you a real service." Mr. Quirk listened to all this with an air of the utmost amazement—even open-mouthed amazement. "What reason, Gammon, can there be against my advancing money on a security worth more than a hundred times the sum borrowed?" he inquired, with visible distrust of his companion.

"I can but assure you, that were I called upon to say whether I would advance a serious sum of money to Titmouse, on the security of the Yatton estates, I should, at all events, require a most substantial collateral security."

"Mystery again!" exclaimed Mr. Quirk, a sigh of vexation escaping him. "You'll excuse me, Gammon, but you'd puzzle an angel, to say nothing of the devil. May I presume for one moment, so far on our personal and professional relationship, as to ask what the reason is on which your advice rests?"

"Mere caution—excessive anxiety to place you out of the way of all risk. Surely, is your borrower so soon to be pronounced firm in the saddle?"

"If you know any thing, Gammon, that I do n't, it's your bounden duty to communicate it; look at our articles."

"It is; but do I? Prove that, Mr. Quirk, and you need trouble yourself no more. But, in the mean while, (without saying how much I feel hurt at your evident distrust,) I have but a word or two further to add on this point."

When Mr. Gammon chose, he could assume an expression of feature, a tone of voice, and a manner which indicated to the person he was addressing, that he was announcing a matured opinion, an inflexible determination—and this, moreover, in the calmest, quietest way imaginable. Thus it was that he now said to Mr. Quirk, "My opinion is, that you should get some third party or parties to advance any required sum, and prevail upon Tag-rag to join in a collateral security, without—if possible—making him aware to the extent of liability he is incurring. By exciting him with the ridiculous notion of an attachment between his daughter and Titmouse, he may be induced to give his signature, as to some complimentary matter of form only. Now, that's my opinion, Mr. Quirk; not lightly or hastily formed; and it rests upon a deep feeling of personal regard toward you, and also our common interest."

Mr. Quirk had listened to this communication in perturbed silence, eyeing the speaker with a ludicrous expression of mingled chagrin, apprehension, and bewilderment. "Gammon," at length said he, affecting a smile, "do you remember when you, and I, and Dora, went to the play to see some German thing or other—Foss was the name, was n't it?"

"Faust—Faust," interrupted Gammon.

"Well; and now what was the name of that fellow that was always—Meth—Meph—what was it?"

"Mephistopheles," replied Gammon, unable to repress a smile.

"Ah—yes! so it was. That's all; I only wanted to think of the name—I'd forgotten it. I beg you pardon, Gammon."

This was poor Mr. Quirk's way of being very sarcastic with his friend. He thought that he had now cut him to the very quick.

"If it had n't been for what's passed between us to-day, Gammon, I should almost begin to think that you were not sincere in your friendship—"

"Did I ever deceive you? Did I ever attempt to overreach you in any thing, Mr. Quirk?"

"N—o—o—," replied Mr. Quirk, but not in the readiest manner, or most confident tone in the world; "I certainly can't say I ever found you out—but I'll tell you what, we both keep a precious sharp look-out after each other, too, do n't we?" he inquired, with a faint smile, which seemed for a moment reflected upon the face of Gammon.

"How long," said he, "I am to be the subject of such unkind suspicions, I do not know; but your nature is suspicious, and as every one has his fault, that is the alloy in the otherwise pure gold of your manly, kind, and straightforward character. Time may show how you have wronged me. My anxious wish is, Mr. Quirk, to see your daughter occupy a position in which we may all be proud to see her." Here a smile shot across Quirk's anxious countenance, like evening sunshine on troubled waters.

"I do really believe, Gammon," said he, eagerly, "that Dora's just the kind of girl to suit Titmouse—"

"So do I. There's a mingled softness and spirit in Miss Quirk—"

"She's a good girl, a good girl, Gammon! I hope he'll use her well if he gets her." His voice trembled. "She's got very much attached to him! Gad, she's quite altered lately; and my sister tells me that she's always playing dismal music when he's not there. But we can talk over these matters at another time. Gad, Gammon, you can't think how it's relieved me, to open my mind to you on this matter! We quite understand one another now, Gammon—eh?"

"Quite," replied Gammon, pointedly; and Mr. Quirk having quitted the room, the former prepared to answer Messrs. Runnington's letter. But first he leaned back, and reflected on several points of their late conversation. Of course he resolved that Miss Quirk should never become Mrs. Titmouse. And what struck him as not a little singular, was this, viz: that Mr. Quirk should have made no observation on the circumstance that Gammon allowed him to risk his daughter, and her all, upon chances which he pronounced too frail to warrant advancing a thousand or two of money! Yet so it was.

This was the answer he presently wrote to the letter of Messrs. Runnington:

"Saffron Hill.

"GENTLEMEN:
DOE, d. TITMOUSE v. JOLTER.

We are favored with your letter of this day's date, and beg to assure you how very highly we appreciate the prompt and honorable course which has been taken by your client, under circumstances calculated to excite the greatest possible commiseration. Every expression of respectful sympathy, on our parts, and on that of our client, Mr. Titmouse, that you may think fit to convey to your distinguished client, is his.

We shall be prepared to receive possession of the Yatton estates on the day you mention—namely, the 17th May next, on behalf of our client, Mr. Titmouse; on whose behalf, also, we beg to thank you for your communication concerning the last quarter's rents.

"With reference to the question of the mesne profits, we cannot doubt that your client will pursue the same prompt and honorable line of conduct which he has hitherto adopted, and sincerely trust that a good understanding in this matter will speedily exist between our respective clients.

As you have intimated a wish upon the subject, we beg to inform you that we have given instructions for making out and delivering our bill herein.

We are, gentlemen, your humble servants,

"QUIRK, GAMMON & SNAP.

"MESSRS. RUNNINGTON & Co."

Having finished writing the above letter, Gammon sat back in his chair, with folded arms, and entered upon a long train of thought—revolving many matters worthy the profound consideration they then received.

When Gammon and Titmouse returned to town from York, they were fortunate in having the inside of the coach to themselves for nearly the whole of the way—an opportunity which Gammon improved to the utmost, by deepening the impression he had already made in the mind of Titmouse, of the truth of one great fact—namely, that he and his fortunes would quickly part company, if Gammon should at any time so will—which never would, however, come to pass, so long as Titmouse recognised and deferred to the authority of Gammon in all things. In vain did Titmouse inquire how this could be. Gammon was impenetrable, mysterious, authoritative; and at length enjoined Titmouse to absolute secrecy concerning the existence of the fact in question, on pain of the infliction of those consequences to which I have already alluded. Gammon assured him that there were many plans and plots hatching against him (Titmouse); but that it was in his (Gammon's) power to protect him from them all. Gammon particularly enjoined him, moreover, to consult the feelings, and attend to the suggestions of Mr. Quirk, wherein Mr. Gammon did not intimate to the contrary, and wound up all by telling him, that as he, Gammon, was the only person on earth—and this he really believed to be the case, as the reader may hereafter see—who knew the exact position of Titmouse, so he had devoted himself for his life to the advancing and securing the interest of Titmouse.

For about a fortnight after their return, Titmouse, at Gammon's instance, resumed his former lodgings; but at length complained so earnestly of their dismal quietude and of their being out of the way of life, that Gammon yielded to his wishes, and, together with Mr. Quirk, consented to his removing to a central spot—in fact, to the CABBAGE-STALK HOTEL, Covent Garden—a green enough name, to be sure; but it was the family name of a great wholesale green-grocer, who owned most of the property thereabouts. It was not without considerable uneasiness and anxiety that Messrs. Quirk and Snap beheld this change effected, apprehensive that it might have the effect of estranging Titmouse from them; but since Gammon assented to it, they had nothing for it but to acquiesce, considering Titmouse's proximity to his pleasured independence. They resolved, however, as far as in each of them lay, not to let themselves be forgotten by Titmouse. Pending the rule for the new trial, Mr. Quirk was so confident concerning the issue, that he greatly increased the allowance of Titmouse; to an extent, indeed, which admitted of his entering into almost all the gaieties that his as yet scarce initiated heart could desire. In the first place, he constantly added to his wardrobe. Then he took lessons, every other day, in "the noble art of self-defence;" which gave him an opportunity of forming with great ease, at once, an extensive and brilliant circle of acquaintance. Fencing-rooms, wrestling-rooms, shooting-galleries, places for pigeon-shooting, cock-fighting, dog-fighting, and billiard-rooms; the water and boat-racing—these were the dazzling scenes which occupied the chief portion of each day. Then, in the evenings, there were theatres, great and small, the various taverns, and other places of nocturnal resort, which are the pride and glory of the metropolis. In addition to this, at an advanced period of the night, or rather a very early hour in the morning, he sedulously strove to perfect himself in those higher arts and accomplishments, excelled in by the more eminent of the youthful aristocracy, viz., breaking windows, pulling bells, wrenching off knockers, extinguishing lamps, tripping up old women, watchmen, and children, and spoiling their clothes;—ah, how often in his humbler days, had his heart panted in noble rivalry of such feats as these, and emulation of the notoriety they earned for the glittering miscreants who excelled in them! Ah, Titmouse, Titmouse! Macte nova virtute, puer!

That he could long frequent such scenes as these without forming an extensive and varied acquaintance, would be a very unlikely thing to suppose; and there was one who would fain have joined him in his new adventures—one who, as I have already intimated, had initiated him into the scenes with which he was now becoming so familiar; I mean Snap, who had been at once his

"Guide, philosopher, and friend;"

but who now had fewer and fewer opportunities of associating with him, inasmuch as his (Snap's) nose was continually "kept at the grindstone" in Saffron Hill, to compensate for the lack of attention to the business of the office of his senior partners, owing to their incessant occupation with the affairs of Titmouse. Still, however, he now and then contrived to remind Titmouse of his (Snap's) existence, by sending him intimations of interesting trials at the Old Bailey and elsewhere, and securing him a good seat to view both the criminal and the spectators—of the persons of the greatest rank, fashion, and beauty; for so it happens that in this country, the more hideous the crime, the more intense the curiosity of the upper classes of both sexes to witness the miscreant perpetrator; the more disgusting the details, the greater the avidity with which they are listened to by the distinguished auditors;—the reason being plain, that, as they have exhausted the pleasures and excitements afforded by their own sphere, their palled and sated appetites require novel and more powerful stimulants. Hence, at length, we see "fashionables" peopling even the condemned cell,—rushing, in excited groups, after the shuddering malefactor, staggering, half palsied, and with horror-laden eye, on his way to the gallows! As soon as old Quirk had obtained an inkling of Titmouse's taste in these matters, he afforded Titmouse many opportunities of gratifying it. Once or twice the old gentleman succeeded even in enabling Titmouse (severe trial, however, for his exquisite sensibilities!) to shake the cold and pinioned hands of wretches within a few minutes' time of being led out for execution!

This is a brief and general account of the way in which Titmouse passed his time, and laid the groundwork of that solid, extensive, and practical acquaintance with men and things, which was requisite to enable him to occupy with dignity and advantage the splendid station to which he was on the point of being elevated.

But let us not lose sight of our early and interesting friends, the Tag-rags—a thing which both Quirk and Gammon resolved should not happen to Titmouse; for on the very first Sunday after his arrival in town from York, a handsome glass coach might have been seen, about two o'clock in the afternoon, drawing up opposite to the gates of Satin Lodge; from which said coach, the door having been opened, presently descended Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Titmouse. Now, the Tag-rags always dined at about two o'clock on Sundays; and, on the present occasion, Mr., Mrs., and Miss Tag-rag, together with a pretty constant visitor, the Reverend Mr. Dismal Horror, were sitting at their dinner-table, discussing as nice a savory leg of roast pork, with apple sauce, as could at once have tempted and satisfied the most fastidious and the most indiscriminating appetite.

"Oh, ma!" exclaimed Miss Tag-rag faintly, changing color as she caught sight, through the blinds, of the approaching visitors—"if there is n't Mr. Titmouse!" and almost dropping on the table her plate, in which, with an air of tender gallantry, Mr. Horror was in the act of depositing some greens, she flew out of the room, darted up stairs, and in a trice was standing, with beating heart, before her glass, hastily twirling her ringlets round her trembling fingers, and making one or two slight alterations in her dress. Her papa and mamma started up at the same moment, hastily wiping their mouths on the corners of the table cloths; and, after a hurried apology to their reverend guest, whom they begged "to go on eating till they came back"—they bounced into the drawing-room, just time enough to appear as if they had been seated for some time; but they were both rather red in the face, and flustered in their manner. Yet, how abortive was their attempt to disguise the disgraceful fact of their having been at dinner when their distinguished visitors arrived! For, firstly, the house was redolent of the odors of roast-pork, sage and onion-stuffing, and greens; secondly, the red-faced servant girl was peering round the corner of the kitchen stairs, as if watching an opportunity to whip off a small dinner tray that stood between the dining-room and drawing-room; and thirdly, they caught a glimpse of the countenance of the reverend guest, who was holding open the dining-room door just wide enough to enable him to see who passed on to the drawing-room; for, in truth, the name which had escaped from the lips of Miss Tag-rag, was one that always excited unpleasant feelings in the breast of her spiritual friend.

"Ah! Mr. and Mrs. Tag-rag! 'Pon my soul—glad to see you—and—hope you're all well!" continued Titmouse, with an air of easy confidence and grace. Mr. Gammon calmly introduced himself and Mr. Quirk. Just at that moment neither Mr. nor Mrs. Tag-rag were sure whether they stood upon their heads or their feet.

"We were just going to sit down to—hush," said Mr. Tag-rag, hurriedly.

"You won't take a little, will you, gentlemen?" inquired Mrs. Tag-rag, faintly; and both the worthy couple felt infinite relief on being assured that their distinguished visitors had already lunched. Neither of them could take their eyes off Mr. Titmouse, whose easy nonchalance convinced them that he must have been keeping the society of lords. He was just inquiring, as he ran his hand through his hair, any gentlemanly light ebony cane against his leg—after Miss Tag-rag, when, pale and agitated, and holding in her hand a pocket handkerchief suffused with musk and bergamot, designed to overcome so much of the vulgar odor of dinner as might be lingering about her—that interesting young lady entered. Titmouse rose and received her in a familiar, forward manner; she turning white and red by turns. (She looked such a shrivelled, little, ugly, formal creature, that Titmouse conceived quite a hatred of her, though recollecting that he had once thought such an inferior piece of goods superior. Old Quirk and Tag-rag, every now and then, cast distrustful glances at each other; but Gammon kept all in a calm flow of small talk, which at length restored those whom they had come to see, to something like self-possession. As for Mr. Quirk, the more he looked at Miss Tag-rag, the more pride and satisfaction he felt in reflecting upon the unfavorable contrast she must present, in Titmouse's eyes, to Miss Quirk. After a little further conversation, principally concerning the brilliant success of Titmouse, Mr. Quirk came to the business of the day, and invited Mr., Mrs., and Miss Tag-rag to dinner at Alibi House, on the ensuing Sunday, at six o'clock—apologizing for the absence of Miss Quirk, on the score of indisposition—she being at the time in the highest possible state of health. Mrs. Tag-rag was on the point of saying some thing deprecatory of their dining out on Sunday, as contrary to their rule; but a sudden recollection of the earthly interests she might peril by so doing, aided by a fearful, significant glance from Mr. Tag-rag, restrained her. The invitation was, therefore, accepted in a very obsequious manner; and soon after their great visitors took their departure, leaving Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Tag-rag in a state of considerable excitement. Goodness! could there be a doubt that there must be some very potent attraction at Satin Lodge to bring thither Titmouse, after all that had occurred? And where could reside the point of that attraction, but in Miss Tag-rag?

As soon as their visitors, glass-coach had driven off—it's inmates laughing heartily at the people they had just quitted—Mr., Mrs., and Miss Tag-rag returned to the dining-table, like suddenly disturbed fowls returning to their roost, when the disturbance has ceased. Profuse were their apologies to Mr. Horror: not aware, however, that he had improved the opportunity afforded by their absence to recruit his energies with a couple of glasses of port wine from a decanter which stood on the sideboard—a circumstance which he did not deem important enough to mention. Vehemently suspecting as he did, what was the state of things with reference to Mr. Titmouse and Miss Tag-rag, it was somewhat of a trial of temper to the exemplary young pastor, to have to listen, for the remainder of the afternoon, to the praises of Titmouse, and speculations concerning the immensity of his fortune. In vain did the worthy minister strive, every now and then, to divert the current of conversation into a more profitable channel—i. e. towards himself; all he said was evidently lost upon her for whose ear it was intended. She was in a revelry, and often sighed. The principal figures before her mind's eye were—TITMOUSE, TITMOUSE, Esq., and THE REV. DISMAL HORROR. The latter was about twenty-six, (he had been called to the work of the ministry in his sixteenth year); short; his face slightly pitted with small-pox; his forehead narrow; his eyes cold and watery; no eye-brows or whiskers; high cheek bones; his short sand-colored hair combed plainly forward over each temple, and twisted into a sort of top-knot in front; he wore no shirt-collar, but had a white neck-handkerchief tied very formally, and was dressed in an ill-made suit of black. He spoke in a drawling, canting tone; and his countenance was overspread with a demure expression of cunning, trying to look religious. Then he was always talking about himself, and the devil, and his chapel, and the bottomless pit, and the number of souls which he had saved, and the number of those whom he knew were damned, and many more who certainly would be damned. All this might be very well in its way, began to think Miss Tag-rag—but it was possible to choke a dog with a pudding. Poor girl, can you wonder at her dwelling fondly upon the image of Titmouse? So splendidly dressed—so handsome—such a fashionable air—and with—ten thousand a-year! When she put all these things together, it almost looked like a dream: such good fortune could never be in store for a poor simple girl like herself. Yet there was such a thing as—love at first sight! After tea they all walked down to Mr. Horror's meeting-house. It was very crowded; and it was remarked that the eloquent young preacher had never delivered a more impassmoned-sermon from that pulpit: it was sublime. Oh how bitterly he denounced "worldly-mindedness!" What a vivid picture he drew of the flourishing green bay-tree of the wicked, suddenly blasted in the moment of its pride and strength; while the righteous should shine like stars in the firmament for ever and ever! Who could not see here shadowed out the characters of Titmouse and of Horror respectively? who could hesitate between the two? And when at length, the sermon over, he sat down in his pulpit, (the congregation also sitting, and singing,) and drew gracefully across his damp forehead his white pocket handkerchief, which had been given him by Miss Tag-rag, and looked with an air of most interesting languor and exhaustion towards Mr. Tag-rag's pew, where sat Miss Tag-rag—her father the wealthiest man in the congregation, and she his only child—he felt a lively and tender interest in her welfare—her spiritual welfare, and resolved to call the next morning; entertaining an humble hope that his zealous labors had not been in vain! Was one fruit of them to have been looked for in the benignant temper which Tag-rag, to the amazement of his shopmen, evinced the next morning, for at least an hour? Would that the like good effects had been visible in Mrs. and Miss Tag-rag; but—alas that I should have to record it!—it was so far otherwise, that they laid aside their fancy-fair work for the whole week, which they devoted to the preparation of those dresses with which they proposed the profanation of the ensuing Sunday.

That day at length arrived, and precisely at six o'clock a genteel fly deposited the visitants from Satin Lodge at the splendid entrance of Alibi House. There was the big footman—shoulder-knot, red breeches, and all. Tag-rag felt a little nervous. Before they had entered the gates, the fond, proud parents had kissed their trembling daughter, and entreated her "to keep her spirits up!" The exhortation was needful; for when she saw the sort of style that awaited them, she became not a little agitated. When she entered the hall—ah! on a chair lay a glossy new hat, and a delicate ebony walking-stick; so he had come—was then up stairs! Miss Tag-rag trembled in every limb.

"I don't know, my dear," whispered Mrs. Tag-rag, to her husband, with a subdued sigh, as they followed the splendid footman up stairs, "it may be all uncommon grand; but somehow I'm afraid we're doing wrong—it's the Lord's day—see if any good comes of it."

"Tut—hold your tongue! Let's have no nonsense," sternly whispered Mr. Tag-rag to his submissive wife.

"Your name, sir?" quoth the footman, in a gentlemanly way.

"Mr., Mrs., and Miss Tagrag," replied Mr. Tag-rag, after clearing his throat; and so they were announced, Miss Quirk coming forward to receive the ladies with the most charming affability. There stood Titmouse, in an easy attitude, with his hands tucked into his coat pockets, and resting on his hips, in a very delicate and elegant fashion. How completely he seemed at his ease!

"Oh Lord!" thought Tag-rag, "that's the young fellow I used to go on so to!"

In due time dinner was announced; and who can describe the rapture that thrilled through the bosoms of the three Tag-rags, when Mr. Quirk requested Mr. Titmouse, to take down—Miss Tag-rag! Her father took down Mrs. Alias; Mr. Quirk, Mrs. Tag-rag; and Gammon, Miss Quirk. She really might have been proud of her partner. Gammon was about thirty-eight years old; of average height; with a particularly gentlemanly appearance and address, and an intellectual and even handsome countenance, though occasionally it wore, to a keen observer, a sinister expression. He had a blue coat, a plain white waistcoat, not disfigured by any glistening fiddle-faddle of pins, chains, or quizzing-glasses, black trousers, and silk stockings. There was at once an appearance of neatness and carelessness; and there was such a ready smile—such a bland case and self-possession about him—as communicated itself to those whom he addressed. I hardly know, Mr. Gammon, why I have thus noticed so particularly your outward appearance; it certainly, on the occasion I am describing, struck me much; but there are such things as whited walls and painted sepulchres. Dinner went off very pleasantly, the wines soon communicating a little confidence to the flustered guests. Mrs. Tag-rag had drunk so much champagne—an usual beverage for her—that almost as soon as she had returned to the drawing-room, she sat down on the sofa and fell asleep, leaving the two young ladies to amuse each other as best they might; for Mrs. Alias was very deaf, and moreover very stiff and distant, and sat looking at them in silence. To return to the dining-room for a moment. 'Twas quite delightful to see the sort of friendship that seemed to grow up between Quirk and Tag-rag, as their heads got filled with wine: at the same time each of them drawing closer and closer to Titmouse, who sat between them—volubility itself. They soon dropped all disguise—each plainly under the impression that the other could not, or did not, observe him; and altogether, impelled by their overmastering motives, they became so barefaced in their ecyphancy—evidently forgetting that Gammon was present—that he could several times, with only the utmost difficulty, refrain from bursting into laughter at the earnest devotion with which these two worshippers of the little golden calf strove to attract the attention of their divinity, and recommend themselves to its favor.

At length the four gentlemen repaired to the drawing-room, whence issued the sounds of music; and on entering, they beheld the two lovely performers seated at the piano, engaged upon a duet. The plump flaxen-haired Miss Quirk, in her flowing white muslin dress, her thick gold chain, and massive bracelets, formed rather a strong contrast to her sallow, skinny little companion, in a span-new slate-colored silk dress, with staring scarlet sash; her long cork-screw ringlets glistening in bear's grease: and as for their performance, Miss Quirk played boldly and well through her part, a smile of contempt now and then beaming over her countenance at the ridiculous incapacity of her companion. As soon as the gentleman made their appearance the ladies ceased, and withdrew from the piano; Miss Tag-rag, with a sweet air of simplicity and conscious embarrassment, gliding towards the sofa, where sat her mamma asleep, but whom she at once awoke. Mr. Quirk exclaimed, as, evidently elevated with wine, he slapped his daughter on her fat back, "Ah, Dora, my dove!" while Tag-rag kissed his daughter's cheek, and squeezed her hand, and then glanced with a proud and delighted air at Titmouse, who was loling at full length upon the other sofa, picking his teeth. While Miss Quirk was making tea, Gammon gaily conversing with her, and in an undertone satirizing Miss Tag-rag; the latter young lady was gazing, with a timid air, at the various elegant nick-nacks scattered upon the tables and alaba. One of these consisted of a pretty little box, about a foot square, with a glass lid, through which she saw the contents; and they not a little surprised her. They were pieces of cord; and on looking at one of the sides of the box, she read, with a sudden shudder,—"With these cords were tied the hands of Arthur Grizzlegut, executed for high treason, 19th November, 18—. Presented, as a mark of respect, to Caleb Quirk, Esq., by John Ketch." Poor Miss Tag-rag recoiled from the box as if she had seen it filled with writhing adders. She took an early opportunity, however, of calling her father's attention to it; and he pronounced it a "most interesting object," and fetched Mrs. Tag-rag to see it. She agreed first with her daughter, and then with her husband. Quietly pushing her investigations, Miss Tag-rag by and by beheld a large and splendidly bound volume—in fact, Miss Quirk's album; and, after turning over most of the leaves, and glancing over the "poetical effusions" and "prose sentiments," which few fools can abstain from depositing upon the embossed pages, when solicited by the lovely proprietresses of such works, beheld—her heart fluttered—poor Miss Tag-rag almost dropped the magnificent volume; for there was the idolized name of Mr. Titmouse—no doubt his own handwriting and composition. She read it over eagerly again and again,—

"Tittlebat Titmouse is my name,
England is my nation;
London is my dwelling place,
And Christ is my salvation."

It was very—very beautiful—beautiful in its simplicity! She looked anxiously about for writing implements; but not seeing any, was at length obliged to trust to her memory; on which, indeed, the exquisite composition was already inscribed in indelible characters. Miss Quirk, who was watching her motions, guessed the true cause of her excitement; and a smile of mingled scorn and pity for her infatuated delusion shone upon her face; in which, however, there appeared a little anxiety when she beheld Titmouse—not, however, perceiving that he did so in consequence of a motion from Gammon, whose eye governed his movements as a man's those of his spaniel—walk up to her, and converse with a great appearance of interest. At length Mr. Tag-rag's "carriage" was announced. Mr. Quirk gave his arm to Mrs. Tag-rag, and Mr. Titmouse to the daughter; who endeavored, as she went down the stairs, to direct melting glances at her handsome and distinguished companion. They evidently told, for she could not be mistaken; he certainly once or twice squeezed her arm—and the last fond words he uttered to her were, "Pon my soul—it's early; devilish sorry you're going!" As the Tag-rags drove home, they were all loud in the praises of those whom they had just quitted, particularly of those whose splendid hospitality they had been enjoying. With a daughter, with whom Mr. Quirk must naturally have wished to make so splendid a match as that with Titmouse,—but who was plainly engaged to Mr. Gammon—how kind and disinterested was Mr. Quirk, in affording every encouragement in his power to the passion which Titmouse had so plainly conceived for Miss Tag-rag! And was there ever so delightful a person as Gammon! How cordially he had shaken the hands of each of them at parting! As for Miss Tag-rag, she almost felt that, if her heart had not been so deeply engaged to Titmouse, she could have loved Mr. Gammon.

"I hope Tabby," said Mrs. Tag-rag, "that when you are Mrs. Titmouse, you'll bring your dear husband to hear Mr. Horror? You know, we ought to be grateful to the Lord—for He has done it."

"La, ma, how can I tell?" quoth Miss Tag-rag, petulently. "I must go where Mr. Titmouse chooses, of course; and no doubt he'll take sittings in one of the West End churches: you know, you go where pa goes—I go where Titmouse goes! But I will come sometimes, too—if it's only to show that I'm not above it, you know. La, what a stir there will be! The three Miss Knippes—I do so hope they'll be there! I'll have your pew, ma, lined with red velvet; it will look so genteel."

"I'm not quite so sure, Tabby, though," interrupted her father, with a certain swell of manner, "that we shall, after a certain event, continue to live in these parts. There's such a thing as retiring from business, Tabby: besides, we shall nat'ally wish to be near you."

"He's a love of a man, pa, isn't he?" interrupted Miss Tag-rag, with irrepressible excitement. Her father folded her in his arms. They could hardly believe that they had reached Satin Lodge. That respectable structure, somehow or other, now looked to the eye of all of them shrunk into most contemptible dimensions. What was it to the spacious and splendid residence which they had quitted? And what, in all probability could that be to the mansion—or perhaps several mansions—to which Mr. Titmouse would be presently entitled, and—in his right—some one else?

Whilst the brilliant success of Tittlebat Titmouse was exciting so great a sensation among the inmates of Satin Lodge and Alibi House, there were also certain quarters in the upper regions of society, in which it produced a considerable commotion, and where it was contemplated with feelings of intense interest; nor without reason. For indeed, to you, reflective reader, much pondering men and manners, and observing the influence of great wealth, especially suddenly and unexpectedly acquired, upon all classes of mankind—it would appear passing strange that so prodigious an event as that of an accession to a fortune of ten thousand a-year, and a large accumulation of money besides, could be looked on with indifference in those regions where money

"Is like the air they breathe—if they have it not, they die;" in its absence, all their "honor, love, obedience, troops of friends," disappear like snow under sunshine; the edifice of pomp, luxury, and magnificence that "rose like an exhalation," so disappears—

"And like an unsubstantial pageant faded, Leaves not a rack behind."

Take away money, and that which raised its delicate and pampered passions above the common condition of mankind—that of privation and want, and anxiety—into one entirely artificial, ~~and~~ <sup>altogether</sup> totally new wants and desires, is gone, all gone; and its occupants suddenly fall, as it were, through a highly rarefied atmosphere, breathless and dismayed, into contact with the chilling exigencies of life, of which till then, they had only heard and read, sometimes with a kind of morbid sympathy, as we do hear and read of a foreign country, not starting the while from our snug homes, by whose comfortable and luxurious fire-sides we read of the frightful palsy of cold of the polar regions, and for a moment sigh over the condition of their miserable inhabitants, as vividly pictured to us by adventurous travellers.

If the reader had reverently cast his eye over the pages of that glittering centre of aristocratic literature, and inexhaustible solace against the ~~onset~~ <sup>onset</sup> of a wet day—I mean De-brett's Peerage, his attention could not have failed to be rivetted among a galaxy of brilliant but minor stars, by the radiance of one transcendent constellation. Behold; hush; tremble!—AUGUSTUS MORTIMER PLANTAGENET FITZ-URSE, EARL OF DREDDLINGTON, VISCOUNT FITZ-URSE, AND BARON DRELLINCOURT; KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN FLEECE; K. G., G. C. B., D. C. L., F. R. S., &c., &c.; Lieutenant-General in the army, Colonel of the 37th regiment of light dragoons; Lord Lieutenant of—shire; elder brother of the Trinity House; formerly Lord Steward of the Household; succeeded his father PERCY COWSTAR-TINE FITZ-URSE as fifth Earl, and twentieth in the Barony, January 10th, 1795; married, April 1, 1799, the Right Hon. Lady Philippa Emmeline Blanche Macpleuchan, daughter of Archibald, ninth duke of Tantaloon, K. T., and has issue an only child.

"CECILIA PHILIPPA LEOPOLDINA PLANTAGENET, born June 10, 1790.

"Town residence, Grosvenor Square.

"Seats, Gruncaghoolaghan Castle, Galway; Tre-ardevor Manor, Cornwall; Llimryllwrcwpliglylly Abbey, N. Wales; Tullyclachnach Palace, N. Britain; Poppleton Hall, Hertfordshire.

"Earldom, by patent, 1667; — Barony, by writ of summons, Hen. II."

Now, as to the above tremendous list of seats and residences, be it observed that the existence of two of them, viz., Grosvenor Square and Poppleton Hall, was tolerably well ascertained by the residence of the august proprietor of them, and the expenditure therein of his princely revenue of £5000 a-year. The existence of the remaining ones, however, the names of which the diligent chronicler has preserved with such scrupulous accuracy, had become somewhat problematical since the era of the civil wars and the physical derangement of the surface of the earth in those parts, which one may conceive to have taken place* consequent upon those events; those imposing feudal residences having been originally erected in positions so carefully selected with a view to their security against aggression, as to have become totally inaccessible, and, indeed, unknown, to the present inglorious and degenerate race, no longer animated by the spirit of chivalry and adventure.

[I have now recovered my breath, after my bold flight into the resplendent regions of aristocracy; but my eyes are still dazzled.]

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH,

Book the Second....Mary the Queen.

XXXIV....How the Princess Elizabeth was confronted with Sir Thomas Wyatt in the Torture Chamber.

As Elizabeth passed beneath the portal of the Bloody Tower, on her way to the Lieutenant's lodgings, whither she was conducted, after quitting Traitor's Gate, by Bedingfield and Sumax, she encountered the giants, who doffed their caps at her approach, and fell on their knees. All three were greatly affected, especially Magog, whose soft and sensitive nature was completely overcome. Big tears rolled down his cheeks, and in attempting to utter a few words of consolation, his voice failed him. Touched by his distress, Elizabeth halted for a moment, and, laying her hand on his broad shoulder, said, in a tone, and with a look calculated to enforce her words, "Bear up, good fellow, like a man. If I shed no tears myself, those who love me need shed none. It is the duty of my friends to comfort, not to dishearten me. My case is not so hopeless as you think. The Queen will never condemn the innocent, and unheard. Get up, I say, and put a bold face on the matter, or you are not your father's son."

Roused by this address, Magog obeyed; and, rearing his bulky frame to its full height, so that his head almost touched the spikes of the portcullis, cried in a voice of thunder, "Would your innocence might be proved by the combat, madam, as in our"—and he hesitated—"I mean your royal father's time! I would undertake to maintain your truth against any odds. Nay, I and my brethren would bid defiance to your whole host of accusers!"

"Though I may not claim you as champions," replied Elizabeth, "I will fight my own battle as stoutly as you could fight it for me!"

"And your Grace's courage will prevail," rejoined Og.

"My innocence will," returned Elizabeth.

"Right!" cried Gog. "Your Grace, I am assured, would no more harbor disloyalty against the Queen than we should, seeing that—"

"Enough!" interrupted the Princess, hastily. "Farewell, good friends," she continued, extending her hand to them which they eagerly pressed to their lips; "farewell! Be of good cheer! No man shall have cause to weep for me."

"This is a proud, though a sad day," observed Og, who was the last honored by the Princess's condescension, "and will never be obliterated from my memory. By my father's beard!" he added, gazing rapturously at the long taper fingers he was permitted to touch, "it is the most beautiful hand I ever beheld, and white as the driven snow."

Pleased by the compliment—for she was by no means insensible to admiration—Elizabeth forgave its unseasonableness for its evident sincerity, and smilingly departed. But she had scarcely ascended the steps leading to the green, when she was chilled by the sight of Renard, who was standing at the northern entrance of the Bloody Tower, wrapped in his cloak, and apparently waiting to see her pass.

As she drew near, he stepped forward, and made her a profound but sarcastic salutation. His insolence, however, failed in its effect upon Elizabeth. Eyeing him with the utmost disdain, she observed to Bedingfeld, "Put that Spanish knave out of my path! And he who will remove him from the Queen's councils will do both her and me a good turn."

"Your Grace has sufficient room to pass," returned Renard, with bitter irony, and laying his hand upon the hilt of his sword, as if determined to resist any attempts to remove him, "Your prison within the Bell Tower is prepared; and, if my counsel have any weight with her majesty, you will quit it only to take the same path, and ascend the same scaffold as your mother, Anne Boleyn."

"Such another taunt," cried Sussex, fiercely, "and neither the sacred character of your office, nor the protection of the Queen, shall save you from my sword!"

And he thrust him forcibly backward. Elizabeth moved on at a slow and stately pace, while the guard, closing round her and Sussex, opposed the points of their halberds to the infuriated ambassador.

"Your Highness has increased Renard's enmity," observed Bedingfeld, with a troubled look.

"I fear him not," replied Elizabeth, dauntlessly. "Let him do his worst; English honesty will ever prove more than a match for Spanish guile."

Entering the Lieutenant's lodgings and traversing the long gallery already described as running in a westerly direction, Elizabeth soon reached the upper chamber of the Bell Tower, which, she was informed by Sir Thomas Brydges, was appointed for her prison.

"It is a sorry lodging for a King's daughter," she observed, "and for one who may be Queen of this realm. But since my sister will have it so, I must make shift with it. How many attendants are allowed me?"

"One female," replied Brydges.

"Why not deprive me of all?" cried the Princess, passionately. "This chamber will barely accommodate me. I will be alone."

"As your Grace pleases," replied Brydges, "but I cannot exceed my authority."

"Can I write to the Queen?" demanded Elizabeth.

"You will be furnished with writing materials, if it is your purpose to prepare your confession," returned the Lieutenant. "But it must be delivered to the council, who will exercise their discretion as to transmitting it to her Highness."

"Ah!" exclaimed the Princess, "am I at their mercy?" "Alas, madam, you are so!" replied Bedingfeld, "but the Chancellor is your friend."

"I am not sure of that," returned Elizabeth. "Oh, that I could see the Queen, were it but for one minute. My mother perished because she could not obtain a hearing of my royal sire, whose noble nature was abused in respect to her; and the Duke of Somerset himself told me that if his brother the Admiral had been allowed speech of him, he would never have consented to his death. But it is ever thus. The throne is surrounded by a baneful circle, whose business it is to prevent the approach of truth. They keep me from my sister's presence, well knowing that I could clear myself at once, while they fill her ears with false reports. Bedingfeld, you are her faithful servant, and, therefore, not my enemy. Tell her, if she will grant me an audience alone, or before her councillors, I will either prove my innocence, or consent to lose my head. Above all, implore her to let me be confronted with Wyatt, that the truth may be extorted from him."

"The interview would little benefit your grace," remarked Brydges. "Wyatt confesses your privacy to the rebellion."

"He lies!" replied Elizabeth, fiercely. "The words have been put into his mouth with the vain hope of pardon. But he will recant them if he sees me. He dare not, will not, look me in the face and aver that I am a partner in his foul practices. But I will not believe it of him. Despite his monstrous treason, he is too brave, too noble-minded, to act so recreant a part."

"Wyatt has undergone the question ordinary and extraordinary, madam," replied Brydges; "and though he endured the first with surprising constancy, his fortitude sunk under the severity of the latter application."

"I forgive him," rejoined Elizabeth, in a tone of commiseration. "But it proves nothing. He avowed thus much to escape further torture."

"It may be," returned Brydges, "and, for your Grace's sake, I hope it is so. But his confession, signed with his own hand, has been laid before the Queen."

"Ah!" exclaimed Elizabeth, sinking into the only seat which the dungeon contained.

"I beseech your Highness to compose yourself," cried Bedingfeld, compassionately. "We will withdraw and leave you to the care of your attendant."

"I want no assistance," replied Elizabeth, recovering herself. "Will you entreat her Majesty to grant me an audience on the terms I have named, in the presence of Wyatt?"

"It must be speedy, then," remarked Brydges, "for he is adjudged to die to-morrow."

"To-morrow!" echoed Elizabeth. "Nay, then, good Bedingfeld, seek the Queen without delay. Implore her by the love she once bore me—by the love I am assured she bears me still—to interrogate me before this traitor. If he perishes with this uncontradicted, I am lost."

"Your words shall be repeated to her Highness," replied Bedingfeld, "and I will not fail to add my entreaties to your own. But I cannot give you a hope that your request will be granted."

"It is fortunate for your highness that the Queen visits the Tower to-day," observed Brydges. "Her arrival is momentarily expected. As I live!" he exclaimed, as the bell was rung overhead, and answered by the beating of drums and the discharge of cannon from the batteries, "she is here!"

"It is heaven's interposition in my behalf!" cried Elizabeth. "Goto her at once, Bedingfeld. Let not the traitor Renard get the start of you. I may live to requite the service. Go—go."

The old knight obeyed, and the others immediately afterward retired, closing the door upon the Princess, and placing a guard outside.

Left alone, Elizabeth flew to the narrow and strongly grated loophole, commanding the southern ward, through which the Queen must necessarily pass on her way to the palace, in the hope of catching a glimpse of her. She had not to wait long. Loud fanfares of trumpets resounded from the gate of the By-ward Tower. These martial flourishes were succeeded by the trampling of steeds, and fresh discharges of ordnance; and the next moment a numerous retinue of horse and foot emerged from the gateway. Just as the royal litter appeared it was stopped by Sir Henry Bedingfeld, and the curtains were drawn aside by Mary's own hand. It was a moment of intense interest to Elizabeth, and she watched the countenance of the old knight as if her life depended on each word he uttered. At first she could not see the Queen's face; but as Bedingfeld concluded, Mary leaned forward and looked up at the Bell Tower. Uncertain whether she could be seen, Elizabeth determined to make her presence known; and, thrusting her head through the bars, waved her kerchief. Mary instantly drew back. The curtains of the litter were closed, Bedingfeld stepped aside, and the cavalcade moved on.

"She will not see me!" cried Elizabeth, sinking back in despair. "I shall perish like my mother."

The Princess's agitation did not subside for some time. Expecting Bedingfeld to return with the tidings that Mary had refused her request, she listened anxiously to every sound, in the hope that it might announce his arrival. Hour after hour passed by, and he came not; and, concluding that he did not like to be the bearer of ill news, or, what was yet more probable, that he was not allowed to visit her, she made up her mind to the worst.

Elizabeth had not the same resources as Jane, under similar circumstances. Though sincerely religious, she had not the strong piety that belonged to the other, nor could she like her divorce herself from the world, and devote herself wholly to God. Possessing the greatest fortitude, she had no resignation; and, while capable of enduring any amount of physical suffering, could not control her impatience. Her thoughts were bitter and mortifying enough, but she felt no humiliation; and the only regrets she indulged were at having acted so unwise a part. Scalding tears bedewed her cheeks—tears that would none have been shed, if any one had been present; and her mingled emotions of rage and despair, were so powerful, that she had much ado to overcome them. Ungovernable fury against Mary took possession of her, and she pondered upon a thousand acts of revenge. Then came the dreadful sense, of her present situation—of its hopelessness, its despair. She looked at the stone walls by which she was inclosed, and invoked them to fall upon her, and crush her, and she rushed towards the massive and iron-girded door, as if she would dash herself against it with impotent fury. Her breast was ravaged by fierce and conflicting passions; she grasped it convulsively to prevent herself from executing the desperate deeds that suggested themselves to her. In after years, when the crown was placed upon her head, and she grasped one of the most powerful sceptres ever swayed by female hand—when illustrious captives were placed in that very dungeon, by her commands, and one royal victim near almost to her as a sister, lingered out her days in hopeless captivity, only to end them on the block—at such seasons she often recalled her own imprisonment, often in imagination endured its agonies, but never once with a soft or relenting heart. The sole thought that now touched her, and subdued her violence, was that of Courtenay. Neither his unworthiness nor his inconstancy could shake her attachment. She loved him deeply and devotedly—with all the strength and fervor of her character; and, though she had much difficulty in saving him from her contempt, this feeling did not abate the force of her regard. The idea that he would perish with her in some degree reconciled her, to her probable fate.

Thus meditating, alternately roused by the wildest resentment, and softened by thoughts of love, Elizabeth passed the remainder of the day without interruption. Worn out, at length, she was about to dispose herself to slumber, when the door was opened, and Sir Thomas Brydges, accompanied by two serving-men and a female attendant, entered the room. Provisions were placed before her by the men, who instantly withdrew, and Brydges was about to follow, leaving the female attendant behind, when Elizabeth stopped him, and inquired what answer Sir Henry Bedingfeld had brought from the Queen.

"My orders are to hold no communication with your Grace," replied the Lieutenant.

"At least tell me when I am to be examined by the Council," rejoined Elizabeth. "The meanest criminal has a right to be so informed!"

But Brydges shook his head, and, quitting the chamber, closed the door, and barred it outside.

Controlling her feelings, as she was now no longer alone, Elizabeth commanded her attendant to awaken her in an hour, and threw herself upon the couch. Her injunctions were strictly complied with, and she arose greatly refreshed. A lamp had been left her; and, taking up a book of prayers, she addressed herself to her devotions, and, while thus occupied, her mind gradually resumed its composure. About midnight the door was opened by the Lieutenant, who entered with Nightgall and two other officials in sable robes, while a guard of halberdiers, bearing torches, remained without.

"I must request your Grace to follow me," said Brydges.

"Whither?" demanded Elizabeth, rising. "To the Queen's presence?"

The Lieutenant made no answer.

"To the Council?" resumed the Princess, "or to execution? No matter. I am ready." And she motioned the Lieutenant to lead on.

Sir Thomas Brydges obeyed, and, followed by the Princess, traversed the gallery, descended the great staircase, and entered a spacious chamber on the ground floor. Here he paused for a moment, while a sliding panel in the wall was opened, through which he and his companion passed.

A short flight of stone steps brought them to a dark, narrow passage, and they proceeded silently and slowly along it, until their progress was checked by a strong iron door, which was unfastened and closed behind them by Nightgall. The jarring of the heavy bolts, as they were shot into their sockets, resounded hollowly along the arched roof of the passage, and smote forcibly upon Elizabeth's heart; and she required all her constitutional firmness to support her.

They were now in one of those subterranean galleries, often described before, on either side of which were cells, and the clangor called forth many a dismal response. Presently afterwards, they arrived at the head of a staircase, which Elizabeth descended, and found herself in the torture-chamber. A dreadful spectacle met her gaze. At one side of the room, which was lighted by a dull lamp from the roof, and furnished as before with numberless hideous implements—each seeming to have been recently employed—sat, or rather was supported, a wretched man, upon whom every refinement of torture had evidently been practiced. A cloak was thrown over his lower limbs, but his ghastly and withered features proved the extremity of suffering to which he had been subjected. Elizabeth could scarcely believe that in this miserable object, whom it would have been a mercy to despatch, she beheld the once bold and haughty Sir Thomas Wyatt.

Placed on the corner of a leathern couch, and supported by Wolfytt and Surrocolde, the latter of whom bathed his temples with some restorative, Wyatt fixed his heavy eyes upon the Princess. But her attention was speedily diverted from him to another person, whose presence checked her feelings. This was the Queen, who stood on one side, with Gardiner and Renard. Opposite them was Courtenay, with his arms folded upon his breast. The latter looked up as Elizabeth entered the chamber; and, after gazing at her for a moment, turned his regards, with an irrepressible shudder, to Wyatt. Knowing that her safety depended upon her firmness, Elizabeth disguised all appearance of compassion, and, throwing herself at the Queen's feet, cried, "Heaven bless your highness for granting me this interview! I can now prove my innocence."

"In what way?" demanded Mary, coldly. "It would indeed rejoice me to find I have been deceived. But I cannot shut my ears to the truth. You traitor," she continued, pointing to Wyatt, "who dared to rise in arms against his Sovereign, distinctly charges you with participation in his rebellious designs. I have his confession, taken from his own lips, and signed with his own hand, wherein he affirms, by his hopes of mercy from the Supreme Judge before whom he will shortly appear to answer for his offences, that you encouraged his plans for my dethronement, and sought to win the crown for yourself, in order to bestow it with your hand upon your lover, Courtenay."

"It is false!" cried Elizabeth; "false as the califf who invented it—false as the mischievous councillor who stands beside you, and who trusts to work my ruin! But, by our father's soul, it shall go hard if I do not requite him! Your Majesty has not a more loyal subject than myself, nor has any of your subjects a more loving sister. This wretched Wyatt, whose condition would move my pity were he not so heinous a traitor, may have written to me, but, on my faith, I have never received his letters."

"Lord Russell's son declares that he delivered them into your own hands," observed Mary.

"Another lie, as false as the first!" replied Elizabeth. "It is a plot, your Highness—a contrivance of my enemy, Simon Renard. Where is Lord Russell's son? Why is he not here?"

"You shall see him anon, since you desire it," replied Mary. "Like yourself, he is a prisoner in the Tower. But these assertions do not clear you."

"Your Highness says you have Wyatt's confession," rejoined Elizabeth. "What faith is to be attached to it? It has been wrung from him by the severity of the torture to which he has been subjected. Look at his shattered frame, and say whether it is not likely he would purchase relief from such suffering as he must have endured at any cost. The sworn tormentors are here. Let them declare how often they have stretched him on the rack, how often applied the thumb-screw—before this false charge was wrung from him. Speak, fellows! how often have you racked him?"

But the tormentors did not dare to reply. A stifled groan broke from Wyatt, and a sharp convulsion passed over his frame.

"The question has only extorted the truth," observed Mary.

"If the accusation so obtained be availing, the reaction must be equally so," replied Elizabeth. "Sir Thomas Wyatt," she exclaimed, in a loud and authoritative tone, and stepping toward him, "if you would not render your name for ever infamous, you will declare my innocence."

The sufferer gazed at her, as if he did not clearly comprehend what was said to him.

Elizabeth repeated the command, and in a more peremptory tone.

"What have I declared against you?" asked Wyatt, faintly.

"You have accused me of countenancing your traitorous practices against the Queen's Highness, who now stands before you," rejoined Elizabeth. "You well know it is false. Do not die with such a stain upon your knight-hood and your honor. The worst is over. Further application of the rack would be fatal, and it will not be resorted to because you would thus escape the scaffold. You can have, therefore, no object in adhering to this vile fabrication of my enemies. Retract your words, I command you, and declare my innocence!"

"I do!" replied Wyatt, in a firm tone. "I have falsely accused you, and was induced to do so in the hope of pardon. I unsay all I have said, and will die proclaiming your innocence."

"It is well," replied Elizabeth, with a triumphant glance at the Queen.

"Place me at the feet of the Princess," said Wyatt to his supporters. "Your pardon, madam," he added, as the order was obeyed.

"You have it," replied Elizabeth, scarcely able to repress her emotion. "May God forgive you as I do."

"Then your former declaration was false, thou perjured traitor!" cried Mary, in amazement.

"What I have said I have said," rejoined Wyatt; "what now say is the truth." And he motioned the attendants to raise him, the pain of kneeling being too exquisite for endurance.

"And will you adhere to your declaration?" pursued Mary.

"To my last breath," gasped Wyatt.

"At whose instigation were you induced to charge the Princess with conspiring with you?" demanded Renard, stepping forward.

"At yours," returned Wyatt, with a look of intense hatred. "You, who have deceived the Queen—deceived me—and would deceive the devil, your master, if you could—you urged me to it—you—ha! ha!" And with a convulsive attempt at laughter, which communicated a horrible expression to his features, he sank into the arms of Wolfytt, and was conveyed to a cell at the back of the chamber, the door of which was closed.

"My innocence is established," said Elizabeth, turning to the Queen.

"Not entirely," answered Mary. "Wyat's first charge was supported by Lord Russell's son."

"Take me to him, or send for him hither," rejoined Elizabeth. "He has been suborned, like Wyatt, by Renard. I will stake my life that he denies it."

"I will not refute the idle charge brought against me," observed Renard, who had been for a moment confounded by Wyatt's accusation. "Your majesty will at once discern its utter groundlessness."

"I ask no clemency for myself," interposed Courtenay, speaking for the first time; "but I beseech your highness not to let the words of that false and crafty Spaniard weigh against your sister. From his perfidious counsels all these disasters have originated."

"You would screen the Princess in the hope of obtaining her hand, my lord," replied Mary. "I see through your purpose, and will defeat it."

"So far from it," replied the Earl, "I here solemnly renounce all pretensions to her."

"Courtenay!" exclaimed Elizabeth, in a tone of anguish.

"Recent events have cured me of love and ambition," pursued the earl, without regarding her. "All I desire is freedom."

"And is it for one so unworthy that I have entertained this regard?" cried Elizabeth. "But I am rightly punished."

"You are so," replied Mary, bitterly. "And you now taste some of the pangs you inflicted upon me."

"Hear me, gracious madam," cried Courtenay, prostrating himself before the Queen. "I have avowed thus much, that you may attach due credit to what I am about to declare concerning Renard. My heart was yours, and yours only, till I allowed myself to be influenced by him. I knew not then his design, but it has since been fully revealed. It was to disgust you with me that he might accomplish the main object of his heart—the match with the Prince of Spain. He succeeded too well. Utterly inexperienced, I readily yielded to the allurements he spread before me. My indiscretions were reported to you. But, failing in alienating me from your regard, he tried a deeper game, and chose out as his tool the Princess Elizabeth."

"Ha!" exclaimed Mary.

"He it was," pursued Courtenay, "who first attracted my attention towards her—who drew invidious comparisons between her youthful charms and your majesty's more advanced age. He it was who hinted at the possibility of an alliance between us—who led me on step by step, till I was completely enmeshed. I will own it. I became desperately enamored of the Princess. I thought no more of your highness—of the brilliant prospects lost to me; and, blinded by my passion, became reckless of the perilous situation in which I placed myself. But now that I can look calmly behind me, I see where, and why I fell—and I fully comprehend the tempter's motives."

"What says your excellency to this?" demanded Mary, sternly.

"Much that the Earl of Devonshire has asserted is true," replied Renard. "But in rescuing your majesty, at any cost, from so unworthy an alliance, I deserve your thanks rather than your reprobation. And I shall ever rejoice that I have succeeded."

"You have succeeded at my expense, and at the expense of many of my bravest and best subjects," replied Mary, severely. "But the die is cast, and cannot be recalled."

"True," replied Renard, with a smile of malignant satisfaction.

"Will your highness pursue your investigation further tonight?" demanded Gardiner.

"No," replied the Queen, who appeared lost in thought. "Let the Princess Elizabeth be taken back to the Bell Tower, and Courtenay to his prison in the Bowyer Tower. I will consider upon their sentence. Wyatt is respited for the present. I shall interrogate him further."

With this she quitted the torture-chamber with her train, and the prisoners were removed as she had directed.

XXXV. . . . How Xit discovered the secret of his birth; and how he was knighted under the title of Sir Narcissus Le Grand.

Life is full of the saddest and the strongest contrasts. The laugh of derision succeeds the groan of despair—the revel follows the funeral—the moment that ushers the new-born babe into existence, is the last, perchance, of its parent—without the prison walls, all is sunshine and happiness—within, gloom and despair. But throughout the great city which it commanded, search where you might, no stronger contrasts of rejoicing and despair could be found, than were now to be met with in the Tower of London. While, on the one hand, every dungeon was crowded, and scarcely an hour passed that some miserable sufferer did not expire under the hand of the tormentor, or the public executioner; on the other, there was mirth, revelry, and all the customary celebrations of victory. As upon Mary's former triumph over her enemies, a vast fire was lighted in the centre of the Tower Green, and four oxen, roasted whole at it, were distributed, together with a proportionate supply of bread, and a measure of ale or mead, in rations, to every soldier in the fortress; and, as may be supposed, the utmost joviality prevailed. To each warder was allotted an angel of gold, and a dish from the royal table; while to the three giants were given the residue of a grand banquet, a butt of Gascon wine, and, in consideration of their valiant conduct during the siege, their yearly fee, by the Queen's command was trebled. On the night of these festivities, a magnificent display of fire-works took place on the Green, and an extraordinary illumination was effected by means of a row of barrels filled with pitch, ranged along the battlements of the White Tower, which being suddenly lighted, cast forth a glare that illuminated the whole fortress, and was seen at upwards of twenty miles' distance.

Not unmindful of the Queen's promise, Xit, though unable to find a favorable opportunity of claiming it, did not fail to assume all the consequence of his anticipated honors. He treated those with whom he associated with the utmost haughtiness; and, though his arrogant demeanor only excited the merriment of the giants, it drew many a sharp retort, and not a few blows, from such as were not disposed to put up with his insolence. The subject that perpetually occupied his thoughts, was the title he ought to assume;—for he was thoroughly dissatisfied with his present appellation. "Base and contemptible name!" he exclaimed. "How I loathe it!—and how did I acquire it? It was bestowed upon me, I suppose, in my infancy, by Og, to whose care I was committed. A mystery hangs over my birth. I must unravel it. Let me see:—Two-and-twenty years (come Martinmas), I was deposited at the door of the Byward Tower in a piece of blanket!—unworthy swaddling cloth for so illustrious an infant—a circumstance which fully proves that my noble parents were anxious for concealment. Stay! I have heard of changelings—of elfin children left by fairies in the room of those they steal. Can I be such a one? A shudder crosses my frame at the bare idea. And yet my activity, my daring, my high mental qualities, my unequalled symmetry of person, small though it be—all these seem to warrant the supposition. Yes! I am a changeling. I am a fairy child. Yet hold! this will not do. Though I may entertain these notions in secret of my alliance with the invisible world, they will not be accepted by the incredulous multitude. I must have some father, probable or improbable. Who could he have been? Or who might he have been? Let me see. Sir Thomas More was imprisoned in the Tower about the time of my birth. Could I not be his son? It is more than probable. So was the Bishop of Rochester. But to claim descent from him would bring scandal upon the church. Besides, he was a Catholic prelate. No, it must be Sir Thomas More. That will account for my wit. Then about the same time there were the Lord Darcy; and Robert Salisbury, Abbot of Vale Crusis; the Prior of Doncaster; Sir Thomas Percy; Sir Francis Bygate; and Sir John Bulmer. All these were prisoners, so that I have plenty to choose from. I will go and consult Og. I wonder whether he has kept the piece of blanket in which I was wrapped. It will be a gross omission if he has not."

LE CHATEAU DE VANDYK.

From an unpublished volume.

BY CHARLES LEVER, ESQ.

On the 8th day after my arrival at Brussels, I told my wife to pack up; for, as Mr. Thyseus the lawyer, who promised to write before that time, had not done so, we had nothing to wait for. We had seen Waterloo, visited the Musée, skated about in Liston slippers through the Palais d'Orange, dined at Duboss, eat ice at Velloni's, bought half the old lace in the Rue de la Madeleine, and almost caught an ague in the Allee Verte. This was, certainly, pleasure enough for one week; so I ordered my bill, and prepared to evacuate Flanders. Lord help us, what things we are! had I gone down to the railroad by the Bouvelards, and not by the Montagne de la Cour, what miseries might I not have been spared. Mr. Thyseus's clerk met me, just as I emerged from the Place Royale, with a letter in his hand.

"Ah, Monsieur, quel plaisir de vous voir—voilà une lettre pour vous."

I took it—opened—and read:

"Sir—I have just completed the purchase of the beautiful Chateau of Vanderstratendontk, with all its gardens, orchards, pheasantries, piscinæ, prairies, and forest rights, which are now your property. Accept my most respectful congratulations upon your acquisition of this magnificent seat of ancient grandeur, rendered doubly precious by its having been once the favorite residence and chateau of the great Vandyk."

Here followed a long encomium upon Reubens and his school, which I did not half relish, knowing it was charged to me in my account, the whole winding up with a pressing recommendation to hasten down at once to take possession, and enjoy the partridge-shooting, then in great abundance.

My wife was in ecstasy to be The Frow von Vanderstratendontk, with a fish pond before the door, and twelve gods and goddesses in lead around it. To have a brace of asthmatic peacocks on a terrace, and a dropsical swan on an island, were strong fascinations, not to speak of the straight avenues, leading nowhere, and the winds of heaven blowing everywhere. A house with a hundred and thirty windows, and half as many doors, none of which would shut close; a garden, with no fruit but crab apples; and a nursery, so called, because the play ground of all the brats for a league round us. No matter, I had resolved to live abroad for a year or two; one place would do just as well as another; at least, I should have quietness; that was something: there was no neighborhood, no town, no high road, no excuse for travelling acquaintances to drop in, or rambling tourists to bore one with letters of introduction. Thank God! there was neither a battle-field, a cathedral, a picture, nor a great living poet, for ten miles on every side.

Here, thought I, I shall have that peace Piccadilly cannot give. Cincinnatus-like, I'll plant my cabbages, feed my turkeys, let my beard grow, and nurse my rental. Solitude never bored me; I could bear anything but intrusive impertinence; and, so far did I carry this feeling that, on reading Robinson Crusoe, I laid down the volume in disgust on the introduction of his man Friday.

It mattered little, therefore, that the coulour de rose picture the lawyer had drawn of the chateau, had little existence out of his own florid imagination: the quaint old building, with its worn tapestries and faded furniture, suited the habit of my soul, and I hugged myself often in the pleasant reflection that my London acquaintances would be puzzling their brains for my whereabouts, without the slightest clue to my detection. Now, had I settled in Florence, Frankfurt, or Geneva, what a life I must have led! There is always some dear Mrs. Somebody going to live in your neighborhood, who begs you'll look out for a house for her: something very eligible; eighteen rooms well furnished, a southern aspect, in the best quarter; a garden indispensable; and all for some forty pounds a year: or some other dear friend who desires you'll find a governess with more accomplishments than Malibran, and more learning than Porson, with the temper of five angels, and a vow in heaven to have no higher salary than a college bed-maker. Then there are the Thompsons passing through, whom you have taken care never to know before, but who fall upon you now, as strangers in a foreign land, and take the benefit of the alien act in dinners at your house during their stay. I stop not to enumerate the crying wants of the more lately arrived resident, all of which are refreshed for your benefit; the recommendations to butlers who do a't cheat, to moral music-masters, grave dancing-masters, and doctors who never take fees; every infraction by each of these individuals in his peculiar calling being set down as a just cause of complaint against yourself, requiring an animated correspondence in writing, and concluding with an abject apology, and a promise to cut the delinquent that day, though you owe him a half-year's bill.

These were all pleasant—not to speak of the curse of disjointed society, ill assorted, ill conceived, unreasonable pretension, vulgar impertinence, and fawning toadyism on every side, and not one man to be found, to join you in laughing at the whole thing, which would amply repay one, for any endurance.

No, thought I, I've had enough of Florence, I'll try my bark in quieter waters, and though it's only a punt, yet I'll hold the sculls myself, and that's something.

So much for the self-gratulation I indulged in, as the old chaise de poste rattled over the heavy pavement, and drew short up at the portico of my future dwelling. My wife was charmed with the procession of villagers who awaited us on the steps, and, although an uglier population never trod their mother earth in wooden slippers, fancied she could detect several faces of great beauty and much interest in the crowd. I saw nothing but an indiscriminate haze of cotton nightcaps, striped jackets, blouses, black petticoats and sabots: so, pushing my way through them, I left the bazon and the Burgo-master, to the united delights of their music and eloquence, and, shutting the hall door, threw myself in a seat and thanked heaven that my period of peace and tranquillity was at length to begin.

Peace and tranquillity! What airy visions! Had I selected the post of cad to an omnibus, a steward to a Greenwich steamer, were I a guide to the monument or a waiter at Long's, my life had been one of dignified repose, in comparison with my present existence.

I had not been a week in the chateau, when a travelling Englishman sprained his ankle, within a short distance of the house. As a matter of course he was brought there, and taken every care of for the few days of his stay: he was fed, housed, leeches, and stumped, and, when at length he proceeded upon his journey, was profuse in his acknowledgements for the services rendered him: and yet, what was the base return of the ungrateful man? . . . I have scarcely temper to record it. During the very moment when we were most lavish in our attention to him, he was sapping the very peace of his benefactors. He learned from the Flemish servants of the house that it had formerly been the favorite residence of Vandyk; that the very furniture then there was unchanged since his time; the bed, the table, the chair he sat on were all preserved. The wretch!—am I not warranted in calling him so?—made notes of all this, and, before I had been three weeks in my abode, out came a "Walk in Flanders," in two volumes, with a whole chapter about me, headed "CHATEAU DE VANDYK." . . . There we were, myself and my wife, in every window of the Row—Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, Brown and Green had bought us at a price, and paid for us: there we were—we who courted solitude and retirement, to be read of by every puppy in the west end and every apprentice in Cheapside. Our hospitality was lauded as if I kept open house for all comers, with "hot chops and brown gravy at a moment's notice." The antiquary was bribed to visit me by the fascinations of the spot, sacred to the reveries of genius; the sportsman by the account of my preserves; the idler, to say he had been there; and the guide-book maker and historical biographer to vamp up details for a new edition of "Belgium as it is, or Vandyk and his Contemporaries."

From the hour of the publication of that d—d book, I never enjoyed a moment's peace and ease. The whole tide of my travelling countrymen—and what a flood it is!—came pouring into Ghent. Post horses could not be found sufficient for half the demand; the hotels were crowded; respectable peasants gave up their daily employ, to become guides to the chateau; and little busts of Vandyk were hawked about the neighborhood by children of four years old. The great cathedral of Ghent—Van Scamp's pictures—all the historic remains of that ancient city, were at a discount; and those who formerly exhibited them, as a livelihood, were now thrown out of bread. Like the dancing master who has not gone up to Paris for the last summer, or the physician who has not taken up the stethoscope, they were reputed old-fashioned and passés; and, if they could not describe the Chateau de Vandyk, were voted among the by-gones.

The impulse once given, there was no stopping; the current was irresistible; the double lock on the gate of the avenue, the bull dog at the hall door, the closed shutters, the cut away bell-rope, announced a firm resolution in the fortress not to surrender; but we were taken by assault, escaladed, and starved out in turns.

Scarcely was the tea-urn on the breakfast table, when they began to pour in; old and young, the halt, the one-eyed, the fat, the thin, the melancholy, the merry, the dissipated, the dyspeptic, the sentimental, the jocular, the blunt, the ceremonious, the courtly, the rude, the critical, the free and easy: one came forty miles out of his way, and pronounced the whole thing an imposition and myself a humbug; another insisted upon my getting up at dinner, that he might sit down in my chair, characterised by the confounded guides, as "la chaise de Vandyk;" a third went so far as to propose lying down in the great four-post bed, just to say he had been there, though my wife was then in it. I speak not of the miserable practice of cutting slices of all the furniture as relics. John Murray took an inventory of the whole contents of the house for a new edition of his guide-book, and Holman the blind traveller, felt me all over with his hand, as I sat at tea with my wife; and, last of all, a respectable cheese monger from the Strand, after inspecting the entire building from the attics to the cellar, pressed sixpence into my hand at parting, and said, "Happy to see you, Mr. Vandyk, if you come into the city!"

Then the advice and counsel I met with, oral and written, would fill a volume, and did; for I was compelled to keep an album in the hall for the writer's names.

One suggested that my desecration of the temple of genius would be less disgusting, if I dined in my kitchen and left the ancient dining room as the great artist had left it.

Another hinted that my presence in my own house destroyed all the illusions of its historic associations.

A third, a young lady—to judge by the writing—proposed my wearing a point beard and lace ruffles, with trunk hose and a feather in my hat; probably to favor the illusion so urgently mentioned by the last writer, and, perhaps, to indulge visitors like my friend the cheesemonger.

Many pitied me—well might they!—as one insensible to the associations of the spot; while my very servants, regarding me only as a show part of the establishment, neglected their duties on every side, and betook themselves to ciceronehip, each allocating his peculiar territory to himself; like the people who show the lions and the armor in the Tower.

No weather was either too hot or too cold, too sultry or too boisterous, no hour too late or too early, no day was sacred. If the family were at prayers, or at dinner, at breakfast or in bed, it mattered not: they had come many miles to see the chateau, and see it they would.

Alas! thought I, if, as some learned persons suppose, individuals be recognisable in the next world, what a melancholy time of it will be yours, poor Vandyke! If they make all this hubbub about the house you lived in, what will they do about your fleshly tabernacle?

As the season advanced, the crowds increased, and, as autumn began, the conflicting currents to and from the Rhine all met in my bed-room. There took place all the rendezvous of Europe. Runaway daughters there first repented in papa's arms, and profligate sons, promised amendment for the future. Myself and my wife were passed by unnoticed and disregarded amid this tumult of recognition and salutation. We were emaciated like skeletons: our meals we eat when we could, like soldiers on a retreat, and we slept in our clothes, not knowing at what moment the enemy might be upon us. Locks, bolts, and bars were ineffectual: our resistance only increased curiosity, and our garrison was ever open to bribery.

It was to no purpose that I broke the windows, to let in the north wind and acute rheumatism; to little good did I try an alarm of fire every day about two, when the house was fullest; and I failed signally in terrifying my torturers when I painted the gardener's wife sky blue, and had her placed in the hall, with a large label over her bed, "collapsed cholera." Bless your heart, the tourist cares for none of these, and I often think it would have saved English powder and shot to have exported half a dozen of them to the East, for the siege of St. Jean d'Acre. Had they been only told of an old picture, a tea-pot, a hearth brush—or a candlestick that once belonged to Godfrey de Bouillon or Peter the Hermit, they would have stormed it under all the fire of Egypt. Well it's all over at last: human patience could endure no longer, we escaped by night, got away by stealth to Ghent, took post-horses in a feigned name, and fled from the Chateau de Vandyk, as from the plague. Determined no longer to trust to chances, I have built a cottage myself, which has no historic associations further back than six weeks ago; and fearful even of being known as the ex-départ possessor of the chateau, never confess to have been in Ghent in my life, and, if Vandyk be mentioned, ask if he is not the postmaster at Tervueren.

Here then I conclude my miseries. I cannot tell what may be the pleasure that awaits the live lion, but I envy no man the delights that fall to his lot, who inhabits the den of the dead one.

A MAN TALKING TO HIMSELF.—One word concerning Lord Dudley's habit of talking to himself, which contributed not a little to extend his reputation for eccentricity. Like many men of studious, reflecting turn, he banqueted on his own ideas, and thought aloud. Words clearly were not given him to conceal what was "going on within doors." He told too often the whole truth, which, in polite society, has a tendency to be libellous. He was, in truth, more susceptible of bore than of fog: and fastidious refinement is too often the cause of more misery than enjoyment in this world, where perfection is the exception. "Nothing," observes Petrarch, "is so tiresome as conversing with people who have not the same information as oneself." "Lord Dudley," says Byron, "was good when he liked." He was never absent, never flagged, when pitted against opponents worthy of his steel; the fit audience of his wit and illustration. The anecdotes of his soliloquies are innumerable: "ab uno disce omnes." He had a particular dislike to be asked to give any one a lift in his carriage, in which he thought over the occurrences of the day, more, perhaps, than half the members of the Royal College of Physicians. An ingenious tormentor of Brookes's begged him to give a cast to a homeward-bound, unconscious victim. It could not be refused. The unhappy pair set out in their chariot, and arrived silently near Mount-street, when Lord Dudley muttered audibly, "What a bore! It would be civil to say something. Perhaps I had better ask him to dinner. I'll think about it." His companion, a person of infinite fancy, and to whom Lord Dudley afterwards took a liking, re-muttered, after a due pause, "What a bore! Suppose he should ask me to dinner! what should I do? I'll think about it."—[Quarterly Review.

THE GRAY FOREST EAGLE.

BY ALFRED B. STREET.

With storm-daring pinion and sun-gazing eye,
The GRAY FOREST EAGLE is King of the sky!
Oh, little he loves the green valley of flowers,
Where sunshine and song cheer the bright summer hours,
For he hears in those haunts only music, and sees
Only rippling of waters and waving of trees;
There the red-robin warbles, the honey-bee hums,
The timid quail whistles, the sky partridge drums;
And if those proud pinions, perchance, sweep along,
There's a shrouding of plumage, a hushing of song;
The sunlight falls stilly on leaf and on moss,
And there's nought but his shadow black gliding across;
But the dark, gloomy gorge, where down plunges the foam
Of the fierce rock-lash'd torrent, he claims as his home:
There he blends his keen shriek with the roar of the flood,
And the many-voiced sounds of the blast-smitten wood;
From the crag-grasping fir-top, where morn hangs its wreath,
He views the mad waters while writhing beneath:
On a limb of that moss-bearded hemlock far down,
With bright azure mantle and gay mottled crown,
The kingfisher watches, while o'er him his foe,
The fierce hawk, sails circling, each moment more low:
Now poised are those pinions and pointed that beak,
His dread swoop is ready, when, hark! with a shriek
His eye-balls red-blazing, high bristling his crest,
His snake-like neck arched, talons drawn to his breast,
With the rush of the wind-gust, the glancing of light,
The Gray Forest Eagle shoots down in his flight;
One blow of those talons, one plunge of that neck,
The strong hawk hangs lifeless, a blood-dripping wreck;
And as dives the free kingfisher, dart-like on high
With his prey soars the Eagle, and melts in the sky.

A fitful red glaring, a low rumbling jar
Proclaim the storm demon yet raging afar:
The black cloud strides upward, the lightning more red,
And the roll of the thunder more deep and more dread;
A thick pall of darkness is cast o'er the air,
And on bounds the blast with a howl from its lair:
The lightning darts zig-zag and forked through the gloom,
And the bolt launches o'er with crash, rattle, and boom;
The Gray Forest Eagle, where, where has he sped?
Does he shrink to his eyrie, and shiver with dread?
Does the glare blind his eye? Has the terrible blast
On the wing of the sky-king a fear-fetter cast?
No, no, the brave Eagle! he thinks not of fright;
The wrath of the tempest but rouses delight;
To the flash of the lightning his eye casts a gleam,
To the shriek of the wild blast he echoes his scream,
And with front like a warrior that speeds to the fray,
And a clapping of pinions, he's up and away!
Away, oh, away, soars the fearless and free!
What reck he the sky's strife?—its monarch is he!
The lightning darts round him, undaunted his sight;
The blast sweeps against him, unwavering his flight;
High upward, still upward, he wheels, till his form
Is lost in the black scowling gloom of the storm.
The tempest sweeps o'er with its terrible train,
And the splendor of sunshine is glowing again;
Again smiles the soft, tender blue of the sky,
Waked bird-voices warble, fann'd leaf-voices sigh;
On the green grass dance shadows, streams sparkle and run,
The breeze bears the odor its flower-kiss has won,
And full on the form of the demon in flight
The rainbow's magnificence gladdens the sight!
The Gray Forest Eagle! oh, where is he now,
While the sky wears the smile of its God on its brow?
There's a dark, floating spot by yon cloud's pearly wreath,
With the speed of the arrow 't is shooting beneath;
Down, nearer and nearer it draws to the gaze,
Now over the rainbow, now blent with its blaze,
To a shape it expands, still it plunges through air,
A proud crest, a fierce eye, a broad wing are there;
'T is the Eagle—the Gray Forest Eagle—once more
He sweeps to his eyrie: his journey is o'er!

Time whirls round his circle, his years roll away,
But the Gray Forest Eagle minds little his sway;
The child spurns its buds for Youth's thorn-hidden bloom,
Seeks Manhood's bright phantoms, finds Age and a tomb;
But the Eagle's eye dims not, his wing is unbowed,
Still drinks he the sunshine, still scales he the cloud!
The green tiny pine-shrub points up from the moss,
The wren's foot would cover it, tripping across;
The beech-nut down dropping would crush it beneath,
But 't is warm'd with heav'n's sunshine, and fanned by its breath;
The seasons fly past it, its head is on high,
Its thick branches challenge each mood of the sky;
On its rough bark the moss a green mantle creates,
And the deer from his antlers the velvet-down grates:
Time withers its roots, it lifts sadly in air
A trunk dry and wasted, a top jag'd and bare,
Till it rocks in the soft breeze, and crashes to earth,
Its blown fragments strewing the place of its birth.
The Eagle has seen it up-struggling to sight,
He has seen it defying the storm in its might,
Then prostrate, soil-blended, with plants sprouting o'er,
But the Gray Forest Eagle is still as of yore.
His flaming eye dims not, his wing is unbowed,
Still drinks he the sunshine, still scales he the cloud!
He has seen from his eyrie the forest below
In bud and in leaf, robed with crimson and snow.
The thickets, deep wolf-lair, the high crag his throne,
And the shriek of the panther has answered his own.
He has seen the wild red man the lord of the shades,
And the smoke of his wigwags curl thick in the glades;
He has seen the proud forest melt breath-like away,
And the breast of the earth lying bare to the day;
He sees the green meadow-grass hiding the lair,
And his crag-throne spread naked to sun and to air;
And his shriek is now answered, while sweeping along,
By the low of the herd and the husbandman's song;
He has seen the wild red man off-swept by his foes,
And he sees dome and roof where those smokes once arose;
But his flaming eye dims not, his wing is unbowed,
Still drinks he the sunshine, still scales he the cloud!

An emblem of Freedom, stern, haughty and high,
Is the Gray Forest Eagle that King of the sky!
It scorns the bright scenes, the gay places of earth—
By the mountain and torrent it springs into birth;
There rocked by the wild wind, baptised in the foam,
It is guarded and cherished, and there is its home!
When its shadow steals black o'er the empires of Kings,
Deep terror, deep heart-shaking terror, it brings;
Where wicked Oppression is armed for the weak,
Then rustles its pinion, then echoes its shriek;
Its eye flames with vengeance, it sweeps on its way,
And its talons are bathed in the blood of its prey.
Oh, that Eagle of Freedom! when cloud upon cloud
Swathed the sky of my own native land with a shroud,
When lightnings gleamed fiercely, and thunderbolts rung,
How proud to the tempest those pinions were flung!
Though the wild blast of battle swept fierce through the air
With darkness and dread, still the Eagle was there;
Unquailing, still speeding, his swift flight was on,
Till the rainbow of Peace crowned the victory won.

Oh, that Eagle of Freedom! age dims not his eye,
He has seen Earth's mortality spring, bloom and die!
He has seen the strong nations rise, flourish and fall,
He mocks at Time's changes, he triumphs o'er all:
He has seen our own land with wild forests o'erspread,
He sees it with sunshine and joy on its head;
And his presence will bless this his own chosen clime,
Till the Archangel's fiat is set upon Time.

MOORE'S DESCRIPTION OF NIAGARA FALLS.—When we arrived at the inn in the neighborhood of the Falls, it was too late to think of visiting them that evening; and I lay awake almost the whole night with the sound of the cataract in my ears. The day following I consider as a sort of era in my life; and the first glimpse I caught of that wonderful cataract gave me a feeling which nothing in this world can ever awaken again. It was through an opening among the trees, as we approached the spot where the full view of the Falls was to burst upon us, that I caught this glimpse of the mighty mass of waters folding smoothly over the edge of the precipice; and so overwhelming was the notion it gave me of the awful spectacle I was approaching, that during the short interval that followed, imagination had far outrun the reality; and, vast and wonderful as was the scene that then opened upon me, my first feeling was that of disappointment. It would have been impossible, indeed, for anything real to come up to the vision I had in these few seconds formed of it; and those awful Scriptural words, "The fountains of the great deep were broken up," can alone give any notion of the vague wonders for which I was prepared. But in spite of the start thus got by imagination, the triumph of reality was, in the end, but the greater; for the gradual glory of the scene that opened upon me soon took possession of my whole mind; presenting, from day to day, some new beauty or wonder, and, like all that is most sublime in nature or art, awakening sad, as well as elevating thoughts. I retain in my memory but one other dream—for such do events so long past appear—which can in any respect be associated with the grand vision I have just been describing; and, however different the nature of their appeals to the imagination, I should find it difficult to say on which occasion I felt most deeply affected, when looking on the Falls of Niagara, or when standing by moonlight among the ruins of the Coliseum.—[Moore's Preface to his Poems.

LOVE PLAYS.—Almost every one of Beaumont and Fletcher's fifty-two dramas is founded upon Love. This fact might even alone serve for a gauge to mete the genius of our authors. Among all poetic subjects, love is the easiest to succeed with, being the most popular. To select it over-often is therefore a mark of weakness; a proof of impotence to handle subjects which interest less universally, enthusiastically. No dramatist who has a heart will eschew love-subjects; but they will be always chosen by many dramatists who have nothing else. Now to form the complete poet, neither heart only, nor head only, is sufficient; the complete poet must have a heart in his brain, or a brain in his heart. Such was Shakespeare, complete in both in the highest degree. Love, however, must not (as often imagined) pass for the sole emotion which evinces heart. Shakespeare evinces much throughout all his plays, though many are independent of that emotion altogether or almost—"Macbeth," to wit. A supreme poet, by native taste and ambition rather aspires to loftier subjects, as an eagle soars among cliffs and clouds, nor builds like the turtle-dove even on the most beautiful tree of the forest, though he may rock himself there awhile in the topmost branches. Out of Shakespeare's thirty-six dramas there are one-third decided love-plays—a due proportion: but his greater dramas, "Lear," "Hamlet," "Macbeth," "Othello," admit this passion subordinately, or not at all. Love-plays will ever be most popular in a voluptuous age, evidencing its effeminateness. Few of any other kind appeared under the Restoration, England's most dissolute, feel'-ruined, contemptible era. * * * When the "tender passion" becomes hacknied, it loses in real tenderness: when made too common a subject, it declines into somewhat worse than common-place, maudlin namby-pamby. Woman is passed rather than caressed by Etherege, Wycherley, and Vanbrugh; set up rather as a butt for compliments by Congreve, Dryden, &c., than a shrine for deep-murmured vows, prayers, and praises.

JOE MILLER.—Although this personage is constantly quoted, very few persons know who he was. His name was John Motley, born in 1692. He wrote several dramatic pieces. He was dreadfully troubled with the gout, particularly in his right hand, which prevented him frequently from writing, and he was confined to his bedroom for two years; but, under all these trying circumstances, he maintained a cheerful temper, and gave to the world, about the year 1720, the book that bears the title of "Joe Miller's Jests." Motley wrote a portion of the popular farce called "The Devil to Pay." Queen Caroline, (wife of George II.) when Princess of Wales, commanded a play to be performed for Motley's benefit, and disposed of a great many tickets with her own hand in the drawing-room, and most of them were paid for in gold. So much for the author of "Joe Miller's Jests."

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1841

THE EVERGREEN.

A Monthly Magazine of Popular Literature,
EDITED BY PARK BENJAMIN.

In the March Number of this periodical, two new stories will be commenced—viz: OLD ST PAUL'S, a new romance by W. Harrison Ainsworth, author of Jack Sheppard, Rookwood, Crichton, &c., and GEORGE ST. GEORGE JULIAN, a new romance by the author of Stanley Thorn, Valentine Vox, &c. These works are not published in the New World; and it is the intention of the conductors of the Evergreen hereafter to give it a separate and independent character, except so far as it is requisite to conclude those New World stories already in progress.

When the Evergreen was first begun, in January, 1840, it was intended merely to make it a repository of the best articles which appeared in the New World; since the latter, appearing at that time in a folio form only, was difficult of preservation. But since the Quarto edition of the New World has gone into successful operation, THE EVERGREEN becomes unimportant as to the object for which it was established. It has, therefore, been determined to give it a character of its own—to make it a monthly compendium of the best issues of the English press, which, by reason of its preoccupation, cannot find places in the New World. In this way, being original in its reprints, it will have an intrinsic value, separate from any other publication.

THE EVERGREEN is the cheapest Magazine published—viz: $2 per annum in advance. Back numbers can be supplied. J. WINCHESTER, Publisher, 30 Ann st.

THE MARKET MONOPOLY.—We were rejoiced to meet with the following article in the EVENING POST of yesterday. It is bold, manly, independent, consistent with the former course of the paper, and just what we hoped for, but were afraid to expect, on account of the party influences to which the Post is necessarily subjected. No other answer than the following is needed to the long-winded articles on this subject, with which the STANDARD has stupefied its readers for weeks past. There is no doubt that the people will follow the advice of the Post, whatever may be the course of the corporation.

We see no reason, for our part, why the Common Council should not at once take upon themselves the responsibility of repealing that part of the market laws which is objected to—namely, the prohibition of selling fresh meats any where but in the markets. The people are, we believe, fully in favor of the repeal. The prohibition cannot be enforced; in fact it was never enforced since our experience, and there can be no surer sign that it is absolutely repugnant to public opinion. The public have pronounced their verdict already—the prohibition is odious, or it would not be constantly violated with impunity. A regulation of the kind ought not certainly to exist after it ceases to be respected.

When the committee say in their report that it is a matter of difficulty for the Corporation Attorney, with the clearest evidence, to obtain the conviction of those who daily violate this law, they tell us in effect that the masses of the people are hostile to the law, and that it is inoperative. Every body knows that there are hundreds of shops in this city, in which fresh meats are sold daily in defiance of the market laws, and without fear of a legal prosecution; and the fact came out the other day that some of them were established by regular butchers who had stalls in the markets, and who took this method to enter into a competition with the unlicensed vendors.

For this reason we should be very glad to see the prohibition abolished without delay, scruple or ceremony—wiped out by the Common Council with a wet sponge, like an old score that is certain never to be paid. Yet if the Common Council really suppose that they have not received sufficient instructions, if they are doubtful of the popular voice, we will not quarrel with them for submitting the question to the people. In such a case the reference to the ballot boxes is a proper one. On the other hand, if, as we fully believe, the popular will has been clearly expressed, it is the business of the Common Council to carry it into effect, without the slightest regard to the odium which they may incur from any particular class of men.

The idea that the butchers who have taken stalls in the markets, ought to be paid back their premiums, arises, no doubt, from a desire to do them ample justice; but we should be glad to see the matter further investigated before this point is settled. That they ought to receive a remuneration for any loss they may suffer by the violation of any express or implied contract made by them with the corporation, we cheerfully admit. Yet, if any part of the premiums has been paid because the stalls are at a cheaper rent than shops, more convenient, or more in the way of common resort, that part ought clearly not to be refunded; inasmuch as those who occupy the stalls, will continue to enjoy all these advantages after the prohibition is repealed. Moreover, if the premiums are paid since the prohibition began to be disregarded, or if, as some contend, the repeal of the prohibition will not sensibly diminish the custom of the butchers in the markets, in either case there is no reason for the return of the premiums. Where no damage is suffered, no damage ought to be allowed. Justice to the tax payers requires that these matters should be fully investigated and settled before any thing is done in regard to the refunding of the premiums.

93—Judge H. W. Fuller, of Augusta, Me., fell dead in Cambridge street, Boston, on Friday evening last. He had been to Cambridge, to see his son.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT'S OPINION OF A BANKRUPT LAW.

—In reply to a great many letters addressed to him from all parts of the nation, requesting his sentiments on the subject of a Bankrupt Law, the Vice-President has published a communication in the Globe, apprising his numerous correspondents of his opinions. He says:

"It will be seen by the framers of that instrument, that the relations between the citizens of different states, and especially between the trading communities of the different towns and cities, would render a uniform system of bankruptcy highly important to their interests. In this grant of power, the patriarchs of our independence evidently considered it the discharge of a sacred duty; and it is difficult for me to assign any good cause why this provision has not been carried into effect, unless it has been prevented by clashing sentiments upon its details, as it cannot be controverted by any that bankrupts, innocent, unfortunate bankrupts, have always existed, upon which such a law would operate; and, in my opinion, the law should be permanent, and not temporary. We are a commercial, an agricultural, and a manufacturing nation, extending from the cold regions of the North to the Capes of Florida, near the torrid zone; and from the Atlantic ocean to the sources of the waters of the Pacific.

Through this vast domain, and with their various pursuits, bankruptcies must always exist; and it is the duty of the Government to make such provision as will be calculated to give the greatest possible relief that can be given consistently with the principles of justice. Congress alone has power to do this, and on them the work devolves, not only as a constitutional right, but as a solemn duty. Both in private and public life I have ever regarded it as a paramount duty to relieve the distressed from every burden, as far as possible, and especially to break that yoke by which none can be benefited, and to soothe, rather than break, the heart already rent with the anguish of misfortune.

It is repugnant to every principle of justice to regard bankruptcy as a presumption of guilt. In the fluctuations of trade, the most honorable men are often its victims; and to hold the person of the debtor subject to his creditor, and to put his future liberty or acquisitions beyond his own control, when he has surrendered all, is to inflict a punishment where there is no crime, nor criminal tribunal to investigate a crime, or to prescribe its punishment.

Credit in trade is based upon confidence in the success of him who obtains it, and ought not in any degree to depend upon a contingent right which the creditor may claim on the liberty or future independence of the debtor. If he chance to be unsuccessful, all that they can claim is a faithful surrender of his remaining effects. Let him give these and begin the world again. What is the effect of subjecting his future acquisition to the seizure of his creditors? It is to stifle in him all spirit of enterprise, and to bind him and his family down to perpetual poverty, without the remotest prospect of benefit to his creditors or to society. A punishment like this, without the conviction of guilt, is too revolting to my feelings to give it my sanction; and it never ought to exist in a free or civilized country. It is said that dishonest persons will sometimes avail themselves of the benefit of a bankrupt law. So unfaithful men may sometimes be elected to legislative bodies, and crimes may sometimes be perpetrated under the cloak of religion. But I would not refuse relief to the unfortunate, nor destroy legislative bodies, nor strive to abolish Christian churches, on account of abuses to which they are all subject; for the same principle is equally applicable to all."

In speaking of the details of a bankrupt law, he continues:

"We should provide a uniform system of bankruptcy upon as liberal principles as justice will warrant; and as experience shall show its imperfections, we should give it such consideration and amendment as will be found equitable. I should expect its provisions to be extended to all classes of citizens of every profession, involuntary as to merchants, and voluntary as to others. The law should embrace all cases existing at the passage of the law, as well as all which may happen in future. Such are my views upon this subject. I do not set up myself as a standard for others; circumstanced as I am, I could not act otherwise without a violation of conscience and the obligations of solemn duty. For I have no doubt that if the system should be established, its beneficial effects would be felt in every part of our country, and especially throughout our whole trading community. It is a system which I believe prevails in every commercial country in Europe, and in every civilized nation on the globe. Indeed, from the earliest antiquity, the Jews, though an agricultural nation, had their septennial years of release, and their general jubilee. It is the same measure in a different form; the same great conservative principle for the same great object."

COLONIZATION.—The annual meeting of the Maryland State Colonization Society was held in the Senate Chamber at Annapolis, on the 26th ult. J. H. B. Latrobe, Esq., President of the Society, gave a full exposition of the affairs of the Colony at Cape Palmas. It is under the government of colored men, having a charter framed after the model of our own institutions, with a code of laws especially drawn up for them. No ardent spirits are allowed within its borders. Cape Palmas occupies the extreme projection of the Western coast of Africa, and is the point which vessels usually make for in sailing towards the Gulf of Guinea and those lower portions of the African continent with which Europeans carry on trade. The most important resolution adopted by the meeting, was one to hold a State Convention of the friends of Colonization in the City of Baltimore, during the ensuing spring.

93—It affords us pleasure to state that the health of the Mayor of this city is greatly improved, and there are strong hopes entertained that he will soon be able to resume the duties of his office.

TO THE OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

GENTLEMEN: Believe me, my motives are solely dictated by a desire to procure an official investigation into the abuses of the navy, that have lately been held up to the eyes of the nation—into offences and crimes of the most revolting nature. The honor of the navy—yes, its very existence as an honorable body—demands this investigation. I consider it a bounden duty you owe to yourselves and the country, that any officer, of whatsoever grade, should use all his influence to bring about a fair and open investigation—either a refutation or an exposition of these alleged or real improprieties. Some I know to be true. Let the offenders fall beneath the severity of well-merited punishment; purge the navy of such men, and it will rise again with renewed purity.

Captains of the navy—you are looked upon as the immediate guardians of our naval honor. To you is entrusted the sacred duty of keeping alive the flames on the altar of our naval glory; is it not alike your duty and desire to spurn from your ranks one who has violated his trust, and disgraced the profession by base, dishonest, and dishonorable actions? Painful as the task is, I offer an additional proof of the unworthiness of a certain captain, lately in command of a ship on the Western coast of America. The relation of one circumstance, from many of a similar nature, will be sufficient.

Not long since one of our national cruisers was laying in a port far up the Gulf of California; and for the first time the glorious stars and stripes, borne at the peak of a man-of-war, were fanned by the gentle breezes of that cloudless clime. To the commander of this ship was entrusted the proud distinction of creating a most favorable and lasting impression on the inhabitants of that unfrequented portion of Mexico, to the advantage of our country's commerce.

The authorities extended all the hospitalities in their power; the town was thrown open to the strangers. The very men, in whose charge the revenue of the port was entrusted, frequented the ship, broke bread with the noble commander—little suspecting that at that very moment their entertaining host had his minions actively employed in violating the laws of the port, and defrauding their country of those just revenues of which they were the protectors. In their absence such iniquity could be enacted with less chance of detection. Some time was spent in that harbor; during the sojourn the approach of night was the signal for action; boats were despatched from the ship, "in the dead watch and middle of the night," to meet at some secluded nook of the harbor, far removed from the usual landing. Men were sent on shore with canvass bags fitting under their clothes; who, after a short absence, returned to the boat in waiting with so heavy and perhaps bulky a freight of money that it was their custom to sham intoxication to avoid the unsuspecting guard stationed on the quay.

This deception was at last discovered, and the ingenious commander was compelled to resort to another. Will you believe, honorable and high-minded captains of the navy, that there is now a man among you who has sent his officers, in full uniform, on shore to defraud the custom house of its dues, and shield the moral theft with an outward display of the button? Such is the fact. In justice to the officers of that ship, be it known, that but two of their number were engaged in this dirty business: one a midshipman, who has already been discharged for drunkenness, the other a brawny Irish carpenter, a fancy man of the captain's. When this last fraud was resorted to, from a scarcity of dishonest officers, men—fore-mast hands—were rigged out in officers' uniforms to assist in this carrying trade. For every dollar smuggled on board, some seven or eight per cent. duties were stolen from the government. No doubt those employed received a hamp now and then, as a reward for their zeal in executing the captain's orders.

They had their gleanings. The harvest was reaped by the commander, who received his two or three per cent. for transportation. Are there any who doubt this? If so, I say ask those who sailed in the —, during her last cruise, to testify its truth. "SPY CAPTAINS WILL HAVE SPY FOLLOWERS."

NATURAL CURIOSITY.—The Boston Society of Natural History have received, through the politeness of D. S. McCauley, Esq., U. S. Consul at Tripoli, two rare varieties of African sheep. Three of these animals, a ram, ewe and lamb, covered with close, thick wool, are fine specimens of the four-horned variety from Benzari, in the Tripoli regency. They are also distinguished by the great breadth of the tail, which occasionally attains the weight of 15 pounds, resembling marrow in its substance, and esteemed a great delicacy by epicures. The fourth specimen, a ram of the Fezzan variety, is clothed with hair, which forms a mane upon the neck and shoulders, and attains a length of several inches on the dewlap. In the hair, as well as the long and slender legs, this animal nearly approaches the goat; while the projecting nose and recurved horns, eminently distinguishes this variety. In its native state the animal inhabits the inaccessible cliffs of the Atlas range, whence a single specimen was recently procured, as a great curiosity, for the Zoological Society of London.

THE KNICKERBOCKER FOR FEBRUARY.—The January number was excellent; but excellent as it was, we do not know that it was superior to this. We are quite satisfied with the Knickerbocker; it is quite as good, in the general run of its articles, as either of the London monthlies—and we are not sure that five dollars a year could be better spent than in encouraging this periodical.

There is nothing here by Washington Irving. We presume that the Crayon papers are not to be discontinued—at least we hope not. The best feature of the number is a magnificent poem by Alfred B. Street, entitled The Gray Forest Eagle. We copy it in the New World, and should copy any thing else if we were so disposed, despite the formidable announcement on the second page, "Entered according to act of Congress, &c.," and of the very polite information conveyed in a note, that "the object of this measure is, not to deny our contemporaries in the country the privilege of selecting such portions of its contents as may suit their taste, but to prevent 'the mammoth journals' of the Atlantic cities from taking from the Magazine, as soon as published, those papers and series of papers which cost us an annual outlay of thousands," &c., &c. We do not take this remark to ourselves, as we have not transferred more than a column to our pages from the Knickerbocker, these six months past.

As much as we like the Knickerbocker, and as sincerely as we esteem the Editor, we cannot but say that this plan of securing a copyright is a small business—excessively small. It is very much like that boyish spirit which says, "Let my things alone!" and it does more hurt than good. If the Knickerbocker's best articles are copied, they are capital advertisements for the Magazine, and get it more subscribers than all the prepared puffs that can be printed. However, this copyright is a mere bugbear, and it can only protect the Magazine from being reprinted as a whole. By universal consent and long usage, parts and portions of copyrighted works have been allowed to be reprinted. Nothing can be recovered from one who merely takes a single short article. Is this not so? If you think not, gentlemen of the Knickerbocker, suppose you commence an action against us for copying Street's poem—we will make it an amicable suit, so please you, upon which to determine this point.

We like the literary and artistic spirit displayed in the Knickerbocker; as a critical Journal, it is not entitled to much respect, being addicted to puffing always. It seldom scores a poor book, and when it does, it indulges in such a vein of unseriousness, (to adopt a Transcendentalism,) that the author and the public laugh, and call the editor "a devilish good-natured fellow, after all!"

THE LIFE OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH, WITH SELECTIONS FROM HIS WRITINGS. By Washington Irving. 121, 123 Family Library—Harper and Brothers.

Mr. Irving informs us that he has prepared these volumes "as a tribute to the memory of one whose writings were the delight of his childhood, and have been a source of enjoyment to him throughout life." The same reverential and kindly feeling must have been excited in the bosom of every one who is at all familiar with the amiable, though whimsical character, and the charming productions of Goldsmith. He was a man to be loved and respected in spite of all his foibles. It is almost superfluous to say, that Mr. Irving has succeeded to admiration in portraying the life of his favorite author. His heart was in his subject, and none better could have been selected for the exercise of his peculiar powers. The selections from Goldsmith's writings will be read with no less delight than his biography.

"WHO SHALL BE HIS?" by the author of the Flirt, &c.

This is one of Miss Pickering's very best novels. The story is told in a simple, unaffected manner, without any struggle after the intense and exaggerated in style and sentiment, which most modern novelists seem to regard as the very perfection of fictitious writing. The tale is suffered to tell itself; we are permitted to enjoy the rare privilege of learning the character and relations of the persons introduced by means of what they do and say, without being bored with pages of useless and tedious description; and we seldom meet with that stereotyped phrase, "let us take a retrospective glance," to warn the reader what passages it will be safe and judicious to skip.

The plot is as simple as the style, and is intended to display the struggle of affection, duty, and sensibility in the heart of a girl, lovely without being tame, witty without malice, and near enough humanity for us to love her as a woman without adoring her as a seraph. It abounds with life, brilliancy, and humor, with much quiet domestic incident, and with some passages that call the unbidden moisture to the eye. We commend it to all our readers who wish to defy "external Jove," and have by the fireside an antidote against this gloomy and abominable weather. (Published by Carey and Hart, Philadelphia; for sale by Wiley and Putnam, Broadway.)

DISEASES OF THE ORGANS OF RESPIRATION, edited by Alexander Tweedie, M.D. F.R.S., with American notes and additions, by W. W. Gerhaud, M.D. Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia.

This is the third volume of a series of original dissertations, written by some of the most eminent medical practitioners in Europe, and intended, when finished, to form a complete library of practical medicine.

The present volume treats of the diseases of the Organs of Respiration, a subject fraught with interest to all who, like us, live in a changeable climate, peculiarly obnoxious to these affections. The preceding volumes of this work have been most favorably received, both abroad and in this country; we can, therefore, but add our feeble tribute to its merits by recommending it to the profession as one of the most able productions of the day. It is beautifully got up, and Dr. Gerhaud has executed his part with industry and ability.

NEW REMEDIES: the method of preparing and administering them; their effects on the Healthy and Diseased Economy: third edition, with numerous modifications and additions. By Robley Dunglison, M.D.

This is a most useful and valuable standard medical work, which is indispensable to a well-chosen library of works on the important science which it advances and explains. Published by Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia. 1 vol. 8vo. pp. 541.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Grand Opera Della Scala of Milan closed its autumnal season previously to the commencement of the Carnival, on the 16th ult. The two operas which had met with the most success were the productions of young and little-known composers out of Italy, viz: "Il Templario," by Nicholai, and "Oberto," by Verdi; these have been favorably received; the first, in particular, is likely to have some run. In the ballet department, for which description of pantomime this splendid theatre ranks so pre-eminent, the present Viceroy of Egypt appears to have figured in as conspicuous a part as on the political stage, but with more success. The new ballet, "Ali Pasha di Giamina," had proved most successful, principally owing to the excellent acting of the celebrated nema, Signor Cotte, and the admirable dancing of Mademoiselle Grolle and other French artistes. Donzelli was to re-appear at this theatre in the early part of the Carnival.

Rossini, the celebrated maestro, was present at the Grand Opera of Bologna on the 17th ultimo, to witness the debut of Madame Schobertlechner, and the second appearance of Cerito. The house was crowded to excess and the success of the first lady is said to have been most triumphant, Rossini having expressed his opinion that she was the most perfect model of the genuine Italian style of singing and acting of any debutante he had seen for some years. In the Cavatina of Antonia in "Belisario," she was encored three times; and subsequently, in the opera of "Anna Bolena," she was considered to be unequalled by any prima donna in that land of song. A new ballet had been produced expressly for the first appearance before the Bolognese of the fascinating Cerito; it was entitled "Il Genio e la Maga;" she was received with the greatest ecst, more especially in a passo a deux with Signor Priora.

By a public ordinance of the King of Hanover, it has just been forbidden to manifest at the theatres approbation or disapprobation on the part of the audience in a loud manner, under fear of expulsion, or fine and imprisonment, according to circumstances.

At Leipzig a vocalist named Lortzic has produced a new German comic opera, entitled "Caramo," which had met with great success. A new opera, by the same composer, was in preparation, entitled "Die biden Schutzen."

Frederick Schneider, the German composer, has just completed two oratorios, of which report spoke favorably; one entitled "the temple of Solomon," the other "Bonifazio."

Spohr, we learn, has just completed a new oratorio entitled "The Fall of Babylon."

A rich musical amateur of Venice has just bequeathed to the Conservatoire of Music of that ancient city the sum of 10,000 scude, on condition of their performing annually three requiems, of which Mozart's is to be one. A clause in the will provides that if the society omit to fulfil this condition, or execute it indifferently, this legacy is to go to the Conservatoire at Milan, on the like conditions.

It would appear from the following fact, inter alia, that the "power of song" has equally its influence in more frigid latitudes than our own. At Hamburg, lately, a marriage was celebrated between the eldest son and heir of the richest banker in that city, Mr. Conrad B— and Mademoiselle Henrietta Schutz, first cantatrice of the opera at Copenhagen.

The only son of Mozart, who has for some time been the leader of the band at the Opera at Vienna, lately performed before the Archduke Stephen of Austria, who has since attached him to the imperial household as first composer and musician.

A Dutch singer, M. Vrugt, one of the chorus singers of the private chapel of the King of Holland, who has lately obtained great popularity at Brussels, has just completed a native opera, of which report speaks in the highest terms.

Madame Perrot, the fascinating danseuse, better known in this country as Charlotta Grini, has lately made her debut as a vocalist in an operatic ballet, entitled "Zingaro," by Fontana, in which she is stated to have displayed as much ability as a singer as she is so well known to possess as a first-rate Terpsichorean.

At the theatre, Carlo Felice, at Genoa, a new opera was in rehearsal, of which great expectations were entertained. It is to be produced at the commencement of the present carnival. It is entitled "Luisa Strozzi;" the music by Maestro Pietro Combi, and the words by Signor Beltrame.

Moriani, the most celebrated tenor singer at the present time in Italy, and probably the successor to Rubini, has been making a tour of the principal theatres in that country. At Trieste, on the 30th of November, he and Mademoiselle Tadolini were so much admired throughout, but particularly in the finale to "Lucia di Lammermoor," that they had to appear ten times after the fall of the curtain.

A NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT.—A Rock Harmonicon, formed of stones found in the neighborhood of Skiddaw, and played upon by the discoverer's three sons, is now performing at Liverpool. The Whitehaven Herald says—"The inventor of this strange work of art is a plain Cumberland yeoman, from near Keswick, and the rude materials from which he contrives to extract the most enchanting harmony, are nothing more than a collection of slates or stones from the more unfrequented parts of the mighty Skiddaw. These are arranged in such a manner as to enable three persons to beat upon them at the same time with small wooden mallets; and this is accomplished with so much dexterity and skill, as to distil from the rudest possible materials the most rich and delightful melody of sweet sounds that ear ever heard, or imagination can conceive. The effect is perfectly magical, and the listener stands entranced and wonder struck. Men of undoubted musical science have inspected this novel instrument, and have given a most flattering opinion of the work which the inventor has achieved, and also of its vast capabilities."

THREE DAYS LATER.

The ship North America, which sailed from Liverpool on the 7th inst., arrived on Saturday. We were disappointed in not receiving our London papers in season to publish the news in our paper of Saturday. We have the second edition of the London Times of the 6th inst. The news was received by Express from Marseilles and issued at seven o'clock in the morning of the 6th. It is interesting and important. The British dispute with China has been arranged. Dost Mahomed has surrendered.

Kurruck Singh, King of Lahore, died on the 5th of November. During the funeral ceremony his successor, Nounal Singh, was killed by accident. Shere Singh was to mount the throne.

The particulars are clearly enough given in the following summary from the Second Edition of the London Times:

We have received by extraordinary express from Marseilles, letters and journals from Bombay up to the 1st of December, as well as advices from Alexandria to the 24th, and letters and journals from Malta to the 25th.

The intelligence from China is of the highest importance, no less than the near settlement of the China question.

Shortly after the capture of Chusan, Admiral Elliot, in proceeding to the Pecho river, was met by a mandarin of the third rank of the Chinese empire, though some accounts say by the Emperor himself, while others affirm that Admiral Elliot had arrived at Peking, and had an audience of the Emperor.

The Emperor has agreed to pay £3,000,000 for the expenses incurred by the British in making war; other authorities state £2,000,000 sterling as indemnity for the opium seized, and £1,000,000 for the expenses of the war. The Emperor, either himself or through his officers, has expressed pacific intentions to the Admiral, and he disavows the actions of his commissioner Lin. This latter, indeed, has fallen into disgrace, and the Emperor offers to surrender him into the hands of the British, to be dealt with as they may think proper. Two commissioners were to be sent either to Canton or Ningpo, with full powers to negotiate a treaty.

Chusan is not to be given up until the treaty be signed.

The above intelligence, which is up to the 1st of October, was brought by Her Majesty's ship Cruiser to Calcutta.

No movement southward is expected from Chusan before the 15th of October. The Admiral was to leave Chusan for Ningpo in one of the steamers on the 30th of September, and the Blenheim was warping out for the same destination. The Emperor is greatly annoyed at our occupation of Chusan, and his minister hinted "that the Admiral's visit had prevented the march of fierce soldiers to retake the island."

The Malacca papers have got up a story that accounts have been received there that our ships-of-war had taken the Bogue forts, and after forcing the passage of the Bocca Tigris had proceeded to Canton. It is feared that this is not correct.

Great complaints are made of the unhealthiness of the men in the expedition against Chusan; the weather at this place is represented as cold and unhealthy. Mortality appears to prevail. Captain Stean, of Her Majesty's 49th, had died. The fleet, however, was plentifully supplied with provisions.

The intelligence from India is also highly important, although we were enabled by our extraordinary express from Paris to anticipate the two most prominent facts, the news of which had been received by telegraph in the French capital.

Our extraordinary express from Marseilles received this morning brings intelligence from Alexandria to the 24th ult., on which day the Great Liverpool sailed with the Indian mails. Her trip from Falmouth to Alexandria is the shortest on record—viz., 14 days and 1 hour from port to port. 12 days and 11 hours only were spent at sea. The plague had appeared in Alexandria a month earlier than usual, and 3 deaths had been officially notified. The Indian mails and 18 passengers were landed at Suez on the 18th ult., and escorted across the Desert by a guard of 60 horsemen furnished by the Pasha to preserve them from the attacks of the Bedouin Arabs, who had lately become hostile and dangerous, seizing the Pasha's stores, and attacking the pilgrims en route from Cairo to Mecca. Ibrahim Pasha was still with his army at Damascus, to which he had returned in very ill health, and beset by the mountaineers, hoping (it was believed) to avail himself of the Napier convention to return to Egypt peaceably and by sea.

Mehemet Ali had again written to Admiral Stopford on the 21st ult., and proposed to send another message to expedite the return of Ibrahim and his army. Sir Charles Smith had arrived in the Hydra at Alexandria on the 17th ult., and had an interview with the Pasha on the 19th, and placed the Hydra at his service to convey his despatch to Marmarica on the 22d ult. Sir Charles left Alexandria in the Great Liverpool. Serious sickness had prevailed at Acra. The storm that visited the coast of Syria with such violence on the 2d and 3d ult., had produced an alarming scarcity at Beyrout and in the mountains, where the new Turkish Governor had recklessly stopped the supplies of grain arriving, and the mountaineers were again nearly driven into collision with the authorities by desperation. No hope is entertained that the Porte will be able to govern Lebanon, now that the population is re-armed. Mehemet Ali was still raising batteries and exercising his troops incessantly, and had given notice to the National Guards of Alexandria that they were to consider themselves his regular soldiers. At the same time he was making preparations for the better cultivation of his private estates, and had appointed his son, Said Bey, and his grandson, Abbas Pasha, to be resident administrators in separate districts.

EXPEDITION TO THE NIGER.—The expedition which is now fitting out in England, for Africa, is an important one to the cause of humanity, and deserves the good wishes of every friend of the human race. The expedition is to consist of three iron steam-vessels—the Albert, the Wilberforce, and the Soudan. They will take with them surgeons and men of science, botanists, surveyors, geographers, geologists and agriculturists. They are provided with seeds, implements, medicines and presents, furnished from private as well as public sources. This expedition is intended to proceed to the mouth of the Niger, and ascend that river, and lay the foundation of commerce with the African tribes; extend among them the principles of Christianity and the blessings of civilization; and in this way give a mortal blow to the odious and unnatural traffic in slaves.

The greatest obstacle to the success of this expedition, will probably be found in the unhealthiness of the climate, which has proved so fatal to Europeans. But the nature of the diseases on the African coast has been studied with much attention within a few years, and every possible precaution will be taken to preserve the health of the persons who will embark in this noble enterprise.—[Boston Mercantile Journal.]

Congressional.

FRIDAY, JAN. 29.

In the SENATE Mr. White, of Ia., presented a resolution of the State of Indiana in favor of a National Bank; also, a resolution in favor of one Presidential term.

The prospective pre-emption was then taken up, when Mr. Clay resumed the speech he commenced the day before in vindication of his favorite measure, (the distribution policy) and of Whig politics generally.

Mr. Buchanan, of Pa., took an opportunity to deny ever having argued in favor of a reduction of the wages of labor, and said his speech on the subject had been entirely misunderstood—he was incapable of advocating any such propositions, &c., &c.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Morris, of Ohio, asked leave to introduce a bill to repeal the Sub-treasury law. On the vote being taken, leave was refused—yeas 79, nays 87.

SATURDAY, JAN. 30.

Mr. Rives made his first appearance in the Senate this morning.

During the debate, a warm passage took place between Messrs. Calhoun and Mangum, but was finally explained away.

MONDAY, FEB. 1.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate several communications, of which one was from the War Department, containing an abstract of the general returns of the militia of the United States.

Mr. Mangum presented resolutions from the Legislature of North Carolina, in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the Public Lands, which were read and ordered to be printed.

Similar resolutions from the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania were presented by Messrs. Bayard and Sturgeon.

Mr. Mouton presented resolutions from the Legislature of Louisiana, in favor of a Bankrupt Law.

TUESDAY, FEB. 2.

In the SENATE, Mr. Wall of N. J., presented a memorial from citizens of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the Pilot Law of 1837.

Mr. Preston from the Senate committee appointed to meet a similar committee from the House to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes of President and Vice President of the United States, and notifying the persons chosen of their election, reported as follows:

Resolved, That the two Houses of Congress will assemble in the Chamber of the Representatives on Wednesday, Feb. 10th, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the Presiding Officer; that one person be appointed to be a teller on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared. That the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected; to the two Houses, as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President, and Vice President of the United States, and together, with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

The report was adopted and laid on the table.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Sergeant, of Pa., wished to offer a resolution of the Legislature of that State in relation to the public lands; but its reception was objected to by Mr. Jones, of Va. It was afterwards received, however, and laid on the table.

STATE TREASURER AND SURVEYOR GENERAL.—On Monday, Jacob Haight and Orville L. Holley were re-elected State Treasurer and Surveyor General.

SENATOR FROM MAINE.—Hon. George Evans, at present a Representative in Congress, has been chosen Senator, for the term of six years from and after the third of March next.

—We learn from the message of the Governor of Mississippi, that the slaves in that state outnumber the whites; whites 178,667, slaves 195,764, free persons of color 1,386.

PROGRESS OF GEN. HARRISON.

REPUBLICAN OFFICE, CINCINNATI, JAN. 27, 1840.

GENERAL HARRISON'S DEPARTURE FOR THE EAST.—Yesterday, about 12 o'clock, Gen. Harrison took his departure from our city, from his own West. At an early hour crowds of citizens congregated in front of the Hanrie House, anxious to see him for the last time previous to his entering upon the important duties of the Presidency. The numerous assemblage was not composed entirely of his political friends. Many who opposed his election were there, seeming to have forgotten their opposition, and appearing to feel that they were assembled to pay their respects to him who had been selected by the free, unbought suffrages of his fellow-citizens to discharge the duties of the most important office in the world.

It was the General's original intention to have started off privately. This course was approved by many, but the great mass felt an anxiety to embrace this opportunity of manifesting their love and respect for him who had spent his life amongst them, and who had been called to direct the destinies of this free people. It would have been an affection of modesty, if the General had attempted to slip off quietly, and without letting the time of his departure be known. He was leaving the acquaintances and friends of his youth and manhood—those for whose interest he had spent many a sleepless night—and weary day—those for whom he had often periled his fortune—his life—his all; those who loved him as a father—those who had stood by him and defended his character from the envenomed shafts of malice and detraction. We say we should all have a right to complain if he had not afforded us this opportunity of taking leave of our benefactor and personal friend.

Several of our splendid military companies, without any previous understanding, were on the ground to escort the gallant old chief from his quarters to the steam boat Ben Franklin, which conveys him to Pittsburg.

The day was cloudy and the streets muddy—a carriage had been provided to convey him to the river, but he preferred walking. He was escorted by the Greys, and Washington Cadets, and an immense crowd of citizens. The Invincibles were on board the boat, and the Citizens' Guards came down a short time after he reached the boat to fire a parting salute.

The crowd upon the wharf was immense; from twelve to fifteen thousand had assembled, to take leave of their friend and benefactor, and of the Nation's President. The scene was touching and sublime. The martial music, the military display, the cannon's roar from either shore, the vast multitude, the mingling of those who had so recently been engaged in fierce political strife, to get a last look at him, who was the Nation's hope, was a scene which no one could witness unmoved. We never saw the General more deeply affected, than when from the deck of the boat, in a short address he took leave of the assembled thousands.

The boat left the wharf about twelve o'clock. She was crowded with citizens of this place and Louisville, who will accompany him to Pittsburg. Some half a dozen of his intimate friends will accompany him throughout his journey.

So pressing have been the invitations he has received, and so great is the anxiety of many on his route to see him, that we think it probable he will not reach Washington much before the 11th or 12th of February.

WHEELING GAZETTE OFFICE, JAN. 29, 1840.

General Harrison arrived in this city yesterday afternoon at about half past two o'clock. During the whole day our wharf was crowded with persons anxiously awaiting his arrival, and at about two o'clock the boat on which he came was discovered to be in sight five or six miles down the river. The fact was announced by the discharge of cannon, and in about half an hour the splendid steamer Ben Franklin rounded the point, and came into port in gallant style. Four or five pieces of artillery on shore were fired without intermission, and the cannon on board the boat responded. The bells of the city were rung, and almost every whig house displayed a flag.

By the time the boat arrived at the wharf, the concourse of people was tremendous, and three hearty cheers were given at the moment she touched the Virginia soil. General Harrison was waited on by the Committee of Reception, and escorted in an open carriage to the United States Hotel, where a cordial welcome and the hospitalities of the city were tendered to him by S. Sprigg, Esq., in a neat and appropriate address. The General responded in a forcible and happy manner.

During the afternoon he received the congratulations of thousands of our fellow-citizens from every point for miles around, and in the evening he was escorted to the residence of Mr. E. Dorsey, where a splendid entertainment was provided, and here he was waited upon by hundreds more, including our fair countrywomen. General Harrison left for Pittsburg at a late hour last night. Arrangements for his reception are made at Pittsburg.

Extract to the Editor, dated

PITTSBURG, JAN. 30, 1841.

General Harrison arrived in our city about 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon. He was received with a degree of warmth and enthusiasm which must have afforded him the highest gratification. At a public meeting held the day before yesterday, a committee of 343 was appointed to make suitable arrangements for his reception. Indeed, our whole population turned out, or the greater proportion of it—and the "Ben Franklin" was greeted on her arrival at the wharf, with acclamations that made the welkin ring again. Walter Forward, Esq. acted as chairman of the committee. It is understood that the President elect will address the people at 11 o'clock this day, from the front of Iron's Hotel. The old hero never looked better.

—A serious accident occurred on Friday morning last at the India Rubber Factory, in Providence, where steam power was employed. It appears that while the engineer was at breakfast the boiler became red hot, and instead of allowing it to cool he set his pumps in motion to fill it with water, upon which it exploded, and was blown to a considerable distance from the premises. By the accident a fine young girl was killed, and eight men dangerously wounded.

—The Boston Atlas of Tuesday says "The Royal Mail Steamship Acadia, Lieut. E. C. Miller, left Cunard's Wharf yesterday, a few minutes after 2 P. M., carrying out 12,425 letters, and 2,500 packages of newspapers.

THE EXPLORING EXPEDITION.—The Boston Transcript of Wednesday evening says: "The ship Nantucket, Captain Edwards, arrived at Tarpaun Cove, yesterday, reports having spoken, July 23d, off the Feejee Islands, the U. S. brig Porpoise, Captain Reynolds, all well, bound to Mollo. The Vincennes and Peacock were at Sandal Novo Bay. The Expedition were surveying the Feejee Islands and Shoals, and would sail in ten days for the Sandwich Islands. It was reported that a ship, supposed to be the Shyllock, of Sippican, had been wrecked at the Feejee Islands—crew saved and landed at Hapae Island.

The barque Flora, from Sandwich Islands, for New York, was at Pernambuco January 3d, having touched for supplies. She has on board, as passengers, Rev. Mr. Bingham and family, from Oahu."

CAPTURE OF A SLAVER.—We have been favored with the subjoined extract from a letter to a gentleman of this city, dated St. Croix, Dec. 30.

I beheld, this morning, in company with several gentlemen, one of the most horrible sights my eyes ever encountered. An English brig-of-war which cruises in the vicinity of Porto Rico, while running from St. Thomas to this island, observed at a considerable distance a small dirty looking craft, which would not have been suspected as a slaver but from the number of men seen upon her deck. After a short chase the brig came up to her, and from her appearance the commander of the brig was satisfied she was no slaver, but concluded that after having taken the trouble of giving her a chase they might as well search her. On opening the hatches they found the hold crammed with negroes from 8 to 12 years old, stark naked, with their heads shaved.

The crew of the slaver was immediately taken on board the brig, and the slaver manned and brought into this port.

This morning, after breakfast, we engaged a boat and went alongside the slaver, and conversed some time with the lieutenant in command, on the subject of his vocation. Several of the little sufferers were very ill, and one died last night. They were all placed around the sides of the vessel; and as we approached, they grinned and waved their hands at us, apparently quite happy and pleased with having their liberty on deck.

I do not regret that I took the trouble to see them, but I never desire to see another such horrible sight. The cargo belongs to a Spaniard in Porto Rico, whose loss will be $60,000. The brig has just fired a salute, which has been answered from the fort, and she is departing for Porto Rico, whence the slaver will be sent to Havana, where I suppose these unfortunate creatures will be apprenticed to Spanish masters.—[N. ## THE ARTIST'S TRIUMPH.

On prostrate columns and through ivied arch,
O'er matted vines and lowly creeping flowers,
Which mocking Time hath strewn o'er ancient pride,
A flood of moonlight glory broadly streams.
A sound of mirth and melody is heard,
And echoing sweetness dies along the air.
To-night they'll crown him, and old Rome shall ring
With the young Artist's triumph! has he not Gained him a name? A place too in their hearts?
And shall he pass unhonored, like the dull
Of soul who worship not the beautiful?
Shall he return to his own fatherland
Without one wreath of fame? Not in the glory
And gorgeous splendor of the Capitol,
With flowers of gem-like hues spread round his path,
And shout of countless multitudes, shall he Receive the meed of honor: not the less
Will it be prized. Oh, what makes glory dear?
And why does the enthusiast toil for fame?
Some loving eye will gaze upon his deeds—
Some loving heart will throb tumultuously,
To hear the praises he has nobly earned!
He whom Ambition leads to some bold height,
To gain whose eminence, are trampled, crushed,
All home endearments, and those holy ties
Which bind the yearnings of the human heart
Like ivy tendrils to affection's vine,
Is like to one upon a throne of ice,
Circled with rays which shine, but yield no warmth!

"He must part from us now—loving, warm hearts of home,
Call him back from the beauty and glory of Rome;
The laurel and olive to crown him we'll twine,
While fresh roses are wreathed round the sparkling wine.
"He has worshipped with us 'neath the blue laughing sky
Where relics of glory in loveliness lie;
And spells of strange beauty his spirit have bound,
As he wandered through ruins by pale flowers crowned.
"He must part from us now—but remembrance will bring
All the soul-thrilling dreams of his hopes in their Spring;
And his heart-pulse will throb to the love we have given,
Like the tremulous wave lit by star-rays of heaven.
"Let us pour forth the lyre-notes, and pledge him in wine;
Round his brow, round his brow, let the graceful wreath twine;
We will crown him to-night, he shall bear to his home
With the same wreath of Genius, sweet memories of Rome."

THE PEASANT BOY.

BY CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN.

It may be within the memory of most my readers to have seen a spirited drawing of a peasant boy, proceeding with spade on shoulder, to his daily labor as a tiller of the earth. The picture, if I mistake not, is a copy from the original of Daniel Ricciogalli, the friend and pupil of Michael Angelo.

There's poetry, boy, in that step of thine,
Firmly and free on the green sward prest,
And the locks that over thy temples shine,
Wanton wild in the winds of the warm south-west.
Care lurks not, boy, in thy laughing eye,
No clouds o'ershadow thy forehead's snow;
And the mellow tints of the morning sky
Lend to thy cheek an eloquent glow.
Thy hairloom is pure and unbroken health—
A cheerful heart to endure thy toil,
And what thou wantest of this world's wealth,
Is sturdily gain'd from the generous soil.
With the lark's first note thou'rt up and away,
Brushing the dews from the glistening sod,
And quivering the simple roundelay,
Which innocence hymns to the ear of God.

From the ardent sun of advancing noon,
Thou seekest the shade of some shelter'd nook,
Where the ringdove warbles its amorous tune
To the answering sound of the gushing brook.

There, sinking down on the stream's soft brink,
Thou gratefully takest thy frugal repast,
First bending thy lips to the stream to drink
The wave that glideth so cool and fast.

Then to labor again, till the waning sun
Seeks his place of repose in the western sky,
And the shades of evening come trooping on,
And the bird nestles low in the covert nigh.

They are coming to meet thee—the joyous band!
The flax-hair'd girl, and the bold, brave boy—
While the baby totters toward thy hand,
And clasps thy fingers with prattling joy.

To the cottage away!—to thy mother's knee—
To thy father's side—thou art welcome there!
That mother's smile is ever for thee,
And thou hast thy father's heart and prayer.

To slumber repairing, thy rest is sweet,
In the rafter'd chamber beneath the eaves,
Where the pattering rain-drops of summer beat,
And the wind complains 'mid the rustling leaves.

There's poetry, boy, in that step of thine!—
There's poetry wrought with thy sinless life;
I would that thy stormless fate were mine,
Passionless, careless, and free from strife!

CORSE DE LEON;

OR, THE BRIGAND.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DARNLEY," "RICHELIEU," "THE KING'S HIGHWAY," &amp;c.

CHAPTER III.

It had nearly ceased raining, but the night, as we have said, was cold and chilly, the sky was still covered with thick clouds, and the air was full of thick darkness—to use the expressive words of Scripture; a darkness that could be felt. Bernard de Rohan and his companions paused for a moment before the door of the little inn, listening to catch any sounds of the conflict from which the servant seemed so freshly to have come.

All was silent, however. The rushing sound of the mountain torrents, swelled by the late rains; the sighing of the night winds amongst the gorges of the mountains and through the deep pine forests; the distant cry of a wolf, and the whirring scream of the night hawk, as it flitted by, were all heard distinctly: but no human voice mingled with the other sounds.

This silence, however, gave no assurance to the heart of Bernard de Rohan that the persons for whom the servant had appealed to his chivalry had escaped from their assailants. It was well known at that time that every part of Savoy was infested with bands of brigands, which had rather increased than diminished in number since France had taken possession of the country; so that, unable to put them down, the famous Marechal de Brissac, in order to restrain their indiscriminate ravages in some degree, had been obliged to give them occasional employment, with his own forces. When not thus employed, however, they were known to lay wait in all the principal passes, both of Piedmont and Savoy, and take toll of all travellers with a strong hand. Enormous barbarities were from time to time charged against them; and, if one might judge by general rumor, no scheme was too wild, no act too violent and desperate, for them to devise and execute. The only conclusion, therefore, which Bernard de Rohan drew from the absence of all sounds of conflict, was that the banditti had prevailed, and either murdered their victims or carried them off.

"Quick! quick!" he cried, after a momentary pause. "Lead on, lead on, good fellow! where are your lord and lady? Which is the way?"

"This way, noble sir, this way," cried the man, advancing at once along the road which led more immediately into the mountains. "They cannot have gone far: I could hear the voice of the brigands from the inn door."

* In press and shortly to be published by Harper &amp; Brothers.

Thus saying, he led the way onward with great speed; but as Bernard de Rohan followed with the same quick pace, the clear deep voice of the man whom the host had called Master Leon sounded in his ear, saying, "There is some mistake here, and I think some villainy; but fear not."

"Fear!" replied Bernard de Rohan, turning his head toward him. "Do you suppose I fear?"

"No, I suppose not," replied the man; "but yet there was no common interest in your eye, good youth, when this knave talked of his young mistress, and one may fear for others though not for themselves. But hark! I hear a noise on before. Voices speaking. Some one complaining, I think. Quick, quick! run, sir varlet, run!"

At the rapid pace at which they now proceeded they soon heard the sounds more distinctly before them. There was a noise of horses, and a jingling as of the bells of mules. The murmuring of a number of voices, too, came borne upon the air down the pass, and some four or five hundred yards farther up, the servant, who was now running on as fast as possible, stumbled over a wounded man, who uttered a cry of pain. But the young cavalier and his companions slackened not their pace, for by this time they could plainly hear some sharp and angry voices pouring forth oaths and imprecations, and urging what seemed to be a band of prisoners, to hurry forward more rapidly. At the same time the light of a torch, or more than one, was seen gleaming upon the grey rocks and green foliage, and on one occasion it threw upon the flat face of a crag on the other side of the ravine the shadow of a large body of men, with horses and other beasts of burden.

"Now, out with your swords," cried the personage named Leon, in a tone of authority, "for we are gaining on them quick, and I doubt not shall have stout resistance."

Bernard de Rohan's sword was already in his hand before the other spoke, and hurrying on, the next moment he reached an angle of the rock, from which he could plainly discern the whole party that he was pursuing. He paused for an instant as he saw them, and well might that sight make him do so, for the torchlight displayed to his eyes a body of at least fifteen or sixteen armed men, some of them mounted, some of them on foot, driving on in the midst of them two or three loaded horses, and seven or eight men and women, several of them apparently having their hands tied. The party was about two hundred yards in advance, and though the torchlight was sufficient to show him the particulars which we have mentioned, yet it did no more than display the gleaming of the arms and the fluttering of the women's garments, without at all giving any indication of the rank or station to which the prisoners belonged.

The young cavalier, it must be remembered, was accompanied by only five persons, and the greater part of those five were, like himself, but lightly armed. His momentary pause, however, was only to reconnoitre the enemy, without the slightest hesitation as to what his own conduct was to be. He knew the effect of a sudden and unexpected attack, and calculated upon some assistance also from the prisoners themselves; but had he had nothing but his own courage in his favor, his conduct would have been the same. He was again hurrying on, when the powerful grasp of the man named Leon was laid upon his arm, and staid him.

"Hush!" he said: "do not be too quick! Do you not see that these men are no brigands, as you thought?"

"How should I see that?" demanded Bernard de Rohan, turning sharply upon him. "Who but brigands would commit an act like this?"

"Think you that brigands would have torches with them?" said his companion, calmly. "Pause a moment, pause a moment; let them get round yon point of the rock; for if they hear us coming, and see how few we are, we shall be obliged to do things that we had better not. Beyond the rock they will be cooped up in a little basin of the hills, where they can be attacked with advantage."

"You seem to know the country well," said Bernard de Rohan, gazing upon him with some suspicion, as the light of the torches, faintly reflected from the other side of the valley, served partially to display his dark, but fine countenance.

"Ay! I do know it well!" replied the other: "so well, that from the foot of that rock which they are now turning, I will guide you up by a path over the shoulder of the hill till we meet them in front, at the same time that some of your people attack them in the rear."

Bernard de Rohan did not hesitate; but it was only for a moment. His mind was not naturally a suspicious one; and, of course, had the proposal been made by any one whom he knew, the advantages of such a plan would have instantly struck him, and he would have followed it at once. But the man who suggested it was unknown to him. Nay, more, there was something in his tone, his manner, in his whole appearance, which, to say the best, was strange and unusual. His garb, as far as it had been seen, was unlike that of the peasantry of Savoy; and, in short, there was that about him which naturally tended to create a doubt as to his ordinary pursuits and occupations.

Bernard de Rohan hesitated then, but it was with the hesitation of only one moment. He had been accustomed to deal with and to command fierce and reckless men; and though his years were not sufficient to have given him what may be called the insight of experience, he had by nature that clear discernment of the human character which is the meed of some few, and may be called the instinct of instinct.

During his momentary pause, then, he saw that the dark eye of his strange companion was fixed upon him as if reading what was passing in his mind. The jovial priest also seemed to penetrate his thoughts, and said in a low voice, "You may trust him! you may trust him! He never betrayed any one."

"I do trust him," cried Bernard de Rohan, turning round and grasping the stranger's hand, "I trust him entirely. You and I," he continued, "will go over the hill alone. If I judge right we have both been in many a hot day's strife, and can keep that narrow road without much assistance. It is better that there should be a show of more people behind."

As he spoke, the faint flash of the receding torches showed him a smile upon his companion's countenance. "Come on slowly," said Corse de Leon, "and keep near the rock; we shall soon get up with them, for they are incumbered and we are free."

Thus saying, he led the way, remaining, as far as possible, under the shadow of the crags, till the last of the party before them had turned the angle beyond, and the whole valley was again in darkness. The cavalier and those who were with him then hurried their pace, till they reached a spot where a point of the rock jutted out into the valley. There the strangers paused, bidding the attendants of the young nobleman pursue their way along the road, till they came up with the rear of the other party, and then attack them as suddenly and vehemently as possible. "Make all speed," he said, "for we shall be there before you, cutting off the corner of the hill. Here, priest!" he continued, "here's a pistol and a dagger for you. You'll need something to work with. Now quick on your way, for the moon will be out in a few minutes, if one may judge by the paleness of that cloud's edge, and her light would betray our scanty numbers.—Follow me, baron!—Here! Upon this rock!—Catch by that bough!—Another step and you are in the path!"

As he spoke, he himself sprang up, seeming well acquainted with every stock and every stone in the way; Bernard de Rohan followed with less knowledge of the path, but all the agility of youth and strength, and they had soon nearly reached the brow of the hill.

"Out upon the pale moon!" cried Bernard de Rohan's companion, pausing and gazing up towards the sky. "She shines at the very moment she should not. See how she is casting away those clouds, as if she were opening the hangings of her tent! We may go slow, for we shall be far before them."

He now led the way onward with a slower pace; and after ascending for somewhat more than a quarter of a mile, the path began to descend again as if to rejoin the road. Every step was now clear, for the moon was shining brightly; and though no one, probably, could see Bernard de Rohan and his companion as they took their way among the rhododendrons and junipers which were thickly mingled with the fragments of rock around, yet they themselves from time to time caught a distinct view of the valley. An occasional flash of light upon their left hand, too, but a good deal in the rear, soon showed Bernard de Rohan that his guide had told him the truth in regard to the shortness of the path he had taken, though he could not absolutely see the road, or those who were travelling along it. At length, however, they reached a spot where the path which they were following wound along within ten yards of the chief road itself, and choosing a small break nearly surrounded with tall shrubs and broken masses of the crag, Corse de Leon stopped, saying, "It will be well to stay for their coming here. They will take full ten minutes to reach this place. You wait for them here, I will climb a little farther up to watch them as they come, and will be back again in time."

If Bernard de Rohan entertained any suspicion in regard to his guide's purposes, he knew that it would be vain to show it, and therefore he made no opposition to the plan that his companion proposed, but let him depart without a word; and then choosing a spot among the trees, where he could see without being seen, he gazed down into the little basin formed by the surrounding hills. The clear light of the moon was now streaming bright and full into the valley, only interrupted from time to time for a single moment by fragments of the clouds driven across by the wind; but at first Bernard de Rohan could see nothing of the party which he was pursuing; for the road as usual wound in and out along the irregular sides of the mountain, being raised upon a sort of terrace some two hundred feet above the bottom of the valley. In a moment or two, however, he caught sight of them again, coming slowly on; but with their torches now extinguished, and presenting nothing but a dark mass, brightened here and there by the reflection of the moon's light from some steel cap or breast-plate.

The time seemed long, and their advance slow, to Bernard de Rohan; for although he had lain in many an ambush against the foe, and had taken part in many an encounter where the odds against him were scarcely less than those which were now presented, yet of course he could not but feel some emotion in awaiting the result—that deep and thrilling interest, in fact, which has nothing to do with fear, and approaches perhaps even nearer to joy—the interest which can only be felt in the anticipation of a fierce but noble strife, where, knowing the amount of all we risk, we stake life and all life's blessings upon the success of some great and generous endeavor. He felt all this, and all the emotions which such a state must bring with it, and thus, longing to throw the die, he found the moments of expectation long.

Now seen, and now lost to his sight, the party continued to advance, and yet his strange companion did not make his appearance. The young nobleman judged that he could not be far, indeed, for once or twice he heard the bushes above him rustle, while a stone or two rolled down into the bottom of the valley; and he thought he distinguished Leon's voice murmuring also, as if talking to himself. At length there was a clear footfall heard coming down the steepest part of the mountain, and in another moment the stranger stood once more by Bernard de Rohan's side. As he came near, he threw off the cloak which he had hitherto worn, and cast it into one of the bushes, saying to it as he did so, "I shall find you, if I want you, after this is over."

His appearance now, however, left Bernard de Rohan scarcely a doubt in regard to the nature of his usual occupation. When his cloak was thus thrown off, his chest and shoulders were seen covered with that peculiar sort of corselet or brigantine, which originally gave name to the bands called Brigands. His arms were free, and incumbered with any defensive armor; and over his right shoulder hung a bull's head, suspending his long, heavy sword. This was not all, however; another broad leather belt and buckle went round his waist, containing, in cases made on purpose for them, a store of other weapons, if his sword blade should chance to fail: among which were those long and formidable knives which in the wars of the day were often employed by foot soldiers to kill the chargers of their mounted adversaries. Daggers of various lengths were there also, together with the petronel or large horse pistol, which was so placed, however, as to give free room for his hand to reach the hilt of his sword.

In this guise he approached Bernard de Rohan, saying, "You see, baron, I am better prepared for this encounter than you are. You have nothing but your sword, you had better take one of these," and he laid his finger upon the butt of a petronel.

"My sword will not fail," replied Bernard de Rohan, with a smile. "I see, indeed, you were better qualified to judge whether these are brigands or not than I was."

"They are no brigands," replied the other—"brigands know better what they are about," and as he spoke he threw away his hat, and tied up his long black hair, which fell over his ears and shoulders, with a piece of riband. "I cannot very well understand," he continued in the same low tone, "what has become of your people and the priest; I could see nothing of them from the height, and I almost fear that these villains, fearing pursuit, have broken down the little wooden bridge behind them, at what we call the Pas de Suzette, where the stream falls into the river."

"Hark!" said Bernard de Rohan. "They are coming up," and grasping his sword, he took a step forward. "Wait," said the Brigand, laying hold of his arm. "Give your people the last minute to attack them in the rear. By heavens they ought to have been here by this time!"

The sound of horses' feet and human voices now became distinct from below, and oaths and imprecations were still heard loud and vehemently, as the captors hurried on their prisoners.

"Get you on, get you on!" exclaimed one voice; "don't you see how quietly your lord is going?"

"He is not my lord," cried another in a faint tone. "I am wounded and hurt, and cannot go faster."

"Get on, get on, villain!" reiterated the other voice. "You would fain keep us till the fools behind mend the bridge and come up with us. Get on, I say!—If he do not walk faster, prick him with your dagger, Bouchart. We will skin him alive when we get to the end of the march! Drive it into him!"

A sharp cry succeeded—Bernard de Rohan could bear no more, but bursting away from the hand of the Brigand, he sprang into the road. Leon followed him at once; but even before he was down, the young cavalier's sword had stretched one of the advancing party on the ground, and was crossed with that of another.

"Hold, hold!" shouted the loud voice of the Brigand. "Hold, and throw down your arms! Villains, you are surrounded on all sides!"

For a moment their opponents had drawn back; but the scanty number of the assailants was seen, before Corse de Leon uttered what seemed so empty a boast.

"Cut him down," cried a voice from behind, "cut him down!" and one of the horsemen spurred on towards him. Another, at the same moment, aimed a blow at the head of Bernard de Rohan from behind, which struck him on the shoulder and brought him on his knee, while a shot was fired at the Brigand, which struck his cuirass, but glanced off harmless.

"It is time we should have help," said Corse de Leon in a cool tone, and—while with his right hand he drew a pistol from his girdle, levelled it at the head of one of those who were centring with Bernard de Rohan, fired, and saw the man fall over into the valley below—with the left he applied a small instrument to his lips, producing a loud, long, shrill whistle, which those who have heard it will never forget. It is like the scream of a bird of prey, but infinitely louder; and the moment it proceeded from the lips of the Brigand, similar sounds echoed round and round from twenty different points above, below, and on the opposite side of the valley.

When Bernard de Rohan staggered up from his knee, the scene was completely changed. Corse de Leon stood no longer alone, but with three stout men by his side armed to the teeth. The fragments of rock and large stones that were rolling from above showed that rapid footsteps were coming down the side of the mountain. Up from the rocky bed of the stream five or six other men were seen climbing with the activity of the chamois or the lizard, and to complete the whole, the whistle was heard prolonged up the valley, while from the same side the ear could distinguish the galloping of horse coming down with furious speed.

The party of the adversary, however, was large. All were well armed, all evidently accustomed to strife and danger, and had all apparently made up their minds to struggle to the last. They accordingly made a fierce charge at once along the road, in order to force their way on; and the strife now became hand to hand, and man to man, while above the contest the loud voice of the brigand leader was heard shouting, "Tie them! Tie them!—Do not kill them, if you can help it!"

Nor was his assumption of certain success unjustified. Every moment fresh numbers were added to the party of Corse de Leon. The adversaries were driven back along the road, dragging the prisoners with them some way, but were stopped by fresh opponents, dropping, as it were, from the mountains, and cutting them off in their retreat. They were still struggling, however, when at length eight or nine horsemen, the sound of whose approach had been heard before, reached the scene of combat, and then, seeing that farther resistance was vain, several of them uttered a cry of "Quarter! quarter! We will throw down our arms."

"Here, take my sword, Doland," said the brigand leader to one of his men. "Wipe it well, and go back for my hat and cloak which I left among the bushes by the cross of St. Maur. Well, baron," he continued, turning to Bernard de Rohan, "I am afraid you have to regret the want of your armor—that was a bad wounding on your head."

"No, it struck my forehead," replied Bernard de Rohan, "and my hatcoat doubled. There is no great harm done." "You had better keep behind," continued Corse de Leon in a low voice. "I wished not to have displayed myself at all had it been possible to avoid it, but it could not be helped. However, you had better not show yourself with us. It may make mischief."

"But the lady," said Bernard de Rohan, "the lady, let me go and speak to her and set her free—I have no fear of being seen."

"Leave it to me, leave it to me," said the Brigand. "You shall have opportunity enough to speak with her. And she shall know who is her deliverer. Will you not trust me after all this night's work?"

"Entirely," said Bernard de Rohan; "but it is natural, when one aids a lady in scenes like these, to wish to speak with her, to soothe and tranquillize her."

"Especially when one loves her," replied the Brigand, laughing. "But you shall speak with her in a moment, only keep back for the present."

Bernard de Rohan had neither the will nor the power to resist. The Brigand, indeed, might well assume the tone of command, for at that moment there could be no successful opposition to his will; but, besides this consideration, there were other feelings in the bosom of the young cavalier which inclined him to yield at once.

Every thing that he had seen was calculated to surprise and perplex him. The knowledge which his strange companion seemed to have of his history and circumstances; the state of active preparation in which he had found him, as if he had been aware, long before, of all that was about to occur, and had taken measures to meet every contingency; the interest which he had shown in an enterprise that seemed not to concern him at all, and the active and vehement opposition he had evinced to persons apparently engaged in the same trade of violence with himself, were all unaccountable to Bernard de Rohan; and he paused in some anxiety to see what would be the next act in the strange drama in which he himself was bearing a part.

While the brief conversation which I have narrated took place between the Brigand and the young cavalier, the successful party had drawn closer and closer round their adversaries, and were busily disarming and tying them. This operation, being carried on with great dexterity and rapidly, had advanced considerably when Leon again strode forward into the midst of them to give farther directions.

"Not so tight! Not so tight, Antoine!" he said; "you'll cut his wrists with those thongs. Take off his corselet, Pierre. You cannot get it off when his arms are tied.—If he resists, pitch him over into the stream.—That horse will break away and be lost.—Some of you come and untie my Lord of Masseran and his people.—Noble signor," he continued, and Bernard de Rohan thought that he heard a good deal of bitter mockery in his tone, "I pray you tell me what is to be done with these insolent villains who have dared to lay violent hands upon you and your Lady Wife's fair daughter. Shall we either put them to death on the spot—which, perhaps, would be the wisest plan, as the dead are very silent; or shall we send them, bound hand and foot, to your chateau, that you may give them your own directions as to what they are to say and do?"

These words were addressed to a tall, graceful man, somewhere between forty and fifty years of age, who had appeared as one amongst the prisoners of the party just overthrown. He seemed not particularly well pleased with the Brigand's speech, and replied in a tone somewhat sullen, "You must do with them as you please, sir, and with us also, though from your words I suppose that you mean us good and not evil."

"Oh, certainly, my good lord," replied the other—"I am here to free you, and you shall be safely conducted by my people to your own abode. Am I, by your authority, then, to treat these men as they deserve?"

The Lord of Masseran seemed to hesitate for a moment, but then replied sharply, "By all means! By all means! They well deserve punishment."

"Oh! spare them! spare them!" cried a lady's voice. "They have done evil certainly; but they might have treated us worse. Do not hurt them, sir."

"Lady," replied the Brigand, "I will only punish them as they deserve, and you yourself shall hear the sentence. Strip off every man's coat. Take off the bridles of their horses, and throw with flog them down the valley to Gandelot's Inn. When they are there, they will know what to do with themselves. Now, lady, this is but small measure of retribution for bad acts. Quick, my men, quick. You must take them over the hill, for the bridge is broken."

He then spoke a few words to one of his companions in a low tone; after which, he returned once more to Bernard de Rohan, who had remained behind, asked particularly after the wounds he had received, and inquired whether he were fit to escort a lady some two leagues that night. He spoke with a smile; and there was no hesitation in the young cavalier's reply. Before their short conversation was ended, the Brigand's orders in regard to his prisoners were in the act of execution; and certain it is that the discipline to which they were subjected was sufficiently severe, if one might judge by many a piteous cry which echoed up the valley, for some minutes after they were driven in a crowd down the road. The young lady conveyed her eyes with her hands, and remained silent; but a grim smile came upon the countenance of the Lord of Masseran, as if there was something pleasant to him in the music of human suffering.

There were still some ten or twelve of Leon's band around; and their next task was to untie the hands of such of the Lord of Masseran's people as were still bound. "Now, sir," continued the Brigand, as soon as this was accomplished, "you shall have good escort back to your chateau. But we must go in separate parties. You and your four servants under the careful protection of Elois here, by the mountain path you know of. The young lady, I myself will escort by the longer, but the smoother road." "Nay! nay!" exclaimed the Lord of Masseran, quickly

"Why separate us? If you mean well by her, why not let?"

"Because it pleases me not," replied the Brigand, in a stern tone. "Who is lord here upon the side of the mountain but I? You are lord in your chateau, and none dare answer you. But I am lord in the moonlight and on the hill side, and none shall answer me."

"Oh! in pity, in pity!" exclaimed the young lady, holding out her hands with a gesture of entreaty. But the Brigand advanced to her horse's side, and spoke a word to her in a low tone. She let her hands drop again without reply, and Bernard de Rohan, who had remained in the shade, while the moonlight fell full upon her, could see her eyes suddenly turn toward the spot where he stood.

"Lead on the Lord of Masseran, Elois," said the voice of Corse de Leon. "Leave that poor fellow who seems wounded with the lady; and take the rest with you."

There was no reply, and the Savoyard nobleman, with his companions, was led on by a strong party of the brigands up the valley, and then across the stream. As he passed Bernard de Rohan, he fixed his eyes upon him for a moment, but made no observation; and at the same time the Brigand held up his finger to the young cavalier, as if directing him still to forbear for a time.

As soon as the hill hid the other party from their sight, Bernard de Rohan, unable to bear the restraint any longer, sprang forward to the lady's side, and threw his arms around her. His head was bare, and as he looked up toward her, the moonlight fell full upon his face. As if still doubtful, however, she gazed wildly and eagerly upon him: parted the curls of his hair with her hands back from his forehead; then threw her arms round his neck, and bending her head, wept upon his shoulder.

GARCIA PEREZ DE VARGAS.

The crowns of Castille and Leon being at length joined in the person of King Ferdinand, surnamed El Santo, the authority of the Moors in Spain was destined to receive many severe blows from the united efforts of two Christian states, which had in former times too often exerted their vigor against each other. The most important event of King Ferdinand's reign was the conquest of Seville, which great city yielded to his arms in the year 1248, after sustaining a long and arduous siege of sixteen months.

Don Garcia Perez de Vargas was one of the most distinguished warriors who on this great occasion fought under the banner of Ferdinand; and accordingly there are many ballads of which he is the hero. The incident celebrated in that which follows, is thus told, with a few variations, in the seventh chapter of the thirteenth book of MARIANA:

"Above all others, there signalized himself in these affairs that Garcia Perez de Vargas, a native of Toledo, of whose valor so many marvellous and almost incredible achievements are related. One day about the beginning of the siege, this Garcia Perez, and another with him, were riding by the side of the river, at some distance from the outpost, when, of a sudden, there came upon them a party of seven Moors on horseback. The companion of Perez was for returning immediately, but he replied that 'never, even though he should lose his life for it, would he consent to the baseness of flight.' With that, his companion riding off, Perez armed himself, closed his visor, and put his lance in the rest. But his enemies, when they knew who it was, declined the combat."

"He had therefore pursued his way by himself for some space, when he perceived that in lancing the head-piece and shutting the visor, he had, by inadvertence, dropt his scarf. He immediately returned upon his steps that he might seek for it. The King, as it happened, had his eye upon Perez all this time, for the royal tent looked toward the place where he was riding, and he never doubted that the knight had turned back for the purpose of provoking the Moors to the combat. But they avoided him as before, and he, having regained his scarf, came in safety to the camp."

"The honor of the action was much increased by this circumstance, that although frequently pressed to disclose the name of the gentleman who had deserted him in that moment of danger, Garcia Perez would never consent to do so, for his modesty was equal to his bravery."

A little further on, Mariana relates that Garcia Perez had a dispute with another gentleman, who thought proper to assert that Garcia had no right to assume the coat of arms which he wore. "A sally having been made by the Moors, that gentleman, among many more, made his escape, but Garcia stood firm to his post, and never came back to the camp until the Moors were driven again into the city. He came with his shield all bruised and battered to the place where the gentleman was standing, and pointing to the effaced bearing which was on it, said, 'I, deed, sir, it must be confessed that you show more respect than I do to this same coat of arms, for you keep yours bright and unsullied, while mine is sadly discolored.' The gentleman was sorely ashamed, and thenceforth Garcia Perez bore his achievement without gainsaying or dispute."

King Ferdinand alone did stand one day upon the hill, surveying all his leaguer, and the ramparts of Seville: The sight was grand, when Ferdinand by proud Seville was lying,

O'er tower and tree far off to see the Christian banners flying.

Down chanced the King his eye to fling, where far the camp below

Two gentlemen along the glen were riding soft and slow; As void of fear each cavalier seem'd to be riding there, As some strong hound may pace around the roebuck's thicket lair.

It was Don Garcia Perez, and he would breathe the air, And he had ta'en a knight with him, that as lief had been elsewhere; For soon this knight to Garcia said, "Ride, ride we, or I see the glance of helm and lance: it is the Moorish host."

The Baron of Vargas turn'd him round—his trusty squire was near— The helmet on his brow he bound, his gauntlet grasp'd his With that upon his saddle-tree he planted him right steady: "Now come," quoth he, "whoe'er they be, I trow they'll find us ready."

By this the knight who rode with him had turn'd his horse's head, And up the glen in fearful trim unto the camp had fled. "Ha! gone?" quoth Garcia Perez—he smiled and said no more,

But slowly with his esquire rode as he rode before.

It was the Count Lorenzo, just then it happen'd so, He took his stand by Ferdinand, and with him gazed below: "My liege," quoth he, "seven Moors I see a-coming from the wood; Now bring they all the blows they may, I trow they'll find

But it is Don Garcia Perez: if his cognizance they know, I guess it will be little pain to give them blow for blow."

The Moors from forth the greenwood came riding one by one,

A gallant troop with armor resplendent in the sun; Full haughty was their bearing, as o'er the sward they came, While the calm Lord of Vargas his march was still the same.

They stood drawn up in order, while past them all rode he, For when upon his shield they saw the Red Cross and the Tree, And the wings of the Black Eagle, that o'er his crest were They knew it was Garcia Perez, and never a word they said.

He took the casque from off his head, and gave it to the squire: "My friend," quoth he, "no need I see why I my brows But as he dropt the helmet, he saw his scarf was gone—" "I've dropt it, sure," quoth Garcia, "when I put my helmet on."

He look'd around and saw the scarf, for still the Moors were near; And they had pick'd it from the sward, and loop'd it on "These Moors," quoth Garcia Perez, "uncourteous Moors they be; Now, by my soul, the scarf they stole, yet durst not ques-

But when the Moslem saw him, they stood in firm array: He rode among their armed throng—he rode right furiously: "Stand, stand, ye thieves and robbers! lay down my lady's pledge!" He cried; and ever as he cried they felt his faulchion's edge.

That day when the Lord of Vargas came to the camp alone, The scarf, his lady's largess, around his breast was thrown; Bare was his head, his sword was red, and, from his pomel struck, Seven turbans green, sore hack'd, I ween, before Garcia Pe-

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

The reader may, by this time, have got an intimation that Tittlebat Titmouse, in a madder freak of fortune than any which her incomprehensible ladyship hath hitherto exhibited in the pages of this history, is far on his way toward a dizzy pitch of greatness—viz., that he has now, owing to the verdict of the Yorkshire jury, taken the place of Mr. Aubrey, and become heir-expectant to the oldest barony in the kingdom—between it and him only one old peer, and his sole child—an unmarried daughter, intervening. Behold the thing demonstrated to your very eye, in the following pedigree, which is only our former one a little extended.

From the above, I think it will appear, that on the death of the fifth earl and twentieth baron, the earldom would be extinct, and the barony would descend upon the Lady Cecilia; and that in the event of her dying without issue in the lifetime of her father, Tittlebat Titmouse would become LORD DRELCINCOURT, (twenty-first in the barony;) and in the event of her dying without issue, after her father's death, TITTLEBAT TITMOUSE would become the twenty-second LORD DRELCINCOURT, one or other of which two splendid positions, but for the enterprising agency of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, would have been occupied by CHARLES AUBREY, Esq.; on considering which, one cannot but remember a saying of an ancient poet, who seems to have kept as keen an eye upon the unaccountable frolics of the goddess Fortune, as this history shows that I have. 'Tis a passage which any little schoolboy will translate to his mother or his sisters—

—*"Hinc apicem rapax
Fortuna cum stridore acuto Sustulit, hic possuisse gaudet."*

At the time of which I am writing, the Earl of Dreddlington was about sixty-seven years old; and he would realize the idea of an incarnation of the sublimest PRIDE. He was of rather a slight make, and, though of a tolerably advanced age, stood as straight as an arrow. His hair was glossy and white as snow; his features were of an aristocratic cast; their expression was severe and haughty; and there was not the slightest trace of intellect perceptible in them. His manner and demeanor was calm, cold, imperturbable, inaccessible: wherever he went—so to speak—he radiated cold. Poverty embittered his spirit, as his lofty birth and ancient descent generated the pride I have spoken of. With what calm and supreme self-satisfaction did he look down upon all lower in the peerage than himself! and as for a newly-created peer, he looked at him with ineffable disdain. Amongst his few equals he was affable enough; amongst his inferiors he exhibited an insupportable appearance of condescension—one which excited a wise man's smile of pity and contempt, and a fool's anger—both, however, equally naught to the Earl of Dreddlington. If any one could have ventured upon a post mortem examination of so august a structure as the Earl's carcass, his heart would probably have been found to be of the size of a pea, and his brain very soft and flabby; both, however, equal to the small occasions which, from time to time, called for the exercise of their functions. The former was occupied almost exclusively by two feelings—love of himself and of his daughter, (because upon her would descend his barony;) the latter exhibited its powers (supposing the brain to be the seat of the mind) in mastering the military details requisite for nominal soldiery: the game of whist: the routine of petty business in the House of Lords: and the etiquette of the court. One branch of useful knowledge he had, however, completely mastered—that which is so ably condensed in Debrett: and he became a sort of oracle in such matters. As for his politics, he professed Whig principles—and was, indeed, a blind and bitter partisan. In attendance to his senatorial duties, he practised an exemplary punctuality; was always to be found in the House at its sitting and rising; and never once, on any occasion, great or small, voted against his party. He had never been heard to speak in a full House; first, because he never could muster nerve enough for the purpose; secondly, because he never had any thing to say; and lastly, lest he should compromise his dignity, and destroy the prestige of his position, by not speaking better than any one present. His services were not, however, entirely overlooked; for, on his party coming into office for a few weeks, (they knew it could be for no longer a time,) they made him Lord Steward of the Household; which was thenceforward an epoch to which he referred every event of his life, great and small. The great object of his ambition, ever since he had been of an age to form large and comprehensive views of action and conduct, and conceive superior designs, and achieve distinction amongst mankind—was, to obtain a step in the peerage; for, considering the antiquity of his family, and his ample, nay superfluous pecuniary means—so much more than adequate to support his present double dignity of earl and baron—he thought it but a reasonable return for his eminent political services to obtain the step which he coveted. But his anxiety on this point had been recently increased a thousand fold by one circumstance: A gentleman who held an honorable and lucrative official situation in the House, and who never had treated the Earl of Dreddlington with that profound obsequiousness which the Earl conceived to be his due—but, on the contrary, had presumed to consider himself a man and an Englishman equally with the Earl—had, a short time before, succeeded in establishing his title to an earldom that had long been dormant, and was of creation earlier than that of Dreddlington. The Earl of Dreddlington took this untoward circumstance so much to heart, that for some months afterwards he appeared to be in a decline: always experiencing a dreadful inward spasm whenever the Earl of Fitzwarren made his appearance in the House. For this lamentable state of things there was plainly but one remedy—a MARQUISATE—at which the Earl gazed with all the intense desire of an old and feeble ape at a cocoa-nut, just above his reach, and which he beholds at length grasped and carried off by some nimble and younger rival. Amongst all the weighty cares and anxieties of this life, I must do the Earl of Dreddlington the justice to say, that he did not neglect the concerns of hereafter—the solemn realities—that future revealed to us in the Scriptures. To his enlightened and comprehensive view of the state of things around him, it was evident that the Author of the world had decreed the existence of regular gradations of society.

The following lines, quoted one night in the House, by the leader of his party, had infinitely delighted the Earl—

"Oh, where DEGREE is shaken,
Which is the ladder to all high designs,
The enterprise is sick!
Take but DEGREE away—nature that string,
And hark! what discord follows! each thing meets
In mere oppugnancy!"

When the Earl discovered that this was the production of Shakspeare, he conceived a great respect for him, and purchased a copy of his works, and had them splendidly bound; never to be opened, however, except at that one place where the famous passage in question was to be found. Since, thought the earl, such is clearly the order of Providence in this world, why should it not be so in the next? He felt certain that then there would be found corresponding differences and degrees, in analogy to the differences and degrees existing upon earth; and with this view had read and endeavored to comprehend a very dry but learned book—Butler's Analogy, lent him by his brother, a bishop. This consolatory conclusion of the Earl's was greatly strengthened by a passage of Scripture, from which he had once heard his brother preach—"In my Father's house are MANY MANSIONS: If it had not been so I would have told you." On grounds such as these, after much conversation with several old brother peers of his rank, he and they—those wise and good men—came to the conclusion that there was no real ground for apprehending so grievous a misfortune as the huddling together hereafter of the great and small into one miscellaneous and ill-assorted assemblage; but that the rules of precedence, in all their strictness, as being founded in the nature of things, would meet with an exact observance, so that every one should be ultimately and eternally happy in the company of his equals. The Earl of Dreddlington would have, in fact, as soon supposed, with the deluded Indian, that in his voyage to the next world—

"His faithful dog should bear him company," as that his lordship should be doomed to participate the same regions of heaven with any of his domestics: unless, indeed, by some, in his view, not improbable dispensation, it should form an ingredient in their cup of happiness in the next world, there to perform those offices—or analogous ones—for their old masters, which they had performed upon earth. As the Earl grew older, these just, and rational, and Scriptural views, became clearer, and his faith firmer. Indeed it might be said that he was in a manner ripening for immortality—for which his noble and lofty nature, he felt, was fitter, and more likely to be in its element, than it could possibly be in this dull, degraded, and confused world. He knew that there his sufferings in this inferior stage of existence would be richly recompensed; for sufferings indeed he had, though secret, arising from the scanty means which had been allotted to him for the purpose of maintaining the exalted rank to which it had pleased God to call him. The long series of exquisite mortifications and pinching privations arising from this inadequacy of means, had, however, the Earl doubted not, been designed by Providence as a trial of his consistency, and from which he would, in due time, issue like thrice-refined gold. Then also would doubtless be remembered in his favor the innumerable instances of his condescension in mingling in the most open manner with those who were unquestionably his inferiors, sacrificing his own feelings of lofty and fastidious exclusiveness, and endeavoring to advance the interests, and, as far as influence and example went, polish and refine the manners of the lower orders of society. Such is an outline—alas, how faint and imperfect!—of this great and good man, the Earl of Dreddlington. As for his domestic and family circumstances, he had been a widower for some fifteen years, his Countess having brought him but one child, Lady Cecilia Philippa Leopoldina Plantagenet, who was, in almost all respects, the counterpart of her illustrious father. She resembled him not a little in feature, only that she partook of the plainness of her mother. Her complexion was delicately fair; but her features had no other expression than that of a languid hauteur. Her upper eyelids drooped as if she could hardly keep them open; the upper jaw projected considerably over the under one; and her front teeth were prominent and exposed. She seemed to take but little interest in any thing on earth, so frigid was she, and inanimate. In person, she was of average height, of slender and well-proportioned figure, and an erect and graceful carriage, only that she had a habit of throwing her head a little backwards, that gave her a singularly disdainful appearance. She had reached her twenty-seventh year without having had an eligible offer of marriage, though she would be the possessor of a barony in her own right, and £5000 a year; a circumstance which, it may be believed, not a little embittered her. She inherited her father's pride in all its plenitude. You should have seen the haughty couple sitting silently side by side in the old-fashioned, yellow family-carriage, as they drove round the crowded park, returning the salutations of those they met in the slightest manner possible. A glimpse of them at such a moment would have given you a far more just and lively notion of their character, than the most anxious and labored description of mine.

Ever since the first Earl of Dreddlington had, through a bitter pique conceived against his eldest son, the second Earl, diverted the principal family revenues to the younger branch, leaving the title to be supported by only £5000 a year, there had been a complete estrangement between the elder and the younger—the titled and the monied—branches of the family. On Mr. Aubrey's attaining his majority, however, the present Earl sanctioned overtures being made towards a reconciliation, being of opinion that Mr. Aubrey and Lady Cecilia might, by intermarriage, effect a happy re-union of family interests; an object, this, that had long lain nearer his heart than any other upon earth, till, in fact, it became a kind of passion. Actuated by such considerations, he had done more to conciliate Mr. Aubrey than he had ever done towards any one on earth. It was, however, in vain. Mr. Aubrey's first delinquency was, an unqualified and enthusiastic adoption of Tory principles. Now, all the Dreddlingtons, from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, had been firm, unflinching Tories, till the father of the present Earl quietly walked over one day to the other side of the House of Lords, completely fascinated by a bit of riband which the minister held up before him: and before he had sat in that wonder-working region, the ministerial side of the House, twenty-four hours, he discovered that the true signification of Tory, was bigot, and of Whig, patriot; and he stuck to that version till it transformed him into a gold stick, in which capacity he died, having repeatedly and solemnly impressed upon his son the necessity and advantage of taking the same view of public affairs, with a view to arrive at similar results. And in the way in which he had been trained up, most religiously had gone the earl; and see the result: he, also, attained to eminent and responsible office—to wit, that of Lord Steward of the Household. Now, things standing thus—how could the earl so compromise his principles, and indirectly injure his party, by suffering his daughter to marry a Tory? Great grief and vexation of spirit did this matter, therefore, occasion to that excellent nobleman. But, secondly, Aubrey not only declined to marry his cousin, but clenched his refusal, and sealed his final exclusion from the dawning good opinion and affections of the earl, by marrying some one else—Miss St. Clair. Thenceforth there was a great gulf between the Earl of Dreddlington and the Aubreys. Whenever they happened to meet, the earl greeted him with an elaborate bow, and a petrifying smile; but for the last seven years, not one syllable had passed between them. As for Mr. Aubrey, he had never been otherwise than amused at the eccentric airs of his magnificent kinsman. Now, was it not a hard thing for the earl to bear—namely, the prospect there was that his barony and estates might devolve upon this same Aubrey, or his issue? for Lady Cecilia, alas! enjoyed but precarious health, and her chances of marrying seemed daily diminishing. This was a thorn in the poor earl's flesh; a source of constant worry to him, sleeping and waking; and proud as he was, and with such good reasons, he would have gone down on his knees and prayed to heaven to avert so direful a calamity—to see his daughter married.

Such being the relative position of Mr. Aubrey and the Earl of Dreddlington at the time when this history opens, it is easy for the reader to imagine the lively interest with which the earl first heard of the tidings that a stranger had set up a title to the whole of the Yatton estates; and the silent but profound anxiety with which he continued to regard the progress of the affair. He obtained, from time to time, by means of confidential inquiries instituted by his solicitor, a general notion of the nature of the new claimant's pretensions; but, with a due degree of delicacy towards his unfortunate kinsman, he studiously concealed the interest he felt in so important a family question as the succession to the Yatton property. The earl and his daughter were exceedingly anxious to see the claimant; and when he heard that the claimant was a gentleman of "decided Whig principles"—the earl was very near setting it down as a sort of special interference of Providence in his favor; and one that, in the natural order of things, would lead to the accomplishment of the other wishes of the earl. Who knew but that, before a twelvemonth had passed over, the two branches of the family might not be in a fair way of being re-united—and thus, among other incidents, invest the earl with the virtual patronage of the borough of Yatton, and, in the event of their return to power, strengthen his claim upon his party for his long-coveted marquise? Urgent business had carried him to the continent a few days before the trial of the ejectment at York; and he did not return till a day or two after the Court of King's Bench had solemnly declared the validity of the plaintiff's title to the Yatton property, and consequently established his right of succession to the barony of Dreincourt. Of this event a lengthened account was given in one of the Yorkshire papers, which fell under the earl's eye the day after his arrival from abroad; and to the report of the decision of the question of law, was appended the following paragraph:—

"In consequence of the above decision, Mr. Aubrey, we are able to state on the best authority, has given formal notice of his intention to surrender the entire of the Yatton property without further litigation; thus making the promptest amends in his power to those whom he has—we cannot doubt unwittingly—injured. He has also accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, and has consequently retired from Parliament; so that the borough of Yatton is now vacant. We sincerely hope that the new proprietor of Yatton will either himself sit for the borough, and announce immediately his intention of doing so, or give his prompt and decisive support to some gentleman of decided Whig principles. We say prompt—for the enemy is vigilant and crafty. Men of Yatton! To the rescue!!!—Mr. Titmouse is now, we believe, in London. This fortunate gentleman is not only in possession of the fine property at Yatton, with an unincumbered reat-roll of from twelve to fifteen thousand a year, and a vast accumulation of rents to be handed over by the late possessor, but is now next but one in succession to the earldom of Dreddlington and barony of Dreincourt, with the large family estates annexed thereto. We believe this is the oldest barony in the kingdom. It must be a source of great satisfaction to the present earl to know that his probable successor professes the same liberal and enlightened political opinions, of which his lordship has, during his long and distinguished political life, been so able and consistent a supporter."

The Earl of Dreddlington was slightly flustered on reading the above paragraph. He perused it several times with increasing satisfaction. The time had at length arrived for him to take decisive steps; nay, duty to his newly-discovered kinsman required it.

Messrs. Titmouse and Gammon were walking arm-in-arm down Oxford street, on their return from some livery-stables, where they had been looking at a horse which Titmouse was thinking of purchasing, when an incident occurred which ruffled him not a little. He had been recognized and publicly accosted by a vulgar fellow, with a yard measure in his hand, and a large parcel of drapery under his arm—in fact, by our old friend Mr. Huckaback. In vain did Mr. Titmouse affect, for some time, not to see his old acquaintance, and to be earnestly engaged in conversation with Mr. Gammon.

"Ah, Titty!—Titmouse! Well, Mister Titmouse—how are you? Devilish long time since we met!" Titmouse directed a look at him that he wished could have blighted him, and quickened his pace without taking any farther notice of the presumptuous intruder. Huckaback's blood was up, however—roused by this ungrateful and insolent treatment from one who had been under such great obligations to him; and quickening his pace also, he kept alongside with Titmouse.

"Ah," continued Huckaback, "why do you cut me in this way, Titty? You are n't ashamed of me, surely? Many's the time you've tramped up and down Oxford street with your bundle and yard measure!"

"Fellow!" at length exclaimed Titmouse, indignantly, "upon my life I'll give you in charge if you go on so! Be off, you low fellow!—Dem vulgar brute!" he subjoined in a lower tone, bursting into perspiration, for he had not forgotten the insolent pertinacity of Huckaback's disposition.

"My eyes! Give me in charge? Come, I like that, rather—you vagabond! Pay me what you owe me! You're a swindler! You owe me fifty pounds, you do! You sent a man to rob me!"

"Will any one get a constable?" inquired Titmouse, who had grown white as death. The little crowd that was collecting round them began to suspect, from Titmouse's agitated appearance, that there must be some foundation for the charges made against him.

"Oh, go, get a constable! Nothing I should like better! Ah, very fine gentleman—what's the time of day, when chaps like you are wound up so high?"

Gammon's interference was in vain. Huckaback got more abusive and noisy; no constable was at hand; so, to escape the intolerable interruption and nuisance, he beckoned a coach off the stand, which was close by, and Titmouse and he stepping into it, they were soon out of sight and hearing of Mr. Huckaback. Having taken a shilling drive, they alighted, and walked toward Covent Garden. As they approached the hotel they observed a yellow chariot, at once elegant and somewhat old-fashioned, rolling away from the door.

"I wonder who that is," said Gammon; "it's an earl's coronet on the panel; and an old gentleman was sitting low down in the corner!"

"Ah—it's no doubt a fine thing to be a lord, and all that—but I'll answer for it, some of 'em's as poor as a church mouse," replied Titmouse as they entered the hotel. At that moment the waiter, with a most profound bow, presented him with a letter and a card, which had only the moment before been left for him. The card was and there was written on it, in pencil, in rather a feeble and hurried character—"For Mr. Titmouse."

"My stars, Mr. Gammon!" exclaimed Titmouse, excitedly, addressing Mr. Gammon, who also seemed greatly interested by the occurrence. They both repaired to a vacant table at the extremity of the room; and Titmouse, with not a little trepidation, hastily breaking a large seal which contained the earl's family arms, with their crowded quarterings and grim supporters—better appreciated by Gammon, however, than by Titmouse—opened the ample envelope, and, unfolding its thick gilt-edged enclosure, read as follows:

"The Earl of Dreddlington has the honor of waiting upon Mr. Titmouse, in whom he is very happy to have, so unexpectedly, discovered so near a kinsman. On the event which has brought this to pass, the Earl congratulates himself not less than Mr. Titmouse, and hopes for the earliest opportunity of a personal introduction."

"The Earl leaves town to-day, and will not return till Monday next, on which day he begs the favor of Mr. Titmouse's company to dinner. He may depend upon its being strictly a family reunion, the only person present, besides Mr. Titmouse and the Earl, being the Lady Cecilia. Grosvenor Square, Thursday."

"TITMUSE AT YATTON, Esq., &c. &c."

As soon as Titmouse had read the above, still holding it in his hand, he gazed at Gammon with mute apprehension and delight. Of the existence, indeed, of the magnificent personage who had just introduced himself, Titmouse had certainly heard, from time to time, since the commencement of the proceedings which had just been so successfully terminated. He had seen it, to be sure; but, as a sort of remote splendor, like that of a fixed star which gleamed brightly, but at too vast a distance to have any sensible influence, or even to arrest his attention. After a little while, Titmouse began to chatter very volubly; but Gammon, after reading over the note once or twice, seemed not much inclined for conversation; and had Titmouse been accustomed to observation, he might have gathered, from the eye and brow of Gammon, that that gentleman's mind was very deeply occupied by some matter or other, probably suggested by the incident which had just taken place. Titmouse, by and by, called for pens, ink and paper—"the very best of gilt-edged paper, mind"—and prepared to reply to Lord Dreddlington's note. Gammon, however, who knew the peculiarities of his friend's style of correspondence, suggested that he should draw up, and Titmouse copy the following note. This was presently done; but when Gammon observed how thickly studded it was with capital letters, the numerous flourishes with which it was garnished, and its more than questionable orthography, he prevailed on Titmouse, after some little difficulty, to allow him to transcribe the note which was to be sent to Lord Dreddlington. Here it is:

"Mr. Titmouse begs to present his compliments to the Earl of Dreddlington, and to express the high sense he entertains of the kind consideration evinced by his Lordship in his call and note of to-day."

"One of the most gratifying circumstances connected with Mr. Titmouse's recent success, is the distinguished alliance which his lordship has been so prompt and courteous in recognising. Mr. Titmouse will feel the greatest pleasure in availing himself of the Earl of Dreddlington's invitation to dinner for Monday next."

"Cabbage-Stalk Hotel, Thursday."

"THE RIGHT HONORABLE, THE EARL OF DREDDLINGTON, &c. &c."

"Have you a 'Peerage' here, waiter?" inquired Gammon, as the waiter brought him a lighted taper. Dobrett was shortly laid before him; and, turning to the name of Dreddlington, he read over what has been already laid before the reader. "Humph—Lady Cecilia—here she is—his daughter—I thought as much—I see!" This was what passed through his mind, as—having left Titmouse, who set off to deposit a card and the above "Answer" at Lord Dreddlington's—he made his way toward the delectable regions in which their office was situated—Saffron Hill—"T is curious—amusing—interesting to observe his progress"—continued Gammon to himself—

"Tag-rag—and his daughter,

"Quirk—and his daughter,

"The Earl of Dreddlington—and his daughter. How many more! Happy! happy! happy Titmouse!"

The sun that was rising upon Titmouse was setting upon the Aubreys. Dear, delightful—now too dear, now too delightful—Yatton! the shades of evening are descending upon thee, and thy virtuous but afflicted occupants, who, early on the morrow, quit thee for ever. Approach silently yon conservatory. Behold in the midst of it the dark slight figure of a lady, solitary, motionless, in melancholy attitude—her hands clasped before her: it is Miss Aubrey. Her face is beautiful, but grief is in her eye; and her bosom heaves with sighs, which, gentle as they are, are yet the only sounds audible. Yes, that is the sweet and once joyous Kate Aubrey!

"T was she, indeed; and this was her last visit to her conservatory. Many rare, delicate, and beautiful flowers were there; the air was laden with the fragrant odors which they exhaled, as it were, in sighs, on account of the dreaded departure of their lovely mistress. At length she stooped down, and in stooping, a tear fell right upon the small sprig of geranium which she gently detached from the stem and placed in her bosom. "Sweet flowers," thought she, "who will tend you as I have tended you, when I am gone? Why do you look now more beautiful than ever you did before?" Her eye fell upon the spot on which, till the day before, had stood her aviary. Poor Kate had sent it, as a present, to Lady De la Zouch, and it was then at Fotheringham Castle. What a flutter there used to be among the beautiful little creatures when they perceived Kate's approach! She turned her head away. She felt oppressed, and attributed it to the closeness of the conservatory—the strength of the odors given out by the numerous flowers but it was sorrow that oppressed her; and she was in a sta at once of mental excitement and physical exhaustion. The last few weeks had been an interval of exquisite suffering. She could not be happy alone, and yet could not bear the company of her brother and her sister-in-law, nor that of their innocent children. Quitting the conservatory with a look of lingering fondness, she passed along into the house with a hurried step, and escaped, unobserved, to her chamber—the very chamber in which the reader obtained his first glimpse of her; and in which, now entering it silently and suddenly, the door being only closed, not shut, she observed her faithful little maid Harriet, sitting in tears before a melancholy heap of packages prepared for travelling on the morrow. She rose as Miss Aubrey entered, and presently exclaimed passionately, bursting afresh into tears, “Ma’am, I can’t leave you—indeed I can’t; I know all your ways; I won’t go to any one else! I shall hate service! and I know they’ll hate me too; for I shall cry myself to death!”

“Come, come, Harriet, this is very foolish; nay, it is unkind to distress me in this manner at the last moment.”

“Oh, ma’am, if you did but know how I love you! How I’d go on my knees to serve you all the rest of the days of my life.”

“Don’t talk in that way, Harriet; that’s a good girl,” said Miss Aubrey, rather faintly; and sinking into the chair, had a great deal to go through, Harriet, and am in very poor spirits.”

“I know it, ma’am, I do; and that’s why I can’t bear to leave you! She sunk on her knees beside Miss Aubrey.

“Oh, ma’am, if you would but let me stay with you! I’ve been trying, ever since you first told me, to make up my mind to part with you; and, now it’s coming to the time, I can’t, ma’am—indeed, I can’t! If you did but know, ma’am, what my thoughts have been while I’ve been folding and packing up your dresses here; to think that I shan’t be with you to unpack them; it’s very hard, ma’am, that madam’s maid is to go with her, and I am not to go with you.”

“We must have made a choice, Harriet,” said Miss Aubrey, with forced calmness.

“Yes, ma’am; but why did you not choose us both? Because we’ve both always done our best; and, as for me, you’ve never spoke an unkind word to me in your life.”

“Harriet, Harriet,” said Miss Aubrey, tremulously, “I’ve several times explained to you that we cannot any longer afford each to have our own maid; and Mrs. Aubrey’s maid is older than you, and knows how to manage children—”

“What signifies affording, ma’am? Neither she nor I will ever take a shilling of wages; I’d really rather serve you for nothing, ma’am, than any other lady for a hundred pounds a year! Oh, so happy as I’ve been in your service, ma’am!” she added, bitterly.

“Don’t, Harriet—you would not, if you knew the pain you give me,” said Miss Aubrey, faintly. Harriet got up, poured out a glass of water, and forced her pale mistress to swallow a little, which presently revived her.

“Harriet,” said she, “you have never once disobeyed me, and now I am certain you won’t. I assure you that we have made all our arrangements, and cannot alter them. I have been very fortunate in obtaining for you so kind a mistress as Lady Stratton. Remember, Harriet, she was the oldest bosom friend of my—” Miss Aubrey’s voice trembled, and she ceased speaking for a minute or two, during which she struggled against her feelings with momentary success. “Here’s the prayer-book,” she presently resumed, opening a drawer in her dressing-table, and taking out a small volume—“Here’s the prayer-book I promised you; it is very prettily bound, and I have written your name in it, Harriet, as you desired. Take it, and keep it for my sake. Will you?”

“Oh, ma’am,” replied the girl bitterly, “I shall never bear to look at it, but I’ll never part with it till I die.”

“Now leave me, Harriet, for a short time—I wish to be alone,” said Miss Aubrey; and she was obeyed. She presently rose and bolted the door; and then, secure from interruption, walked slowly to and fro for some time; and a long and deep current of melancholy thoughts and feelings flowed through her mind and her heart. She had, but a short time before, seen her sister’s sweet children put into their little beds for the last time at Yatton; and together with their mother, had hung fondly over them, kissing and embracing them—their little fellow-wanderers—till her feelings compelled her to leave them. One by one all the dear innumerable ties that had attached her to Yatton, and every thing connected with it ever since her birth, had been severed and broken—ties, not only the strength, but the very existence of which, she had scarce been aware of till then. She had bade—as had all of them—repeated and agonizing farewells to dear and old friends. Her very heart within her trembled as she gazed at the objects familiar to her eye, and pregnant with innumerable little softening associations, ever since her infancy. Nothing around them now belonged to them—but to a stranger—to one who—she shuddered with disgust. She thought of the fearful position in which her brother was placed—entirely, at the mercy of, it might be, selfish and rapacious men—what indeed was to become of all of them? At length she threw herself into the large, old, easy-chair, which stood near the window, and with a fluttering heart and hasty, tremulous hand, drew an open letter from her bosom. She held it for some moments, as if dreading again to peruse it—but at length she unfolded it, and read—

“No, my own Kate! I neither can nor will forget you—nor shall you forget me. I care not about offending you in this point. Say what you like, do what you like, go whither-soever you choose—you shall never escape Geoffrey Delamere. How should it be so? Why, my sweet Kate, you are become a part of my very being, and you know it; we both know it. Without my own darling Kate the future is an utter blank to me; come, my own love, may I not hope that it is, in a measure, the same with you? Can you possibly think of or name a sacrifice I would not make for you? Kate, in the plain language of a fond and honest heart, let me tell you that I think you love me.” Here Miss Aubrey’s hand dropped with the letter upon her lap, and she burst into a passionate flood of tears. After an interval of several minutes, she again took up the letter.

“Because you know how I love you. And yet I sometimes doubt it—I sometimes tremble to think that possibly there may be other reasons than those which you assign, for resisting not only my own passionate entreaties, but those of my mother; the often expressed and anxious wishes of my father, (as he himself, over and over again, told your brother,) of all my family, of your family and friends. Heavens, it alarms me to recapitulate in this way! Why, whom else is there, dear, dearest Kate, to consult? Yield, yield, to the impulse of your own pure, and gentle, and generous heart, and throw to the winds the absurd fancies—the doubts and fears—with which you torment both yourself and me! How I wish, if I am to suffer in this grievous way, that you were a shade—ay, even so, a shade less delicate—not quite so high-minded! You are so to a pitch that, really—really is morbid! It makes my very heart bleed (and you ought not willingly to give me pain) to hear you talk of your being portionless—a beggar. I have scarce patience to write the words. Why, if it were even so, what would money signify to me? Oh, Catharine, be but mine, and I am the happiest, the richest, the proudest man in the country. But what am I saying? Perhaps Miss Aubrey is reading that which I scarcely know how I am writing with a cold and angry look. If so, I had better conclude; I have exhausted all the language at my command, and if it has been only to offend you, what a cruel condition is mine!” Here Miss Aubrey again laid down the letter, and again burst into tears, and wept long and bitterly. Once more she resumed:—“It may seem cruel of me to write thus at a moment when your heart is bleeding for your brother—your noble, high-minded brother; but in remembering him, do not forget me; and if remembering me should in any way injure the interests of your brother, forget me, if you will. O Kate! God knows what sleepless nights and days of anxiety your brother’s cruel misfortunes have cost us! Why, oh why, cannot I persuade you, that this Castle is large enough for all of us? I am writing on—and on—and on—as if I love were setting off to a distant country, never to return. O Kate, think you could but see the agony of grief and love in which I took up, and now lay down, my pen!”

Miss Aubrey, quite overcome by her feelings, hastily folded up the letter, replaced it whence she had taken it, and sobbed bitterly. Alas, what additional poignancy did this give to the agonies of her last evening at Yatton! She had, however, become somewhat calmer by the time that she heard the door hastily, but gently tapped at, and then attempted to be opened. Miss Aubrey rose and unbolted it, and Mrs. Aubrey entered, her beautiful countenance as pale and sad as that of her sister-in-law. She, however, was both wife and mother; and the various cares which these relations entailed upon her at a bitter moment like the present, served, in some measure, to occupy her thoughts, and prevent her from being absorbed by the heart-breaking circumstances which surrounded her. Suffering had, however, a little impaired her beauty; her cheek was very pale, and her eye and brow laden with trouble.

“Kate, dear Kate,” said she, rather quickly closing the door after her, “what is to be done? Did you hear carriage-wheels a few moments ago? Who do you think have arrived? As I fancied would be the case, the De la Zouches.” Miss Aubrey trembled and turned pale. “You must see—you must see—Lady De la Zouch, Kate—they have driven from Fotheringham on purpose to take a last farewell! ‘Tis very painful, but what can be done? You know what dear good friends they are.”

“Is Lord De la Zouch come, also?” inquired Miss Aubrey, apprehensively.

“I will not deceive you, dearest Kate, they are all come; but she only is in the house: they are gone out to look for Charles, who is walking in the park.” Miss Aubrey gave a sudden shudder; and after evidently a violent struggle with her feelings, the color having entirely deserted her face, and left it of an ashy whiteness, “I cannot muster up resolution enough, Agnes,” she whispered. “I know their errand.”

“Care not about their errand, love! You shall not be troubled—you shall not be persecuted.” Miss Aubrey shook her head, and grasped Mrs. Aubrey’s hand.

“They do not, they cannot persecute me. It is a cruel and harsh—and!—consider how noble, how disinterested is their conduct; it is that which subdues me.”

Mrs. Aubrey threw her arms round her agitated sister-in-law, and tenderly kissed her forehead.

“Oh, Agnes!” faltered Miss Aubrey, pressing her hand upon her heart, to relieve the intolerable oppression she suffered, “would to Heaven that I had never seen—never thought of him.”

“Don’t fear that he will attempt to see you on so sad an occasion as this. Delamere is a man of the utmost delicacy and generosity.”

“I know he is, I know he is,” gasped Miss Aubrey.

“Stay, I’ll tell you what to do; I’ll go down and return with Lady De la Zouch; we can see her here, undisturbed and alone, for a few moments; and then, nothing painful can occur. Shall I bring her?” she inquired, rising. Miss Aubrey did not dissent; and within a very few minutes’ time, Mrs. Aubrey returned, accompanied by Lady De la Zouch, rather an elderly woman, her countenance still handsome; of very dignified carriage, of an extremely mild disposition, and passionately fond of Miss Aubrey. Hastily drawing aside her veil as she entered the room, she stepped quickly up to Miss Aubrey, and for a few moments grasped her hands in silence.

“This is very sad work, Miss Aubrey,” said she at length, hurriedly glancing at the luggage lying piled up at the other end of the room. Miss Aubrey made no answer, but shook her head. “It was useless attempting it, we could not stay at home; we have risked being charged with cruel intrusion; forgive me, dearest, will you? They will not come near you!” Miss Aubrey trembled. “I feel as if I were parting with a daughter, Kate,” said Lady De la Zouch, with sudden emotion. “How your mamma and I loved one another!”

“For mercy’s sake, open the window; I feel suffocated,” faltered Miss Aubrey. Mrs. Aubrey threw up the window, and the cool, refreshing breeze of evening quickly diffused itself through the apartment, and revived the drooping spirits of Miss Aubrey, who walked gently to and fro about the room, supported by Lady De la Zouch and Mrs. Aubrey, and soon recovered a tolerable degree of composure. The three ladies presently stood, arm in arm, gazing through the deep bay-window at the fine and extensive prospect which it commanded. The gloom of evening was beginning to steal over the landscape.

“How beautiful!” exclaimed Miss Aubrey, with a deep sigh.

“The window in the northern tower of the castle commands a still more extensive view,” said Lady De la Zouch. Miss Aubrey suddenly looked at her, and burst into tears. After standing gazing through the window for some time longer, they stepped down into the room, and were soon engaged in deep and earnest conversation.

For the last three weeks Mr. Aubrey had addressed himself with calmness and energy to the painful duties which had devolved upon him, of setting his house in order. Immediately after quitting the dinner-table that day—a mere nominal meal to himself, his wife, and sister—he had retired to the library, to complete the extensive and important arrangements consequent upon his abandonment of Yatton; and after about an hour thus occupied, he walked out to take a solitary—a melancholy—a last walk about the property. It was a moment that severely tried his fortitude; but that fortitude stood the trial. He was a man of lively sensibilities, and appreciated, to its utmost extent, the melancholy and alarming change that had come over his fortunes. Surely even the bluntest and coarsest feelings that ever tried to disguise and dignify themselves under the name of stoicism—to convert into bravery and fortitude a stupid, sullen insensibility—must have been not a little shaken by such scenes as Mr. Aubrey had had to pass through during the last few weeks—scenes which I do not choose to distress the reader’s feelings by dwelling upon in detail. Mr. Aubrey had no mean pretensions to real philosophy, but he had still juster pretensions to an infinitely higher character—that of a CHRISTIAN. He had a firm, unwavering conviction that whatever befell him, either of good or evil, was the ordination of the Almighty—infinite wisdom, infinitely good;—and this was the source of his fortitude and resignation. He felt himself here standing upon ground that was immovable.

To avert the misfortune which menaced him, he had neglected no rational and conscientious means. To retain the advantages of fortune and station to which he had believed himself born, he had made the most strenuous exertions consistent with a rigid sense of honor. What, indeed, could he have done that he had not done? He had caused the claims of his opponent to be subjected to as severe and skilful a scrutiny as the wit of man could suggest; and they had stood the test. Those claims, and his own, had been each of them placed in the scales of justice; those scales had been held up and poised by the pure and firm hands to which the laws of God, and of the country, had committed the administration of justice: on what ground could a just and reasonable man quarrel with or repine at the issue? And supposing that a perverse and subtle ingenuity in his legal advisers could have devised means for delaying his surrender of the property, to him who had been solemnly declared its true owner, what real and ultimate advantage could he have obtained by such a dishonorable line of conduct? Could the spirit of the Christian religion tolerate the bare idea of it? Could such purposes or intentions consist for one instant with the consciousness that the awful eye of God was always upon every thought of his mind, every feeling of his heart, every purpose of his will? A thorough and lively conviction of God’s moral government of the world secured him a happy composure—a glorious and immovable resolution; it enabled him to form a true estimate of things; it extracted the sting from grief and regret; it dispelled the gloom that would otherwise have settled portentously upon the future. Thus he had not “forgotten the exhortation which spoke unto him, as unto a child; My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of Him.” And if, indeed, religion had not done this for Mr. Aubrey, what could it have done, what would it have been worth? It would have been that indeed which dull fools suppose it—a mere name, a melancholy delusion. What hopeless and lamentable imbecility would it not have argued, to have acknowledged the reality and influence of religion in the hour of prosperity—and to have doubted, distrusted, or denied it in the hour of adversity? When a child beholds the sun obscured by the dark clouds, he may think, in his simplicity, that it is gone for ever; but a MAN knows that behind is the sun, glorious as ever, and the next moment, the clouds having rolled away, its glorious warmth and light are again upon the earth. Thus it is, thought Aubrey, with humble but cheerful confidence, with the Almighty—who hath declared himself the “Father of the spirits of all flesh”—

“Behind a frowning Providence,
He hides a smiling face!
Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his works in vain:
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain!”

“Therefore, O my God!” thought Aubrey, as he gazed upon the lovely scenes familiar to him from his birth, and from which a few short hours were to separate him for ever, “I do acknowledge Thy hand in what hath befallen me, and Thy mercy which makes me to bear it, as from Thee.” The scene around him was tranquil and beautiful—inexpressibly beautiful. He stood under the shadow of a mighty elm-tree, the last of a long and noble avenue, which he had been pacing in deep thought for upwards of an hour. The ground was considerably elevated above the level of the rest of the park. No sound disturbed the serene repose of the approaching evening, except the distant and gradually diminishing sounds issuing from an old rookery, and the faint low bubbling of a clear streamlet that flowed not far from where he stood. Here and there, under the deepening shadows cast by the lofty trees, might be seen the glancing forms of deer, the only live things visible. “Life,” said Aubrey, with a sigh, as he leaned against the trunk of the grand old tree under which he stood, and gazed with a fond and anxious eye on the lovely scenes stretching before him, to which the subdued radiance of the departing sunlight communicated a tender, pensive air; “life is, in truth, what the Scriptures—what the voice of nature—represent it—a long journey, during which the traveller stops at many resting places. Some of them are more, others less beautiful; from some he parts with more, from others, with less regret: but part he must, and pursue his journey, though he may often turn back to gaze with lingering fondness and admiration at the scene he has last quitted. The next stage may be—as all his journey might have been—bleak and desolation; but through that he is only passing; he will not be condemned to stay in it, as he was not permitted to dwell in the other; he is still journeying on, along a route which he cannot mistake, to the point of his destination, his journey's end—the shores of the vast ocean of eternity—his HOME!"

Such were the thoughts passing through the mind of Aubrey.

And what, MEN OF THE WORLD, as—knowing not how significantly—you call yourselves—what would be your thoughts, what would you have done, if upon you had suddenly descended the stroke which has fallen upon this CHRISTIAN GENTLEMAN—surely, at least, your equal in intellect, in accomplishments, in refinement, in personal honor, in station, and in fortune? What would become of many of you, unable any longer to indulge, some in the refined, others in the coarse profligacy, which hath at last become essential to your characters and existence? And of you, frivolous followers of fashion? Glittering insects! struck to the earth out of your artificial elevation, as the sudden shower beats down the butterfly—what can you do, but lie there and be crushed? How can you exist without—that can console or compensate you for the want of—the clubs, the opera, the gaming-table, the betting-stand—your French cooks and mistresses, your gay dress and equipage, the brilliant ball-room, the sparkling wines, the splendid dinner-table? Alas, these gone, what and where are you? What is to become of you? What is left you upon earth—emasculate both in mind and body? Are you fit for conflict with your gaunt and dismaying opponent—ADVERSITY? Those of you who can think and reflect, be it ever so little, what is there to console you in the view of the past? Is it not steeped in sensuality, disfigured with debauchery? And what have you to hope for from the future? Where are now your old friends and companions? Vain and presumptuous wretch, are you any longer in a condition to be recognised by them? Remember, you have had your day, and the night cometh!

Not thus was it with Aubrey!

The deepening shadows of evening warned him to retrace his steps to the hall. Before quitting the spot upon which he had been so long standing, he turned his head a little towards the right, to take a last view of an object which called forth tender and painful feeling—it was the old sycamore which his sister's intercession had saved from the axe. There it stood, feeble and venerable object! its leafless silvery-grey branches becoming dim and indistinct, yet contrasting touchingly with the verdant strength of those by its side. A neat strong fence had been placed around it; but how much longer would it receive such care and attention? Aubrey thought of the comparison which had been made by his sister, and sighed as he looked his last at the old tree, and then slowly walked on towards the hall. When about half-way down the avenue, he beheld two figures apparently approaching him, but undistinguishable in the gloom and the distance. As they neared him, he recognised Lord De la Zouch, and Mr. Delamere. Suspecting the object of their visit, which a little surprised him, since they had taken a final leave, and a very affecting one, the day before, he felt a little anxiety and embarrassment. Nor was he entirely mistaken. Lord De la Zouch, who advanced alone towards Aubrey,—Mr. Delamere turning back—most seriously pressed his son's suit for the hand of Miss Aubrey, as he had often done before; declaring, that though he wished a year or two first to elapse, during which his son might complete his studies at Oxford, there was no object dearer to the heart of Lady De la Zouch and himself, than to see Miss Aubrey become their daughter-in-law. "Where," said Lord De la Zouch, with much energy, "is he to look elsewhere for such a union of beauty, of accomplishments, of amiability, of high-mindedness?" After a great deal of animated conversation on this subject, during which Mr. Aubrey assured Lord De la Zouch that he would say every thing which he honorably could to induce his sister to entertain, or at all events, not to discard the suit of Delamere; at the same time reminding him of the firmness of her character, and the hopelessness of attempting to change any determination to which she had been led by her sense of delicacy and honor—Lord De la Zouch addressed himself in a very earnest manner to matters more immediately relating to the personal interests of Mr. Aubrey; entered with lively anxiety into all his future plans and purposes: and once more pressed upon him the acceptance of most munificent offers of pecuniary assistance, which, with many fervent expressions of gratitude, Aubrey again declined. But he pledged himself to communicate freely with Lord De la Zouch, in the event of an occasion arising for such assistance as his lordship had already so generously volunteered. By this time Mr. Delamere had joined them, regarding Mr. Aubrey with infinite earnestness and apprehension. All, however, he said, was—and in a hurried manner to his father—"My mother has sent me to say that she is waiting for you in the carriage, and wishes that we should immediately return." Lord De la Zouch and his son again took leave of Mr. Aubrey. "Remember, my dear Aubrey, remember the pledges you have repeated this evening," said the former. "I do, I will!" replied Mr. Aubrey, as they each wrung his hands; and then, having grasped those of Lady De la Zouch, who sat within the carriage powerfully affected, the door was shut; and they were quickly borne away from the presence and the residence of their afflicted friends. While Mr. Aubrey stood gazing after them, with folded arms, in an attitude of melancholy abstraction, at the hall door, he was accosted by Dr. Tatham, who had come to him from the library, where he had been, till a short time before, busily engaged reducing into writing various matters which had been the subject of conversation between himself and Mr. Aubrey during the day.

RATHER SEVERE.—A young buck of the soap-lock order, who wore an unshaven face, because, as he said, it looked "foreign," lately accosted a Yankee at one of our hotels as follows:

"I say, fellow, some individuals think I am a Frenchman, and some take me for an 'Etalyene,' now what do you think I am."

"I think you are a darned fool," replied Jonathan.

[Concluded.]

Henry Clay, the son of a Virginian clergyman, was born in 1777. His early career coincides with that of Sir Samuel Romilly in three particulars: his education was neglected, he was placed in the office of a chancery clerk, and (like Curran also) he broke down when he first attempted to address an audience: "In his first attempt," we are told, "he was much embarrassed, and saluted the president of the society (a debating club) with the technical phrase, Gentlemen of the Jury; but gaining confidence as he proceeded, he burst the trammels of his youthful diffidence, and clothing his thoughts in appropriate language, gave utterance to an animated and eloquent address. He soon obtained an extensive and lucrative practice, and the reputation which the superiority of his genius acquired was maintained by his legal knowledge and practical accuracy."

After acquiring distinction as an advocate, he made his first appearance as a political speaker in the state legislature, and was soon afterwards elected a member of the national senate. Since that period he has taken an active part in discussing or effectuating most of the great measures completed or contemplated by the government of the United States. He has been employed on diplomatic missions, has filled a cabinet office, been twice a candidate for the presidency, and at the present moment the leadership of the "Whig" party in Congress lies between him and Mr. Webster.

Mr. Clay, as secretary-at-war under J. Q. Adams, zealously urged the recognition of the South American States; he hailed "the glorious spectacle of eighteen millions of people struggling to burst their chains and to be free," and his biographer, in "The National Portrait Gallery," now arrogates for him the honor of having called a new world into existence. "That honor belongs not to George Canning, as a reference to dates will show: if there be glory due to any one mortal man more than to others, for rousing the sympathies of free men for a people struggling to be free, that glory is due to Henry Clay, although he has never had the vanity to say so himself: his exertions won the consent of the American people to sustain the President in the decisive stand which he took when the great European powers contemplated an intervention on behalf of Spain, and it was that which decided Great Britain in the course which she pursued. The Spanish American States have acknowledged their gratitude to Mr. Clay by public acts. His speeches have been read at the head of their armies, and his name will find as durable a place in the history of the South American republics as in the records of his native land." This is a recurrence of the old error. The Americans are fully persuaded that the great European powers are constantly watching the policy of the United States with a view to the direction of their own, though, in point of fact, they think much less of it than they ought to do, and hardly ever reckon it as more than a makeweight in their system of balances. How can a nation, powerless for aggressive warfare, expect to influence sovereigns who can bring half a million of men into the field?

The tariff, however, is Mr. Clay's peculiar hobby; and he might, with much more plausibility, be called the founder of the restrictive laws called "the American system," than the originator of a grand stroke of European statesmanship.

Mr. Clay must be heard and seen to be appreciated. His person is tall and commanding; his action graceful and dignified; and his voice possesses such compass and variety, that we have heard it compared to a band of music. Miss Martineau speaks of "his small grey eye and placid half-smile redeeming his face from its usual unaccountable commonness." But this lady's descriptions are rarely confirmed by eye-witnesses. Clearness of statement is one of his chief merits; and this, added to some general resemblance in bearing, is probably the reason why Lord Lyndhurst, when he rises in the House of Lords, so frequently reminds Americans of Mr. Clay. The following is the best specimen of his style within our reach:

"During all this time the parasites of opposition do not fail, by cunning sarcasm or sly innuendo, to throw out the idea of French influence, which is known to be false, which ought to be met in one manner only, and that is by the lie direct. The administration of this country devoted to foreign influence! The administration of this country subservient to France! Great God! what a charge! how is it so influenced? By what ligament, on what basis, on what possible foundation does it rest? Is it similarity of language? No! we speak different tongues—we speak the English language. On the resemblance of our laws? No! the sources of our jurisprudence spring from another and a different country. On commercial intercourse? No! we have comparatively none with France. Is it from the correspondence in the genius of the two governments? No! here alone is the liberty of man secure from the inexorable despotism which everywhere else tramples it under foot. Where, then, is the ground of such an influence? But, Sir, I am insulting you by arguing on such a subject. Yet, preposterous and ridiculous as the insinuation is, it is propagated with so much industry, that there are persons found foolish and credulous enough to believe it. You will, no doubt, think it incredible (but I have nevertheless been told it as a fact), that an honorable member of this House, now in my eye, recently lost his election by the circulation of a silly story in his district, that he was the first cousin of the emperor Napoleon. The proof of the charge rested on a statement of facts, which was undoubtedly true. The gentleman in question, it was alleged, had married a connexion of the lady of the President of the United States, who was the intimate friend of Thomas Jefferson, late President of the United States, who, some years ago, was in the habit of wearing red French breeches. Now, taking these premises as established, you, Mr. Chairman, are too good a logician not to see that the conclusion necessarily follows!"

Edward Everett is one of the most remarkable men living. He is a native of Massachusetts, and was born about 1796. At nineteen he had already acquired the reputation of an accomplished scholar, and was drawing large audiences as a Unitarian preacher. At twenty-one (the age at which Roger Ascham achieved a similar distinction) he was appointed Professor of Greek in Harvard University, and soon afterwards he made a tour of Europe, including Greece. M. Cousin, who was with him in Germany, informed a friend of ours that he was one of the best Grecians he ever knew, and the translator of Plato must have known a good many of the best. On his return from his travels he lectured on Greek literature with the enthusiasm and success of another Abelard—we hope, without the Heloise.

In the United States the clerical (so called) profession is taken up or thrown off almost at pleasure. Mr. Everett got so sick of it during his early trials, that he retains a marked aversion to a pulpit, and generally insists upon a stage or rostrum when he has to deliver an anniversary discourse. He was eight years a member of Congress, and on his retiring was made Governor of Massachusetts; but, failing to get re-elected in 1839, he has since lived in comparative retirement. We are not sorry to add that he owes no inconsiderable portion of his fame to the "North American Review," to which (like his accomplished brother) he has been for many years a frequent and distinguished contributor. Indeed his celebrated article on Greece might be quoted as one of the best specimens of his eloquence.

Mr. Everett's chief qualifications as an orator are a clear, sweet voice and a prodigious memory; to which Mr. Sydney Smith's description of Mackintosh's might apply: "His memory (vast and prodigious as it was) he so managed as to make it a source of pleasure and instruction, rather than that dreadful engine of colloquial oppression into which it is sometimes erected." He delivers his lectures and orations with the manuscript before him, but seldom or never has occasion to refer to it, and the effect is consequently fully equal to that of improvisation. It is admitted, however, that he failed in Congress; and his addresses, literary and commemorative, are rather eloquent pieces of writing than orations in the popular acceptance of the term. They are graceful, polished, imaginative, high-toned and flowing, with a kind of Oiceronian richness and redundancy; but the condensing power is wanting, and there is no such thing as effective oratory without that.

Mr. Everett is hardly a match for Mr. Macaulay either as a speaker or a writer, though his style is not equally open to the objection of sameness; but they resemble each other in one striking particular. Their written compositions read like orations—their orations sound like written compositions: with a slight change in the commencement and conclusion, the speech becomes a critical essay, or the critical essay a speech; and both, with all their undoubted excellence, remind us of those ingenious patent contrivances which are constructed with a peculiar view to this sort of metamorphosis—the walking-stick, for example, which does duty as a fishing-rod when the head and ferule are screwed off.*

One of the first productions which brought Mr. Everett into notice was a discourse delivered at an academical society in the presence of Lafayette in 1824. The personal appeal to the illustrious visitor is a failure, but the discourse contains some great truths finely stated. For example:

"Our country is called, as it is, practical; but this is the element for intellectual action. No strongly-marked and high-toned literature, poetry, eloquence, or ethics, ever appeared but in the pressure, the din, and crowd of great interests, great enterprises, and perilous risks, and dazzling rewards. Statesmen, and warriors, and poets, and orators, and artists, start up under one and the same excitement. They are all branches of one stock. They form, and cheer, and stimulate; and, what is worth all the rest, understand each other; and it is as truly the sentiment of the student in the recesses of his cell, as of the soldier in the ranks, which breathes in the exclamation—

"To all the sons of sense proclaim,
One glorious hour of crowded life
Is worth an age without a name."

The ages of Pericles, of Augustus, of Leo, of Louis the Fourteenth, of Elizabeth, of Anne, pass in review before us as we dwell upon this splendid stanza of Sir Walter Scott's. All these in one sense might be termed revolutionary periods, for the minds of men had been violently up-stirred, and society was still rocking from the consequences of the shock. But what has this to do with the present condition of the people of the United States, who are practical as the population of Birmingham are practical?—and the sole magnets of intellect that distinguished community has sent forth are Mr. Joseph Parkes, Mr. Attwood, and Mr. Muntz, who are only just fit to illustrate an age of brass.

Mr. Macaulay has produced many a gorgeous piece of historical painting, which it expands the mind and charms the imagination to dwell upon, but he has produced nothing more impressive than Mr. Everett's description of the landing of the first settlers:

"I see them, escaped from these perils, pursuing their all but desperate undertaking, and landed at last, after a five months' passage, on the ice-clad rocks of Plymouth,—weak and weary from the voyage,—poorly armed, scantily provisioned, depending on the charity of their ship-master for a draught of beer on board, drinking nothing but water on shore,—without shelter,—without means,—surrounded by hostile tribes. Shut now the volume of history, and tell me, on any principle of human probability, what shall be the fate of this handful of adventurers? Tell me, man of military science, in how many months were they all swept off by the thirty savage tribes enumerated within the early limits of New England? Tell me, politician, how long did this shadow of a colony, on which your conventions and treaties had not smiled, languish on the distant coast? Student of history, compare for me the baffled projects, the deserted settlements, the abandoned adventurers, of other times, and find the parallel of this. Was it the winter's storm, beating upon the houseless heads of women and children; was it hard labor and spare meals; was it disease; was it the tomahawk; was it the deep malady of a blighted hope, a ruined enterprise, and a broken heart, aching in its last moments at the recollection of the loved and left beyond the sea; was it some, or all of these united, that hurried this forsaken company to their melancholy late? And is it possible that neither of these causes, that not all combined, were able to blast this bud of hope? Is it possible that, from a beginning so feeble, so frail, so worthy, not so much of admiration as of pity, there has gone forth a progress so steady, a growth so wonderful, a reality so important, a promise yet to be fulfilled so glorious?"

"Every orator before us has tried his hand at this topic, and put forth all his strength to heighten the contrast between the past and present condition of the colonies. But how infinitely inferior are all of them to Burke! The passage is familiar to the reader of taste; but as we shall have occasion to allude to it again, we think it best to save the trouble of reference:—

"Mr. Speaker, I cannot prevail on myself to hurry over this great consideration. It is good for us to be here. We stand where we have an immense view of what is past. Clouds, indeed, and darkness rest upon the future. Let us, however, before we descend from this noble eminence, reflect that this growth of our national prosperity has happened within the short period of the life of man. It has happened within sixty-eight years. There are those alive whose memory might touch the two extremities. For instance, my Lord Bathurst might remember all the stages of its progress. He was in 1704 of an age at least to be made to comprehend such things. . . . If, amidst these bright and happy scenes of domestic honor and prosperity, that angel should have drawn up the curtain, and unfolded the rising glories of his country, and whilst he was gazing with admiration on the then commercial grandeur of England, the genius should point out to him a little speck, scarce visible in the mass of the national interest, a small seminal principle, rather than a formed body, and should tell him,—"Young man, there is America—which at this day serves for little more than to amuse you with stories of savage men and uncouth manners; yet shall, before you taste of death, show itself equal to the whole of that commerce which now attracts the envy of the world. Whatever England has been growing to by a progressive increase of improvement, brought in by varieties of people, by succession of civilizing conquests and civilizing settlements in a series of seventeen hundred years, you shall see as much added to her by America in the course of a single life!" If this state of his country had been foretold to him, would it not require all the sanguine credulity of youth, and all the fervid glow of enthusiasm, to make him believe it? Fortunate man, he has lived to see it! Fortunate indeed, if he lives to see nothing that shall vary the prospect, and cloud the setting of his day."

If the invitations to these annual spouting-matches were headed with this passage, or it were inscribed on a plain tablet on the traditional landing-place at Plymouth, we cannot help thinking that a great deal of useless trouble might be saved. How well it justifies the remark of Fox: "I cannot bear this thing in anybody but Burke, and he cannot help it."

Daniel Webster was born in 1782, the son of a New Hampshire farmer. Like the Dean of St. Patrick's, and many others besides, he showed no signs of talent in early youth, and it was contrary to the wishes of his family that he undertook the study of the law. He was called to the bar in 1805, and began the practice of his profession in a small village, but removed in 1807 to Portsmouth, the capital of the county, where he soon acquired celebrity. He became a member of Congress in 1812, and distinguished himself by his exertions to place the currency of the United States on a sound footing. In 1816, his pecuniary means having been much straitened by the consequences of a fire, he removed to Boston, and gave up all his time to his profession. The experiment was attended with complete success, and in a very short period his practice equalled that of any member of the American bar.

Many of his law-arguments are good specimens of this kind of composition; but his speech on the prosecution of Knapp (tried for murder), from which Miss Martineau quotes largely, and with high commendation, appears to us more remarkable for affectation than force: e. g.

"The room was uncommonly open to the admission of light. The face of the innocent sleeper was turned from the murderer, and the beams of the moon, resting on the grey locks of his aged temples, showed him where to strike. The fatal blow is given! and the victim passes, without a struggle or a motion, from the repose of sleep to the repose of death! It is the assassin's purpose to make sure work; and he yet plies the dagger, though it was obvious that life had been destroyed by the blow of the bludgeon.—He even raises the aged arm, that he may not fail in his aim at the heart, and replaces it again over the wounds of the poniard! To finish the picture, he explores the wrist for the pulse! He feels for it, and ascertains that it beats no longer! It is accomplished. The deed is done. He retreats, retraces his steps to the window, passes out through it as he came in, and escapes. He has done the murder—no eye has seen him, no ear has heard him. The secret is his own, and it is safe!"

"Ah! gentlemen, that was a dreadful mistake. Such a secret can be safe nowhere. The whole creation of God has neither nook nor corner, where the guilty can bestow it, and say it is safe. Not to speak of that eye which glances through all disguises, and beholds every thing, as in the splendor of noon—such secrets of guilt are never safe from detection, even by men. True it is, generally speaking, that 'murder will out.' True it is, that Providence hath so ordained, and doth so govern things, that those who break the great law of Heaven, by shedding man's blood, seldom succeed in avoiding discovery. Especially, in a case exciting so much attention as this, discovery must come, and will come, sooner or later."

Miss Martineau informs us that, on the eve of the trial, Mr. Webster asked whether there was anything remarkable about any of the jury. The answer was, that the foreman was a man of remarkably tender conscience, and Miss Martineau entertains no doubt that the concluding passage was intended for his especial benefit:

"A sense of duty pursues us ever. It is omnipresent like the Deity. If we take to ourselves the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the seas, duty performed, or duty violated, is still with us, for our happiness or our misery. If we say the darkness shall cover us, in the darkness as in the light our obligations are yet with us. We cannot escape their power, nor fly from their presence. They are with us in this life, will be with us at its close; and in that scene of inconceivable solemnity which lies yet further onward, we shall still find ourselves surrounded by the consciousness of duty to pain us wherever it has been violated, and to console us so far as God may have given us grace to perform it."

We suspect that in general such considerations are as well suppressed in an address to a jury. If there be a delicate conscience it needs no stimulus to act—and a dull one will be more sensible to arguments of a more mundane sort. The late Rowland Hill understood human nature well. His chapel having been infested by pickpockets, he took occasion to remind the congregation that there was an all-seeing Providence, to whom all hearts were open and from whom no secrets were hid; "but last," he added, "there may be any present who are insensible to such reflections, I beg leave to state that there are also two Bow-street officers on the look-out."

During the period of his retirement, Mr. Webster found time to write for the North American Review an answer to ours on the American law of debtor and creditor. (Q. R., May, 1819.) We have no wish to revive the controversy, and shall therefore content ourselves with bearing willing testimony to the tone and taste of Mr. Webster's observations. Some of them may surprise such of our readers as are not aware that the most enlightened of the American statesmen are fully alive to the importance of the grand principle on which alone good government can be based in any country:

"If the property cannot retain the political power, the political power will draw after it the property. If orator Hunt and his fellow-laborers should, by any means, obtain more political influence in the counties, towns and boroughs of England, than the Marquis of Buckingham, Lord Stafford, Lord Fitzwilliam, and other noblemen and gentlemen of great landed estates, these estates would inevitably change hands. At least so it seems to us; and therefore, when Sir Francis Burdett, the Marquis of Tavistock, and other individuals of rank and fortune, propose to introduce into the government annual parliaments and universal suffrage, we can hardly forbear inquiring whether they are ready to agree that property should be as equally divided as political power; and if not, how they expect to sever things which to us appear to be intimately connected."

Sir Francis Burdett has come to a different conclusion since the Reform Bill experiment, and so, we believe, have most of the other individuals of rank and fortune alluded to; but, unluckily, he is the only one amongst them who has had the manliness to act upon his convictions.

At the end of seven years, Mr. Webster had gained enough to justify his return to public life; and in January, 1823, he delivered one of the speeches which have done most towards the diffusion of his fame—a speech in favor of the Greeks. The following passage is much and justly admired:

"It may, in the next place, be asked, perhaps, supposing all this to be true, what can we do? Are we to go to war? Are we to interfere in the Greek cause, or any other European cause? Are we to endanger our pacific relations? No, certainly not. What then, the question recurs, remains for us? If we will not endanger our own peace; if we will neither furnish armies nor navies to the cause which we think the just one, what is there within our power?"

"Sir, this reasoning mistakes the age. The time has been, indeed, when fleets and armies, and subsidies, were the principal reliance even in the best cause. But, happily for mankind, there has arrived a great change in this respect. Moral causes come into consideration, in proportion as the progress of knowledge is advanced; and the public opinion of the civilized world is rapidly gaining an ascendancy over mere brutal force. It is already able to oppose the most formidable obstruction to the progress of injustice and oppression; and, as it grows more intelligent and more intense, it will be more and more formidable. It may be silenced by military power, but it cannot be conquered. It is elastic, irrepressible, and invulnerable to the weapons of ordinary warfare. It is that impassable, unextinguishable enemy of mere violence and arbitrary rule, which, like Milton's angels,

"Vital in every part,
Cannot, but by annihilating, die."

"Until this be propitiated or satisfied, it is vain for power to talk either of triumphs or of repose. No matter what fields are desolated, what fortresses surrendered, what armies subdued, or what provinces overrun. In the history of the year that has passed by us, and in the instance of unhappy Spain, we have seen the vanity of all triumphs, in a cause which violates the general sense of justice of the civilized world. It is nothing that the troops of France have passed from the Pyrenees to Cadix; it is nothing that an unhappy and prostrate nation has fallen before them; it is nothing that arrests, and confiscation, and execution, sweep away the little remnant of national resistance. There is an enemy that still exists to check the glory of these triumphs. It follows the conqueror back to the very scene of his ovations; it calls upon him to take notice that Europe, though silent, is yet indignant; it shows him that the sceptre of his victory is a barren sceptre; that it shall confer neither joy nor honor, but shall moulder to dry ashes in his grasp. In the midst of his exultation it pierces his ear with the cry of injured justice; it denounces against him the indignation of an enlightened and civilized age; it turns to bitterness the cup of his rejoicing, and wounds him with the sting which belongs to the consciousness of having outraged the opinion of mankind."

Strange inconsistency! this passage is applauded, learnt by heart, and recited by the whole rising generation, in a land which doggedly retains millions of human beings in the most degrading state of slavery, in direct defiance of the opinion of the world!

The people of the United States are proud of having fulfilled one poetic promise; when will they fulfil another, made for them by a poet who never let slip an opportunity of showing kindness to an American?

"Assembling here, all nations shall be blest,
The sad be comforted, the weary rest;
Untouched shall drop the fetters from the slave,
And He shall rule the world he died to save."

Or when will an American orator be permitted to rise to the height of the magnificent piece of declamation which gave Mr. Webster the framework of his best passage?

In 1826 Mr. Webster was elected a member of the Senate, and in 1833 the same honor was conferred upon him. This is the field in which he has gathered most of his laurels; his resistance to the nullifying doctrines of the South Carolina delegates having been the principal means of preserving the entirety of the Union, which was seriously endangered by the threatened resistance of that state. Mr. Webster's profound knowledge of the constitution gave him a decided advantage in the resulting contest with Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Hayne, who were both antagonists of a calibre to call forth all his energies. His chief speech, in answer to Mr. Hayne, occupied three days in the delivery, and abounds in fine passages, besides giving ample evidence of his power as a debater in the English sense. For example:

"I shall not acknowledge that the honorable member goes before me in regard to whatever of distinguished talent, or distinguished character, South Carolina has produced. I claim part of the honor, I partake in the pride, of her great names. I claim them for countrymen, one and all. The Laurences, the Rutledges, the Pinckneys, the Sumpters, the Marions—Americans all—whose fame is no more to be hemmed in by state lines, than their talents and patriotism were capable of being circumscribed within the same narrow limits. In their day and generation they served and honored the country, and the whole country; and their renown is of the treasures of the whole country. Him, whose honored name the gentleman himself bears—does he esteem me less capable of gratitude for his patriotism, or sympathy for his sufferings, than if his eyes had first opened upon the light of Massachusetts, instead of South Carolina? Sir, does he suppose it in his power to exhibit a Carolina name so bright as to produce envy in my bosom? No, sir, increased gratification and delight, rather. I thank God, that, if I am gifted with little of the spirit which is able to raise mortals to the skies, I have yet none, as I trust, of that spirit which would drag angels down. When I shall be found, sir, in my place here in the Senate, or elsewhere, to sneer at public merit because it happens to spring up beyond the little limits of my own state, or neighborhood; when I refuse, for any such cause, or for any cause, the homage due to American talent, to elevated patriotism, to sincere devotion to liberty and the country; or, if I see an uncommon endowment of Heaven—if I see extraordinary capacity and virtue in any son of the South—and if, moved by local prejudice, or gangrened by state jealousy, I get up here to abate the tithe of a hair from his just character and just fame, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth!"

"Sir, let me recur to pleasing recollections—let me indulge in refreshing remembrances of the past—let me remind you that in early times no states cherished greater harmony, both of principle and feeling, than Massachusetts and South Carolina. Would to God that harmony might again return! Shoulder to shoulder they went through the revolution—hand in hand they stood round the administration of Washington, and felt his own great arm lean on them for support. Unkind feeling, if it exist, alienation and distrust, are the growth, unnatural to such soils, of false principles since sown. They are weeds, the seeds of which that same great arm never scattered."

"Mr. President, I shall enter on no encomium upon Massachusetts—she needs none. There she is—behold her, and judge for yourselves. There is her history: the world knows it by heart. The past, at least, is secure. There is Boston, and Concord, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill—and there they will remain for ever. The bones of her sons, falling in the great struggle for Independence, now lie mingled with the soil of every state, from New England to Georgia; and there they will lie for ever. And, sir, where American Liberty raised its first voice, and where its youth was nurtured and sustained, there it still lives, in the strength of its manhood and full of its original spirit. If discord and disunion shall wound it—if party strife and blind ambition shall hawk and tear at it—if folly and madness—if unbusiness under salutary and necessary restraint—shall succeed to separate it from that union, by which alone its existence is made sure, it will stand, in the end, by the side of that cradle (Boston) in which its infancy was rocked: it will stretch forth its arm with whatever of vigor it may still retain, over the friends who gather round it: and it will fall at last, if fall it must, amidst the proudest monuments of its own glory, and on the very spot of its origin."

The extract relating to Greece contains a quotation from Milton, and the last a paraphrase of Dryden. These, with Shakspeare, form the bulk of Mr. Webster's poetical reading; and we are by no means sure that it is useful for an orator to be familiar with any poets but those which are in the mouths and memories of the people; for what avail allusions which it requires notes or an appendix to explain?

It is obvious, however, that he has made a careful study of the best English orators, particularly Burke. The following instances of resemblance, in the hands of a sharp critic, might be converted into plausible proofs of plagiarism.

Mr. Webster speaks of "affections which, running backwards, and warming with gratitude for what our ancestors have done for our happiness, run forward also to our posterity;" and Burke says, "they seldom look forward to posterity who never look backward to their ancestors." The appeal to Lafayette, in the speech on laying the cornerstone of the Bunker's Hill monument,—"Fortunate, fortunate man! with what increase of devotion will you not thank God for the circumstances of your extraordinary life! you are connected with two hemispheres and with two generations,"—is only a fresh application of the allusion to Lord Bathurst. In the same speech (p. 72) we find—"Like the mariner, whom the ocean and the winds carry along, till he sees the stars which have directed his course, and lighted his pathless way, descend, one by one, beneath the rising horizon, we should have felt that the stream of time had borne us onward, till another great luminary, whose light had cheered us, and whose guidance we had followed, had sunk away from our sight." This was evidently suggested by an image which the late Charles Butler terms the finest in modern oratory: "Even then, Sir, before this splendid orb was entirely set, and whilst the western horizon was in a blaze with his descending glory, in an opposite quarter of the heavens arose another luminary, and for his hour became lord of the ascendant."

* A collection of Mr. Macaulay's writings has been recently published in America, apparently without his leave.

But many others have been laid under contribution besides Burke. A passage in the eulogium of Adams and Jefferson beginning—"Their work doth not perish with them. The tree which they assisted to plant will flourish although they water it and protect it no longer"—probably owed something to the noble peroration of Grattan: "The spirit is gone forth, the declaration is planted," &c. The passage beginning—"Is any man so weak as to hope for a reconciliation," &c.—is almost a translation from the Philippics of Demosthenes. The invocation against slavery—"I would invoke those who fill the seats of justice and all who minister at her altar,"—is borrowed from Lord Chatham's "I call upon the bishops to interpose the unsullied sanctity of their lawn; upon the judges to interpose the purity of their ermine, to save us from this pollution." The sudden and effective turn in the peroration of his speech for Prescott—"For myself, I am willing here to relinquish the character of an advocate, and to express opinions by which I am willing to be bound as a citizen of the community"—is imitated from Erskine, in his defence of Captain Bailey: "My lords, I address you no longer as an advocate, but as a man, as a member of that state whose very existence depends upon her naval power."

This peroration is one of those which American school-boys recite on holiday occasions; and the circumstance is always worthy of note as an indication of popular taste.

Mr. Webster's taste is not uniformly refined, and he is by no means nice in his choice of language: but then his style is not of the feeble order which depends upon the collocation of an epithet; it is of granite strength and texture; and, if his asperities were polished off, would still present the solidity of the rock. His voice is one of extraordinary power; his personal appearance, as many of our readers can bear testimony, is singularly impressive—nay grand; his dark, deep-set eyes blaze with lustre when he is animated, and his broad, black, overhanging eyebrows, in particular, give an almost unnatural air of energy and determination to his face. We may be pardoned for adding that his unaffected simplicity and perfect modesty as well as dignity of bearing in society, were universally appreciated during his late visit to Great Britain.

Miss Martineau speaks of his "indolent, pleasure-loving disposition;" and it is a common saying in the United States, that "Webster must be pushed." Just so Dumont describes Mirabeau's manner as "un peu trainante" till he got under weigh—jusqu'à ce qu'il se fut animé et que les soufflets de la forge fussent en fonction. Lord Chatham used frequently to speak in a careless manner, and in an undertone, for a quarter of an hour or more at a time, and then break out into one of his brilliant passages. Lord Brougham would often take as long to get clear of the long-entangled sentences—parenthesis within parenthesis—with which it was his pleasure to begin: but then it is our firm conviction that he often finds himself upon his legs without having made up his mind as to what he is going to say.

In compliance with the suggestion of David Hume,—who says that criticism is nearly useless unless the critic quotes innumerable examples,—we have given specimens enough to enable our readers to form an opinion for themselves regarding the degree of excellence attained by the public speakers of the United States; but we have naturally been more anxious to illustrate their merits than their demerits, and must be pardoned, therefore, for briefly noting their two prominent defects, which otherwise could hardly be collected from this article. These are their lengthiness (to borrow one of their own words) and their magniloquence. Few American orators appear to have the slightest notion that too many words or topics may be employed, or that an effect may be produced by simplicity. Reversing the method of Demosthenes—who, according to Lord Brougham, never came back upon the same ground, and always ended quietly—they never know when they have said enough, and generally conclude, like a melodrama, with a blaze.

It is an ordinary occurrence in Congress for a member to speak two or three days, and his fellow-members make it a point to listen, or at least to suffer it with decency. Captain Hall recommended the introduction of coughing, but was told that the state of manners did not admit of such a sure. Some Kentucky representative might adopt the late Mr. Richard Martin's example, and propose a bullet as "the best pill for the honorable gentleman's complaint;" or a dozen bowie-knives might start from their sheaths to revenge a catarrh that threatened him with insult. Besides, as we formerly observed, the evil is inherent in the very nature of a strictly representative system, and is beginning to be felt in the English House of Commons to a formidable extent.

"All laws," says M. de Tocqueville, "which tend to make the representative more dependent on the elector, not only affect the conduct of the legislature, but also their language. They exercise a simultaneous influence on affairs themselves, and on the manner in which affairs are discussed. There is hardly a member of Congress who can make up his mind to go home without having despatched at least one speech to his constituents, nor who will endure any interruption until he has introduced into his harangue whatever useful suggestions may be made touching the four-and-twenty states of which the Union is composed, and especially the district which he represents."

When an orator has got his audience bound hand and foot, it is not in human nature to be merciful, and it is consequently no matter of astonishment to find the best speakers almost as unsparring as the worst. After dining for the first time in company with one of their greatest men when visiting London, the reflection suggested to an acute observer by his mode of delivering his opinions, was, that time must be of comparatively little value in America. To test the justice of the remark, apply the criterion which Mr. Rogers has applied to so many distinguished authors with such success.

This most elegant and correct of writers, with a taste matured by the constant study of the classics of our tongue, has amused his leisure hours by trying into how small a compass wit, wisdom, and eloquence may be packed. The notes to the last edition of his poems are not merely treasure-houses of anecdote and illustration, but admirable studies in composition for those who will be at the pains of ascertaining the language in which the same thoughts or incidents have been expressed or related by others. A good instance is afforded by his version of a now familiar incident, as compared with that of Mr. Wordsworth or (what can induce this young and really able writer to challenge such comparisons?) Mr. Milnes:—

"You admire that picture," said an old Dominican to me at Padua, as I stood contemplating a Last Supper in the refectory of his convent, the figures as large as the life,—I have sat at my meals before it for seven-and-forty years; and such are the changes that have taken place among us—so many have come and gone in the time—that, when I look upon the company there—upon those who are sitting at that table, silent as they are—I am sometimes inclined to think that we, and not they, are the shadows."—Rogers's Poems, p. 212.

Mr. Wordsworth gives twenty-three lines of blank verse to this story, and Mr. Milnes seven stanzas of four lines each:—

"Stranger! I have received my daily meal
In this good company now three score years,
And thou, whoever thou art, canst hardly feel
How time these lifeless images endears," &c. &c.

Mr. Rogers has also compressed the famous passage from Burke (quoted ante p. 41) into less than half of its original dimensions. This, however, is a doubtful experiment. Burke was a rich and full but not a wordy speaker; and almost every epithet has an individual aim, and serves to point, amplify, or modify the thought. Moreover, sentences are rather hard of digestion; and, considering how modern popular assemblies are composed, it would seldom be safe to calculate on that intuitive quickness of perception which takes in a fine image at a hint, or bolts a long train of reasoning in a syllogism. Does the bare cooper naphos of Demosthenes fill the mind like the "one black cloud," which "hung for a while on the declivities of the mountains"—or was Lord Erskine wrong in rating amongst Foxe's highest merits his mode of passing and re-passing the same topics "in the most unforeseen and fascinating review?" But after making all fair allowances for audience and occasion, it is not going too far to say that the best American orators might be advantageously reduced a third—many two-thirds—and some, if nothing were left but what the sense or sentiment required, would shrink down into a resemblance to the little Dutch governor, mentioned by Knickerbocker, who pined away so rapidly, that, when he died, there was nothing of him left to bury.

The constant straining after effect is another of their obvious failings: they have no notion of repose or simplicity: they never stand at ease: they live, and move, and have their being upon stilts. Action, action, action, says the Greek: Metaphor, metaphor, metaphor, cries the American. "Get money," says the old-world adage, "honestly if you can—at all events get money,"—quocunque modo rem. "Be eloquent," says the American, "naturally if you can—at all events be eloquent." The German professor (we suspect, Dr. von Raumer) was found jumping over the chairs and tables to make himself lively, and the Transatlantic orator may be seen slapping his forehead, beating his breast, puffing, blowing, and perspiring, to make himself sublime. There cannot be a stronger proof of their weakness in this particular than the fact of the Irish looking tame, chaste, and abstemious alongside of them. It will readily be admitted that the natives of the Green Isle are fond of flowers, and not over-nice in their selection, but they do not insist upon passing off faded or artificial ones as fresh bouquets of their own gathering. They invoke the genius of their country too often, and lay too many chaplets on her shrine, but they are not eternally dancing round her (like the philanthropists in the Anti-jacobin) with sunflowers and hollyhocks in their hands.

Here, also, M. de Tocqueville has his theory ready; as for what anomaly has he not? In this instance, however, he has clearly been led astray by his love of generalizing:

"In democratic communities each citizen is habitually engaged in the contemplation of a very puny object, namely, himself. If he ever raises his looks higher, he then perceives nothing but the universal form of society at large, or the still more imposing aspect of mankind. His ideas are all either extremely minute and clear, or extremely general and vague: what lies between is an open void. When he has been drawn out of his own sphere, therefore, he always expects the same amazing object will be offered to his attention; and it is on these terms alone that he consents to tear himself for an instant from the paltry, complicated cares which form the charm and excitement of his life."

With all due deference to M. de Tocqueville, we should say that the attention of such a citizen would be more likely to be attracted by simple domestic pictures and practical good sense than by sublime flights or large general views; that he would prefer Crabbe to Wordsworth, and Tierney to Burke. As to his perceiving nothing but society or mankind in the abstract, he cannot raise his eyes without seeing ships, shops, and crops—the outward and visible signs of commerce, manufactures, and agriculture; public works and public men; the wonders of art and nature; General Jackson and the falls of Niagara. In fact, the mixture of jealousy and self-complacency with which the citizens of the United States are wont to contemplate such things, affords a much more plausible solution of the mystery. The English are a proud nation; the Americans a vain one. The English care little what foreigners think or say of them; the Americans care a great deal. The English bide their time, or repose upon their laurels; the Americans fret, fume, and play the frog in the fable, in the vain hope of arriving per saltum, at the same height of intellectual and political superiority. In our opinion, their commemorative discourses are alone sufficient to vitiate both their feelings and their style. On the anniversaries of the landing at Plymouth, the declaration of independence, the battle of Bunker's Hill, and many other interesting events of the same kind, all the orators of the country, bad, good and indifferent, are regularly set to work to abuse

England, and glorify their own great, good, wise, free and unpretending democracy. The ordinary images and topics being long ago exhausted, exaggeration is the order of the day; and the more inflated the language the better, when national vanity is to be pampered and commonplaces are to be attractively dished up. At the same time there is surely no necessity for going into any refined or recondite train of speculation to show why, speaking generally, our Transatlantic friends (if they will allow us to call them so) want taste, which is the sum and substance of the charge.

A HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

CHAPTER V....The Capture of Viviana.

On the morning after his encounter with Guy Fawkes, Humphrey Chetham, accompanied by Martin Heydocke, took his way to Lambeth Marsh. With a throbbing heart he approached the miserable dwelling he knew to be inhabited by Viviana, and could scarcely summon courage to knock at the door. His first summons not being answered, he repeated it more loudly, and he then perceived the face of Father Oldcorne at the window, who, having satisfied himself that it was a friend, admitted him and his attendant.

"You were expected, my son," said the priest, after a friendly greeting. "Guy Fawkes has prepared Viviana for your coming."

"Will she not see me?" demanded the young merchant, uneasily.

"I believe so," replied Oldcorne. "But I will apprise her of your arrival. Be seated, my son."

He then carefully fastened the door, and repaired to Viviana's chamber, leaving Chetham in that state of tremor and anxiety which a lover, hoping to behold his mistress, only knows.

It was some time before Viviana appeared, and the young merchant, whose heart beat violently at the sound of her footsteps, was startled by the alteration in her looks, and the extreme coldness of her manner. Oldcorne was with her, and motioning Martin Heydocke to follow him, the youthful pair were left alone.

"You desire to see me, I am given to understand, sir," observed Viviana, in a freezing tone.

"I have journeyed to London for that express purpose," replied Humphrey Chetham, tremulously.

"I am much beholden to you, sir," returned Viviana, in the same repelling tone as before; "but I regret you should have taken so much trouble on my account."

"To serve you is happiness, not trouble, Viviana," replied Humphrey Chetham, ardently; "and I am overjoyed at finding an opportunity of proving my devotion."

"I have yet to learn what service I must thank you for," she returned.

"I can scarcely say that I am warranted in thus intruding upon you," replied Chetham, greatly abashed; "but, having learnt from my servant, Martin Heydocke, that Doctor Dee had set out for London, with the view of seeking you out, and withdrawing you from your present associates, I was determined to be beforehand with him, and to acquaint you, if possible, with his intentions."

"What you say surprises me," replied Viviana. "Doctor Dee has no right to interfere with my actions. Nor should I obey him were he to counsel me, as is scarcely probable, to quit my companions."

"I know not what connection there may be between you to justify the interposition of his authority," replied Chetham, "neither did I tarry to inquire. But, presuming from what I heard, that he would attempt to exercise some control over you, I set out at once, and, without guide to your retreat, or the slightest knowledge of it, was fortunate enough, on the very night of my arrival in London, to chance upon Guy Fawkes, who directed me to you."

"I am aware of it," was the chilling answer.

"I will not avouch," pursued Chetham, passionately, "that I have not been actuated as much by an irrepressible desire to see you again, as by anxiety to apprise you of Doctor Dee's coming. I wanted only a slight excuse to myself to induce me to yield to my inclinations. Your departure made me wretched. I thought I had more control over myself. But I find I cannot live without you."

"Alas! alas!" cried Viviana, in a troubled tone, and losing all her self-command. "I expected this. Why—why did you come?"

"I have told you my motive," replied Chetham; "but, oh! do not reproach me!"

"I do not desire to do so," returned Viviana, with a look of agony. "I bitterly reproach myself that I cannot meet you as of old. But I would rather—far rather have encountered Doctor Dee, had he come hither resolved to exert all his magical power to force me away, than have met you."

"Have I unwittingly offended you, Viviana?" asked Chetham, in astonishment.

"Oh! no—no—no!" she replied, "you have not offended me; but—"

"But what?" he cried, anxiously.

"I would rather have died than see you," she answered.

"I will not inquire wherefore," rejoined Chetham, "because I too well divine the cause. I am no longer what I was to you."

"Press this matter no further, I pray of you," returned Viviana, in much confusion, and blushing deeply. "I shall ever esteem you—ever feel the warmest gratitude to you. And what matters it whether my heart is estranged from you or not, since I can never wed you?"

"What matters it?" repeated the young merchant, in accents of despair—"it matters much. Drowning love will cling to straws. The thought that I was beloved by you, though I could never hope to possess your hand, reconciled me, in some degree, to my fate. But now," he added, covering his face with his hands—"now, my heart is crushed."

"Nay, say not so," cried Viviana, in a voice of the deepest emotion. "I do love you—as a sister."

"That is small comfort," rejoined Chetham, bitterly. "I echo your own wish. Would we had never met again! I might, at least, have deluded myself into the belief that you loved me."

"It would have been better so," she returned. "I would inflict pain on no one—far less on you, whom I regard so much, and to whom I owe so much."

"You owe me nothing, Viviana," rejoined Chetham. "All I desired was to serve you. In the midst of the dangers we have shared together, I felt no alarm except for your sake. I have done nothing—nothing. Would I had died for you!"

"Calm yourself, sir, I entreat you," she returned. "You did love me once?" demanded Chetham, suddenly.

"I thought so," she answered.

The young merchant uttered an exclamation of anguish, and a mournful pause ensued, broken only by his groans.

"Answer me, Viviana," he said, turning abruptly upon her—"answer me, and in mercy, answer truly—do you love another?"

"It is a question I cannot answer," she replied, becoming ashy pale.

"Your looks speak for you!" he vociferated, in a terrible tone—"you do! His name?—his name?—that I may wreak my vengeance upon him."

"Your violence terrifies me," returned Viviana, withdrawing the hand he had seized. "I must put an end to this interview."

"Pardon me, Viviana!" cried Chetham, falling on his knees before her—"in pity pardon me. I am not myself. I shall be calmer presently. But if you knew the anguish of the wound you have inflicted, you would not add to it."

"Heaven knows I would not!" she returned, motioning him to rise. "And, if it will lighten your suffering, know that the love I feel for another—if love, indeed, it be—is as hopeless as your own. But it is not a love of which even you could be jealous. It is a higher and a holier passion. It is affection mixed with admiration, and purified from all its grossness. It is more, perhaps, than the love of a daughter for her father—but it is nothing more. I shall never wed him I love—could not if I would. Nay, I would shun him, if I did not feel that the hour will soon come when the extent of my affection must be proved."

"This is strange sophistry," returned Chetham; "and you may deceive yourself by it, but you cannot deceive me. You love as all ardent natures do love. But in what way do you mean to prove your affection?"

"Perhaps by the sacrifice of my life," she answered.

"I can tell you who is the object of your affections!" said Chetham. "It is Guy Fawkes."

"I will not deny it," replied Viviana; "he is."

"Hear me, then," exclaimed Chetham, who appeared inexpressibly relieved by the discovery he had made; "in my passage across the river with him last night, our conversation turned on the one subject ever nearest my heart, yourself—and Guy Fawkes not only made me not despair, but promised to aid my suit."

"And he kept his word," replied Viviana, "for, while announcing your proposed visit, he urged me strongly in your behalf."

"Then he knows not of your love for him?" demanded Chetham.

"He not only knows it not, but never shall know it from me—nor must he know it from you, sir," rejoined Viviana, energetically.

"Fear it not," said Chetham, sighing. "It is a secret I shall carefully preserve."

"And now that you are in possession of it," she answered, "I no longer feel your presence as a restraint. Let me still regard you as a friend."

"Be it so," replied Humphrey Chetham, mournfully; "and as a friend let me entreat you to quit this place, and abandon your present associates. I will not seek to turn your heart from Fawkes—nor will I try to regain the love I have lost. But let me implore you to pause ere you irrevocably mix yourself up with the fortunes of one so desperate. I am too well aware that he is engaged in a fearful plot against the state—though I know not its precise nature."

"You will not betray him?" she cried.

"I will not, though he is my rival," returned Chetham.

"But others may—nay, perhaps have done so already."

"Whom do you suspect?" demanded Viviana in the greatest alarm.

"I fear Doctor Dee," replied the young merchant; "but I know nothing certainly. My servant, Martin Heydocke, who is in the Doctor's confidence, intimated as much to me, and I have reason to think that his journey to town, under the pretext of searching for you, is undertaken for the purpose of tracing out the conspirators, and delivering them up to the Government."

"Is he arrived in London?" inquired Viviana, eagerly.

"I should think not," replied Chetham. "I passed him four days ago, on this side Leicester, in company with Kelly and Topcliffe."

"If the wretch, Topcliffe, was with him, your conjectures are too well founded," she replied. "I must warn Guy Fawkes instantly of his danger."

"Command my services in any way," said Chetham.

"I know not what to do," cried Viviana, after a pause, during which she betrayed the greatest agitation. "I dare not seek him out: and yet, if I do not, he may fall into the hands of the enemy. I must see him at all hazards."

"Suffer me to go with you," implored Chetham. "You may rely upon my secrecy. And now I have a double motive for desiring to preserve Fawkes."

"You are, indeed, truly noble-hearted and generous," replied Viviana; "and I would fully confide in you. But, if you were to be seen by the others, you would be certainly put to death. Not even Fawkes could save you."

"I will risk it, if you desire it, and it will save him," replied the young merchant, devotedly. "Nay, I will go alone."

"That were to insure your own destruction," she answered. "No, no—R must not be. I will consult with Father Oldcorne."

With this she hurried out of the room, and returned in a short time with the priest.

"Father Oldcorne is of opinion that our friends must be apprised of their danger," she said. "And he thinks it needful we should both go to their retreat, that no hindrance may be offered to our flight, in case such a measure should be resolved upon."

"You cannot accompany us, my son," added Oldcorne, "for though I am as fully assured of your fidelity as Viviana, and would confide my life to you, there are those who will not so trust you, and who might rejoice in the opportunity of removing you."

"Viviana!" exclaimed Chetham, looking entreatingly at her.

"For my sake—if not for your own—do not urge this further," she returned. "There are already dangers and difficulties enow without adding to them. You would be safer amid a horde of robbers than amidst these men."

"And is it to such persons you commit yourself?" cried Chetham, reproachfully. "Oh! be warned by me, ere it is too late? Abandon them!"

"It is too late already," replied Viviana. "The die is cast."

"Then I can only lament it," returned Chetham, sadly. "Suffer me, at least to accompany you to some place near their retreat, that you may summon me in case of need."

"There can be no objection to that, Viviana," observed Oldcorne; "provided Humphrey Chetham will promise not to follow us."

"Readily," replied the young merchant.

"I am unwilling to expose him to further risk on my account," said Viviana. "But be it as you will."

It was then agreed that they should not set out till night-fall, but proceed, as soon as it grew dark, to Lambeth, where Humphrey Chetham undertook to procure a boat for their conveyance across the river.

The hour of departure at length arrived. Viviana, who had withdrawn to her own room, appeared in her travelling habit, and was about to set forth with her companions, when they were all startled by a sudden and loud knocking at the door.

"We are discovered," she cried. "Doctor Dee has found out our retreat."

"Fear nothing," rejoined Chetham, drawing his sword, while his example was imitated by Martin Heydocke; "they shall not capture you while I live."

As he spoke, the knocking was repeated, and the door shaken so violently as to threaten to burst its fastenings.

"Extinguish the light," whispered Chetham, "and let Father Oldcorne conceal himself. We have nothing to fear."

"Where shall I fly?" cried Oldcorne, despairingly. "It will be impossible to raise the flag, and seek refuge in the vault."

"Fly to my room," cried Viviana. And finding he stood irresolute, and as if paralysed with terror, she took his arm and dragged him away. The next moment the door was burst open with a loud crash, and several armed men with their swords drawn, followed by Topcliffe, and another middle-aged man of slight stature, and rather under-sized, but richly dressed, and bearing all the marks of exalted rank, rushed into the room.

"You are my prisoner!" cried Topcliffe, rushing up to Chetham, who had plucked himself, with Martin Heydocke, at the foot of the stairs. "I arrest you in the King's name!"

"You are mistaken in your man, sir," cried Chetham, fiercely. "I have committed no offence. Lay a hand upon me, at your peril!"

"How is this?" cried Topcliffe. "Humphrey Chetham here?"

"Ay," returned the young merchant; "you have fallen upon the wrong house."

"Not so, sir," replied Topcliffe. "I am satisfied from your presence that I am right. Where you are, Viviana Radcliffe is not far off. Throw down your arms. You can offer no resistance to my force, and your zeal will not benefit your friends, while it will place your own safety in jeopardy."

But Chetham fiercely refused compliance, and after a few minutes' further parley, the soldiers were about to attack him, when Viviana opened a door above, and slowly descended the stairs. At her appearance, the young merchant, seeing that further resistance would be useless, sheathed his sword, and she passed between him and Heydocke, and advanced toward the leaders of the band.

"What means this intrusion?" she asked.

"We are come in search of two Jesuit priests, whom we have obtained information are hidden here," replied Topcliffe, "as well as of certain other Papists, disaffected against the state, for whose apprehension I hold a warrant."

"You are welcome to search the house," replied Viviana. "But there is no one within it except those you see."

As she said this, Chetham, who gazed earnestly at her, caught her eye, and from a scarcely perceptible glance, felt certain that the priest, through her agency, had effected his escape. But the soldiers had not waited for her permission to make the search. Rushing up stairs, they examined the different chambers—there were two small rooms besides that occupied by Viviana—and found several of the priests' habiliments; but though they examined every corner with the minutest attention, sounded the walls, peered up the chimneys, underneath the bed, and into every place, likely and unlikely, they could find no other traces of those they sought, and were compelled to return to their leader with tidings of their ill success. Topcliffe, with another party, continued his scrutiny below, and discovering the moveable flag in the hearth, descended into the vault, where he made certain of discovering his prey. But no one was there; and the powder and arms having been removed, he gained nothing by his investigations.

Meanwhile, his companion,—and evidently from his garb and the deference paid to him, though he was addressed by no title, which could lead to the absolute knowledge of his rank, his superior,—seated himself, and put many questions in a courteous but authoritative tone to Viviana respecting her residence in this solitary abode,—the names of her companions,—where they were,—and upon what scheme they were engaged. To none of these questions would she return an answer, and her interrogator, at last, losing patience, said,

"I hold it my duty to inform you that you will be carried before the Council, and if you continue thus obstinate, means will be taken—~~and~~ <sup>and</sup> none of the gentlest—to extort the truth from you."

"You may apply the torture to," replied Viviana, firmly, "but it will wrest nothing from me."

"That remains to be seen," replied the other; "I only trust you will not compel me to put my threat into execution."

At this moment Topcliffe emerged from the vault, and the soldiers returned from their unsuccessful search above.

"They have escaped us now," remarked Topcliffe to his superior. "But I will conceal a party of men on the premises, who will be certain to capture them on their return."

Viviana uttered an exclamation of irrepressible amazement, which did not escape her auditors.

"I am right, you see," observed Topcliffe, significantly, to his companion.

"You are so," replied the other.

As this was said, Viviana hazarded a look at Humphrey Chetham, the meaning of which he was not slow to comprehend. He saw that she wished him to make an effort to escape, that he might warn her companions; and, regardless of the consequence, he prepared to obey her. While those around were engaged in a last fruitless search, he whispered his intentions to Martin Heydocke, and only awaited a favorable opportunity to put them in execution. It occurred sooner than he expected. Before quitting the premises, Topcliffe determined to visit the upper rooms himself, and he took several of the men with him.

Chetham would have made an attempt to liberate Viviana, but feeling certain it would be unsuccessful, he preferred obeying her wishes to his own inclinations. Topcliffe gone, he suddenly drew his sword—for neither he nor Heydocke had been disarmed—and rushing toward the door, struck down the man next it, and, followed by his servant, passed through it before they could be intercepted. They both then flew at a swift pace toward the marshy fields, and, owing to the darkness and unstable nature of the ground, speedily distanced their pursuers.

Hearing the disturbance below, and guessing its cause, Topcliffe immediately descended. But he was too late; and though he joined in the pursuit, he was baffled like his attendants. Half an hour afterwards he returned to the house with an angry and disappointed look.

"He has given us the slip," he observed to his superior, who appeared exceedingly provoked by the young merchant's flight; "but we will soon have him again."

After giving directions to his men how to conceal themselves, Topcliffe informed his companion that he was ready to attend him. Viviana, who had remained motionless and silent during the foregoing scene, was taken out of the house, and conducted toward the creek, in which lay a large wherry manned by four rowers. She was placed within it, and as soon as his superior was seated, Topcliffe inquired,

"Where will your lordship go first?"

"To the Star Chamber," was the answer.

At this reply, in spite of herself, Viviana could not repress a shudder.

"All is lost!" she mentally ejaculated.

CHAPTER VI.—The Cellar.

It was long before the conspirators gained sufficient courage to recommence digging the mine. Whenever holy water was thrown upon the stones, the mysterious bell ceased tolling, but it presently began anew, and such was the appalling effect of the sound that it completely paralyzed the listeners. Prayers were said by Garnet; hymns sung by the others; but all was of no avail. It continued to toll on with increased solemnity, unless checked by the same potent application as before.

The effect became speedily manifest in the altered looks and demeanor of the conspirators, and it was evident that if something was not done to rouse them, the enterprise would be abandoned. Cateby, equally superstitious with his confederates, but having nerves more firmly strung, was the first to conquer his terror. Crossing himself, he muttered a secret prayer, and, snatching up a pick-axe, entered the cavity, and resumed his labor.

The noise of the heavy blows dealt by him against the wall drowned the tolling of the bell. The charm was broken. And, stimulated by his conduct, the others followed his example; and though the awful tolling continued at intervals during the whole of their operations, it offered no further interruption to them.

Another, and more serious cause of anxiety, however, arose. As the work advanced, without being aware of it, they approached the bank of the river, and the water began to ooze through the sides of the excavation—at first slightly, but by degrees to such an extent as to convince them that their labor would be entirely thrown away. Large portions of the clay, loosened by the damp, fell in upon them, nearly burying those nearest the tumbling mass; and the floor was now in some places more than a foot deep in water, clearly proving it would be utterly impossible to keep the powder fit for use in such a spot.

Cateby bore these untoward circumstances with ill concealed mortification. For a time he struggled against them; and though he felt that it was hopeless, worked on like a desperate military leader conducting a forlorn hope to certain destruction. At length, however, the water began to make such incursions that he could no longer disguise from himself or his companions that they were contending against insurmountable difficulties, and that to proceed further would be madness. He therefore, with a heavy heart, desisted, and throwing down his pick-axe, said it was clear that Heaven did not approve their design, and that it must be relinquished.

"We ought to have been warned by that dreadful bell," he observed, in conclusion. "I now perceive its meaning. And as I was the first to set in direct opposition to the declared will of the Supreme Being, so now I am the first to admit my error."

"I cannot account for that dread and mysterious sound, my son," replied Garnet, "and can only attribute it, as you do, to Divine interference. But whether it was intended as a warning or a guidance, I confess I am unable to say."

"Can you longer doubt, father," returned Cateby, bitterly, "when you look at your excavation? It took us more than a week's incessant labor to get through the first wall; and our toil was no sooner lightened than these fatal consequences ensued. If we proceed, we shall drown ourselves, instead of blowing up our foes. And even if we should escape, were the powder stowed for one day in that damp place, it would never explode. We have failed, and must take measures accordingly."

"I entirely concur with you, my son," replied Garnet; we must abandon our present plan. But do not let us be disheartened. Perhaps, at this very moment, Heaven is preparing for us a victory by some unlooked-for means."

"It may be so," replied Catesby, with a look of incredulity.

As he spoke, an extraordinary noise, like a shower of falling stones was heard overhead. And coupling the sound with their fears of the encroachment of the damp, the conspirators glanced at each other in dismay, thinking the building was falling in upon them.

"All blessed saints protect us!" cried Garnet, as the sound ceased. "What was that?"

But no one was able to account for it, and each regarded his neighbor with apprehension. After a short interval of silence, the sound was heard again. There was then another pause—and again the same rushing and inexplicable noise.

"What can it be?" cried Catesby. "I am so enfeebled by this underground life, that trifles alarm me. Are our enemies pulling down the structure over our heads? or are they earthing us up like vermin?" he added to Fawkes.

"I will go and see," replied the other.

"Do not expose yourself, my son," cried Garnet. "Let us abide the result here."

"No, father," replied Fawkes. "Having failed in our scheme, what befalls me is of little consequence. I will go. If I return not, you will understand what has happened."

Pausing for a moment to receive Garnet's benediction, he then strode away.

Half an hour elapsed before Fawkes returned, and the interval appeared thrice its duration in the eyes of the conspirators. When he re-appeared, a smile sat upon his countenance, and his looks instantly dispelled the alarm that had been previously felt.

"You bring us good news, my son?" cried Garnet.

"Excellent, father," replied Fawkes; "and you were right in saying that at the very moment we were indulging in misgiving, Heaven was preparing for us a victory by unforeseen and mysterious means."

Garnet raised his hands gratefully and reverentially upwards. And the other conspirators crowded round Fawkes to listen to his relation.

"The noise we heard," he said, "arose from a very simple circumstance,—and when you hear it, you will smile at your fears. But you will not smile at the result to which it has led. Exactly overhead, it appears, a cellar is situated belonging to a person named Bright, and the sound was occasioned by the removal of his coals, which he has been selling off."

"Is that all?" cried Catesby. "We are indeed grown childish, to be alarmed by such a cause."

"It appears slight, now it is explained," observed Keyes, gravely; "but how were we to know whence it arose?"

"True," returned Fawkes; "and I will now show you how the hand of Heaven has been manifested in the matter. The noise which led me to this investigation, and which I regard as a signal from on high, brought me to a cellar I had never seen before, and knew not existed. That cellar lies immediately beneath the House of Lords."

"Ah! I see!" exclaimed Catesby. "You think it would form a good depository for the powder."

"If it had been built for the express purpose, it could not be better," returned Fawkes. "It is commodious and dry, and in an out-of-the-way place, as you may judge, when we ourselves have never hitherto noticed it."

"But what is all this to us if we cannot use it?" returned Catesby.

"We can use it," replied Fawkes. "It is ours."

There was a general exclamation of surprise.

"Finding, on inquiry, that Bright was about to quit the neighborhood," continued Fawkes, "and did not require the place longer, I instantly proposed to take it from him, and to create no suspicion, engaged it in Percy's name, stating that he wanted it for his own fuel."

"You have done admirably," cried Catesby, in a tone of exaltation. "The success of the enterprise will now be entirely owing to you."

"Not to me, but to the Providence that directed me," replied Fawkes, solemnly.

"Right, my son," returned Garnet. "And let this teach us never to despair again."

The next day, Percy having taken possession of the cellar, it was carefully examined, and proved, as Fawkes had stated, admirably adapted to their purpose. Their fears were now at an end, and they looked on the success of their project as certain. The mysterious bell no longer tolled, and their sole remaining task was to fill up the excavation so far as to prevent any damage from the wet.

This was soon done, and their next step was to transport the powder during the night to the cellar. Concealing the barrels as before with faggots and coals, they gave the place the appearance of a mere receptacle for lumber, by filling it with old hampers, boxes without lids, broken bottles, stone jars, and other rubbish.

They now began to think of separating, and Fawkes expressed his intention of returning that night to the house at Lambeth. No intelligence had reached them of Viviana's captivity, and they supposed her still an inmate of the miserable dwelling with Father Oldcorne.

Fawkes had often thought of her, and with uneasiness, during his toilsome labors; but they had so much engrossed him that her image was banished almost as soon as it arose. Now that grand obstacle was surmounted, and nothing was wanting, however, except a favorable moment to strike the blow, he began to feel the greatest anxiety respecting her.

Still, he thought it prudent to postpone his return to a late hour, and it was not until near midnight that he and Catesby ventured to their boat. As he was about to descend the steps, he heard his name pronounced by some one at a little distance; and the next moment, a man whom he immediately recognized as Humphrey Chetham, rushed up to him.

"You here again!" cried Fawkes, angrily, and not unsuspiciously. "Do you play the spy upon me?"

"I have watched you for the last ten nights," replied Chetham, hastily. "I knew not where you were. But I found your boat here, and I hoped you would not cross the water in any other."

"Why all this care?" demanded Fawkes. "Has aught happened? Is Viviana safe? Speak, man! do not keep me longer in suspense!"

"Alas!" rejoined Chetham. "She is a prisoner."

"A prisoner!" ejaculated Fawkes, in a hollow voice. "Then my forebodings were not without cause."

"How has this happened?" cried Catesby, who had listened to what was said in silent wonder.

Chetham then hastily related all that had taken place.

"I know not what has become of her," he said, in conclusion; "but I have heard that she was taken to the Star-Chamber by the Earl of Salisbury,—for he, it appears, was the companion of Topcliffe,—and, refusing to answer the interrogations of the Council, was conveyed to the Tower, and I fear subjected to the torture."

"Tortured!" exclaimed Fawkes, horror-stricken; "Viviana tortured! And I have brought her to this! Oh, God! Oh, God!"

"It is, indeed, an agonising reflection," replied Humphrey Chetham, in a sombre tone, "and enough to drive you to despair. Her last wishes, expressed only in looks, for she did not dare to give utterance to them, were that I should warn you not to approach the house at Lambeth, your enemies being concealed within it. I have now fulfilled them. Farewell!"

And he turned to depart.

"Stay!" cried Catesby, arresting him. "Where is Father Oldcorne?"

"I know not," replied Humphrey Chetham. "As I have told you, Viviana, by some means contrived his escape. I have seen nothing of him."

And, hurrying away, he was lost beneath the shadow of the wall.

"Is this a troubled dream, or dread reality?" cried Fawkes to Catesby.

"I fear it is too true," returned the other, in a voice of much emotion. "Poor Viviana!"

"Something must be done to set her free," cried Fawkes. "I will purchase her liberty by delivering up myself."

"Your oath—remember your oath!" rejoined Catesby. "You may destroy yourself, but not your associates."

"True—true," replied Fawkes, distractedly—"I do remember it. I am sold to perdition."

"Anger not Heaven by these idle lamentations—and at a time, too, when all is so prosperous," rejoined Catesby.

"What!" cried Fawkes, fiercely, "would you have me calm, when she who called me father, and was dear to me as a child, is taken from me by these remorseless butchers—subjected to their terrible examinations—plunged in a dismal dungeon—and stretched upon the rack—and all for me—for me? I shall go mad if I think upon it!"

"You must not think upon it," returned Catesby—"at least not here. We shall be observed. Let us return to the house; and perhaps—though I scarcely dare indulge the hope—some plan may be devised for her liberation."

With this he dragged Fawkes, who was almost frenzied with anguish, forcibly along, and they returned to the house.

Nothing more was said that night. Catesby judged it prudent to let the first violence of his friend's emotions expend itself before he attempted to soothe him; and when he communicated the sad event to Garnet, the latter strongly approved the plan. Garnet was greatly distressed at the intelligence, and his affliction was shared by the other conspirators. No fears were entertained by any of them that Viviana would reveal aught of the plot, but this circumstance only added to their regrets.

"I will stake my life for her constancy," said Catesby.

"And so will I," returned Garnet. "She will die a martyr for us."

He then proposed that they should pray for her deliverance. And all instantly assenting, they knelt down, while Garnet poured forth the most earnest supplications to the Virgin in her behalf.

The next morning Guy Fawkes set forth, and ascertained that Humphrey Chetham's statement was correct, and that Viviana was indeed a prisoner in the Tower. He repaired thither, and tried to ascertain in what part of the fortress she was confined, in the hope of gaining admittance to her. But as he could obtain no information, and his inquiries excited suspicion, he was compelled to return without accomplishing his object.

Crossing Tower Hill, on his way back, he turned to cast a glance at the sternal pile he had just quitted, and which was fraught with the most fearful interest to him, when he perceived Chetham issue from the Bulwark Gate. He would have made up to him; but the young merchant, who had evidently seen him, though he looked sedulously another way, set off in the direction of the river, and was quickly lost to view. Filled with the gloomiest thoughts, Guy Fawkes proceeded to Westminster, where he arrived without further adventure of any kind.

In the latter part of the same day, as the conspirators were conferring together, they were alarmed by a knocking at the outer gate; and sending Bates to reconnoitre, he instantly returned with the intelligence that it was Lord Mounteagle. At the mention of this name, Tresham, who was one of the party, turned pale as death, and trembled so violently that he could scarcely support himself. Having been allowed to go forth on that day, the visit of Lord Mounteagle at this juncture, coupled with the agitation it occasioned him, seemed to proclaim him guilty of treachery for the second time.

"You have betrayed us, villain!" cried Catesby, drawing his dagger; "but you shall not escape. I will poniard you on the spot."

"As you hope for mercy, do not strike!" cried Tresham. "On my soul, I have not seen Lord Mounteagle, and know not, any more than yourselves, what brings him hither. Put it to the proof. Let him come in. Conceal yourselves, and you will hear what passes between us."

"Let it be so," interposed Fawkes. "I will step within this closet, the door of which shall remain ajar. From it I can watch him without being observed, and if aught occurs to confirm our suspicions, he dies."

"Bates shall station himself in the passage, and stab him if he attempts to fly," added Catesby. "Your sword, sir."

"It is here," replied Tresham, delivering it to Catesby, who handed it to Bates. "Are you satisfied?"

"Is Lord Mounteagle alone?" inquired Catesby, without noticing the question.

"He appears to be so," replied Bates.

"Admit him, then," rejoined Catesby.

"Entering the closet with Keyes, he was followed by Fawkes, who drew his dagger, and kept the door slightly ajar, while Garnet and the rest retired to other hiding-places. A few moments afterwards, Bates returned with Lord Mounteagle, and, having ushered him into the room, took his station in the passage, as directed by Catesby. The room was very dark, the shutters being closed, and light only finding its way through the chinks in them; and it appeared totally so to Lord Mounteagle, who, groping his way, stumbled forward, and exclaimed, in accents of some alarm,

"Where am I? Where is Mr. Tresham?"

"I am here," replied Tresham, advancing towards him. "How did your lordship find me out?" he added, after the customary salutations were exchanged.

"My servant saw you enter this house," replied Mounteagle, "and, knowing I was anxious to see you, waited some hours without, in the expectation of your coming forth. But as this did not occur, he mentioned the circumstance to me on his return, and I immediately came in quest of you. When I knocked at the gate, I scarcely knew what to think of the place, and began to fear you must have fallen into the hands of cut-throats; and, now that I have gained admittance, my wonder—and I may add my uneasiness—is not diminished. Why do you hide yourself in this wretched place?"

"Be seated," replied Tresham, placing a chair for Lord Mounteagle, with its back to the closet, while he took one opposite him, and near a table, on which some papers were laid. "Your lordship may remember," he continued, scarcely knowing what answer to make to the question, that I wrote to you some time ago, to say that a conspiracy was hatching among certain of our party against the state."

"I have reason to remember it," replied Mounteagle.

"The letter was laid before the Earl of Salisbury, and inquiries instituted in consequence. But, owing to your disappearance, nothing could be elicited. What plot had you discovered?"

At this moment, Tresham, who kept his eye fixed on the closet, perceived the door noiselessly open, and behind it the figure of Guy Fawkes, with the dagger in his hand.

"I was misinformed as to the nature of the plot," he stammered.

"Was it against the King's life?" demanded Mounteagle.

"No," rejoined Tresham; "as far as I could learn, it was an insurrection."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Mounteagle, skeptically. "My information, then, differed from yours. Who were the parties you suspected?"

"As I wrongfully suspected them," replied Tresham, evasively, "your lordship must excuse my naming them."

"Was Catesby—or Winter—or Wright—or Rookwood—or Sir Everard Digby concerned in it?" demanded Mounteagle.

"Not one of them," answered Tresham.

"They are the persons I suspect," replied Mounteagle; "and they are suspected by the Earl of Salisbury. But you have not told me what you are doing in this strange habitation. Are you ferreting out a plot, or contriving one?"

"Both," replied Tresham.

"How?" cried Mounteagle.

"I am plotting for myself, and counterplotting the designs of others," replied Tresham, mysteriously.

"Is this place, then, the rendezvous of a band of conspirators?" asked Mounteagle, uneasily.

Tresham nodded in the affirmative.

"Who are they?" continued Mounteagle. "There is no need of concealment with me."

As this was said, Tresham raised his eyes, and saw that Guy Fawkes had stepped silently forward, and placed himself behind Mounteagle's chair. His hand grasped his dagger, and his gaze never moved from the object of his suspicion.

"Who are they?" repeated Mounteagle. "Is Guy Fawkes one of them?"

"Assuredly not," replied Tresham. "Why should you name him? I never mentioned him to your lordship."

"I think you did," replied Mounteagle. "But I am certain you spoke of Catesby."

And Tresham's regards involuntarily wandered to the closet, when he beheld the stern glance of the person alluded to fixed upon him.

"You have heard of Viviana Radcliffe's imprisonment, I suppose?" pursued Mounteagle, unconscious of what was passing.

"I have," replied Tresham.

"The Earl of Salisbury expected he would be able to wring all from her, but he has failed," observed Mounteagle.

"I am glad of it," replied Tresham.

"I thought you were disposed to serve him?" remarked Mounteagle.

"So I am," replied Tresham. "But, if secrets are to be revealed, I had rather be the bearer of them than any one else. I am sorry for Viviana."

"I could procure her liberation, if I chose," observed Mounteagle.

"Say you so?" cried Fawkes, clapping him on the shoulder; "then you stir not hence till you have procured it!"

ANTIDOTES FOR POISONS.—When poison has been swallowed, ascertain from the patient what the nature of the poison is. If mineral, that is, either corrosive sublimate or arsenic, give a teaspoonful of sulphur, or half a teaspoonful of pearl-ash, or a wine glass of soap-suds; afterwards give a teaspoonful of antimonic wine, and plenty of warm water. If vegetable, or oil of vitrol, aquafortis, or oxalic acid, give pear-ash, or chalk, or magnesia or soap-suds, in plenty of warm water, with a dessert spoonful of antimonic wine, or a scruple of simple powder of ipecacuanha. If laudanum, give a teaspoonful of domestic mustard, and keep the patient walking. If carbonic acid, or fumes of charcoal—open air, keep the body cool; medical aid is required.

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH.

Meet the Second....Meet the Queen.

The foregoing soliloquy occurred in one of the galleries of the palace, where the vain-glorious mannikin was lingering in the hope of being admitted to the royal presence. No sooner did the idea of consulting Og on the subject of his birth occur to him, than he set off to the By-ward Tower, where he found the two unmarried giants employed upon a huge, smoking dish of baked meat, and, notwithstanding his importunity, neither of them appeared willing to attend to him. Thus baffled, and his appetite sharpened by the savory odor of the viands, Xit seized a knife and fork, and began to ply them with great zeal. The meal over, and two ponderous jugs that flanked the board emptied of their contents, Og leaned his huge frame against the wall, and in a drowsy tone informed the dwarf that he was ready to listen to him.

"No sleeping, then, my master," cried Xit, springing upon his knee, and tweaking his nose. "I have a matter of the utmost importance to consult you about. You must be wide awake."

"What is it?" replied the good humored giant, yawning as if he would have swallowed the teasing mannikin. "It relates to my origin," replied Xit. "Am I the son of a nobleman?"

"I should rather say you were the offspring of some ape escaped from the menagerie," answered Og, bursting into a roar of laughter, in which he was joined by Gog, much to the discomfiture of the cause of their merriment. "You have all the tricks of the species."

"Dare to repeat that insinuation, base Titan," cried Xit, furiously, and drawing his sword, "and I will be thy death. I am as illustriously descended as thyself, and on both sides too, whereas thy mother was a frowzy fish-wife. Know that I am the son of Sir Thomas More."

"Sir Thomas More!" echoed both giants, laughing more immoderately than ever. "What has put that notion into thy addle pate?"

"My better genius," replied Xit, "and unless you can show me who was my father, I shall claim descent from him."

"You will only expose yourself to ridicule," returned Og, patting the mannikin's shock head—a familiarity which he resented,—"and though I and my brethren laugh at you, and make a jest of you, we do not desire others to do so."

"Once graced by knighthood, no man, be he of my stature or yours, my overgrown master, shall make a jest of me with impunity," replied Xit, proudly. "But since you think I am not the son of Sir Thomas More, from whom can I safely claim descent?"

"I would willingly assist you to a father," replied Og, smothering a laugh, "but on my faith, I can think of none more probable than Hairun's pet monkey, or perhaps old Max."

"Anger me not," shrieked Xit, in extremity of fury, "or you will rue it. What has become of the blanket in which I was wrapped?"

"The blanket!" exclaimed Og, "why, it was a strip scarcely bigger than my hand."

"Is it lost?" demanded Xit, eagerly.

"I fear so," replied Og. "Stay! now I recollect, I patched an old pair of hose with it."

"Patched a pair of hose with it!" cried Xit. "You deserve to go in tatters during the rest of your days. You have destroyed the sole clue to my origin."

"Nay, if that blanket will guide you, I have taken the best means of preserving it," rejoined Og;—"for I think I have the hose still."

"Where are they?" inquired Xit. "Let me see them instantly."

"If they still exist, they are in a large chest in the upper chamber," replied Og. "But be not too much elated, for I fear we shall be disappointed."

"At all events, let us search without a moment's delay," rejoined Xit, jumping down, and hurrying up the staircase.

He was followed somewhat more leisurely by the two giants, and the trunk was found crammed under a heap of lumber into an embrasure. The key was lost, but as Xit's impatience would not allow him to wait to have it unfashioned by a smith, Og forced it open with the head of a halbert. It contained a number of old buskins, cloaks of all hues and fashions, doublets, pantoufles, caps, buff-boots and hose. Of the latter there were several pairs, and though many were thread-bare enough, it did not appear that any were patched.

Xit, who had plunged into the trunk to examine each article, was greatly disappointed.

"I fear they are lost," observed Og.

"It would seem so," replied Xit, "for there are only a doublet and cloak left. Oh! what a worshipful knight's history should hang on so slight a tenure!"

"Many a knight's history has hung on less," replied Gog. "But what have we rolled up in that corner?"

"As I live, a pair of watch-colored hose," cried Xit.

"The very pair we are in quest of," rejoined Og. "Unfold them, and you will find the piece of blanket in the seat."

Xit obeyed, and mounting on the side of the box held out the huge garments, and there, undoubtedly, in the region intimated by Og, was a piece of dirty flannel.

"And this, then, was my earliest covering," apostrophised Xit. "In this fragment of woollen cloth my tender limbs were swathed."

"Truly were they," replied Og, laughing. "And when I first beheld thee it was ample covering. But what light does it throw upon thy origin?"

"That remains to be seen," returned Xit. And unsheathing his dagger he began to unrip the pieces of flannel from the garment in which it was stitched.

The two giants watched his proceedings in silence, and glanced significantly at each other. At length Xit tore it away.

"It is a labor in vain," observed Og.

"Not so," replied Xit. "See you not that this corner is doubled over. There is a name worked within it."

"The imp is right," cried Og. "How came I to overlook it?"

And he would have snatched the flannel from Xit, but the dwarf darted away, crying, "No one shall have a hand in the discovery but myself. Stand off!"

Trembling with eagerness, he then cut open the corner, and found worked within the words

NARCISSUS LE GRAND.

"Narcissus Le Grand!" exclaimed Xit, triumphantly. "That was my father's title. He must have been a nobleman."

"If that was your father's name," returned Gog, "and I begin to think you have stumbled upon the right person at last, he was a Frenchman, and groom of the pantry to Queen Anne Boleyn."

"He was a dwarf like yourself," added Og, "and though the ugliest being I ever beheld, had extraordinary personal vanity."

"In which respect he mightily resembled his son," laughed Gog; "and since we have found out the father, I think I can give a shrewd guess at the mother."

"I hope she was a person of distinction," cried Xit, whose countenance had fallen at the knowledge he had acquired of his paternity.

"She was a scullion," replied Gog—"by name Mab Leatherbarrow."

"A scullion!" ejaculated Xit, indignantly. "I, the son of a scullion—and of one so basely named as Leatherbarrow—impossible!"

"I am as sure of it as of my existence," replied Og. "Your mother was not a jot taller, or more well-favored than your father; and they both, I now remember, disappeared about the time you were found."

"Which name will you adopt—Le Grand, or Leatherbarrow?" demanded Gog, maliciously.

"This is an unlucky discovery," thought Xit. "I had better have left my parentage alone. The son of a groom of the pantry and a scullion. What a degrading conjunction! However, I will make the most of it, and not let them have the laugh against me. I shall assume my father's name," he added aloud—"Sir Narcissus Le Grand—and a good, well-sounding title it is, as need be desired."

"It is to be hoped all will have forgotten the former bearer of it," laughed Og.

"I care not who remembers it," replied Xit: "the name bespeaks noble descent. Call me in future Narcissus Le Grand. The title fits me exactly—Narcissus expressing my personal accomplishments—Le Grand my majesty. For the present you may put 'master' to my name. You will shortly have to use a more honorable style of address. Farewell, sirs."

And thrusting the piece of flannel into his doublet, he stratted to the door.

"Farewell, sweet Master Narcissus," cried Og.

"Farewell, Leatherbarrow," added Gog.

"Le Grand," corrected Xit, halting, with a dignified air; "Le Grand, henceforth, is my name." And he marched off with his head so erect that, unfortunately missing his footing, he stumbled down the staircase. Picking himself up before the giants, whose laughter enraged him, could reach him, he darted off, and did not return till a late hour, when they had retired to rest.

Two days after this discovery—the Queen being then at the Tower—as he was pacing the grand gallery of the palace, according to custom, an usher tapped him on the shoulder, and desired him to follow him. With a throbbing heart Xit obeyed, and putting all the dignity he could command into his deportment, entered the presence-chamber. On that very morning, as good luck would have it, his tailor had brought him his new habiliments; and arrayed in a purple velvet mantle lined with carnation-colored silk, a crimson doublet slashed with white, orange-tawny hose, yellow buskins fringed with gold, and a green velvet cap, decorated with a plume of ostrich feathers, and looped with a diamond aigrette, he cut, in his own opinion, no despicable figure.

If the dwarf had entertained any doubts as to why he was summoned they would have been dispersed at once, as he advanced, by observing that the three giants stood at a little distance from the Queen, and that she was attended only by a few dames of honor, her female jester, and the vice-chamberlain, Sir John Gage, who held a crimson velvet cushion, on which was laid a richly ornamented sword. A smile crossed the Queen's countenance as Xit drew nigh, and an irrepressible titter spread among the dames of honor. Arrived within a few yards of the throne, the mannikin prostrated himself as gracefully as he could. But he was destined to mishaps. And in this the most important moment of his life, his sword, which was of extraordinary length, got between his legs, and he was compelled to remove it before his knee would touch the ground.

"We have not forgotten our promise—rash though it was," observed Mary, "and have summoned thy comrades to be witnesses to the distinction we are about to confer upon thee. In the heat of the siege, we promised that whoso would bring us Bret, alive or dead, should have his request, be it what it might. Thou wert his captor, and thou hast—"

"Knighthood at your majesty's hands," supplied Xit.

"How shall we name thee?" demanded Mary.

"Narcissus Le Grand," replied the dwarf. "I am called familiarly Xit. But it is a designation by which I do not desire to be longer distinguished."

Mary took the sword from Sir John Gage, and placing it upon the dwarf's shoulder, said "Arise, Sir Narcissus."

The new-made knight immediately obeyed, and making a profound reverence to the Queen, was about to retire, when she checked him.

"Tarry a moment, Sir Narcissus," she said. "I have a further favor to bestow upon you."

"Indeed!" cried the dwarf, out of his senses with delight. "I pray your majesty to declare it."

"You will need a dame," returned the Queen.

"Of a truth," replied Sir Narcissus, tenderly ogling the bevy of beauties behind the throne. "I need one sadly."

"I will choose for you," said the Queen.

"Your highness's condescension overwhelms me," rejoined Sir Narcissus, wondering which would fall to his share.

"This shall be your bride," continued the Queen, pointing to Jane the Fool, "and I will give her a portion."

Sir Narcissus had some ado to conceal his mortification. Receiving the announcement with the best grace he could assume, he strutted up to Jane, and taking her hand, said, "You bear her highness's injunctions, sweetheart. You are to be Lady Le Grand. I need not ask your consent I presume?"

"You shall never have it," replied Jane the Fool, with a coquettish toss of the head, "if her highness did not command it."

"I shall require to exert my authority early," thought Sir Narcissus, "or I shall share the fate of Magog."

"I, myself, will fix the day for your espousals," observed Mary. "Meanwhile, you have my permission to woo your intended bride for a few moments in each day."

"Only a few minutes," cried Sir Narcissus, with affected disappointment. "I could dispense with even that allowance," he added to himself.

"I cannot reward your services as richly," continued Mary, addressing the gigantic brethren, "but I am not unmindful of them,—nor shall they pass unrequited. Whenever you have a boon to ask, hesitate not to address me."

The three giants bowed their lofty heads.

"A purse of gold will be given to each of you," continued the Queen; "and on the day of his marriage, I shall bestow a like gift upon Sir Narcissus." She then waved her hand, and the new-made knight and his companions withdrew.

XXXVI.—How Cholmondeley learnt the history of Chely; how Nightgall attempted to assassinate Renard; and of the terrible fate that befel him.

Cuthbert Cholmondeley, after upwards of a week's solitary confinement, underwent a rigorous examination by certain of the Council relative to his own share in the conspiracy, and his knowledge of the different parties connected with it. He at once admitted that he had taken a prominent part in the siege, but refused to answer any other questions. "I confess myself guilty of treason and rebellion against the Queen's highness," he said, "and I ask no further mercy than a speedy death. But if the word of one standing in peril of his life may be taken, I solemnly declare, and call upon you to attest my declaration,—that the Lady Jane Grey is innocent of all share in the recent insurrection. For a long time she was kept in total ignorance of the project, and when it came to her knowledge, she used every means, short of betraying,—tears, entreaties, menaces,—to induce her husband to abandon the design."

"This declaration will not save her," replied Sir Edward Hastings, who was one of the interrogators, sternly—"By not revealing the conspiracy, she acquiesced in it. Her first duty was to her sovereign."

"I am aware of it, and so is the unfortunate lady herself," replied Cholmondeley. "But I earnestly entreat you, in pity for her misfortunes, to report what I have said to the Queen."

"I will not fail to do so," returned Hastings; "but I will not deceive you—her fate is sealed. And now, touching the Princess Elizabeth's share in this unhappy affair. Do you know ought concerning it?"

"Nothing whatever," replied Cholmondeley; "and if I did, I would not reveal it."

"Take heed what you say, sir," rejoined Sir Thomas Brydges, who was likewise among the examiners, "or I shall order you to be more sharply questioned."

Nightgall heard this menace with savage exultation.

"The rack will wrest nothing from me," said Cholmondeley, firmly.

Brydges immediately sat down at a table, and writing out a list of questions to be put to the prisoner, added an order for the torture, and delivered it to Nightgall.

Without giving Cholmondeley time to reflect upon his imprudence, the jailor hurried him away, and he did not pause till he came to the head of the stairs leading to the torture-chamber. On reaching the steps, Nightgall descended first, but though he opened the door with great caution, a glare of lurid light burst forth, and a dismal groan smote the ears of the listener. It was followed by a creaking noise, the meaning of which the esquire too well divined.

Some little time elapsed before the door was again opened, and the voice of Nightgall was heard from below calling to his attendants to bring down the prisoner. The first object that caught Cholmondeley's gaze on entering the fatal chamber, was a figure, covered from head to foot in a blood-colored cloth. The sufferer, whoever he was, had just been released from the torture, as two assistants were supporting him, while Wolcott was arranging the ropes on the rack. Sorrocold, also, who held a small cup filled with some pungent-smelling liquid, and a sprinkling-brush in his hand, was directing the assistants.

Horror-stricken at the sight, and filled with the conviction from the mystery observed, and the stature of the veiled person, that it was Lord Guilford Dudley, Cholmondeley uttered his name in a tone of piercing anguish. At the cry, the figure was greatly agitated—the arms struggled—and it was evident that an effort was made to speak. But only an inarticulate sound could be heard. The attendants looked disconcerted, and Nightgall, stamping his foot angrily, ordered them to take their charge away. But Cholmondeley, perceiving their intention, broke from those about him, and throwing himself at the feet of him whom he supposed to be Dudley, cried—"My dear, dear lord, it is I, your faithful esquire, Cuthbert Cholmondeley. Make some sign, if I am right in supposing it to be you."

The figure struggled violently, and shaking off the officials, raised the cloth, and disclosed the countenance of the unfortunate nobleman—but oh! how changed since Cholmondeley had seen him last—how ghastly, how distorted, how deathlike, were his features!

"You here!" cried Dudley. "Where is Jane? Has she fled? Has she escaped?"

"She has surrendered herself," replied Cholmondeley, "in the hope of obtaining your pardon."

"False hope!—delusive expectation!" exclaimed Dudley, in a tone of the bitterest anguish. "She will share my fate. I could have died happy—could have defied these engines, if she had escaped—but now!"

"Away with him!" interposed Nightgall. "Throw the cloth over his head."

"Oh God! I am her destroyer!" shrieked Dudley, as the order was obeyed, and he was forced out of the chamber.

Cholmondeley was then seized by Wolffyt and the others, and thrown upon his back on the floor. He made no resistance, well knowing it would be useless; and he determined, even if he should expire under the torture, to let no expression of anguish escape him. He had need of all his fortitude, for the sharpness of the suffering to which he was subjected by the remorseless Nightgall, was such as few could have withstood. But not a groan burst from him, though his whole frame seemed rent asunder by the dreadful tension.

"Go on," cried Nightgall, finding that Wolffyt and the others paused. "Turn the wheels round once more."

"You will wrench his bones from their sockets—he will expire if you do," observed Sorroccold.

"No matter," replied Nightgall; "I have an order to question him sharply, and I will do so, at all hazards."

"Do so at your own responsibility, then," replied Sorroccold, retiring. "I tell you he will die if you strain him further."

"Go on, I say," thundered Nightgall. But as he spoke the sufferer fainted, and Wolffyt refused to comply with the jailor's injunctions.

Cholmondeley was taken off the engine. Restoratives were applied by Sorroccold, and the questions proposed by the lieutenant put to him by Nightgall. But he returned no answer; and uttering an angry exclamation at his obstinacy, the jailor ordered him to be taken back to his cell, where he was thrown upon a heap of straw and left without light or food.

For some time, Cholmondeley remained in a state of insensibility, and when he recovered, it was to endure far greater agony than he experienced on the rack. His muscles were so strained that he was unable to move, and every bone in his body appeared broken. The thought, however, that Cicely was alive, and in the power of his hated rival, tormented him more sharply than his bodily suffering. Supposing her dead, though his heart was ever constant to her memory, and though he was a prey to deep and severe grief, yet the whirl of events in which he had recently been engaged had prevented him from dwelling altogether upon her loss. But now, when he knew that she still lived, and was in the power of Nightgall, all his passion—all his jealousy, returned with tenfold fury. The most dreadful suspicions crossed him; and his mental anguish was so great as to be almost intolerable. While thus tortured in body and mind, the door of his cell was opened, and Nightgall entered, dragging after him a female. The glare of the lamp so dazzled Cholmondeley's weakened vision, that he involuntarily closed his eyes. But what was his surprise to hear his own name pronounced by well-known accents, and, as soon as he could steady his gaze, to behold the features of Cicely—but so pale, so emaciated, that he could scarcely recognize them.

"There," cried Nightgall, with a look of fiendish exultation, pointing to Cholmondeley. "I told you you should see your lover. Glut your eyes with the sight. The arms that should have clasped you are nerveless—the eyes that gazed so passionately upon you, dim—the limbs that won your admiration, crippled. Look at him—and for the last time. And let him gaze on you, and see whether in these death-pale features—in this wasted form, there are any remains of the young and blooming maiden that won his heart."

"Cicely," cried Cholmondeley, making an ineffectual attempt to rise, "do I indeed behold you? I thought you dead."

"Would I were so," she cried, kneeling beside him, "rather than what I am. And to see you thus—and without the power to relieve you."

"You can relieve me of the worst pang I endure," returned Cholmondeley. "You have been long in the power of that miscreant—exposed to his violence, his ill-usage, to the worst of villany. Has he dared to abuse his power? Do not deceive me! Has he wronged you? Are you his minion? Speak! And the answer will either kill me at once, or render my death on the scaffold happy. Speak! Speak!"

"I am yours, and yours only—in life or death, dear Cholmondeley," replied Cicely. "Neither entreaties nor force should make me his."

"The time is come when I will show you no further consideration," observed Nightgall, moodily. "And if the question your lover has just asked, is repeated, it shall be differently answered. You shall be mine to-morrow, either by your own free consent, or by force. I have spared you thus long, in the hope that you would relent, and not compel me to have recourse to means I would willingly avoid. Now, hear me. I have brought you hither to gratify my vengeance upon the miserable wretch, writhing at my feet, who has robbed me of your affections, and whose last moments I would embitter by the certainty that you are in my power. But though it will be much to me to forego the promised gratification of witnessing his execution, or knowing that he will be executed, yet I will purchase your compliance even at this price. Swear to wed me to-morrow, and to accompany me unresistingly whithersoever I may choose to take you, and, in return, I swear to free him."

"He made a like proposal once before, Cicely," cried the esquire. "Reject it. Let us die together."

"It matters little to me how you decide," cried Nightgall. "Mine you shall be, come what will."

"You hear what he says, Cholmondeley," cried Cicely, distractedly. "I cannot escape him. Oh, let me save you!"

"Never!" rejoined Cholmondeley, trying to stretch his hands towards her, "Never! You torture me by this hesitation. Reject it, if you love, positively—peremptorily!"

"Oh, Heaven direct me!" cried Cicely, falling upon her knees. "If I refuse I am your destroyer."

"You will utterly destroy me, if you yield," groaned Cholmondeley.

"Once wedded to me," urged Nightgall, "you shall set him free yourself."

"Oh, no, no, no!" cried Cicely. "Death were better than that. I cannot consent. Cholmondeley, you must die."

"You bid me live," returned the esquire.

"You have signed his death-warrant!" cried Nightgall, seizing her hand. "Come along."

"I will die here," shrieked Cicely, struggling.

"Villain!" cried Cholmondeley, "your cruelty will turn her brain, as it did that of her mother Alexia."

"How do you know Alexia was her mother?" demanded Nightgall, starting, and relinquishing his grasp of Cicely.

"I am sure of it," replied Cholmondeley. "And what is more, I am acquainted with the rightful name and title of your victim. She was the wife of Sir Alberic Mountjoy, who was attainted of heresy and high treason, in the reign of Henry the Eighth."

"I will not deny it," replied Nightgall. "She was so. But how did you learn this?"

"Partly, from an inscription upon a small silver clasp, which I found upon her hood when I discovered her body in the Devilin Tower," replied Cholmondeley; "and partly, from inquiries since made. I have ascertained that the Lady Mountjoy was imprisoned with her husband in the Tower; and that at the time of his execution she received a pardon. I would learn from you why she was subsequently detained?—why she was called Alexia?—and why her child was taken from her?"

"She lost her senses on the day of her husband's death," replied Nightgall. "I will tell you nothing more."

"Alas!" cried Cicely, who had listened with breathless interest to what was said, "hers was a tragical history."

"Yours will be still more tragical, if you continue obstinate," rejoined Nightgall. "Come along."

"Heaven preserve me from this monster!" she shrieked. "Help me, Cholmondeley."

"I am as powerless as a crushed worm," groaned the esquire, in a tone of anguish.

Nightgall laughed exultingly, and twining his arms around Cicely, held his hand over her mouth to stifle her cries, and forced her from the cell.

The sharpest pang he had recently endured was light to Cholmondeley, compared with his present maddening sensations, and had not insensibility relieved him, his reason would have given way. How long he remained in this state he knew not, but, on reviving, he found himself placed on a small pallet, and surrounded by three men, in sable dresses. His attire had been removed, and two of these persons were chafing his limbs with an ointment, which had a marvellous effect in subduing the pain, and restoring pliancy to the sinews and joints; while the third, who was no other than Sorroccold, bathed his temples with a pungent liquid. In a short time, he felt himself greatly restored, and able to move, and when he thought how valuable the strength he had thus suddenly and mysteriously acquired would have been a short time ago, he groaned aloud.

"Give him a cup of wine," said an authoritative voice, which Cholmondeley fancied he recognized, from the further end of the cell. And glancing in the direction of the speaker, he beheld Renard.

"It may be dangerous, your excellency," returned Sorroccold.

"Dangerous or not, he shall have it," rejoined Renard. And wine was accordingly poured out by one of the attendants, and presented to the esquire, who eagerly drained it.

"Now leave us," said Renard; "and return to the torture chamber. I will rejoin you there."

Sorroccold and his companions cowed and departed.

Renard then proceeded to interrogate Cholmondeley respecting his own share in the rebellion; and also concerning Dudley and Lady Jane. Failing in obtaining satisfactory answers, he turned his inquiries to Elizabeth's participation in the plot; and he shaped them so artfully, that he contrived to elicit from the esquire, whose brain was a good deal confused by the potent draught he had swallowed, some important particulars relative to the princess's correspondence with Wyatt.

Satisfied with the result of the examination, the ambassador turned to depart, when he beheld, close behind him, a masked figure, which he immediately recognised as the same that had appeared at the window of his lodgings in the Bloody Tower, on the evening when Jane's death-warrant was signed by the queen. No sound had proclaimed the mask's approach, and the door was shut. The sight revived all Renard's superstitious fears.

"Who, and what art thou?" he demanded.

"Your executioner," replied a hollow voice. And suddenly drawing a poniard, the mask aimed a terrible blow at Renard, which, if he had not avoided it, must have proved fatal.

Thus assaulted, Renard tried to draw his sword, but he was prevented by the mask, who grappled with him, and brought him to the ground. In the struggle, however, the assassin's vizard fell off, and disclosed the features of Nightgall.

"Nightgall!" exclaimed Renard. "You, then, were the mysterious visitant to my chamber in the Bloody Tower. I might have guessed as much when I met you in the passage. But you persuaded me I had seen an apparition."

"If your excellency took me for a ghost, I took you for something worse," replied Nightgall, keeping his knee upon the ambassador's chest, and searching for his dagger, which he had dropped in the conflict.

"Release me, villain!" cried Renard. "Would you murder me?"

"I am paid to put your excellency to death," rejoined Nightgall, with the utmost coolness.

"I will give you twice the sum to spare me," rejoined Renard, who saw from Nightgall's looks that he had no chance, unless he could work upon his avarice.

"Hum!" exclaimed the jailor; who, not being able to reach his dagger, which had rolled to some distance, had drawn his sword, and was now shortening it, with intent to plunge it in the other's throat—"I would take your offer—but I have gone too far."

"Fear nothing," gasped Renard, giving himself up for lost. "I swear by my patron, Saint Paul, that I will not harm a hair of your head. Against your employer only will I direct my vengeance."

"I will not trust you," replied Nightgall, about to strike.

But just as he was about to deal the fatal blow—at the very moment that the point of the blade pierced the ambassador's skin, he was plucked backwards by Cholmondeley, and hurled on the ground. Perceiving it was his rival, who was more hateful to him even than Renard, Cholmondeley, on the onset, had prepared to take some part in the struggle, and noticing the poniard, had first of all possessed himself of it, and then attacked Nightgall in the manner above related.

Throwing himself upon his foe, Cholmondeley tried to stab him; but it appeared that he wore a stout buff jerkin, for the weapon glanced aside, without doing him any injury. As Cholmondeley was about to repeat the thrust, and in a part less defended, he was himself pushed aside by Renard, who, by this time, had gained his feet, and was threatening vengeance upon his intended assassin. But the esquire was unwilling to abandon his prey; and in the struggle, Nightgall, exerting all his strength, broke from them, and wresting the dagger from Cholmondeley, succeeded in opening the door. Renard, foaming with rage, rushed after him, utterly forgetful of Cholmondeley, who listened with breathless anxiety to their retreating footsteps. Scarcely knowing what to do, but resolved not to throw away the chance of escape, the esquire hastily attired himself, and taking up a lamp which Renard had left upon the floor, quitted the cell.

"I will seek out Cicely," he cried, "and set her free; and then, perhaps, we may be able to escape together."

But the hope that for a moment arose within his breast was checked by the danger and difficulty of making the search. Determined, however, to hazard the attempt, he set out in a contrary direction to that taken by Nightgall and Renard, and proceeding at a rapid pace soon reached a flight of steps, up which he mounted. He was now within a second passage, similar to the first, with cells on either side: but though he was too well convinced, from the sounds issuing from them, that they were occupied, he did not dare to open any of them. Still pursuing his headlong course, he now took one turn—now another, until he was completely bewildered and exhausted. While leaning against the wall to recruit himself, he was startled by a light approaching at a distance, and, fearing to encounter the person who bore it, was about to hurry away, when, to his inexpressible joy, he perceived it was Cicely. With a wild cry, he started towards her, calling to her by name; but the young damsel, mistaking him probably for her persecutor, let fall her lamp, uttered a piercing scream and fled. In vain, her lover strove to overtake her—in vain, he shouted to her, and implored her to stop—his cries were drowned in her shrieks, and only added to her terror. Cholmondeley, however, though distanced, kept her for some time in view; when all at once she disappeared.

On gaining the spot where she had vanished, he found an open trap-door, and, certain she must have descended by it, took the same course. He found himself in a narrow, vaulted passage, but could discover no traces of her he sought. Hurrying forward, though almost ready to drop with fatigue, he came to a large octagonal chamber. At one side he perceived a ladder, and at the head of it the arched entrance to a cell. In an agony of hope and fear he hastened towards the recess, and as he approached, his doubt was made certainty by a loud scream. Quick as thought he sprang into the cell, and found, crouched in the further corner, the object of his search.

"Cicely," he exclaimed, "it is I—your lover—Cholmondeley."

"You!" she exclaimed, starting up, and gazing at him as if she could scarcely trust the evidence of her senses; "and I have been flying from you all this time, taking you for Nightgall." And throwing herself into his arms, she was strained passionately to his bosom.

After the first rapturous emotions had subsided, Cicely hastily explained to her lover that after she had fainted, and on reviving, found herself in her accustomed prison. Filled with alarm by his dreadful threats, she had determined to put an end to her existence rather than expose herself to his violence; and had arisen with that resolution, when an impulse prompted her to try the door. To her surprise it was unfastened—the bolt having shot wide of the socket, and quitting the cell, she had wandered about along the passages, until they had so mysteriously encountered each other. This explanation was given, and Cholmondeley having related what had befallen him, the youthful pair, almost blinded to their perilous situation by their joy at their unexpected reunion, set forth in the hope of discovering the subterranean passage to the further side of the moat.

Too much engrossed by each other to heed whither they were going, they wandered on—Cicely detailing all the persecution she had experienced from Nightgall, and her lover breathing vengeance against him. The only person she had seen, she said, during her captivity, was Kit. He had found his way to her dungeon, but was discovered, while endeavoring to liberate her, by Nightgall, who threatened to put him to death if he did not take a solemn oath, which he proposed, not to reveal the place of her captivity. And she concluded the dwarf had kept his vow, as she had seen nothing of him since; nor had any one been led to her retreat.

To these details, as well as to her professions of love for him, unshaken by time or circumstance, Cholmondeley listened with such absorbing attention, that, lost to every thing else, he tracked passage after passage, unconscious where he was going. At last he opened a door which admitted them to a gloomy hall, terminated by a broad flight of steps, down which several armed figures were descending. Cholmondeley would have retreated, but it was impossible. He had been perceived by the soldiers, who rushed towards him questioned him and Cicely, and not being satisfied with their answers, conveyed them up the stairs to the lower guard-room in the White Tower, which it appeared the wanderers had approached.

Here, amongst other soldiers and warders, were the three giants, and instantly addressing them, Cholmondeley delivered Cicely to their care. He would have had them convey her to the Stone Kitchen, but this an officer who was present would not permit, till inquiries had been made, and meanwhile, the esquire was placed in arrest.

Shortly after this an extraordinary bustle was heard at the door, and four soldiers entered carrying the body of a man upon a shutter. They set it down in the midst of the room. Among those who flocked to gaze upon it was Cholmondeley. It was a frightful spectacle; but in the mutilated though still-breathing mass, the esquire recognised Night-gall. While he was gazing at the miserable wretch, and marvelling how he came in this condition, a tall personage strode into the room, and commanded the group to stand aside, approached the body. It was Renard. After regarding the dying man for a few moments with savage satisfaction, he turned to depart, when his eye fell upon Cholmondeley.

"I had forgotten you," he said. "But it seems you have not neglected the opportunity offered you of escape."

"We caught him trying to get out of the subterranean passages, your excellency," remarked the officer.

"Let him remain here till further orders," rejoined Renard. "You have saved my life, and shall find I am not ungrateful," he added to Cholmondeley.

"If your excellency would indeed requite me," replied the esquire, "you will give orders that this maiden, long and falsely imprisoned by the wretch before us, may be allowed to return to her friends."

"I know her," rejoined Renard, looking at Cicely; "and I know that what you say is true. Release her," he added to the officer. And giving a last terrible look at Nightgall, he quitted the room.

"Is Cicely here?" groaned the dying man.

"She is," replied Cholmondeley. "Have you aught to say to her?"

"Ay, and to you, too," replied Nightgall. "Let her approach, and bid the others stand off; and I will confess all I have done. Give me a draught of wine, for it is a long story, and I must have strength to tell it."

Before relating Nightgall's confession, it will be necessary to see what dreadful accident had befallen him; and in order to do this, his course must be traced subsequent to his flight from Cholmondeley's dungeon.

Acquainted with all the intricacies of the passages, and running with great speed, Nightgall soon distanced his pursuer, who having lost trace of him, was obliged to give up the chase. Determined, however, not to be balked of his prey, he retraced his steps to the torture-chamber, where he found Wolfytt, Sorrocel, and three other officials, to whom he recounted the jailor's atrocious attempt.

"I will engage to find him for your excellency," said Wolfytt, who bore so very kindly feeling to Nightgall, "if he is anywhere below the Tower. I know every turn and hole in the passages better than the oldest rat that haunts them."

"Deliver him to my vengeance," rejoined Renard, "and you shall hold his place."

"Says your excellency so!" cried Wolfytt; "then you may account him already in your hands."

With this, he snatched up a halberd and a torch, and bidding two of the officials come with him, started off at a swift pace on the right. Neither he nor his companions relaxed their pace, but tracked passage after passage, and examined vault after vault—but still without success.

Renard's impatience manifested itself in furious exclamations, and Wolfytt appeared perplexed and disappointed.

"I have it!" he exclaimed, rubbing his shaggy head. "He must have entered Saint John's Chapel, in the White Tower, by the secret passage."

The party were again in motion; and, taking the least circuitous road, Wolfytt soon brought them to a narrow passage, at the end of which he descried a dark crouching figure.

"We have him!" he cried, exultingly. "There he Creeping quickly along, for the roof was so low that he was compelled to stoop, Wolfytt prepared for an encounter with Nightgall. The latter grasped his dagger, and appeared ready to spring upon his assailant. Knowing the strength and ferocity of the jailor, Wolfytt hesitated a moment, but, goaded on by Renard, who was close behind, and eager for vengeance, he was about to commence the attack, when Nightgall, taking advantage of the delay, touched a spring in the wall behind him, and a stone dropping from its place, he dashed through the aperture. With a yell of rage and disappointment, Wolfytt sprang after him, and was instantly struck down by a blow from his opponent's dagger. Renard followed, and the fugitive speeding across the nave of Saint John's Chapel, and, without regarding Wolfytt, who was lying on the floor, bleeding profusely, he continued the pursuit.

Nightgall hurried up the steps behind the altar, and took his way along one of the arched stone galleries opening upon the council-chamber. But, swiftly as he fled, Renard, to whom fury had lent wings, rapidly gained upon him.

It was more than an hour after daybreak, but no one was astir in this part of the citadel, and as the pursued and pursuer threaded the gallery, and crossed the council-chamber, they did not meet even a solitary attendant.

THE WEDDING FINGER.—There are few objects among the productions of art contemplated with such lively interest by ladies, after a certain age, as the wedding-ring. This has been the theme for poets of every calibre; for geniuses of every wing, from the duckling to the solar eagle. The mouldy antiquary can tell the origin of the custom with which it is connected, and perchance why a ring is round; and account for many circumstances concerning the ceremony of the circlet, on the most conducive evidence, amounting to absolute conjectural demonstration. Amidst all that has been said and written in reference to the ring, I believe the more lovely part engaged in the mystic matter—the taper residence of this ornament, has been neglected. Now this is rather curious, as there are facts belonging to the ring-finger which render it in a peculiar manner an appropriate emblem of matrimonial union. It is the only finger where two principal nerves belong to two distinct trunks. The thumb is supplied with its principal nerves from the radial nerve, as is also the fore-finger, the middle finger, and the thumb side of the ring-finger; whilst the ulnar nerve furnishes the little finger and the other side of the ring-finger, at the point of extremity of which a real union takes place: it seems as if it were intended by nature to be the matrimonial finger. That the side of the ring-finger next the little finger is supplied by the ulnar nerve, is frequently proved by a common accident, that of striking the elbow against the edge of a chair, a door, or any narrow hard substance; the ulnar nerve is then frequently struck, and a thrilling sensation is felt in the little finger, and on the same side of the ring-finger, but not on the other side of it.

THE EVERGREEN,

A Monthly Magazine of Popular Literature,
EDITED BY PARK BENJAMIN.

In the March Number of this periodical, two new stories will be commenced—viz: OLD ST PAUL'S, a new romance by W. Harrison Ainsworth, author of Jack Sheppard, Rookwood, Crichton, &c., and GEORGE ST. GEORGE JULIAN, a new romance by the author of Stanley Thorn, Valentine Vox, &c. These works are not published in the New World; and it is the intention of the conductors of the Evergreen hereafter to give it a separate and independent character, except so far as it is requisite to conclude these New World stories already in progress.

When the Evergreen was first begun, in January, 1840, it was intended merely to make it a repository of the best articles which appeared in the New World; since the latter, appearing at that time in a folio form only, was difficult of preservation. But since the Quarto edition of the New World has gone into successful operation, THE EVERGREEN becomes unimportant as to the object for which it was established. It has, therefore, been determined to give it a character of its own—to make it a monthly compendium of the best issues of the English press, which, by reason of its preoccupation, cannot find places in the New World. In this way, being original in its reprints, it will have an intrinsic value, separate from any other publication.

THE EVERGREEN is the cheapest Magazine published—viz: $2 per annum in advance for one copy, or three copies for $5. For $3 the back numbers from April, 1840, will be sent, together with the volume for the present year. This will give, complete, all the works now in progress in the Evergreen. Agents are requested to send in their lists as fast as possible. J. WINCHESTER, Publisher, 30 Ann st.

THE PUBLICATIONS OF HARPER AND BROTHERS.

In a late number of the Christian Examiner, near the conclusion of a notice of Mr. Bryant's Selections from American Poets, it is remarked—"We are sorry that any thing from Mr. Bryant's hand should pass through the press of the Harpers, whose distinction it is to issue the poorest looking books of the whole trade. There is a compensation in their cheapness, we suppose, with which we ought to rest satisfied."

Apart from the Boston spirit towards all the issues of New York publishers, displayed in the above small and splenetic observation, it is a simple and obvious falsehood. If the writer intended to speak the truth—which we doubt—he is grossly ignorant of the publications which are, every week, poured from the press in this country; he is too grossly ignorant to write even for a narrow and sectarian review, like the Christian Examiner—the organ of the Unitarians in and about Boston, who seem to consider all the world, apart from their little sphere, a Nazareth, out of which no good can come. The books published by the Harpers are not, indeed, so elegant as those printed at the University Press in Cambridge; but, instead of being issued in editions of a few hundreds, they are disseminated by thousands through the United States. They are not printed to excite the approbation of an insignificant clique of little wits and starveling critics, but to sow knowledge and instruction with a broad cast over the whole surface of the republic. That fastidiousness, which recoils from a cheap book, would object to the giving of food to a famishing brother except upon a plate of the finest porcelain. For our own part, we detest this pretentious affectation about spotless paper and liberal type: this admiring of rivulets of ink running through meadows of margin. A book, that must be handled with as exquisite a care as a transparent drawing upon fine rice-paper, will have few readers: commend us to a volume that looks as if it would suffer no injury by being read and re-read, by being passed from hand to hand, and tossed hither and thither. This compensating quality of cheapness is, to us, the highest recommendation that a book can have: we feel pretty sure that it is worthy of being read, especially if it have the good fortune to be issued by Harper and Brothers.

In New York and at the West and South the reputation of this house is deservedly high. No business firm in this city is in better credit; and no publishers are ranked with them—they stand alone. They never publish an unsuccessful work; the reason of this is, all their undertakings are based on a sound judgement. Their literary adviser—a gentleman connected with the daily press of this city—is one of the best English scholars in the country, a man intimately acquainted with the popular taste, and possessed of abilities as a writer, second to none: though a love of home-quiet and of the liberty of exercising his fine talents as he pleases, have preserved his name from the blazon which attends most of the little great litterateurs of our country. Besides the advantage of this critic's suggestions and advice, the brothers Harper have resources in all the authors, whose works they have published—Bryant, Halleck, Stephens and the rest—who are both willing and happy to give their opinions, when consulted.

Further objections still more frivolous, if possible, than that on which we have just animadverted, are made by the Boston press to some of the late publications in the Family Library—objections so uncritical that it seems to us they must have been actuated by some jealous booksellers. The life and works of Doctor Johnson; the life and works of Goldsmith, edited by Washington Irving; are found fault with, because the works are not complete, because they are nothing more than selections! Can anything be more absurd than this? The object and intention of these books, being to inspire a taste, especially in the young, for the best productions in the English literature—what better course could be adopted than to make choice of fit portions of the works of the first authors? Many a person will be led to read Johnson and Goldsmith in this way, who would have been deterred by the voluminous character of their works. We hope that this plan of presenting short memoirs, well prepared by competent hands, of the most distinguished writers of the language, with specimens of their productions, will be persevered in; it is excellent, and cannot fail to meet the warm approval of all impartial critics. For ourselves, familiar as we were with the writings of Goldsmith, we read the volumes, recently published, with unalloyed gratification. It was like visiting in selectest places the pleasant scenes of by-gone years; though the whole country was familiar to our eye, these chosen spots seemed to be clothed with a new verdure and beauty, and to wear a freshness which was not so apparent when we wandered over them before.

If the Harpers will hearken to our words, they will go on publishing cheap books that the poor may read as well as the rich; and they will add many volumes to the Family and District School Libraries of just such books as they have lately issued.

To the Editor of the New World:

The following line, which has lately caused considerable disputation among the admirers of Shakspeare, as to its meaning, will be found in Othello's address to the Senate:

"She wished that Heaven had made her such a man."

Will you do us the favor to express your sentiments on the subject, through the columns of the New World, and oblige. MANY READERS.

We have no doubt whatever concerning the true meaning of the above quoted line. Desdemona intended to say, if she did say so at all, that she wished Heaven had created her a man, not a woman—and she wished, moreover, that she had been created such a man as Othello was,—so noble, brave, capable of achieving such illustrious deeds. The other meaning, she wished that Heaven had made such a man for her, that is, for her husband, is not tolerable—particularly as uttered by a young maid. Give the former meaning and the speech is delicate and natural, as an exclamation of one excited to enthusiasm by admiration for another; but the latter is a wanton interpretation—and inconsistent with all else that Desdemona utters, as well as with her character. At least, such is our opinion—though, in entertaining it, we differ from no less a critic than John Quincy Adams, who has written some two or three essays, in which he avers that Desdemona behaved with unpardonable impropriety in running away from her father and marrying Othello.

On the other hand, let it be remembered that the line above quoted occurs in Othello's address to the Senate. It might have been his purpose to convey the obnoxious meaning into the minds of the "most potent, grave, and reverend seniors." He might have known full well what Desdemona intended when she uttered that wish to him, and still, to excuse himself with the Senate for having stolen away the old man's daughter, he might have desired to make it appear that Desdemona offered herself to him in this unmaidenly manner; for assuredly, in the sense to which we object, the line is equivalent to a downright proposition of marriage. We must, therefore, decline any direct answer to our correspondent's inquiry, for the plain reason—we cannot give it. The line, like Macbeth's witches, "palter with us in a double sense." If it were spoken by Desdemona herself, we should say that she merely wished that she were a man, and capable of emulating lofty achievements: as reported by Othello, we are puzzled to know what interpretation he put upon the expression himself, or what interpretation he intended to have others put upon it.

RUINS AT ALEXANDRIA.—A correspondent of the London Times states that in the desert places occupied by the ancient city of Alexandria the ruins of vast sewers are still to be seen which show that great attention was once paid to the preservation of the health of the people. The Pasha has a board of ornament; but this board, when applied to to remove nuisances, replies that it was appointed to attend to ornamental matters and not to interfere with dirt. The Pasha himself dare not undertake to enforce neatness among the Arabs.

FAILURE OF THE UNITED STATES BANK.

The most important event of the day is the final stoppage of the United States Bank at Philadelphia. That institution is now confessedly irretrievably bankrupt. Its unsoundness has been suspected for some time past by men of sagacity, and it is now proved beyond a doubt. The stock to day will probably decline thirty per cent. at the Board of Brokers—if, indeed, any sum whatsoever will be offered for what is intrinsically worthless. It may be banded about for a while longer by speculators and cornerers; but it may be considered as already out of the market for purposes of investment.

On Thursday, 4th inst., between 2 and 3 o'clock, P. M., the bank refused payment of a New-York draft of $100,000, and other important demands. In a word, it closed its doors—and its affairs must now be speedily wound up.

It is pretended that the cause of this sudden stoppage is the disappointment, experienced by the bank, in receiving certain large amounts of specie. But this, of course, is a great humbug. We have, ever since Mr. Biddle's withdrawal, looked upon the Bank as an insolvent concern, bolstered up by party newspapers and the deceptive statements of its agents and directors. Its "position" now is very clearly "defined;" and it is better for the public at large that the worst is known. We believe however that the influence of this Bank upon the monetary concerns of the country is grossly exaggerated.

The loss to bill holders will probably be unimportant. The foreign stockholders will doubtless be the most seriously affected; and Mr. Jaudon will have some heavy losses to account for. The course of the New-York and Boston banks, in refusing to suspend and in faithfully maintaining their credit, has been such that general confidence in American credit will not be shaken—whatever may be the temporary effect of the bankruptcy of an Institution, still thought by many to be national.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.—It is gratifying to observe that our legislature is again considering the propriety of abolishing this remnant of a barbarous age. The same subject is also eliciting the attention of the legislative bodies of several other States—a bill having already passed the assembly of Indiana to that effect. And it is to be hoped that when the proposition comes formally before our representatives, they will lay aside their old prejudices, give the subject a careful and impartial consideration, and then act upon it in accordance with their reasons and consciences. It has heretofore been avoided because the minds of members have been wholly engrossed in party, we may say party measures, not comparable to it in importance.

The punishment of death is not only abhorrent to the laws of God, but prejudicial to the true interests of society; the experience of every nation has proved that where the laws are most lenient they are the best executed, and that there is the least crime.

It should be remembered that the object of punishment is not revenge, nor to retaliate upon the criminal injury for injury; but it is to prevent crime. And any law that transcends this principle outrages humanity, and violates every tenet of the Christian faith.

Many take it for granted that whatever is established is, therefore, right, and will make no further inquiry to inform their minds. Such we would advise to examine the origin of these laws; and they will discover that they were established at periods when the legitimate objects of government, and the rights of the subject, were seldom inquired into, and invariably disregarded. They are ever extolling the laws of England, as the best ideal of reason and justice—a country whose criminal code was nearly as cruel as that of Draco, and far more fearful in its execution. His laws, it is true, were written in blood, but their mandates were scarce ever heeded, while the English code, though of a hue not quite so black, altogether eclipsed them in the number of its victims and the ferocity of the mode in which the punishment was inflicted.

At the time of our Revolution, by the English law, about one hundred and sixty offences were punishable with death. Pilfering an object of trifling value was visited with a doom like that which attended the perpetration of the most atrocious murder.

The humanity of our fathers revolted at the savage ferocity of these laws, and as soon as the power was in their own hands, abolished all but such as now remain. It is to be hoped that the good work which they began will be speedily completed, and our laws assimilated to the more just and enlightened sentiments of the age.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—It will be seen by the following act that the legislature of New Hampshire have abolished imprisonment for debt upon all contracts made after the 1st of March next. We are rejoiced to see even this first step taken. But why not abolish imprisonment for debt entirely? Why allow it a lingering death, showing its hideous form, writhing convulsively in its agonies for five or six years, until, perhaps, the statute of limitations shall have released its victims from its grasp? It cannot be for a moment supposed that the right of imprisonment forms any part of the contract. In states where the statute declares that no man shall be arrested on a civil contract, it may well be contended that upon contracts made in such states, the right of arrest is taken away even in states where arrest is allowed. But we are yet to learn that the right of arrest upon a civil contract is such a right that it may not be swept away by the legislature like chaff. Such has always been the opinion, and the legislative course in New York. This whole subject is undergoing a winnowing process in the United States, and usages which have been practised for ages will no longer be tolerated by an enlightened public opinion. Our people are becoming convinced of the truth of the Indian's simple remark, when shown a debtors' prison, "Indian can catch no skins there!" They are becoming satisfied that a prison is not the place for a poor debtor to retrieve his fortune. Punish for fraud and for crime, but let misfortune go free, and "the blessing of those who are ready to perish" will follow you.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That no person shall be arrested, held to bail, or imprisoned on any mesne process or execution founded on any contract or debt which shall accrue or be made from and after the first day of March next.

"Section 2. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be and the same are hereby repealed."

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE NEW WORLD.

HAVANA, Jan. 25, 1841.

A Bull Fight—The Italian Opera—Consumptive Patients, &amp;c.

Among the lions of Havana, the bull fight holds a prominent place. It is the resort of all strangers, for once at least. It generally begins so soon after dinner that one has to hurry, as I did, to be there in time; and now I am so anxious to have finished the disagreeable task of describing it, that I shall not take the trouble to tell you how I got there. The arena of this disgusting exhibition is about a mile and a half from the city, where my ticket (procured beforehand) secured me a seat. Here I had scarcely placed myself before the band stopped playing, and some bloodhounds were brought in by the "banderilleros," who were dressed in the Andalusian costume, and who, at a given signal, let loose the hounds upon some rabbits and a cat. The former escaped for a time by their wonderful agility, but when once caught, death was inevitable. Not so with poor puss. If they came within her reach she gave battle, and made them smell blood of a kind for which they had little thirst, till at length their noses had suffered so much that not one of them dared go near her until a brute of a negro half killed the poor creature by a blow. Then, indeed, the hounds pounced upon her, and destroyed what little life was left.

By this time the dogs had become furious. They had got a taste of blood; and when the bull was let in they attacked him vigorously, catching by the tenderest parts, and holding on with wonderful tenacity. Not even the fearful plunging and kicking of the infuriated creature could break them from their hold. At length the animal gave up in despair. The dogs were taken off, and the bull was further enraged, if possible, by the banderilleros, whose occupation is to stick an instrument of torture with a barbed point into the neck of the beast, nearly between the shoulders. The manner of doing this is to face the bull, and the moment that he springs upon the banderillero he plunges the fatal weapon with deadly aim and fatal dexterity, while in the act of jumping clear of the horns of the wretched animal. These instruments are made of variegated paper ribbons, and generally contain fire-works, so arranged that they go off while the weapon is in the back of the bull, when up goes his head as well as heels, and he performs a regular set of antics, to which a West India negro-dance would bear some comparison. In another moment he is away, at the first plunging his horns into the poor horse, and tossing him (together with his rider) clean off his feet, some eight or ten feet distance, sprawling on the ground, with his entrails hanging out. At this striking moment up comes one of the Matadores, with his bright crimson banners, to divert the bull from his prey; and not unfrequently the picadore mounts again and receives the attacks from the horned brute as long as the wretched horse can stand. The picadore has only a spear six foot long, with a blunt point, which cannot penetrate the hide of the bull, to protect himself. After the mob have been diverted in this way for a time, the signal is given for the matadore to do the work of death. He takes his sword, and, watching the approach of the doomed creature, plunges the sword into him just between the shoulders. In almost every instance the aim is so sure that the bull staggers and falls. Immediately at this moment the bugle is sounded, the noose is put upon his horns, and three horses, gaily caparisoned, are brought in and hitched to the noose. Then, at the crack of the whip, they disappear, and leave the arena clear for another. This one is treated much in the same way as the first, with one exception. He is drawn up to a post by a noose thrown over his horns, and another rope is cast round his hind legs; he is then saddled, when one of the fool-hardy picadores mounts his back, and succeeds in staying there, perhaps, for the space of three or five minutes, by holding on to the pommel of the saddle. He is a rider to whom the bull seems to show no little antipathy. Six bulls, on the occasion when I attended, were dispatched, and two of them in a very expert manner, by a matadore with only one arm! Numerous feats were performed—such as jumping over the bull's back; and one of the more youthful matadores or banderilleros sprung over the horns of one of them. When the fourth was tortured to death, I could remain no longer; and hurrying down to the ferry-boat, hastened back to the city—a five minutes' sail—with a determination never to witness another such disgusting sight. I had seen two horses and four bulls killed, and was almost stunned by the savage shouts, and the thumping of canes by the spectators, among whom some tolerably well-dressed women were bare-faced enough to show not only themselves, but their children of both sexes.

In the evening, to efface the impression of the bull fight, I went to the Italian Opera. "Marino Faliero" was performed with great success. "The Ober" exerted her wonderful abilities to the utmost, which brought down thunders of applause. The good people here seem to have a way of their own to show their approbation. They do not thump with their canes, or heels, as we do in the States, but bring the whole length of their canes to bear upon some flat surface such as the end or back of their seats. In this way it is natural to suppose that they make noise enough to gratify the most fastidious performer, and to shock the nerves of any sensitive person among the audience. Our box was in the third tier, where we had a commanding view of the house, which of itself can boast of nothing at attractive either in the internal or external appearance—in consequence of which, the fair occupants of the boxes, with their brilliant black eyes,—they all have fine eyes—receive your undivided attention. Several of these graceful creatures wore bonnets—which created no little surprise, because they are very seldom worn in the street by the natives, and therefore you would scarcely expect to see them at the Opera. I hope the mantilla is not to go out for a fashion so much less graceful and becoming. I observed, also, that in the pit, which was occupied exclusively by gentlemen, not one wore dark pants. The effect was quite novel as seen from above. The alternate lines of black or blue coats and white trousers reaching clear across the pit. The Spaniards must be extremely fond of sweet sounds alone, since the manager is permitted to give them the same opera over and over again. It is now three months since they opened, and three operas only have been produced, one of which was so unpopular that it was only once repeated. Thus "Marino Faliero" and "Lucia de Lamermoor" have been played alternately. In the former, the Ober electrifies you with her astonishing compass of voice, and in the latter the Borghese melts you into tears by her more touching tenderness and true eloquence of harmonious sounds. She is more beautiful than the other, which no doubt has its effect with me. I hear that this company is to visit the States next summer. Report says also that the Ober has selected "Norma" for her benefit. If so we shall have some fine music and shall also witness the novelty of the prima Donna seated at the entrance door dispensing her tickets, in which case it is not uncommon for her to receive an ounce—$17—for one seat. After the piece—they never have but one piece—is over, the audience is obliged to wait for the Captain General's carriage to drive up and depart before any other vehicle is allowed to approach. Twenty minutes, I am told, has the most noble Prince of Algona kept his fair and loving subjects waiting till he was pleased to retire from their presence.

The steamer Natchez, from New Orleans, arrived, a few days since, with a cargo of consumptives. Some go by land; others by volantes from the quay to some shelter, where they can lie down and die—for death is the portion of more than one-half of those who come here with that disease. It certainly does appear as if the physicians in the States, aware that there is no hope, send them off to Cuba, in order to avoid the loss of reputation which they may incur by the patient's dying while in their hands. How much happier would the unfortunate individuals be if permitted to die among their relatives, rather than be sent hundreds or thousands of miles from home to breathe away existence where no dear or familiar voice can sooth their last moments!

Two of the passengers that came in the Natchez last trip died in two or three days after they arrived. One of them expired calling for her family and physician. "Bring all the physicians, every physician in Havana. I'll pay them any thing," said she, although while she spoke the death rattles were in her throat. It was of no use—her wealth would not save her. She was too far gone before she came to the Havana.

It is astonishing with what rapidity the patient is borne to the grave when he comes here in the last stages of his complaint. Death seems in a desperate hurry to embrace his victim. Why, he goes like this orange which is on the table before me. But yesterday it was sound; this afternoon it is a mass of corruption. Depend upon it, there is no place for those who are far gone with the consumption.

Independent of the tendency which the system has to decay in this sometimes warm climate, there are other reasons. One is that the temperature is exceedingly changeable. One day you are scarcely comfortable in double milled cloth cloaks, and the next you are melting in the thinnest of clothing. I am at this moment sitting in the coolest place I can find in a very cool and airy house, with a thin linen coat and pants on, with no waistcoat, and yet the perspiration is flowing from every pore. To-morrow, if the wind should blow from the north, the thermometer will be as it was but three days since, down to 66. Well, the consequence is, that those who are emaciated by disease, suffer as much as they would in a more northern climate. Here they have no fires, and only a small bit of straw matting is sometimes seen upon the stone or plaster floor. It is seldom that you find windows with glass, and more seldom that you can avoid a current of air.

HISTORY OF THE GERMANS.—We understand that Mr. Francis Graeter of this city is engaged on a translation of WOLFGANG MENZEL'S HISTORY OF THE GERMANS. It is a work that cannot fail of being welcomed by a large and increasing class of readers, who take a deep interest in whatever concerns that great and learned nation. In his own country, Mr. Menzel stands among its foremost authors, as a man of brilliant genius, vast and varied attainments, and extraordinary vigor and eloquence of style. He lives at Stuttgart in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, where he has long edited a literary journal, whose influence is felt all over Germany. He is a bold and independent writer, uncompromising in his hostility to every form of literary immorality. He has been engaged in some very sharp controversies, in which the mystical absurdities, and vague and shadowy trains of thought, or no-thought, which are not unfrequently found in German literature and philosophy are handled with but little ceremony. He has not even hesitated to hurl his thunders, like the giants of old mythology, against the Jupiter of the German Olympus.

Menzel has become already a distinguished name in the departments of fiction, literary criticism, and political history; but he is best known out of Germany, by his work on "German Literature." The History of the Germans, which Mr. Graeter is translating, is, however, his most finished and important production. The studies on the basis of which this admirable work has been reared, occupied him twenty years; and there is probably no man living who understands the history of Germany, not only in the details of facts and dates, but in its essential spirit, so well as Wolfgang Menzel. The ardent patriotism which has ever warmed into eloquence his flowing style, has led him to study the past fortunes of his country with a loving and sympathizing heart. The character, manners and religion of the Germans in the times of classical antiquity; their brave resistance to the Roman legions; the various forms which the genius of Germany assumed during the middle ages and the Empire; the legends, Mime-songs, Guild-songs; the Nibelungen-lied, that wondrous old story of heroic deeds, fiery passions and heart-subduing woes: the twilight cathedrals, in which worlds of thought, music and poetry are wrought into stone, there to stand for ever—unapproached, unapproachable; the countless old ballads, in which are uttered the manifold aspirations of the busy German heart of olden times; all these are ever present to his mind, and enable him to seize and portray the whole German character with a liveliness, freshness and force unequalled by any other German historian. Herein lies Menzel's peculiar excellence; that he has conceived the history of Germany as one whole; that he has represented it according to a profound apprehension of its unity and entireness; that his delineations have the breathing animation of reality; in short, that he has reproduced in his great historical picture the mighty image of Germany as she was in older and more heroic days, and as she is now in her age of boundless culture and erudition.

Mr. Menzel's narrative style is free, vigorous and picturesque, being in these respects a strong contrast to that of most of his learned countrymen. His knowledge of the ancient Germanic constitutions and laws gives a remarkable precision to his statements with regard to the political organizations that have prevailed in different periods of German history. He draws the characters of the several actors on the historic stage, with a nice perception of their several qualities and traits, and a perfect knowledge of their respective positions and influences. His selection of important points, and leading facts is managed with infinite judgement; so that the story is never encumbered with a multiplicity of dry and tedious particulars which have no interest for any but the mere antiquary. His narrative therefore, flows in a stream of transparent diction, and bears the reader's mind delightedly along its course through the successive ages of German history.

We have every reason to believe the translation will be executed with ability. Mr. Graeter is a man of genius and a profound scholar. Though a German by birth, he writes the English language with purity, beauty and a very musical cadence. In a just feeling of the idiomatic proprieties of English composition, Mr. Graeter's writings are remarkable, and are distinguished by the genuine Anglo-Saxon strength. Several original pieces have been published by him; we remember particularly two stories called "Mary's Journey," and "Honig's Owl Tower," which showed great powers of style and brilliancy of imagination. He has also contributed poetical pieces to some of the annuals. We are much gratified, therefore, to hear of his projected translation of Menzel's History, and we hope these brief remarks of ours may encourage him to proceed with this important undertaking. It will be honorable to the literary character of our city to have a work of so high a character successfully accomplished here.

CONGRESS.—After a long and exciting debate, the House of Representatives has passed a bill authorizing a further issue of Treasury notes, to the amount of five millions, after the 4th of March next. [This is to prevent the financial necessity for an extra session.]

The Senate, having passed Mr. Benton's Pre-emption bill, has been hard at work on the Bankrupt bill. A motion to recommit, with a view of including corporations, &c., has been negatived by a decisive vote. It is feared that the bill will fail for want of time.

On Wednesday the two Houses, in due form, counted the votes for President and Vice President, and declared Harrison and Tyler duly elected. No other business was done.

GENERAL HARRISON AT THE CAPITAL.

The President elect of the United States reached Washington on Tuesday morning between eleven and twelve o'clock.

The arrangements for his reception were carried out as fully as the inclement state of the weather permitted. In consequence of the rush of the multitude to the door of the Railroad depot, it was found impossible to go through the ceremony of the address there, and the General was immediately conducted, through double lines of citizens, to the City Hall, where he was addressed and welcomed by Mr. Seaton, Mayor of the city.

General HARRISON replied briefly. He said that a long and intimate acquaintance with the citizens of Washington had left him no room to doubt a reception, from the Mayor and those whom he represented, as cordial as that which he now experienced. Whatever difficulties he might encounter in the administration of the Government of the Union, he said he had a most pleasing anticipation of happiness in his social relations for the time which he might reside amongst them.

Mr. J. A. BLAKE, President of the Washington Tippecanoe Club, was then introduced to General HARRISON, and made him a brief and neat address on behalf of the Club, to which the General replied in appropriate terms.

After this ceremonial, an hour was spent in a personal introduction of many hundred citizens to the General, who appeared to be in fine health and spirits.

The committee then escorted him to his lodgings at Gadsby's Hotel, and soon after left him to himself until half past 4 o'clock, when the committee returned to the Hotel, and, by previous arrangement, entertained at dinner the General, the gentlemen of his suite, (Messrs. CHAMBERS, TODD, COPELAND, and R. WICKLIFFE, jr.), the gentlemen of the Baltimore committee who had attended him to this city, and the Mayors of Georgetown and Alexandria.

The General attended the National Hall on Thursday, from the hours of one o'clock to three, to receive the visits of ladies, together with such gentlemen as have ladies under escort.

The General remains during his present visit to Washington at the National Hotel, where the city committee engaged lodgings for him. It had been his purpose to lodge at the private residence of an old personal friend, (W. L. Brent, Esq.) but he subsequently accepted the accommodations tendered to him by the city.

GENERAL HARRISON'S PROGRESS.

Condensed from the correspondence of the Baltimore Patriot.

Pittsburg, Pa., Jan. 30, 1841.

In my last communication I informed you that General Harrison had made an engagement to meet the ladies of this city at Concert Hall. Sometime before the hour an immense concourse of individuals were assembling in the neighborhood of the building. The room of the Hall was soon thronged with all the beauty and fashion of the town. From my own observations, and from what I could collect from others, I suppose that not less than three thousand young ladies were present, exhibiting the most beautiful and sublime spectacle I ever beheld. When the hour of three arrived, the old hero alighted from the carriage, and accompanied by his distinguished aids, and the Hon. Harmer Denny, he entered the Hall amidst the exclamations of the admiring crowd—the band playing "See the conquering Hero comes." The General rose, evidently much affected by this homage, thus paid by such a fascinating audience, addressed the ladies, in a few brief and eloquent remarks. During the delivery of this speech, the General took the liberty to interweave a beautiful episode in his observations, of the most deeply interesting character. He feelingly alluded to an incident that occurred in 1794. He observed that he ought to have had a Pittsburg wife; that in 1794 he exchanged locks of hair with a lady of this town. The lady with whom the General had the good fortune to meet in 1794 happened to be present, and she (Mrs. A*****) forthwith advanced to the General and tendered him her congratulations. The meeting elicited much exultation. After he concluded, the General then shook by the hand the Whig daughters of Pennsylvania, and all retired to their homes, highly gratified that they had an opportunity of grasping by the hand, the General, who had protected their country in times of danger and of difficulty.

Brownsville, Pa., Feb. 1, 1841.

Before I proceed to enumerate the circumstances attending the landing of the President elect at this place, I will give you a brief sketch of what took place this morning, prior to our embarkation from Pittsburgh, and our progress up the river of the Monongahela. Early in the morning, before sunrise, the cannon and roar of artillery were heard in every part of Pittsburgh. The whole town, before 9 o'clock, was in motion. The military corps exhibited a most splendid appearance. The front of the Pittsburgh Hotel (conducted by the enterprising and accommodating Major Iron, an old soldier under Gen. Harrison) was crowded with individuals who had collected together, to take leave of the President of the people. The General having left the Hotel, to pay one or two visits, to one or two valued friends, shortly returned, when the most enthusiastic cheering commenced.

Some six thousand persons stood before the Hotel. The General, in obedience to the request of his enlightened auditory, appeared before them, and made a few eloquent remarks, in his usual felicitous style, characterized by his usual vigor of thought and closeness of observation. Having concluded these remarks, the committee of arrangements intimated to the vast assemblage, that the General would move onward to the steamer Loyal Hannan, which had been prepared for his transportation to Brownsville. In a short time an immense concourse appeared on the levee, although it was raining and snowing immoderately. He delivered them a farewell address in the most touching and affectionate manner. The military companies accompanied him to this place. We left Pittsburgh with hearts grateful for the homage which the citizens had manifested for our old chief; we left the beautiful and fascinating daughters of that city, who evinced such deep regard for the favorite of the people. The hospitable roofs—the splendid entertainments of the citizens of Pittsburg will long be remembered.

As we ascended the river, every demonstration of respect was tendered the General, and the highest degree of enthusiasm displayed. On reaching Elizabeth, we found an immense crowd on the banks of the river, ready to receive the General. At the warm salutations of his friends, he tendered his kindest regards. A numerous collection of ladies were present to welcome him to the town. He received them with that warmth and cordiality of feeling, for which he is so distinguished. At Williamsport he was also received with every degree of attention. On reaching Belle Vernon, a beautiful village immediately on the banks of the river, we discovered that a portion of it was brilliantly illuminated. Mr. J. Speori generously and faithfully illuminated his dwelling in a most splendid manner, in honor of the arrival of the President elect. A few miles from this place, another dwelling was in a state of brilliant illumination. We at length reached this place. We found two thousand individuals at 11 o'clock at night, to welcome the General, and to tender to their hearty congratulations. At this place, he received the visits of numerous citizens. They soon dispersed—upon the promise of the committee that in the morning the General would receive them with pleasure.

Tuesday, Feb. 2.

On this day, Tuesday, the 2d, we reached Union Town, Pennsylvania. The concourse, as you may well conceive, was immense, as this is the largest portion of the country from which the old soldiers volunteered their services under General Harrison, to defend the North western frontier. The old soldiers here, without any exception, made great sacrifices to meet the General, and the friendly and cordial manner in which he has greeted them uniformly, I am sure, will endear his elevated virtues to their memory. The assemblage at Union Town was immense, upwards of fifteen hundred is the usual estimate. The General's headquarters was at the Clinton House, kept by the worthy and accommodating proprietor, Mr. Ryers. At this place he addressed himself, to-day, to a numerous auditory.

Advisors have been received from the Sandwich Islands up to the 24th of October last. The Exploring Squadron reached Honolulu on the first of October. While cruising among the Feejee Islands, in September, two of the officers of the squadron, who went on shore at Malolo, were killed by the natives. The murdered officers were Lieut. J. A. UNDERWOOD, and Midshipman WILKES HENRY. The account given is that these unfortunate officers had gone ashore with but a few men, and were attacked and killed almost instantly, but not until they had shot four of their assailants, who were the very men that but a few minutes before they had employed in tracking boats over the reef. The men with them were wounded, but escaped.

The Squadron's boats being near, immediately pulled in and commenced a well-directed fire upon the savages, under cover of which Lieut. Alden landed and brought off the bodies, which were entirely stripped. Had not the natives been fully occupied in carrying off their own dead, their bodies would have been taken away and devoured. This occurred on the 25th July. Capt. W. immediately made preparations for attacking their town and fort, which the savages considered impregnable. The seamen were landed, and a fire was opened upon it, but without effect, until a rocket, or "Flying Spirit," as they called it, set fire to their town, and created great consternation. It was finally carried by assault. The natives fought well, and even stood a charge of bayonet, but were finally beaten at all points, seventy or more were killed, the fort and town burnt, their plantations destroyed, and the island laid waste. These islanders have always been noted for their ferocity, treachery, and cannibalism, characteristics which, it seems, they fully retain.

HARRISON'S INAUGURATION SUIT.—We were yesterday shown, by Samuel Lawrence, Esq., a splendid piece of broadcloth, manufactured by the Middlesex Co. in this city, to the order of the Baltimore Tippecanoe Club, and designed for the inauguration suit of Gen. Harrison. The cloth is made entirely from American wool, a part of which was from Mr. Lawrence's flock of sheep in Connecticut, and it is probably the finest article of the kind ever manufactured in this country.—[Lowell Courier.]

FROM THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The Polynesian, published at Honolulu, of Sept. 12th, received by the Editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser, contains some statistics of the trade of the Island. The whole amount of imports into Honolulu for the last four and a-half years, is stated at $1,567,000, of which $742,000 in value was from the United States. The value of exports of native produce in the same period was $1,388,100, of which to the value of $65,000 was Sandal wood, $59,500 bullock hides, and the rest goat skins, salt, sugar, and various other articles. There are ten vessels owned by residents, of the islands, of an aggregate tonnage of 1317 tons, valued at $65,500; seven of these vessels are owned by citizens of the United States, and three by English subjects.

On the 5th of September, three men deserted from the brig Friends, lying at the wharf in Honolulu, taking with them the ship's boat of six tons burthen, with provisions and instruments. It was supposed they had directed their course to the island of Ascension.

HAVANA.—By the brig Delia, arrived yesterday from Havana, we have received our papers to the 17th inst. Mad'le Elssler and suite had arrived from the North, and taken lodgings at the mansion of Mrs. West.

A line of steam packet ships, to run between English and South American ports, to touch at Havana, is projected, to commence their trips on or about the first of October next. Some of the shares of the company are offered for sale in Havana, on the nominal amount, of which it is guaranteed not more than 50 per cent. will be called for.

Benj. Wright, Esq., arrived at Neuvitas in the beginning of January, from New-York, with men and materials to make the Railroad from that place to Puerto Principe. Mr. W. brought with him one of Norris's best locomotives, several freight cars, and 50 operatives. The passenger cars are being made, and it is believed the enterprise will now rapidly progress to completion, and go into use.—[New Orleans Bulletin.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE.—The alarm of fire about 11 o'clock, A. M., on the 4th inst., was from the discovery that a front basement room in the house No. 27 1-2 Hudson street, near Duane, was on fire. It appears that the room was occupied by an Irish woman, of intemperate habits, who had two small children, one about 5 years, and the other half as old. About an hour before the fire was discovered, she had left the children alone in the room; and when it was entered on the discovery of the fire, the little sufferers were found with their clothes burned off, their bodies horribly burned, and dying from suffocation and pain. They were rescued as quickly as possible, and application was made to several of the neighbors to receive them temporarily, but with most unfeeling hearts several refused to admit them within their doors. At last they were taken to the door of Mrs. Robertson, No. 38 Hudson street, who promptly, and with most praiseworthy willingness, not only admitted them, but extended to them every possible aid and care to alleviate their sufferings and render them more comfortable. They were finally taken to the city hospital, where we saw them shortly after, suffering greatly from their burns, and also internally from the effects of inhaling the smoke and the flame from their burning clothes. Little expectation that they would survive was entertained. The loss of the scanty furniture of the room was the principal damage otherwise done by the fire—the result of a mother's carelessness, if not of her vicious propensity for alcohol.—[Sun.

ANOTHER MURDER.—We have just heard of another murder. About the first of December, two colored boys in the service of the Hon. Mr. Appleget, member of Council from Middlesex, from 15 to 18 years old, were sent to work with their axes, into the woods. At night the younger of the two returned home alone, and being asked about his companion, replied, that he went, some time in the day, to one of the neighbors to get a drink of cider, and he had not seen him since. Inquiry was made at the place mentioned, and it was ascertained that he had been there for that purpose. The boy not returning, Mr. A. supposed he had absconded. But, yesterday, his body was found concealed in the woods, with a large wound, apparently inflicted with an axe, on the side of his neck. The other lad was immediately arrested, and on being examined upon oath before the Coroner, at length admitted, I understand, that after his companion's return from getting a drink of cider, some difficulty occurred between them, and the latter struck him with a club, upon which he threw his axe at the aggressor. A scuffle ensued for the possession of the axe, which the younger lad at last succeeded in getting, and started off in a run, pursued by the other. Finding himself in danger of being overtaken, he hurled the axe around him, with a backward stroke, and with the edge struck his pursuer in the neck with full force, which caused death almost instantly. He then concealed the body for fear of detection. The occurrence took place not far from Spotswood, which is on the Camden and Amboy Railroad, some 10 or 15 miles south of New Brunswick. When shall we have an end of these dreadful occurrences?

MURDER.—On Thursday morning, about two o'clock, Thomas Cliff, the keeper of the 6th Ward House, went into the dwelling of a man named John Hand, whom he charged with having stolen his wood. An altercation ensued, when Cliff threatened to shoot Hand with the pistol which he had loaded for the purpose. Upon this, Hand seized Cliff, and a violent struggle ensued, during which Cliff struck Hand several blows with the butt of his pistol (a large horse pistol) fracturing his skull in such a manner as to cause his death in 24 hours. Cliff has escaped.—[Detroit Daily Advertiser.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.—A letter from an officer of the Peacock, dated Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, Oct. 20, says—"It is probable that so soon as the season will permit, the squadron will commence the survey of the N. W. coast of America and Columbia River, which will be a long and tedious business, and not until its completion will our faces turn homeward."

Professor Sparks, of Harvard University, is at Paris, engaged in his search of materials for his history of the American Revolution. He finds easy access to all the archives, public or secret, which he wishes to explore.

FAITHLESSNESS PUNISHED.—$1200 damages were awarded to a damsel in Crawford county, (Pa.) a few days since, from an inconstant swain, who refused to keep his promise of marriage.

ANOTHER.—Miss Mary L. Moore, of Clinton county, N. Y., has recovered $500 from Henry Lawrence for a breach of marriage promise.

ANOTHER.—A Miss Sanborn, of the same county, received $800 from Austin L. Woodworth, for seduction.

HUDSON LUNATIC ASYLUM.—During the year 1840, eighty-four patients were under treatment in this institution. Since its establishment, a period of ten years and a half, 503 patients have been admitted.

A correspondent of the Norfolk Herald, says that speculation designates Dr. F. Mallory, the Representative in Congress from the Norfolk District, as the Secretary of the Navy, under the ensuing administration.

Judge Palmer, of Plattsburgh, formerly a Member of Congress and of the State Legislature, and a highly respected citizen, died of consumption on the 8th of December, at the Island of St. Bartholomew.

PRODUCTION IN ILLINOIS.—Twenty millions of bushels of corn, it is stated, were produced in Illinois last year. There were also produced 385,893 lbs. tobacco, 28,121 lbs. rice, 194,191 lbs. cotton, and 323,296 lbs. sugar.

A NEW TERRITORY.—The Iowa News gives the name of Dacotah Territory to a portion of the country now within its borders, and which it says, will be formed into a distinct territory when Iowa comes to be admitted into the Union.

THE STANDING ARMY.—The Adjutant General of the United States has made a general return of the militia of the States and territories, of their arms, accoutrements, &c. for the year 1839. The whole number of militia is set down at 1,492,444.

MICHIGAN.—Resolutions requiring an immediate resumption of specie payments, have been adopted by the Legislature of Michigan.

The Philadelphia Ledger states that the Camden (N. J.) Bank, opposite that city, has suspended specie payments, after the example of its neighbors.

TEMPERANCE.—The efforts of a priest among the Irish in Lynn (Mass.) on the subject of temperance have met with much success. Upward of a hundred have taken the pledge. Instances are known in which once notorious drunkards have been thoroughly reformed, the medals which they constantly wear about their necks being a talisman which resists every temptation. One woman, who at first declined taking the pledge, afterward walked to Salem expressly to have it administered to her.

NEW SEEDING MACHINE.—Joseph Gibson, of Adrian, Michigan, has invented a machine which sows any kind of seed at broadcast, or plants in drills or hills, with mathematical accuracy, depositing the seed in such quantities as may be desired, and at any required distance, at a suitable depth below the surface, and leaving the ground smooth and even over it; performing the labor as fast as a man or horse can walk. The machine may be used for sowing wheat and other grains, and grass, for flax, hemp, turnips, beets, carrots, onions, &c., and for planting corn, beans, and the like.

THE RICHMOND BANKS.—Upon the receipt on Saturday evening last of the intelligence that the Bank of the United States had suspended specie payments, the officers of the Banks of Richmond held a meeting, and decided to continue specie payments, regardless of the course of the Bank of the United States.

The public may be satisfied that our Banks will carry out the resolution to pay specie—says the Richmond Compiler.

A young Wyandot warrior was lately tried at Upper Sandusky, (Ohio,) by the males of the tribe, in full council. He was found guilty of the murder, and sentenced to be shot—which sentence was executed accordingly.

A German named Milteberger, fell into the Delaware at Philadelphia on Sunday evening last, having a little son in his arms, and both were drowned, although efforts were immediately made to rescue them.

The United States Gazette says that it does "not find that the United States Bank refuses the notes of the other banks, though they ref. se her's." Very sensible are the other banks, in our opinion. They certainly are under no obligation to take the obligations of a worthless, bankrupt concern.

In a message sent by Governor Porter to the Legislature of Pennsylvania on the 5th instant, it is stated that the amount of loans made by the banks to the Commonwealth during the past year was $2,500,000, exclusive of the $800,000 borrowed on the 1st of February. $99,000 have been loaned by individuals, leaving the actual amount received from the banks $3,200,000.

IRON MOUNTAIN.—It is stated in the Woodstock (Va.) Sentinel, that it has recently been discovered that a mountain in that vicinity, known as Paddy Mountain, is almost entirely a mass of iron ore; the ore in huge rocks projects from the earth in all directions, and upon actual experiment proves to be very valuable, yielding seventy per cent. after being fused.

BOSTON AND MAINE RAILROAD.—A bill is before the Legislature of Maine, to incorporate a company with authority to extend the Boston and Maine Railroad, from Somersworth in New Hampshire, near Dover, through the towns of Sanford and Alfred, passing by Sebago pond, by the most convenient route to Augusta, and thence on the most convenient route to Bangor.

We learn from the Cumberland Civilian that a deliberate murder was committed on the body of Mr. William Dudley, from Cornwall, England, who for the last two years has had charge of the works in the tunnel of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. He was shot down on the night of the 23d ult., while on his way home from work, and was afterwards severely beaten with clubs. It is suspected that the murder was committed by three laborers whom he had discharged from employment some weeks before.

THE PROTHONOTARY WARBLER.

Audubon's Ornithology.

THE PROTHONOTARY WARBLER.*

BY JOHN JAMES AUDUBON, F.R.S.S. L. & E.

"I never saw this pretty bird in any of our eastern districts; and rarely farther up the Ohio than Louisville, in the neighborhood of which place it rears its young. Louisiana seems in fact better suited to its habits than any other state, on account of its numerous lakes, creeks and lagoons, overshadowed by large trees, and which are favorite places of resort for this species. It is fond of flying over the water of these creeks and lagoons, and is seldom seen in the woods. Its flight is rapid, and more steady than is usual in birds of its genus: and as it moves along, the brightness of its colors attracts the eye. On alighting, it moves rapidly along the twigs, partly sidewise, frequently turning about and extending its neck to look under the leaves, from which it picks various kinds of insects. It often perches upon the rank grasses and water plants, in quest of minute molluscous animals which creep upon them, and which, together with small land snails, I have found in its stomach. It does not perform sorties, or sally forth after flying insects, as many other Warblers are in the habit of doing. It has a few notes for its song, which possess no interest. The males, when chasing each other, keep up a creaking noise, until the little battle is over, when they perch and balance their body with much grace and liveliness.

I have observed their arrival in Louisiana to take place, according to the state of the weather, from the middle of March to the first of April. At Henderson, in Kentucky, they do not arrive until a month later. They remain until October, but I am inclined to believe, rear only a single brood in a season. The nest is fixed in the fork of a small twig bending over the water, and is constructed of slender grasses, soft mosses, and fine fibrous roots. The number of eggs is from four to six. I could never ascertain whether the male assists in incubation, as the difference of plumage in the sexes is not perceptible when the bird is at large, and indeed can hardly be traced when one has procured the male and the female for comparison. It cannot be called a plentiful species. To search for them on the high lands, or at any considerable distance from the places mentioned, would prove quite useless.

The plant on which you see these birds, grows in swampy places, but is extremely rare, and I have not been able to procure any scientific appellation for it. In Louisiana, it is called the Cane Vine. It bears a small white flower in clusters. The berries are bitter and nauseous. The stem, which runs up and over trees, resembles that of other climbing plants, is extremely elastic, and as tough as a cord. The leaves, of which you see the form and color, are also tough and thick.

THE ECCENTRIC NATURALIST.

"What an odd looking fellow!" said I to myself, as while walking by the river, I observed a man landing from a boat, with what I thought a bundle of dried clover on his back; "how the boatmen stare at him! sure he must be an original!" He ascended with a rapid step, and approaching me, asked if I could point out the house in which Mr. AUDUBON resided. "Why, I am the man," said I, "and will gladly lead you to my dwelling."

The traveller rubbed his hands together with delight, and drawing a letter from his pocket, handed it to me without any remark. I broke the seal and read as follows: "My dear AUDUBON, I send you an odd fish, which you may prove to be undescribed, and hope you will do so in your next letter. Believe me always your friend B." With all the simplicity of a woodsman I asked the bearer where the odd fish was, when M. de T. (for, kind reader, the individual in my presence was none else than that renowned naturalist) smiled, rubbed his hands, and with the greatest good humor said, "I am that odd fish, I presume, Mr. Audubon." I felt confounded, and blushed, but contrived to stammer an apology.

We soon reached the house, when I presented my learned guest to my family, and was ordering a servant to go to the boat for M. de T.'s luggage, when he told me he had none but what he brought on his back. He then loosened the pack of weeds which had first drawn my attention. The ladies were a little surprised, but I checked their critical glances for the moment. The naturalist pulled off his shoes, and while engaged in drawing his stockings, not up, but down, in order to cover the holes about the heels, told us in the gayest mood imaginable that he had walked a great distance, and had only taken a passage on board the ark, to be put on this shore, and that he was sorry his apparel had suffered so much from his late journey. Clean clothes were offered, but he would not accept them, and it was with evident reluctance that he performed the lavations usual on such occasions before he sat down to dinner.

At table, however, his agreeable conversation made us all forget his singular appearance; and, indeed, it was only as we strolled together in the garden that his attire struck me as exceedingly remarkable. A long, loose coat of yellow nankeen, much the worse of the many rubs it had got in its time, and stained all over with the juice of plants, hung loosely about him like a sac. A waistcoat of the same, with enormous pockets, and buttoned up to the chin, reached below over a pair of tight pantaloons, the lower parts of which were buttoned down to the ankles. His beard was as long as I have known my own to be during some of my peregrinations, and his lank black hair hung loosely over his shoulders. His forehead was so broad and prominent that any tyro in phrenology would instantly have pronounced it the residence of a mind of strong powers. His words impressed an assurance of rigid truth, and as he directed the conversation to the study of the natural sciences, I listened to him with as much delight as Telemaachus could have listened to Mentor. He had come to visit me, he said, expressly for the purpose of seeing my drawings, having been told that my representations of birds were accompanied with those of shrubs and plants, and he was desirous of knowing whether I might chance to have in my collection any with which he was unacquainted. I observed some degree of impatience in his request to be allowed at once to see what I had. We returned to the house, when I opened my portfolios and laid them before him.

He chanced to turn over the drawing of a plant quite new to him. After inspecting it closely, he shook his head, and told me no such plant existed in nature;—for, kind reader, M. de T. although a highly scientific man, was suspicious to a fault, and believed such plants only to exist as he had himself seen, or such as, having been discovered of old, had, according to Father MALEBRANCHE's expression, acquired a "venerable beard." I told my guest that the plant was common in the immediate neighborhood, and that I should show it him on the morrow. "And why to-morrow, Mr. Audubon? let us go now." We did so, and on reaching the bank of the river, I pointed to the plant. M. de T. I thought had gone mad. He plucked the plants one after another, danced, hugged me in his arms, and exultingly told me that he had got not merely a new species, but a new genus. When we returned home, the naturalist opened the bundle which he had brought on his back, and took out a journal rendered water-proof by means of a leather case, together with a small parcel of linen, examined the new plant, and wrote its description. The examination of my drawings then went on. You would be pleased, kind reader, to hear his criticisms, which were of the greatest advantage to me, for, being well acquainted with books as well as with nature, he was well fitted to give me advice.

It was summer, and the heat was so great that the windows were all open. The light of the candles attracted many insects, among which was observed a large species of Scarabæus. I caught one, and, aware of his inclination to believe only what he should himself see, I showed him the insect, and assured him it was so strong that it would crawl on the table with the candlestick on its back. "I should like to see the experiment made, Mr. Audubon," he replied. It was accordingly made, and the insect moved about, dragging its burden so as to make the candlestick change its position as if by magic, until coming upon the edge of the table, it dropped on the floor, took to wing, and made its escape.

When it waxed late, I showed him to the apartment intended for him during his stay, and endeavored to render him comfortable, leaving him writing materials in abundance. I was indeed heartily glad to have a naturalist under my roof. We had all retired to rest. Every person I imagined was in deep slumber save myself, when of a sudden I heard a great uproar in the naturalist's room. I got up, reached the place in a few moments, and opened the door, when, to my astonishment, I saw my guest running about the room naked, holding the handle of my favorite violin, the body of which he had battered to pieces against the walls in attempting to kill the bats which had entered by the open window, probably attracted by the insects flying around his candle. I stood amazed, but he continued jumping and running round and round, until he was fairly exhausted, when he begged me to procure one of the animals for him, as he felt convinced they belonged to "a new species." Although I was convinced of the contrary, I took up the bow of my demolished Cremona, and administering a smart tap to each of the bats as it came up, soon got specimens enough. The war ended, I again bade him good night, but could not help observing the state of the room. It was strewn with plants, which it would seem he had arranged into groups, but which were now scattered about in confusion. "Never mind, Mr. Audubon," quoth the eccentric naturalist, "never mind, I'll soon arrange them again. I have the bats, and that's enough."

Several days passed, during which we followed our several occupations. M. de T. searched the woods for plants, and I for birds. He also followed the margins of the Ohio, and picked up many shells, which he greatly extolled. With us, I told him, they were gathered into heaps to be converted into lime. "Lime! Mr. Audubon; why, they are worth a guinea a piece in any part of Europe." One day, as I was returning from a hunt in a cane-brake, he observed that I was wet and splattered with mud, and desired me to show him the interior of one of these places, which he said he had never visited.

The Cane, kind reader, formerly grew spontaneously over the greater portions of the State of Kentucky and other Western Districts of our Union, as well as in many farther south. Now, however, cultivation, the introduction of cattle and horses, and other circumstances connected with the progress of civilization, have greatly altered the face of the country, and reduced the cane within comparatively small limits. It attains a height of from twelve to thirty feet, and a diameter of from one to two, and grows in great patches resembling osier-holts, in which occur plants of all sizes. The plants frequently grow so close together, and in course of time become so tangled, as to present an almost impenetrable thicket. A portion of ground thus covered with canes is called a Cane-brake.

If you picture to yourself one of these cane-brakes growing beneath the gigantic trees that form our western forests, interspersed with vines of many species, and numberless plants of every description, you may conceive how difficult it is for one to make his way through it, especially after a heavy shower of rain or a fall of sleet, when the traveller, in forcing his way through, shakes down upon himself such quantities of water, as soon to reduce him to a state of the utmost discomfort. The hunters often cut little paths through the thickets with their knives, but the usual mode of passing through them is by pushing one's self backward, and wedging a way between the stems. To follow a bear or cougar pursued by dogs through these brakes, is a task, the accomplishment of which may be imagined, but of the difficulties and dangers accompanying which I cannot easily give an adequate representation.

The canes generally grow on the richest soil, and are particularly plentiful along the margins of the great western rivers. Many of our new settlers are fond of forming farms in their immediate vicinity, as the plant is much relished by all kinds of cattle and horses, which feed upon it at all seasons, and again because these brakes are plentifully stocked with game of various kinds. It sometimes happens that the farmer clears a portion of the brake. This is done by cutting the stems, which are fistular and knotted, like those of other grasses, with a large knife or cutlass. They are afterwards placed in heaps, and when partially dried set fire to. The moisture contained between the joints is converted into steam, which causes the cane to burst with a smart report, and when a whole mass is crackling, the sounds resemble discharges of musquetry. Indeed, I have been told that travellers floating down the rivers, and unacquainted with these circumstances, have been induced to pull their oars with redoubled rigor, apprehending the attack of a host of savages, ready to scalp every one of the party.

A day being fixed, we left home after an early breakfast, crossed the Ohio, and entered the woods. I had determined that my companion should view a cane-brake in all its perfection, and after leading him several miles in a direct course, came upon as fine a sample as existed in that part of the country. We entered, and for some time proceeded without much difficulty, as I led the way, and cut down the canes which were most likely to incommode him. The difficulties gradually increased, so that we were presently obliged to turn our backs to the foe, and push ourselves on the best way we could. My companion stopped here and there to pick up a plant and examine it. After a while, we chanced to come upon the top of a fallen tree, which so obstructed our passage that we were on the eve of going round, instead of thrusting ourselves through amongst the branches, when, from its bed in the centre of the tangled mass, forth rushed a bear, with such force, and snuffing the air in so frightful a manner, that M. de T. became suddenly terror-struck, and, in his haste to escape, made a desperate attempt to run, but fell amongst the canes in such a way that he looked as if pinioned. Perceiving him jammed in between the stalks, and thoroughly frightened, I could not refrain from laughing at the ridiculous exhibition which he made. My gaiety, however, was not very pleasing to the savant, who called out for aid, which was at once administered. Gladly would he have retraced his steps, but I was desirous that he should be able to describe a cane-brake, and enticed him to follow me, by telling him that our worst difficulties were nearly over. We proceeded, for by this time the bear was out of hearing.

The way became more and more tangled. I saw with delight that a heavy cloud, portentous of a thunder gust, was approaching. In the mean time, I kept my companion in such constant difficulties, that he now panted, perspired, and seemed almost overcome by fatigue. The thunder began to rumble, and soon after a dash of heavy rain drenched us in a few minutes. The withered particles of leaves and bark attached to the canes stuck to our clothes. We received many scratches from briars, and now and then a twitch from a nettle. M. de T. seriously inquired if we should ever get alive out of the horrible situation in which we were. I spoke of courage and patience, and told him I hoped we should soon get to the margin of the brake, which, however, I knew to be two miles distant. I made him rest, and gave him a mouthful of brandy from my flask; after which, we proceeded on our slow and painful march. He threw away all his plants, emptied his pockets of the fungi, lichens, and mosses which he had thrust into them, and finding himself much lightened, went on for thirty or forty yards with a better grace. But, kind reader, enough—I led the naturalist first one way, then another, until I had nearly lost myself in the brake, although I was well acquainted with it, kept him tumbling and crawling on his hands and knees, until long after mid-day, when we at length reached the edge of the river. I blew my horn, and soon showed my companion a boat coming to our rescue. We were ferried over, and, on reaching the house, found more agreeable occupation in replenishing our empty coffers.

M. de T. remained with us for three weeks, and collected multitudes of plants, shells, bats, and fishes, but never again expressed a desire of visiting a cane-brake. We were perfectly reconciled to his oddities, and, finding him a most agreeable and intelligent companion, hoped that his sojourn might be of long duration. But, one evening when tea was prepared, and we expected him to join the family, he was nowhere to be found. His grasses and other valuables were all removed from his room. The night was spent in searching for him in the neighborhood. No eccentric naturalist could be discovered. Whether he had perished in a swamp, or had been devoured by a bear or a gar-fish, or had taken to his heels, were matters of conjecture; nor was it until some weeks after, that a letter from him, thanking us for our attention, assured me of his safety.

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH.

Book the Second.... Mary the Queen.

[Concluded.]

Nightgall was now within the southern gallery of the White Tower, and Renard shouted to him to step; but he heeded not the cry. In another moment, he reached a door, opening upon the north-east turret. It was bolted, and the time lost in unfastening it, brought Renard close upon him. Nightgall would have descended, but thinking he heard voices below, he ran up the winding stairs.

Renard now felt secure of him, and uttered a shout of savage delight. The fugitive would have gained the roof, if he had not been intercepted by a party of men, who at the very moment he reached the doorway communicating with the leads presented themselves at it. Hearing the clamor raised by Renard and his followers below, these men commanded Nightgall to surrender. Instead of complying, the miserable fugitive, now at his wits' end, rushed backwards, with the determination of assailing Renard. He met the ambassador at a turn in the stairs a little below, and aimed a desperate blow at him with his dagger. But Renard easily warded it off, and pressing him backwards, drove him into one of the deep embrasures at the side.

Driven to desperation, Nightgall at first thought of springing through the loophole; but the involuntary glance that he cast below, made him recoil. On seeing his terror, Renard was filled with delight, and determined to prolong his enjoyment. In vain, Nightgall endeavored to escape from the dreadful snare in which he was caught. He was driven remorselessly back. In vain, he implored mercy in the most abject terms. None was shown him. Getting within the embrasure, which was about twelve feet deep, Renard deliberately pricked the wretched man with the point of his sword, and forced him slowly backwards.

Nightgall struggled desperately against the horrible fate that awaited him, striking at Renard with his dagger, clutched convulsively against the wall, and disputing the ground inch by inch. But all was unavailing. Scarcely a foot's space intervened between him and destruction, when Renard sprang forward, and pushed him by main force through the loophole. He uttered a fearful cry, and tried to grasp at the roughened surface of the wall. Renard watched his descent. It was from a height of near ninety feet.

He fell with a terrific smash upon the pavement of the court below. Three or four halberdiers, who were passing at a little distance, hearing the noise, ran towards him, but finding he was not dead, though almost dashed to pieces, and scarcely retaining a vestige of humanity, they brought a shutter, and conveyed him to the lower guard-room, as already related.

"I have no hope of mercy," gasped the dying man, as his request was complied with, and Cicely, with averted eyes, stood beside him, "and I deserve none. But I will make what atonement I can for my evil deeds. Listen to me, Cicely, (or rather I should say Angela, for that is your rightful name,) you are the daughter of Sir Alberic Mountjoy, and were born while your parents were imprisoned in the Tower. Your mother, the Lady Grace, lost her reason on the day of her husband's execution, as I have before stated. But she did not expire as I gave out. My motive for setting on foot this story, and for keeping her existence secret, was the hope of making her mine if she recovered her senses, as I had reason to believe would be the case."

"Wretch!" exclaimed Cholmondeley.

"You cannot upbraid me more than I now upbraid myself," groaned Nightgall; "but my purpose was thwarted. The ill-fated lady never recovered, and disappointment, acting upon my evil nature, made me treat her with such cruelty that her senses became more unsettled than ever."

"Alas! alas!" cried Cicely, bursting into tears; "my poor mother! what a fate was yours!"

"When all hope of her recovery was extinguished," continued Nightgall, "I thought, that if any change occurred in the sovereignty or religion of the country, I might, by producing her, and relating a feigned story, obtain a handsome reward for her preservation. But this expectation also passed by. And I must confess that, at length, my only motive for allowing her to exist was that she formed an object to exercise my cruelty upon."

"Heaven's curse upon you!" cried Cholmondeley.

"Spare your maledictions," rejoined Nightgall; "or heap them on my lifeless clay. You will soon be sufficiently avenged. Give me another draught of wine, for my lips are so dry I can scarcely speak, and I would not willingly expire till I have made known the sum of my wickedness."

The wine given to him he proceeded.

"I will not tell you all the devilish cruelties I practised upon the wretched Alexia, (for so, as you are aware, I called her, to conceal her real name,)—because from what you have seen you may guess the rest. But I kept her a solitary captive in those secret dungeons, for a term of nearly seventeen years—ever since your birth, in short," he added, to Cicely. "Sometimes, she would elude my vigilance, and run shrieking along the passages. But when any of the jailors beheld her, they fled, supposing her a supernatural being."

"Her shrieks were indeed dreadful," remarked Cholmondeley. "I shall never forget their effect upon me. But you allowed her to perish from famine at last?"

"Her death was accidental," replied Nightgall, in a hollow voice, "though it lies as heavy on my soul as if I had designed it. I had shut her up for security in the cell in the Devilin Tower, where you found her, meaning to visit her at night, as was my custom, with provisions. But I was sent on special business by the queen to the palace at Greenwich for three days; and on my return to the Tower, I found the wretched captive dead."

"She had escaped you, then," said Cholmondeley, bitterly. "But you have not spoken of her daughter?"

"First, let me tell you where I have hidden the body, that decent burial may be given it," groaned Nightgall. "It lies in the vault beneath the Devilin Tower—in the centre of the chamber—not deep—not deep."

"I shall not forget," replied Cholmondeley, noticing with alarm that an awful change had taken place in his countenance.

"What of her child?"

"I must be brief," replied Nightgall faintly; "for I feel that my end approaches. The little Angela was conveyed by me, to Dame Potentia Trusbut. I said she was the offspring of a lady of rank—but revealed no name—and what I told beside was a mere fable. The good dame, having no child of her own, readily adopted her, and named her Cicely. She grew up in years—in beauty; and as I beheld her dawning charms, the love I had entertained for the mother was transferred to the child—nay, it was ten times stronger. I endeavored to gain her affections, and fancied I should succeed, till you"—looking at Cholmondeley—"appeared. Then I saw my suit was hopeless. Then evil feelings again took possession of me, and I began a fresh career of crime. You know the rest."

"I do," replied Cholmondeley. "Have you aught further to disclose?"

"Only this," rejoined Nightgall, who was evidently on the verge of dissolution. "Cut open my doublet; and within its folds you will find proofs of Angela's birth, together with other papers referring to her ill-fated parents. Lay them before the Queen; and I make no doubt that the estates of her father, who was a firm adherent to the Catholic faith, and died for it, as well as a staunch supporter of Queen Catherine of Arragon, will be restored to her."

Cholmondeley lost not a moment in obeying the injunction. He cut open the blood-stained jerkin of the dying man, and found, as he had stated, a packet.

"That is it," cried Nightgall, fixing his glazing eyes on Angela—"that will restore you to your wealth—your title. The priest by whom you were baptised was the Queen's confessor, Feckenham. He will remember the circumstance—he was the ghostly counsellor of both your parents. Take the packet to him and he will plead your cause with the Queen. Forget—forgive me—"

His utterance was suddenly choked by a stream of blood that gushed from his mouth, and with a hideous expression of pain he expired.

"Horrible!" cried Angela, placing her hands before her eyes.

"Think not of him," said Cholmondeley, supporting her, and removing her to a little distance—"think of the misery you have escaped—of the rank to which you will assuredly be restored. When I first beheld those proud and beautiful lineaments, I was certain they belonged to one of high birth. And I was not mistaken."

"What matters my newly-discovered birth—my title—my estates, if I obtain them—if you are lost to me!" cried Angela, despairingly. "I shall never know happiness without you."

As she spoke, an usher, who had entered the guard-room, marched up to Cholmondeley, and said, "I am the bearer of the Queen's pardon to you. Your life is spared, at the instance of the Spanish ambassador. But you are to remain a prisoner on parole, within the fortress, during the royal pleasure."

"It is now my turn to support you," said Angela, observing her lover stagger, and turn deadly pale.

"So many events crowd upon my brain," cried Cholmondeley, "that I begin to fear for my reason—Air!—air!"

Led into the open court, he speedily recovered, and in a transport of such joy as has seldom been experienced, he accompanied Angela to the Stone Kitchen, where they were greeted with mingled tears and rejoicings by Dame Potentia and her spouse.

In the course of the day, Cholmondeley sought out Feckenham, and laid the papers before him. The confessor confirmed all that Nightgall had stated respecting the baptism of the infant daughter of Lady Mountjoy, and the other documents satisfied him that the so-called Cicely was that daughter. He undertook to lay the case at once before the Queen, and was as good as his word. Mary heard his statement with the deepest interest, but made no remark; and at its conclusion desired that the damsel might be brought before her.

XXXVH.—How Jane was imprisoned in the Martin Tower; how she was visited by Roger Ascham; how she received Feckenham's announcement that the time of her execution was fixed; and how she was respite for three days.

The Martin Tower (or as it is now termed, the Jewel Tower, from the purpose to which it is appropriated,) where Jane was confined by the Queen's commands, lies at the north-eastern extremity of the ballium wall, and corresponds in size and structure with the Develin, or Devereux Tower at the opposite angle. Circular in form like the last-mentioned building, and erected, in all probability, at the same period—the latter end of the reign of John, or the commencement of that of Henry the Third—it consists of two stories, having walls of immense thickness, and containing, as is the case with every other fortification, deep recesses terminated by narrow loop-holes. A winding stone staircase, still in a tolerable state of preservation, communicates with these stories, and with the roof, which was formerly embattled, and defended on either side by two small square turrets. Externally, on the west, the Martin Tower has lost its original character; the walls being new-frosted and modernised, and a flight of steps raised to the upper story, completely masking the ancient door-way, which now forms the entrance to the jewel-room. On the east, however, it retains much of its ancient appearance, though in part concealed by surrounding habitations; and when the building now in progress, and intended for the reception of the regalia, is completed, it will be still further hidden. While digging for the foundations of the proposed structure, which were sunk much below the level of the ballium wall, it became apparent that the ground had been artificially raised to a considerable height by an embankment of gravel and sand; and the prodigious solidity and strength of the wall were proved from the difficulty experienced by the workmen in breaking through it, to effect a communication with the new erection.

Within, on the basement floor, on the left of the passage, and generally hidden by the massive portal, is a small cell constructed in the thickness of the wall; and further on, the gloomy chamber used as a depository for the crown ornaments, and which requires to be artificially lighted, is noticeable for its architecture, having a vaulted and groined roof of great beauty. The upper story, part of the residence of Mr. Swift, the keeper of the regalia, at present comprehends two apartments, with a hall leading to them, while the ceiling having been lowered, other rooms are gained. Here, besides the ill-fated and illustrious lady whose history forms the subject of this chronicle, was confined the lovely, and perhaps guiltless Anne Boleyn. The latter fact, has, however, been doubted, and the upper chamber in the Beauchamp Tower assigned as the place of her imprisonment. But this supposition, from many circumstances, appears improbable, and the inscription bearing her name, and carved near the entrance of the hall, is conclusive as to her having been confined in this tower.

Here, in 1641, the twelve bishops, impeached of high treason by the revolutionary party in the House of Commons, for protesting against the force used against them, and the acts done in their absence, were imprisoned during their commitment to the Tower—at least, so runs the legend, though it is difficult to conceive how so many persons could be accommodated in so small a place. Here, also, Blood made his atrocious attempt (a story still involved in obscurity—it has been conjectured, with some show of probability, that he was prompted to the deed by Charles himself,) to steal the crown jewels, and in this very chamber, the venerable Talbot Edwards made his gallant defence of the royal ensigns, receiving for his bravery and his wounds, a paltry grant of two hundred pounds, half of which, owing to vexatious delays, he only received, while the baffled robber was rewarded with a post at court, and a pension of five hundred pounds a-year in Ireland. Can it be doubted after this which of the two was the offender, in the eyes of the monarch?

It must not be omitted that the Jewel Tower enjoys, in common with its corresponding fortification, the Devereux Tower, the reputation of being haunted. Its ghostly visitant is a female figure robed in white—whether the spirit of Anne Boleyn, or the ill-fated Jane, cannot be precisely ascertained.

The Martin Tower acquired its present designation of the Jewel Tower, in the reign of James the First when the crown ornaments were removed to it from a small building, where they had been hitherto kept, on the south side of the White Tower. The regalia was first exhibited to the public in the reign of Charles the Second, when many of the perquisites of the ancient master of the Jewel House were abolished, and its privileges annexed to the office of the lord chamberlain.

Jane's present prison was far more commodious than her former place of confinement in the Brick Tower, and by Mary's express injunctions, every attention consistent with her situation was shown her. Strange as it may seem, she felt easier, if not happier, than she had done during the latter part of the period of her liberation. Then, she was dissatisfied with herself, anxious for her husband, certain of the failure of his enterprise, and almost desiring its failure—now, the worst was past. No longer agitated by the affairs of the world, she could suffer with patience, and devote herself wholly to God. Alone within her prison-chamber she prayed with more fervor than she had been able to do for months; and the soothing effect it produced was such, that she felt almost grateful for her chastening. "I am better able to bear misfortune than prosperity," she murmured, and I cannot be too thankful to Heaven that I am placed in a situation to call forth my strength. Oh! that Dudley may be able to endure his trial with equal fortitude!—But I fear his proud heart will rebel. Sustain him, Lord! I beseech thee, and bring him to a true sense of his condition."

Convinced that her days were now numbered, having now no hope of pardon, scarcely desiring it, and determined to reject it, if coupled with any conditions affecting her faith, Jane made every preparation for her end. No longer giving up a portion of her time to study, she entirely occupied herself with her devotions. Influenced by the controversial spirit of the times, she had before been as anxious to overcome her opponents in argument as they were to convince her of her errors. Now, though feeling equally strong in her cause, she was more lowly-minded. Reproaching herself bitterly with her departure from her duty, she sought by incessant prayer, by nightly vigil, by earnest and heart-felt supplication to wipe out the offence. "I have not sinned in ignorance," she thought, "but with my eyes open, and therefore my fault is far greater than if no light had been vouchsafed me. By sincere contrition alone can I hope to work out my salvation; and if sorrow, remorse, and shame, combined with the most earnest desire of amendment, constitute repentance, I am truly contrite. But I feel my own unworthiness, and though I know the mercy of heaven is infinite, yet I scarcely dare to hope for forgiveness for my trespasses. I have trusted too much to myself already—and find that I relied on a broken reed. I will now trust only to God."

And thus she passed her time, in the most rigid self-examination, fixing her thoughts above, and withdrawing them as much as possible from earth. The effect was speedily manifest in her altered looks and demeanor. When first brought to the Martin Tower, she was downcast and despairing. Ere three days had passed, she became calm, and almost cheerful, and her features resumed their wonted serene and seraphic expression. She could not, it is true, deaden the pangs that ever and anon shook her, when she thought of her husband and father. But she strove to console herself by the hope that they would be purified, like herself, by the trial to which they were subjected, and that their time of separation would be brief. To the duke she addressed that touching letter preserved among the few fragments of her writings, which, after it had been submitted to Gardner, was allowed to be delivered to him. It concluded with these words: "And thus, good father, I have opened unto you the state wherein I presently stand—my death at hand. Although to you it may seem woful, yet to me there is nothing that can be more welcome than to aspire from this Vale of Misery to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure with Christ, my Saviour. In whose steadfast faith (if it may be lawful for the daughter so to write to the father,) the Lord who hath hitherto strengthened you, so continue to keep you, that at last we may meet in heaven."

With her husband she was allowed no communication; and in reply to her request to see him once more, she was told that their sole meeting would be on the scaffold—a wanton insult, for it was not intended to execute them together. The room, or rooms, (for the large circular chamber was even then divided by a partition,) occupied by Jane in the Martin Tower, were those on the upper story, tenanted, as before-mentioned by the keeper of the regalia; and her chief place of resort during the day-time was one of the deep embrasures looking towards the north. In this recess, wholly unobserved and undisturbed, she remained, while light lasted, upon her knees, with a book of prayers, or the Bible before her, fearful of losing one of the precious moments which flew by so quickly—and now so tranquilly. At night she withdrew, not to repose, but to a small table in the midst of the apartment, on which she placed the sacred volume and a lamp, and knelt down beside it. Had she not feared to disturb her calm condition, she would not have allowed herself more than an hour's repose, at the longest intervals nature could endure. But desirous of maintaining her composure to the last, she yielded to the demand, and from midnight to the third hour stretched herself upon her couch. She then arose, and resumed her devotions. The same rules were observed in the food she permitted herself to take. Restricting herself to bread and water, she ate and drank sufficient to support nature, and no more.

On the fourth day of her confinement, the jailor informed her there was a person without who had an order from the Queen to see her. Though Jane would have gladly refused admittance to the applicant, she answered meekly, "Let him come in."

Immediately afterward a grave-looking middle-aged man, with a studious countenance, overclouded with sorrow, appeared. He was attired in a black robe, and carried a flat velvet cap in his hand.

"What, Master Roger Ascham, my old instructor!" exclaimed Jane, rising as he approached, and extending her hand to him, "I am glad to see you."

Ascham was deeply affected. The tears rushed to his eyes, and it was some moments before he could speak.

"Do not lament for me, good friend," said Jane, in a cheerful tone, "but rejoice with me, that I have so profited by your instructions as to be able to bear my present lot with resignation."

"I do indeed heartily rejoice at it, honored and dear madam," replied Ascham, subduing his emotion, "and I would gladly persuade myself that my instructions had contributed in however slight a degree to your present composure. But you derive your fortitude from a higher source than any on earth. It is your piety, not your wisdom that sustains you; and though I have pointed out the way to the living waters at which you have drunk, it is to that alone that you owe the inestimable blessing of your present frame of mind. I came not hither to depress, but to cheer you—not to instruct, but to be instructed. Your life, madam, will afford the world one of the noblest lessons it has ever received, and though your career may be closed at the point whence most others start, it will have been run long enough."
